When about seventy-five years of age, Vasari tells us, he used to be just as indefatigable with his chisel and hammer as when he was a stout young man; he had near his bedroom, if not in it (for he lived in a most primitive and simple manner), an immense block of marble, and when he had nothing else to do he used to be hammering at that, and when asked why he so continually worked at this branch of his various Arts he used to reply that he did it for amusement to pass his time, and that it was good for his health to take exercise with the mallet. He undertook at that age, out of an enormous block of marble, to bring out four figures larger than life, representing the descent from the cross; and he had nearly worked out the figure of Our Lord when, happening to meet with a vein that was hard and troublesome, he one day broke it into half a dozen pieces. It was seen in this state by a friend, and his servant begged it for him. It was put together, and it is now to be seen at Florence. But Vasari says that it was necessary, in order to give him occupation, to get another large block of marble and put it near his bed, that so he might continue at his work, and he began another group of the same sort. This was at the age of 75. And Vasari gives us an interesting account of how he worked: he says he was remarkably sober, and while performing his greatest works, such as the paintings, he rarely took more than a crust of bread and a glass of wine for his dinner. This sobriety, he says, made him very vigilant, and not requiring much sleep; and very often in the night he used to rise when he could not sleep, and then he worked away with his chisel, having made for himself a sort of helmet, or cap, out of pasteboard, and upon the middle of this, in the top, he had his candle, so that the shadow of his body never could be thrown upon the work.

Apropos of this, Vasari tells us an anecdote which is interesting, as showing the character of Michael Angelo and of his time. Vasari observes that he never used wax candles for this purpose, but a particular sort of candles made of goat's tallow, which, he says, are particularly excellent.

Wishing to make him a present, he (Vasari) sent to Michael Angelo his servant one day with four bags of these particular candles, containing 40lbs. of them. The servant brought them, and Michael Angelo, who never accepted a present, told him to take them back again; he would not receive them. The servant said, "They have nearly broken my arm in bringing them; and I shall not carry them back." "Then do what you like with them," said Michael Angelo. "Then," replied the servant, "I observed, as I came to your house, that just before your door there was a nice bed of just hardened mud; I'll go and stick all the candles in this, and light them all, and leave them there." Michael Angelo said, "No, I can't allow you to make such a confusion as there would be about my door; so you may leave them." This shows the homely and friendly way in which the artists lived among themselves. (Cheers.)

Now, we have a very interesting account of the manner in which he used to work at this marble, from a contemporary French writer, who says: "I can say that I have seen Michael Angelo when he was about sixty years of age, and not then very robust, make the fragments of marble fly about at such a rate that he cut off more in a quarter of an hour than three strong young men could have done in an hour, a thing almost incredible to any one who has not seen it; and he used to work with such fury, with such an impetus, that it was feared he would have dashed the whole marble to pieces, making at each stroke chips of three or four fingers' thick fly off into the air;" and that with a material in which, if he had gone only a hair's breadth too far, he would have totally destroyed the work, which could not be restored like plaster or clay.

Going now to another part of the world for the same Art, we return to Nuremberg, and find a most magnificent piece of sculpture in stone, unrivalled in the delicacy and exquisite beauty of the work; that is the tabernacle in the Church of Saint Lawrence. It rises from the ground and goes up, not merely to the top of a very high church, running along like a plant, with one of the pillars against which it is built; but, as if the church was not high enough for it, creeping far beyond, and making the most graceful termination, which has nothing similar in works of this sort. So beautiful and delicate is the whole work, representing all the mysteries of Our Lord's Life and Passion, that, for a long time, people used to assert that it was not stone, but modelled in some composition. But it has been proved beyond doubt that it is stone. Now, the man who made this was a mason—a common working stone-mason—Adam Kraft, who built part of the tower of the church, and whose name is upon it as the mason who built it; and he until 1490, when he was 53 years of age, had never attempted to work as a sculptor; and yet before he died he had not only executed many beautiful works, and among them a carved staircase in the tower, but this exquisite work, which is without a parallel. He has represented the whole of it as supported by three kneeling figures, himself and his two apprentices, who executed alone the whole work.

We see, therefore, that wherever there has really been grand or noble work executed in statuary, by sculptors, they have been artificers as well as designers; they have done the work with their own hands, as well as imagined it in their own fancies. (Cheers.)

Let us go now to another department of Art. We have treated of metals and carved work in wood and stone. Let us go now to pottery. I have already observed that those beautiful vases, known by the name of Etruscan, were really made, originally, for domestic use; that, consequently, they were made by the potter, and not by a fine artist only—this has been fully proved. It used to be thought at one time that they were all funereal, or of symbolical use, being found almost entirely in tombs; but it has been proved that the greater part of them were for the common domestic purposes of the table and the household—that some, indeed, were given as prizes at the games, filled with oil; others were marriage presents, kept with more care in houses; but still they were the work of the potter, and must have been produced entirely by hand. This was so much considered as a branch of Art that, in early Rome, in the time of Numa, there was a College of Potters—they were ennobled by being made a special guild. Any one who went through the Exhibition must have been particularly struck with the elegance of forms which prevailed in all the Indian, and also in the Turkish pottery; and the common vessels, used to carry water on the head by the peasantry of Italy and Spain, have the same elegance of form which very little of our china, or of our finest pottery, can exhibit; and the question naturally suggests itself—how is this, that in many other countries there should be such beautiful productions, and at the same time that we should not be able to give the same beauty of form? The answer to this is given, I think, very correctly by Mr. Digby Wyatt, in his beautiful work on the late Exhibition. He observes, that "there can be no doubt that the reason of this beauty in the old pottery and in that of the East is, that it is made entirely by the workman himself. There can be little doubt that the most beautiful forms of Greek and Etruscan vases have been generated by a simple process of formation, and by the refined delicacy of touch, acquired by the potter during years of practice. The perfect outline of some of the commonest objects of pottery from India, Tunis, Turkey, and the rest, demonstrates the methods by which contours, equal in grace to the Etrurian and those of Magna Græcia, have been produced. In the finer work of pottery, among us, a distinct person is employed to design from him who makes the object; the one makes the pattern, and a mould is probably made of the same figure as is given. But in the ancient and Oriental objects the beauty of form is attributed to the Art being literally in the potter's fingers; and he acquires by the manipulation a fineness of touch, a delicacy of eye, which enables him to produce beautiful forms, which no one in the abstract could imagine." This is corroborated by the fact that, in the British Museum, in the great gallery where the Etruscan vases are kept, you will not find two—and if you search the Vatican and Bourbon Museum, and all the collections in Europe, you will not find two, perfectly alike; there is a difference in them, which shows they were not produced by a model, but simply out of the hand; and I have no doubt that the influence of this working in clay is to be traced in all the works in metal and in glass of the ancients—because, no doubt, the eye of the man who worked in bronze had been formed by his familiarity with the beautiful patterns which came forth every day from the hands of the workmen in clay. I find, too, it is mentioned in Pliny that when a knight named Octavius, in the time of Augustus, wished to have a vase made, it cost him a talent, or upwards of £50, to have the model made; which shows that the clay model was to be modelled before the marble vase was sculptured. In this Art, then, the producer is the designer, the artist is the artisan, and hence comes perfect beauty.

Next to this must be mentioned a very important branch of Productive Art, in which the Art of Design is always necessary to be in combination with the actual manufacture; and that is china, or painting upon pottery. The Etruscan vases are often simple, sometimes of one color, sometimes they have nothing but ornament; at other times they have most beautifully executed, though sketchy, scenes of ancient mythology, or very frequently from the Iliad. These are done in a way which shows that there must have been hundreds of artists who could do that work. Very frequently it was not a painter who did them, but the man who was at work on the pottery throughout; and although mere sketches, they are considered as containing the elements of very beautiful drawing. If we come to speak of this Art in modern times, a remarkable instance of genius persevering in its work may be taken from the history of Bernard Pallissy. He was an artist, but as a painter of comparatively humble pretensions, for he tells us he used to paint figures, images, and so on; but in this he was an artist, to a certain extent. He tells us himself, in the biography he has written, that in 1544, when there seemed not to have been anything approaching to ornamental pottery in France, he happened to see an Italian cup, which struck him as being very beautiful; and he thought to himself—"Why could not this be produced in France?" He set to work. He was a poor man, hardly educated; but he had a great turn for chemistry, and was particularly desirous of finding out a manner of enamelling pottery, and especially a white enamel, which he at length contrived to make. He took his work to be baked in glass-houses, and found it completely fail; then he set to work in his own house, and he built a furnace for the purpose. He put his ingredients into the furnace; they would not set or harden. He had spent all his money, and he gradually pawned all his clothes, and burnt every article of furniture to keep up the furnace, and pulled up the fruit trees in his garden, and then the very floor of the house, to keep up the fire. Still the work was all spoiled. When he went out, the people charged him with being a coiner; he was ridiculed as mad, and every sort of annoyance came on him. He persevered yet; and having found that his furnace would not act, he pulled it down, and with his own hands bringing the lime and bricks, he built another furnace, and then sat for six days and nights watching the fire. Then he began to succeed; he got a little money by having a commission to make a survey, and came back to his work, and tried again. The mortar he used, however, happened to have some person in it; and just as the pottery was going to set, he heard a crack, and the pebbles in the mortar began to fly, and broke his enamel. He set to work again, and put his materials again in the fire, and this time there was a tremendous explosion, and the ashes burst in; and the whole of his work was covered with black, so firmly set into the enamel, that it all had to be thrown away except a few pieces, by which he made a trifle. For sixteen years he persevered in this way; and then was crowned with success, and produced the first specimens of colored and beautiful pottery, such as are to this day sought by the curious; and he received a situation in the king's household, and ended his days in comfort and respectability. (Cheers.)

I could mention the beautiful earthenware of the sixteenth century, known by the name of Raphael's ware, because it is supposed that Raphael himself did not disdain to make designs for common pottery—pottery not to be used merely by the rich, but to be found in the common cottages, and houses of ordinary classes; the most beautiful specimens being in the apothecaries' shops of Padua and Verona. There we have the employment of high Art in the decoration of a common and ordinary object; for the pottery itself has no particular pretensions to elegance of make; but yet one of these plates, thick, heavy, clumsy, and coarse as they are, is worth a service of modern production.

Another department is statuary in pottery, which presents some very interesting features in the history of Art. Its very origin is exceedingly interesting. Pliny gives it to us as the invention of a certain potter, whose daughter, when parting with a youth to whom she was engaged, did what I dare say some of you have often done—made him stand before the lamp, so as to throw his shadow on the wall, and so sketched his head and face; and the father, wishing to preserve this sketch, took some of his clay and filled up the outline, and made a bas-relief of the countenance. That piece of pottery, at the time when the Romans first became acquainted with Art, and carried away the monuments of Greece, was preserved in the Temple of the Nymphs, at Corinth, as a treasure of Art—as the first germ from which had been developed some of the most beautiful productions of that kind. (Cheers.) By the time of the Roman kings of the race of Tarquin, the inhabitants of Italy had arrived at such perfection in this Art that they used to make chariots, horses, and other representations of clay, so well baked that they could be placed in the open air, and stood for many centuries without injury; and, in fact, we find them now among the Etruscan monuments. The Romans must also have learned well how to paint them; because we find it stated that there was an artist, whom Varro particularly mentions, who imitated fruit in pottery so perfectly as to deceive any one, and make one think it was real.

But the most interesting example of this application of high Art to such products is what we find in the life of an eminent artist, and at the same time a potter, Luca della Robbia. He was put, when quite a boy, apprentice to a jeweller; he very soon began to make things in bronze; he gave up mere small modelling, and began upon marble, and succeeded very well. He worked the whole of the day at his chiselling, and sat up all the night drawing. He was poor; he was hungry and cold, and the only means he had of warming himself at night was to put his feet in a basket of shavings, while he sat there drawing, and would not be driven from it. Now, there was an education for him—beginning first with small work and exercising his patience and skill in that way. (Cheers.) Sigismund Malatesta, the great patron of Art at Rimini, was then building a splendid church, and he sent to Florence to find workmen to do the carving; and Luca della Robbia was engaged for this purpose. He had at that time been a silversmith's apprentice, had executed works in marble and bronze, and was set to undertake that noble work at Rimini; and how old was he when Sigismund engaged him? He was fifteen; and what pains and study must have been gone through in that time by the poor boy to make himself really an artist! He succeeded admirably at Rimini, and came back and received a commission to work with Donatello, to make a screen for an organ, and a bronze door. After all this, he suddenly discovered a totally new branch of Art—modelling in pottery. He first contrived to manufacture his own clay; he then discovered a mode of glazing it to such a perfection, that centuries of weather do not in the least affect it. He then contrived to color it in the most beautiful manner; and all Florence, and every part of Italy, may be said to be filled with works of Art equal to anything produced in marble, and valued as high. He went on improving his art; he began, then, tessellated pavements and outsides of churches, which are most beautiful; and then, taking to himself not a number of workmen, to mould under him, but two near relatives of his, who were also artists and sculptors in marble, and who left marble to come to work in clay, this family carried on the same work to the third generation, when the secret of the art expired with the family. But in those three generations, till Pope Leo gave them the commission of making the pavement of the Loggia of Raffaele, this family made an infinite number of original works of Art, executed by hand, colored and baked by themselves. Now, there is a whole family of artists, in whom the productive and the artistic skill were united. In our estimation we should say, what a descent that was, for a sculptor in bronze, in marble, to come to a mere potter! But I will read to you Vasari's sentiments on that subject, who, as the great biographer of artists, and who lived among artists, and was himself an artist, may be allowed to have a right sentiment upon it. He says: "Luke, therefore, passing from one sort of work to another, from marble to bronze, and from bronze to clay, did so, not from any idleness, nor from being like many others, capricious, unstable, and discontented with his Art, but because he felt himself drawn to new pursuits, and to an Art requiring less labor and time, and rendering him more gain; hence the world, and the Arts of design, became enriched with an Art, new, useful, and most beautiful; and he, with glory and praise, immortal and unfailing."

We are told by Pliny, that it was in the time of Augustus the practice was introduced of painting the walls of houses. Temples were undoubtedly painted before, because he tells us that when the Temple of Ceres was falling into ruins, the paintings of Demophilus were cut away from the walls, as is sometimes done with frescoes, and put into frames in order to preserve them. On one occasion, by the way, the city of Rhodes was saved when Demetrius besieged it, because he feared a beautiful painting would be destroyed that was on the wall of one of the buildings. This painting of walls corresponded to our paper hangings; what we do by putting on stained or colored paper, they did with the brush and the skill of the artist. The walls of Pompeii and Herculaneum are covered with most beautiful paintings, not merely ornamental patterns and arabesques; but there is such a mixture of the mere ornament, and of figures perfectly designed and colored, as to show that there was no distinction made then between the painter of a fresco and the house decorator; the artist was himself the performer of the work, and so beautiful is it, that we have hardly anything in modern times superior to what is commonly found on the walls of the private houses of cities which were in a province remote from the capital, and which had no particular recommendation, that we know of, as seats of Art.

We have an instance, also, in modern times. Perhaps one of the most beautiful productions of modern Art is the painting of that gallery to which I have alluded, where we see that Raffaele undertakes to do what now one would never think of committing to the hands of any one higher than a common house-decorator. No nobleman, nor even a monarch, would think of asking the first artist of the kingdom to design the ornament of a gallery, scroll work and grotesques, or mechanical ornament, which, now, would be done by a common process or a common hand. But, in a former age, there was no distinction made between what we now consider the higher and the lower sorts of Art; but the whole of Art was regarded as one thing; the greatest of artists considered it was his place to make even the smallest work, which might be insignificant in itself, great and noble, and to stamp the highest impress of Art on the commonest and most ordinary commissions that were given to him. (Cheers.)

(Conclusion next week.)

TWO SONNETS.

BY CHARLES TENNYSON.

[Charles Tennyson, the brother of Alfred, has published a small volume of poems, chiefly sonnets, from which volume, as it is but little known in this country, we propose to make, from time to time, a few extracts, which can hardly fail, we think, to convince our readers that Charles Tennyson is far from unworthy of the name he bears.]

SONNET VII.

Hence with your jeerings, petulant and low!
My love of home no circumstance can shake,
Too ductile for the change of place to break,
And far too passionate for most to know.
I and yon pollard oak have grown together;
How on yon slope the shifting sunsets lie
None knew so well as I, and setting hither
Flows the strong current of my sympathy.
From this same flower-bed, dear to memory,
I learned how manygolds do bloom and fade,
And from the grove that skirts this garden glade
I had my earliest thoughts of love and spring—
Ye wot not how the heart of man is made:
I learn but now what change the world can bring.

XXII.

I trust thee from my soul, Oh Mary dear!
But oftentimes when delight hath fullest power
Hope treads too lightly for herself to hear,
And doubt is ever by, until the hour!
I trust thee, Mary! but till thou art mine
Up from thy foot unto thy golden hair—
Oh! let me still misgive thee, and repine;
Uncommon doubts spring up with blessings rare!
Thine eyes of purest love give surest sign,
Drooping with fondness, and thy blushes tell
A fitting tale of steadiest faith and zeal;
Yet I will doubt, to make success divine!
A tide of summer dreams, with gentlest swell,
Will bear upon me then, and I shall love most well!

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.—Talking about music—and our honorable members have been talking a great deal about it lately—a celebrated professor says: "You generally find that persons who are not fond of music play the flute."—Punch.

MENDELSSOHN'S ST. PAUL.

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

No. 4.—Thus doubly prefaced,—by the Overture which, we may suppose, epitomizes the subject of the entire work, and by the two first vocal pieces, which invoke Heaven for the blessing of “strength and joyfulness” to qualify the artist for his sacred task,—thus doubly prefaced, the action of the Oratorio commences.

In the selection and arrangement of the text, the composer has chosen to precede the entry of his principal character by such a representation of the times in which he appeared, and the circumstances by which his appearance was surrounded, as prepares us at once to appreciate the importance of St. Paul's mission and the transition his character undergoes when the oppressor of Christians becomes the apostle of Christianity. Accordingly, the incidents of the arraignment and martyrdom of St. Stephen are presented at such very considerable length as alone could do justice to their powerful interest, and thus is shown the enthusiastic zeal of the first teachers, and the fanatical violence of those who opposed them.

In the present piece is related the unanimity of the believers, the faith and power of Stephen, who works wonders amongst them, the inability of the Scribes to resist the influence of his wisdom, their suborning of men to speak against him, the declaration of these that they heard his blasphemy, and the activity of the Synagogue to excite the people and the Elders, who seize him and drag him before the Council.

The narrative portion of this is rendered in a Recitative for soprano solo, an episode in which is the short Duet for two basses, personating the false Witnesses, that graphically distinguishes the dramatic or personal words of the text from the narrative,—that which is done or said from that which is related.

Brief as is the Duet, the peculiar character of this carefully-considered fragment (expressed in the responsive phrases of the voices, and in the points of imitation carried through the ceaseless motion of the murmuring accompaniment, singularly colored by the orchestral distribution, which lies entirely between the viola, two violoncellos, and the double bass supported by the organ pedals), this peculiar character embodies a deep, though, perhaps therefore, not very obvious meaning, to penetrate which is quite worth the pains of an examination. Let us suppose, then, in the plausible phraseology in which the words of the Witnesses are conveyed, and in the reiterated corroboration by each of the testimony of the other, the most sedulous endeavor to justify by persuasion and to vindicate by asseveration the charge preferred, while the falsehood and the consequent cautious inconfidence of the speakers is indicated in the suppressed perturbation that forms an undercurrent of the whole. These men are not of the People, crying, under the misdirection of fanaticism, for what they believe to be justice upon a blasphemer, but they are the suborned Witnesses of the Synagogue, hired to inflame with their purposed perjury the fury of the multitude, conscious of their hollowness, and careful to conceal their falsehood and their shame in it. Such is, to me, the reading of the text embodied in the music.

The short Duet leaves off (closes, one cannot say, since what succeeds is still continuous), the duet leaves off with a dominant cadence, and an abrupt transition introduces the resumption of the Recitative. The new tonality, the hurried movement, and the addition to the score of the acute instruments, induce a contrast of color that forcibly illustrates the situation. We pass from the Witnesses to their employers, from their plausibility to wrath that engages this as its insidious and certain engine.

We are now led to the next Chorus, of which both words and music of this number are introductory.

No. 5.—Here we have the accusation of Stephen embodied in a Chorus of the People of Jerusalem. This comprises alternate declarations to the Council and addresses to the prisoner, the unanimous rendering of the former of which presents well the vehement earnestness of the excited multitude, as does the fugal treatment of the latter their impatience each to have a voice in the taunts to which he is submitted,—each to be foremost in charging him personally with the outrage for which they demand vengeance. The dramatic power thus displayed could not be exceeded, and the technical treatment of the scene equals the poetical purpose with which it is conceived.

The fierceness of the infuriate crowd, who rushing tumultuously, without regard of place or person, into the judgment hall, eagerly denounce their intended victim as a blasphemer against Moses and against God,—their charge to him, “Did we not enjoin and straightly command you that you should not teach in the name you follow? and lo! you have filled Jerusalem with these unlawful doctrines,”—and their turning wildly again with their first appeal to the Council, this is depicted with a living truthfulness that brings the raging multitude in actual existence before us, and makes us know and feel how terrible is the power of the bad passions of man, and how dreadful an engine are they to set in action. Thus much is comprised in what we may esteem the First Part or division of the movement; and the malignant scorn with which Stephen is still regarded when the voices cease—and the looks of hatred cast upon him are even more redundant of vengeance than the limited words—is not less powerfully presented in the few threatening bars of symphony with their entirely unique and most poignant instrumentation.

Less irritated, and therefore much more dignified in character, is the episode for male voices in which the accusation against Stephen is directly preferred. A transient modulation into C at the words “Destroy all these our holy places,” is one of the brightest points in the whole Chorus, and one that derives from its great simplicity a power to which nobody can be insensible.

The multitude is not to be restrained. With violent agitation, aggravated by its temporary suppression, the mass of the people resume their original of denunciation, and the dramatic and the musical effect of this recurrence of the chief theme of the movement are both heightened by the addition of a florid counterpoint of semiquavers against the Subject that is admirably sustained. The resumption of the episodic idea, now distributed among the full chorus, and supported by the agitated accompaniment of the string instruments, forms a climax to the close of the movement that seems to raise this grand point of culmination still higher and higher as it approaches it, and then, the repetition of the very individual bars for the orchestra that seem, in their tone of exultant derision, to anticipate the tortures with which the martyr is menaced, this very powerful conception is concluded.

No. 6.—A few bars of Recitative for soprano, resuming the narrative, tell how they look upon his face, and it is like the face of an angel (an expression most gracefully rendered in the music), and how the High Priest demands if these charges be true, his words being separated from the more indifferent tone of relation in the third person by an impressive change of key, and by a slower and consequently more impressive enunciation.

Stephen's defence is rendered in a grand declamatory Recitative for tenor, that as a piece of musical eloquence, is scarcely to be reached by the highest eulogium with which enthusiastic admiration could attempt to do it justice. Commencing with the majestic calmness that is inspired by conscious right and complete mastery of the subject upon which he is to discourse, the orator gradually rises with the development of his theme in warmth of expression and energy of delivery, until the flood of his speech would seem to have accumulated such intensity of power as must bear down all before it. One cannot too much admire the consummate art wherewith this is embodied, but, the more one must admire, the less can one define. The felicitous artifice of the frequent repetition, at irregular periods, of the two bars of symphony that introduce the character of Stephen, each repetition being successively in a higher and higher key—thus much admits of description—all else of the forcible treatment of this impressive scene must be left to the appreciation of the hearer.

The multitude awed by the fervid eloquence of their purposed victim, and feeling the growing influence of his words, become impatient of a power that may be withdrawn but cannot be resisted. In low mutterings, that bespeak how much less is their can than their will to oppose him, they interrupt what they are unable to answer with murmurs of “Take him away!” Then, gaining assurance from the sound of their own voices, and mutual encouragement from the coward's panoply—the knowledge of physical superiority, they break forth in a fierce exclamation of a life-thirsty fanaticism, “He shall perish.”

Passing directly from the harmony of E flat to the second inversion of D, the first employment of this major tonic, the single voice of Stephen is introduced with an effect of beautiful, of glorious radiance, that, to say the least—and words could say no more—realizes the idea his language conveys, where he declares, “Lo! I see the heavens open, and the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of God.”

How far the immediate dispersion of the visionary brightness may be more or less true to the situation, or more or less necessary as a means of Art to certify its brilliancy, and how far the whole musical idea may be more or less analogous to that which first introduces Anna and Ottavio in the sette in Don Giovanni, I leave for the speculation of those whose delight in present beauty is sufficiently temperate to allow them to turn from its contemplation to theorize upon its source:—for me, I am content to admire and to acknowledge.

BOSTON, SEPT. 17, 1853.

A NEW VOLUME of this journal will commence with the number for Saturday, October 8th. Just the beginning of the musical season, and just the time for new subscribers to begin to read our paper. We trust our friends, who are satisfied that this paper is worth sustaining, will use a little effort to induce others to subscribe.

We would also state, for the benefit of those who may wish to keep connectedly such mirror of the musical times as we have given for the eighteen months past, that we have a good supply of all the back numbers on hand, with bound volumes of the first year.

M. Fétis's Musical Testament.

A recent number of the Revue et Gazette Musicale opens with an article, yet to be continued, by the veteran Fétis, under the heading of Mon Testament Musical. Of course it cannot but be interesting as the formal summing up of a long life spent in the most earnest study and elucidation of the entire history of music. M. Fétis may be said to have been the creator of a voluminous musical literature. (See a short sketch of his life in our Journal of July 23d.) He has given a great impulse to musical learning and criticism. M. Fétis is an eclectic in his tastes; not a man of genius perhaps; not always quick to appreciate genius under new forms; not prone to enter into the profounder spiritual sense of Art; and yet no man is so well qualified, from actual acquaintance with all that has been done in music since it began to be an Art, to judge of what musicians do in our day, and no man has done more to point out the beauties and the worth of genuine music in the various schools that one by one have been passing out of date. He has brought many an old forgotten tone-picture out of the shades of the past, and shown that the colors laid on by the hand of genius, even in its days of small means, are still warm and fresh in the light of the eternal sun. We can forgive some egotism, some intolerance of innovating Wagners, and so forth, in his old days; for he has probably surveyed and traversed the vast field hitherto, and looked it into unity from his own mental focus, till he comes to fancy himself a sort of proprietor and keeper, and grows jealous of "Young Germany's" or young anybody's right of entrance.

The glance which M. Fétis, in this "last will and testament," casts back over the history of Music, (having identified himself enough with it all along to make it seem to him, no doubt, the history of his own life), is interesting and instructive. Seen by the light of the obvious principle which he says he has deduced from it as the basis of his whole musical theory, the various schools and steps of progress become clear and palpable. That principle is simply this: that in music there are always two things, the sentiment and the form; the forms may change and become obsolete, but the inspiring sentiment, the genius of a composition, however limited its means, if it have genius, always retains its value and its charm. Hence M. Fétis's eclecticism.

He begins with very old examples, when all music, sacred and secular, vocal and instrumental, was limited to the old church modes. Being without semi-tones, and without the element of dissonance, it was without attraction, without the tendency of one harmony to pass into another, without modulation, and without impassioned accent:—in short, it lacked what in these days is called expression. Yet there was true music in the old Gregorian plain song and what was built upon it. If it had not the dramatic, passionate expression of our modern music, it had an expression of its own, which made it a sublime Art. "Essentially calm, majestic or sweet, by reason of its consonant harmony, it gave to prayer sometimes a character of grandeur and immobility, in harmony with the idea of the Creator; sometimes of resigned devotion; and sometimes of fond invocation. It was prayer in its truest, strictest sense, the most analogous to its object."

"Examine this music on its worldly side, and you will see that, though deprived of all means of dramatic expression, because this expression lies entirely in the passionate accent which only exists in harmonic attraction (or modulation), it has other advantages inherent in its system of tonality: for example, a naïve simplicity, a certain sweet gayety, sometimes quaint or grotesque. In the dance it is graceful and a little melancholy; for the dance of those times did not go by leaps and bounds like that upon our lyric stage. Songs for three, four, five or six voices, madrigals, characteristic dances and fantasies 'to be sung or played on instruments;' such was all the secular music that the ancient tonality could produce. It is not without its charm, to one who understands it. Musicians, who only comprehend the musical forms of their own epoch, find nothing but dryness, hardness, and puerile attempts at imitation and canon in all the works of this old Art; they cannot be persuaded that it has any invention; and they regard the artists who produced it as men but little advanced, who, without genius, by these mechanical labors prepared the way for the later progress of music. To them it appears all cast in the same mould; in every piece they find only the same things; nothing but counterpoint; and the free fancies of the Neapolitan frottole and canzoni, the Italian madrigali, the German geistliche and weltliche Lieder (spiritual and worldly songs), the French chansons, the motets and the masses, all seem to them but tedious applications of these forms of counterpoint, little different from one another.

"If this were so, how comes it that certain artists were universally pronounced great men in their Art? At the end of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century, Josquin Despré excited the admiration of all Europe; Italy, Germany, the Netherlands, France, England and Spain declared him the greatest of musicians. Something must have distinguished him from his contemporaries, Alexander Agricola, Compère, Dujardin, and others,—all able men and enjoying much esteem. Musicians make what they can of notes, said Luther; Josquin alone makes what he pleases. Josquin wrote counterpoint like the rest of them; what then distinguished him from others, unless it be his genius, which into well-known forms knows how to put ideas entirely individual? These ideas, this individuality we can still recognize in his works. Josquin felt the influence of his time, like every artist. Subjected to the old tonality, before the complete scale was formed; placed in an order of ideas which considered melody of small importance and placed the highest end of Art in the harmonic development of a theme under certain conventional forms; finally, continuing the absurd tradition which chose for the subject of church music the melodies of popular songs with their obscene words, still this great artist showed that there was something in him that lifted him above the conditions of the Art of his time. His mind led him to a certain satirical tendency, as is seen by the spiritual buffooneries with which he has filled the mass entitled la, sol, fa, re, mi, which he composed to avenge himself upon a seigneur too forgetful of his promises. Yet he knew how to handle serious subjects with a gravity without example before him. We see remarkable proofs of it in his De profundis, in his Miserere and his Stabat Mater. These compositions are not treated from the dramatic stand-point of our actual musicians: but Josquin has given them a sombre tinge, not only by the character and movement of his harmony, but also by placing it in the gravest chords for each species of voice.

"Formed by his example, his successors perfected the details of the forms he had invented, softened certain relations of the intervals which he had not completely managed, and arrived thus by degrees at the time when a reform in Art, made necessary in regard to certain traditions which choked all good taste and good sense, was effected by two illustrious musicians who shared the empire of the musical Art; I speak of Palestrina and Orlando di Lasso. Without going beyond the limits of the old tonality, both of them imagined kinds of music, sacred and profane, analogous to the sentiment expressed by the words; they broke with the gross traditions repulsed by this sentiment, and arrived by different qualities at the same end. More pure, more chastened in his style, melancholy, and perhaps a little mystical, Palestrina has more of unction, more of depth in his devotional expression; while Lasso, or Lassus, more abundant in ideas, more various in form, more bold, more vehement, produces perhaps more effect and has a certain something more like originality. Both created an enthusiasm among their contemporaries and have preserved their just renown from generation to generation. Popes, kings, princes, grand seigneurs, artists, citizens and peasants, all considered them the greatest musicians of their time, and courted them with all sorts of distinctions. Yet other artists of great worth were living in the time of Lasso and of Palestrina; like them, they gave their works the forms of masses, motets, madrigals and chansons; these two men were superior, in that they inspired in their times the same outbursts of enthusiasm, which we see caused by the works of some celebrities of our time. Under these same forms of counterpoint, the common patrimony of all musicians, they had introduced something which distinguished them from others, something individual, original,—in a word, ideas.

"In fact, there are but two things in Art; to wit, the idea and the form: the idea, imperishable and always young; the form variable and growing old. . . . Few artists are creators of ideas; many cultivate the form with success. . . . The first are the rare men of genius; the others are the estimable talents whose works preserve an honorable place in the regard of posterity. After these comes the vulgar crowd, who, barren of ideas and imprisoned within formulas, see their productions die faster than they beget them."

M. Fétis proceeds to find the same thing true of composers who "lived the new life" of the modern tonality, or musical tone-system. With the introduction of semi-tones, of dissonance, of modulation, music acquired a passionate accent; dramatic expression became the end of Art; the old madrigals and chansons for three to six voices were abandoned for the song for one voice, accompanied by the spinet, lute, theorbo, or guitar; the aria, the cantata and the duo took their place. Each of those pieces aimed to express a sentiment; each became a little drama, like the French romances and the German Lieder of to-day. Instrumental music, too, became emancipated from the voice and acquired an individual character; it tended to a sentimental expression and gradually assumed the larger forms and the complete development of an instrumental drama, or symphony. The accent of passion appeared also in the music of the church, in the motets for one or two voices, accompanied for the first time by the organ. Violins and violas were soon added. Sacred texts were set to music of a dramatic expression, and the Credo of the mass, the prose of the dead, the penitential psalms, the Stabat Mater, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, became at length veritable dramas.—Now, in this new world, as in the old, there were some men of genius, who created ideas, amongst a great many more men of mere taste and talent, who only cultivated and perfected the form. The idea and the form, these two conditions of the beautiful, the one eternal and the other changeable, did in the new Art what they had done in the old; they have bequeathed to us imperishable beauties, by reason of the vital ideas clothed in the form or fashion of the times.

"These principles and observations," continues M. Fétis, "fruits of long studies and incessant meditations, were long ago my own, when, about the year 1821, a sort of vertigo, in France in imitation of Italy, got possession of most of the artists and amateurs of music, through the enthusiasm which the operas of a great artist had excited;—an enthusiasm which soon turned all heads likewise in southern Germany, in Spain, in England, and even in America. Nothing could be more legitimate than the admiration inspired by the real and great beauties that shine in the productions of the author of the Barbier de Seville, of Otello and of Guillaume Tell; but the admiration of the multitude is like the religion of fanatics: it thinks it cannot honor its idol but by breaking the altars of the other gods before it. It was not enough that Rossini was declared one of the greatest musicians of his age; to hear men talk, you would have thought there was no other, and that music was born with him. Pamphlets were published to demonstrate that Paisiello, Cimarosa, Mozart even, had had some talent in their day" [this sounds like the reports of certain musical lectures in New York last winter, and like recent criticisms in the Tribune], "but that they had done nothing but prepare the way for the progress of music; that the musical world had been for centuries awaiting its Messiah, and that he was born at last, and came clad in the figure of Rossini. The worst of it was, that artists of some real merit, shaken by the prevailing fashion, and having little faith in what constitutes the real beauty of Art, abandoned what there was individual and available in their own talent, to devote themselves to imitation of the form which then enjoyed the favor of the world. I say to imitation of the form, since only that is ever imitated; the idea exists only by its character of pure creation; repeated it may be, but never imitated."

We shall see how this great freshet and ensuing fever of Rossini-ism operated upon our learned eclectic, and what barriers M. Fétis set about erecting to keep back the deluge and restore the tranquil reign of sound and catholic taste. We have not yet received the end of the Will, to say nothing of the codicils that may follow.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

Music in Boston is at its lowest ebb, until the tide of music-loving population flows back from the mountains and the sea-shores, which it already begins to do.—The military bands, pleased with their summer success, have volunteered each one more evening performance on the common.—The "Hutchinson Family" are singing to their crowds in the new Tremont Temple, and the hall is much admired for its acoustic qualities, its lighting, &c.—But the notes of preparation are sounding; the "season" is coming upon us with a rush. Advertisements of coming concerts, showy Jullien placards and portraits, are rivalling each other. JULLIEN will give us a fortnight of his music in the Boston Music Hall, beginning about the 24th of October. The "GERMANIANS" commence their winter campaign at the same time. Chamber concerts, oratorios, &c., are quietly preparing.

There are now three Song Unions of Germans in our city: viz. the "Liederkræuz," of several years standing; the "Saengerbund," about a year old; and the "Mænerchor," recently formed.

New York.

A whole column of advertisements in the Tribune shows that it is now the very heyday and high noon of music in New York. MARETZKE, with STEFFANONE, SALVI, MARINI, BENEVENTANO, &c., (but without SONTAG), opens a new operatic season at Niblo's on Monday; the piece is I Puritani.—Mme. SONTAG announces a concert at Brooklyn, and a new series of concerts, from New York outwards.—GOTTSCALK has his card out for concerts early in October.—OLE BULL, whose concert for the New Orleans sufferers yielded a large sum, gave a second grand concert Thursday evening on his own account, with PATTI and STRAKOSCH, the programme much as usual.

The baroness JULIE DE BERG, pianist from Vienna, gave on Thursday a second concert in Metropolitan Hall, and played Thalberg, Liszt, Schullhoff, Henselt and De Meyer. She had PAUL JULIEN and the Italian troupe to aid.

Finally, the great JULLIEN continues to draw nightly throngs to Castle Garden, giving each night an overture, a movement from a symphony, an operatic fantasia, a plenty of astonishing quadrilles and polkas, two or three solos from his best artists, and two or three songs by ANNA ZERR, who (shame to say) stooped to pick up one night and sing "Old folks at home," for the b'boys; one would as soon think of picking up an apple-core in the street. The Home Journal talks of Jullien as follows:

JULLIEN'S Concerts present four features, namely, selections from the works of the "classical composers," eccentric compositions, by Jullien himself; singing by Mademoiselle Zerr; and instrumental solos, wonderfully performed by Bottesini, Koenig, Reichart, Lavigne, Colinet, and Wuille. M. Jullien's mode of conducting the orchestra, we may add, forms a fifth and very remarkable feature of the entertainment. His action serves as a kind of visible accompaniment to the invisible sounds. He seems to swell, to rise, and subside with the music of the piece. He appears to woo the softer strains with a pleading gesture, to beckon the music from the distant instruments, to "ride upon the whirlwind and direct the storm" of sound which his imperious wand evokes. The orchestra, even on the earlier nights of the season, was perfectly drilled and entirely "up" to its novel work. One of the new effects introduced by Jullien into orchestral performances, is this—the musicians, in certain passages, sing as well as play. He has likewise acted upon a hint given by Handel, who said, he would introduce discharge of artillery into his choruses, if it were possible. Jullien has not been able to achieve this; but he has come as near to it as possible, by the introduction of immense drums and other monster instruments. One or two other singular (and comical) effects contrived by Jullien, cannot by any arrangement of words be described. The compositions which have been most popular, so far, are the National Quadrilles, the Irish, the English, the American, etc. These quadrilles are blendings together of national airs, and are both ingeniously arranged and magnificently performed. Mlle. Zerr has made a considerable, but not very marked, impression, upon the New-York public. She is a tall, finely formed, and good-looking woman, with a voice of remarkable power and clearness in its upper notes. She is chary of ornament, and adheres closely to the score. Of the solo instrumental performers, it is impossible to speak too highly. M. Bottesini extorts effects from the double-bass, which would be wonderful if produced upon the violoncello. M. Reichart plays the flute faultlessly and incomparably. Herr Koenig "sings" with his instrument, the cornet-a-piston. In a word, Jullien's concerts are thoroughly enjoyable. They go off with a spirit, a dash, a sparkle and a rapidity not attained by any other conductor that we have had among us. They combine just those proportions of the classic and the popular, which render them pleasing and satisfactory to the scientific musician and the general public.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The season came to a close on Saturday (August. 20) with a remarkably good performance of Rossini's Guglielmo Tell. The house was crowded. On no occasion has the music of this splendid opera been more thoroughly enjoyed. The overture, the tenor solo in the duet ("Dove vai?") between Tamberlik and Ronconi, the slow movement of the grand trio for the same, with Zelger (who was the substitute for Fornes in the part of Walter), and the A minor chorus in the meeting of the cantons (finale Act II.), were all redemanded unanimously. The "Corriam, corriam," ("S'avez moi") created a furore; and Tamberlik was twice recalled, amid enthusiastic cheering. Madame Castellani sang the beautiful air "Selva opaca," which she always sings well, better than ever; and the histrionic genius of Ronconi shone conspicuously in the scene where Tell shoots the apple from the head of his son by order of the tyrannical Gessler—who could not possibly have an abler representative than Tagliafico. Lucchesi, Polonini, Mlle Bellini, and Mlle Cotti, in the minor characters, all did their best; and the band and chorus were more than up to the mark. In short, the general execution of Rossini's masterpiece was worthy of a great theatre; and the Royal Italian Opera took leave of its subscribers and the public until next year with éclat. After the opera the National Anthem was performed, Madame Castellani singing the solo verses. A call was then raised for Mr. Costa, who came forward, and was loudly applauded.

With one slight exception, every promise contained in the prospectus issued in the month of March, has been fulfilled. The one exception is to be found in the advertised list of singers—Mlle. Donzelli, a soprano. In her place, moreover, the management brought forward Mme. Tedesco, whose success in the Prophète was a matter of importance to the theatre. Of six operas new to the repertoire, which were named in the prospectus, it was announced that not less than three would be produced. Three were really produced—Rigoletto, Boccanuto Cellini, and Jessonda. The other three—Mitilda di Shabran (Rossini), Don Sebastian (Donzetti), and Juana Shore (Bonetti),—may stand for further consideration.—Times.

GERMAN OPERA.—A German troupe opened at Drury Lane on the 22d of August, with a large and efficient orchestra and chorus, and Herr Fornes, Herr Reichart, Mme. Zimmerman, and Mme. Caradori, as principal singers. The latter lady (not Caradori Allan) is said to be an artist of considerable repute in Italy, Germany and Turkey. The Musical World says:

She possesses a fine and powerful soprano, uses it admirably, and is altogether a singer of no ordinary pretensions. As an actress she has energy, abandon, and purpose. She moves well, she stands well, and poses well—which proves, satisfactorily, she does not impose. Moreover, she is natural and easy. As a woman, Mme. Caradori is moulded large, but she is moulded well and significantly. Mme. Caradori is a decided acquisition to the operatic stage.

The opera was Freischütz. Fornes was Caspar, Reichart, Max; Mme. Zimmerman, Anna; and Mme. Caradori, Agatha.

The Caspar of Fornes is a grand and picturesque impersonation; and never was it grander or more picturesque than on Monday evening. Fornes was encoined in the famous drinking song, and in the splendid "revenge" scene he was boisterously applauded.

Herr Reichart made a capital Max. It was the first time we had seen the popular concert singer on the stage, and the impression he made was decidedly favorable. He is perfectly at home on the boards, and feels quite at his ease in opera. The magnificent song, "O, I can bear my fate no longer,"—one of the finest tenor airs ever written—he gave with so much unexaggerated feeling and expression, that the first movement was unanimously redemanded. He was excellent in the incantation scene.

Madame Zimmerman made a lively and agreeable Anna. She sang her two charming songs with point and facility, and was warmly greeted.

Madame Caradori's grand coup was, as a matter of course, in the long and arduous scene in the second act.—She sang it like a musician and a vocalist, and was received with cheers by the whole house. She became a favorite with her first essay.

Herr Doering—who played Zamiel last year—was it?—at the Royal Italian Opera, appeared as the fiend huntsman on this occasion.

The performance throughout was received with the utmost demonstrations of delight and good humor.

On Thursday evening Lucrezia Borgia was given in the Italian language; and, although we trembled for the performance, coming so soon after the gorgeous display at Covent Garden, it was really so excellent, that our fears were soon numbered into insensibility. The cast of the principal parts may be guessed:—Madame Caradori, Lucrezia; Herr Reichart, Gennaro; Herr Fornes, Duke Alphonso. A lady, whom the bills—neither Missing, Madaming, nor Mademoiselling—entitled Adelaide Weinthal, appeared as Maffeo Orsini.

FLIGHT OF THE BIRDS.—Bosio and Tedesco have both gone to Paris; Mme. Julienne has returned to Barcelona; Castellani to her old post at Lisbon, where she is to sing again with the English tenor, Swift. Tamberlik goes to St. Petersburg. Bettini is singing at La Scala, in Milan.

GERMANY.—A grand musical festival is to be held at Carlsruhe on the 20th and 21st of this month, under the direction of LISZT. The programme mostly favors the new tendencies in music, and includes the overture to Wagner's Tannhäuser, with selections from his Lohengrin; Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

Moses waved his wand, the Day appeared. "Here, monsieur, is not music contending with the sun whose splendor she has borrowed, with nature himself, whose phenomena she represents in their least details?" whispered the Duchess. "Do you not hear Egypt re-awaking after this long stupefaction? Gladness flows everywhere with the light. What cries! what bounding, joyous notes! the oppressed soul breathes again,—what delirium, what tremolo in this orchestra, this fine tutti! It is the joy of a delivered people."

The physician, surprised by this contrast, one of the most splendid passages of modern music, clapped his hands, forgetting himself in his admiration.

"Brava la Doni!" murmured a Venetian gentleman who had entered the box.

The Duchess goes on to explain in a very scientific way, and, considering the time and place, at great length, how Rossini has employed to represent the coming light, chords like these he had used in expressing darkness and cold, in this revealing the grandeur of his thought. Light is the same substance in winter and in summer, by day and by night, and the effects of light are varied only by the nature and condition of the objects it encounters. Thus Rossini has chosen for the base of his music, one motif, a simple chord of C. Beginning with the violins, the artist gradually reverses the whole expression which he had drawn from this motif in the opening passages.

The Quintet which follows this fine Introduction excites in the mind of the Duchess the pyrrhic joy which is expressed in the strophe,

Voce di giubile
D' intorno echeggino
Di pace l'ride
Per noi spunto.

She calls the attention of the Frenchman to the artistic power with which this exultation of the people is introduced as the final emboldened cry of delight united by the grave, earnest, sweet song of Moses and of Aaron to the solemnities of the invocation.

"Yes!" answers the physician, "this would make a charming contra dance!"

"French! French! utterly French!" cried the Duchess. "Yes, I believe you capable of employing this sublime outburst, so gay, so nobly rejoicing, in the service of your rigadoons. You caricature everything—your caricature of music is the vulgarization of great ideas by your dancing tunes. Your cleverness kills your souls as your reasoning kills your reason."

"Have I annoyed you?" asked the Frenchman. "I should be excessively sorry to do so. Your words are like a magic wand, opening my brain and summoning forth new and sublime ideas."

"No," she answered, "you praised Rossini after your fashion. He will succeed in France, I see, through the clever and sensuous side of his character. But hold! here comes the Tinti for the famous duo between Elcia and Osiris. If she has mastered her part well, you will hear the sublime song of a woman divided between her love of her country and her love for one of its oppressors. What can be finer than the art with which the antagonisms of this drama are sustained. A people demanding liberty, enslaved by treachery, supported by a miracle working God. A prince whose love for a Jewess almost justifies the treasons of the oppressor! In this song of Osiris, Ah! se puoi così lasciarmi, how much is there of the divine languor, the ardent sweetness, the tenderness of oriental love! how much in the reply of Elcia: Ma perche così straziarmi! No! two hearts so melodiously united cannot tear themselves asunder," she continued, looking at the prince. "But bark! the divine, delicious Allegro of the march of the Hebrews on their way to the desert. . . .

"Dov' è mai quel cuore amante," she began again in Italian, when the Tinti began the admirable stanzas in which she asks pity for her sufferings. "But what is the matter? The pit is in an uproar!"

"Genovese is bleating like a deer," returned the prince.

This duo, the first sung by the Tinti, was indeed spoiled by the complete failure of the tenor. As soon as he began to sing with the Tinti, his fine voice changed. His excellent method, which reminded us at once of Crescentini and Velati, he seemed to remember and forget at his pleasure. Sometimes a note held too long, sometimes a trill too much prolonged, interfered with the singing. Sometimes unmodulated outbursts of his voice, the sound rushing out like water from an opened flood-gate, gave signs of a complete forgetfulness of every law of taste. The pit began to be exceedingly agitated. The Venetians began to believe that Genovese was acting upon a wager. La Tinti was recalled and applauded furiously. Genovese received some warnings of the hostile feeling he was exciting.

During this scene, comic enough to the Frenchman, whilst La Tinti, eleven times called out, received the frenzied applause of the audience, and received them alone, (for Genovese did not dare to give her his hand,) the physician made an observation upon the close of this duo to the Duchess.

"Rossini ought to have expressed here the deepest grief, and I find the music most unsuitably gay and joyous."

"You are right," she answered. "This fault is a consequence of tyranny. Rossini thought here more of his prima donna than of his Elcia."*

* Compare with this admission (a very just admission too) of Rossini's occasional submissiveness, the magnificent, uncompromising attitude of Beethoven, a most striking and amusing description of which is to be found in Madame Sontag's account of the first repetitions of "Fidelio."—TR.

[From the Manchester Examiner.]

CARDINAL WISEMAN'S LECTURE ON THE CONNECTION BETWEEN THE Arts of Production and the Arts of Design.

[Concluded.]

I will now speak of a department of Art which will interest you, perhaps, more than others—Art applied to textile fabrics. There is a great difference between what art can do in this department and what it can do for those through which I have passed; because the others are in their nature more lasting; they are to continue for a time; they are worth, therefore, the attention and care of artists of the very highest class. The fashions of textile fabrics are perishable and fragile—they are capricious and changeable; therefore it is impossible to have the time, the leisure, and the same degree of labor expended on them as is necessary to produce a great work of Art. I have read with considerable pleasure and can bear testimony to, the important suggestions in a pamphlet or lecture on this subject delivered in this city by Mr. Potter. (Cheers.) He is quite correct in his estimate of the somewhat exaggerated ideas which may exist of the power of Art in connection with that which is not durable, and which in reality has its value, necessarily, for only a brief period. I agree, therefore, with him on that subject; but at the same time I accept as very important his concession that, even with regard to that degree of Art which is compatible with the nature of the substance on which it is to be displayed, we do not do what we ought to do, and that we fall short of our neighbors—or at least that, while in that which is of secondary character we have put forth such perseverance and study as to have attained an equality with them, there is a point, in that which is more delicate and perfect, which we have not reached. (Cheers.) This is an important concession. It appears there is some reason why, in France, they can produce, even in printed fabrics, a superior and more delicate, more beautiful artistic effect, than can as yet be given here; and I shall have to speak of the reason of this, which accords completely with what I have said, because in these works, which are not made absolutely by handicraft, but with the assistance of mechanical skill, there must be a distinction between the designer and the mere workman—a man who keeps the machine in motion and puts the work through it, although, no doubt, it is necessary for the designer also to have a considerable acquaintance with the process by which his design is to be brought out in actual manufacture. I only wish to observe how the principle comes down here. You know the cartoons at Hampton Court, the most perfect and finished work of Art of Raffaele. You would suppose these would be a labor of years: for they are all by his own hand, perhaps hardly aided by a disciple; and nothing can be more perfect than the outline and artistic distribution of the parts of the painting. What were these cartoons? Simply drawings for the loom. Raffaele did not think it below him to draw patterns which were to be sent to Holland or Belgium, and there to be executed in the loom by weavers of a carpet. This shows how the very highest ideal Art may bend without degradation to assist practical Art with all its powers and resources: and where the union of the two in the same person cannot be got, then we have to think of the means by which the harmonious combination of both may be brought to produce one effect. (Cheers.) While upon this subject, I am tempted to quote some beautiful lines on the subject from one of our oldest and wisest poets—one who calls himself, upon his tomb, “the servant of Queen Elizabeth, the councillor of King James, and the friend of Sir Philip Sidney”—Lord Brooke. Speaking as if it was considered in those days that the impulses of industry must be entirely regulated by the ruling power, he prescribes the duty of that in regard to the production of manufactures:—

To which end, power must nurseries erect,
And those trades cherish which use many hands;
Yet such, as more by pains than skill effect,
And so by spirits more than vigor stand;
Whereby each creature may itself sustain,
And who excel, add honor to their gain.

Another remark I will read, which comes in the same passage, because it seems, as written in that age, prophetic of what may be considered the characteristic commercial policy of this day—that policy which particularly owes, if not its origin, certainly its greatest impulse to this city. (Cheers.) He says:—

Now, though wise kings do by advantage play
With other states, by setting tax on toys,
Which, if needs do permit, they justly may,
As punishment for that vice which destroys,
*To real things yet must they careful be,
Here and abroad, to keep them custom free;
Providing clothes and food no burthen bear,
Then, equally distributing of trade,
So as no one rule what we eat or wear,
Or any town the gulf of all be made;*
For, though from few wealth soon be had and known,
And still the rich kept servile by their own,
Yet no one city rich, or exchequer full,
Gives states such credit, strength, or reputation,
As that far-seeing, long-breathed wisdom will,
Which, by the well disposing of creation,
Breathes universal wealth, gives all content,
Is both the mine and scale of government.

(This quotation was much applauded.) Now, gentlemen (continued the Cardinal), I wish to come to some general results. We have seen that, so far, in every instance we have examined, wherever there has been real beauty and perfection of work, it has been in consequence of the practical Art and of the fine Art, which ought to work together, being most closely combined, and as nearly as it can be done in the same individual, or else in the most perfectly harmonious co-operation. Now, we must watch very carefully whether the plans which are being proposed for artistic education—to be applied to production—will tend to combine these to characters better, or further to separate them. I come to the conclusion that, if Art has always flourished in its perfection when the two have been combined—and if, on the other hand, it is acknowledged that, at present, Art is not applied to manufactures as it might be—and if it is, at the same time, the clearly visible fact that our artisans and workmen are not artists—I think I have a right to conclude that this separation of the two characters is the cause of our inferiority, and that, therefore, the education which we are to prepare for those who are to carry productive Art to its perfection, must be one which will combine, closer than is now done, these two departments of what I consider one and the same thing. Now, is it, or can it be so, by the education we are now giving? I observed that what I have said till now has been acknowledged long before by one of the greatest authorities in matters of Art—that is, Doctor Waagen, the director of the Royal Gallery at Berlin. He was examined in 1835, before a committee of the House of Commons on the improvement of Arts and manufactures, and he said that “in former times artists were more workmen, and the workmen were more artists, as in the time of Raffaele; and it is very desirable to restore this happy connection.” I was glad to find this corroboration of what I intended to say. He says again—“We have then, to endeavor a connection between these two, the productive and beautiful Art.” Now, I ask what class of Art was it which was in combination with productive Art, to make it the parent of such a beautiful offspring in every department? It was not low Art; it was not the mere knowing how to sketch an object from nature; it was not merely linear drawing; it was not mere elementary Art, but it was high Art, and the highest Art. In every one of these cases the state of society was such—from what causes I do not undertake here to say—that it did permit the highest artists devoting themselves to what now they condemn and would despise: and, on the other hand, there was such honor given to the product of industry, that when it really had the stamp of beauty upon it, it rose of itself to the department of high Art.

Let me illustrate what I consider the danger to be guarded against by another example. When you go into a picture gallery now, and you see the portrait of a man, why do you care the least who that man was? You see the splendid effect; the countenance, which perhaps has not a beautiful feature in it, but which, by the noble expression, by the beautiful tone of color, by the majestic character thrown around the head, by the harmony between the parts, even by the accessories, is made so glorious that you can gaze upon it for hours. It may be a Doge, it may be a merchant, a soldier, or a prince; you care not; you see there, not the portrait, but you see the painting by Titian, or by Rembrandt, or Vandyke, and the artistic merit so completely swallows up all the idea of personality of him who is represented, that, unless it happens to be some one particularly known, you never take the trouble of inquiring whom the painter represents. And why so? Because then portrait painting had not become a distinct department of Art. There was no such thing then as a person who called himself a portrait painter, who thought he could produce a noble likeness of a man by merely giving a fac simile of his features; but portraits were paintings by men who could have painted an historical picture of the highest character, and to whom it would have been thought not unbecoming to commit the greatest artistic works imaginable. But in modern times the portrait painter is an entirely different person, and the pictures produced by that class of artists are, unfortunately, of little value, except to those who have a personal interest in the subject of the portrait; you know, too, that every one of those portraits, which cover such a vast extent of the wall of the Exhibition, will be transferred to the place of honor, over the chimney-piece in the house of the owner, and when his son grows up, it will be but on one side, that a portrait of the inheritor may take its place, and in the next generation it will be transferred to some other more out-of-the-way corner of the house, until at last it will find a more ignominious position than Caesar's dust stopping up a bunghole to keep out the inclemency of the weather. From what does this come? Simply from the attempt to divide Art into parts—to say that there shall be a class of men who can do a portrait, but cannot do an historical or other great painting. And you find a difference when some of the great artists of the present day—for there are some truly great artists in England—do put their hands to what is considered another department of Art, and paint the portrait of a friend, or of any one else—it becomes in itself a fine creation of Art, and it will not perish when the person is forgotten; but it will be known by the name of the person who painted it, and not by the name of the person who sat for it. In this way, too, high Art, when applied to a lower branch, raises its character. This is what ought to be the fundamental basis of artistic education. If we really mean to make more than improved designers or draughtsmen for mechanical work, we must have great artists who are not afraid to work mechanically at the same time that they are great artists; we must have the feeling that Art commits no unworthy condescension in giving immediate assistance to the processes of production. The famous artists of whom I have been speaking were, as we have seen, men who worked at their business, and yet were not considered as working men; they were considered as artists, and treated as such. And it is that, I am afraid, which makes the great difference between our time and theirs. Art, unfortunately, is not now considered so noble as to give rank and station, as it did in those days. I do not mean that the great artists, those who devote themselves to what are considered works of high Art, do not receive patronage and countenance, and even high honor; but we find that in those days such distinctions were bestowed on the artists themselves in productive toil. There is not, perhaps, any part of the history of Art more interesting and beautiful than those portions of Cellini's memoirs, which shows us the manner in which he was treated; he used to go when he pleased to the Pope to take him drawings and models; he speaks of going in without even waiting to be announced—going in the evening, after laboring all day in his workshop, as a matter of course. He was treated in the same manner by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and by the King Francis the First; when he was working for him the King used to go at any hour and visit him; and Cellini gives rather a characteristic anecdote, proving how very familiar such visits were. One day, while at work, and, as usual, rather in ill temper, an apprentice or servant did something which displeased Cellini, and he roughly took the youth by the shoulders, and pushed him across the room. The apprentice fell against the door, which was just then opened by the king, and he fell fairly into the king's arms. Such was the familiar way in which kings and great personages used to visit Cellini, and find him in his apron among his workmen. The difference between the social tone of our day and that of a former age cannot probably be overcome. I cannot, therefore, pretend to hope that we shall see the day when the real honest artisan who at the same time shows skill as well as industry, will be considered raised thereby above that condition in which he is at present held. (Cheers.) But I believe, myself, that it is not patronage which Art wants in modern times. Patronage it has; you, gentlemen here, many of you, I know, would not scruple to go far beyond the mere calculation of interest, were it in your power to raise, by your patronage, any one who gave evidence of genius, and reward him as he deserved. It is not patronage, but honor, that Art wants. (Cheers.)

Now, speaking of the department to which I have just alluded, there is a passage worth quoting from Mr. Ward's book, "The World and its workshop," on the difference between English and French designers in the textile fabrics. "France has studiously cultivated the Art of design, and advanced its professors to the rank of gentlemen; in England, on the contrary, with some exception, it has been degraded to a mechanical employment, and remunerated at weekly wages. France has, in consequence, a species of industry, to which we have no claim—the production of design for exportation." Now, having drawn these general conclusions, we must come to some practical applications. The first, that we must avoid making too great a separation between that character of Art, which it is proposed, now, to impart to our products, and the higher departments of Arts. I have observed that the separation of Art into two departments, high and low, seems to be dangerous, and it will perhaps, prove fatal. You may educate a great number of good designers, persons who will make tolerable drawings, and with rapidity; but the influence upon these which are considered the lower stages of art must come, not from below, but from above; it is only Art in its highest department that gives the true feeling of proportion, the right sense of harmony, whether in color or in design, that gives also that sense and feeling of the adaptation and propriety of things to their purpose, which is indispensable. Any one must be surprised at seeing the extraordinary combination of the styles of different countries and times, in our works of Art, from the want of a regular artistic education. I therefore, think, that the first thing which must be done is to try an education which will not give merely a great degree of elementary artistic power, but that, while we give what may be called the rudiments of Art to every one, if possible, so as to give them all the opportunity of developing a higher taste and power, if they possess it, we must not, in looking beyond that, satisfy ourselves with the idea that we can educate a great number of artisans to a middling degree of artistic feeling, in the hope that thereby we may influence the character of our manufactures; but we must endeavour to combine the two, to bring down the high Art to mingle with the lower, in the feeling that it is the common interest and duty of artists to improve the productive arts, and to carry into actual work—not merely into design—the powers which they possess. (Cheers.)

The evidence of Mr. Skene, before the committee of the House of Commons, is to the same effect. He and Mr. Potter and every other writer I have seen, agree that we are not equal with the French in the more delicate operations of art applied to manufactures, and especially in textile fabrics; and he gives this reason: "The system of France is very different from that of this country, because in France artists of the first eminence employ their time—and make it a most profitable part of their employment—in pattern drawing, and they are paid very high prices by the manufacturers."

This, then, accounts for everything, because it is the union of high art in design with manufacture that makes the French superior. The evidence of M. Coquerel, who is himself an eminent architect and designer, shows that a distinguished artist, who became president of the French Academy of Arts at Rome, and one of the first of his day, was employed at Sevres, in the china manufacture; and he states, also, that of fourteen or fifteen French artists of the first rank, educated at Rome, with whom he was acquainted, many were scattered through France assisting in the different manufactures—finding the market for the highest class of artistic works so limited, and so full, these men, instead of sinking into despair, or committing suicide, as has been seen in similar cases, turned their high talent to the assistance and improvement of manufactures: and they are not thought to have dishonored themselves by doing so, nor is it considered their superior education was thrown away upon them, in qualifying them for the posts they now occupy. Why should it not be so here? Let any one go into the exhibition of paintings in London, and look around the walls, he will, perhaps, find only a small number of artists who can, with any hope of advancing themselves in the path to eminence, continue in what they may consider the highest department of art; and I cannot but think there are many in distress, persons who might be making an honorable livelihood, if they would apply their talents to what they would wrongly consider, perhaps, a degrading employment, but which is most honorable,—the improvement of art in its productive department. (Cheers.)

The second step, which seems to me of the greatest importance, is, to familiarize the people with art. This I know is a very trite topic, and one which can hardly be considered to require from us much attention. I know it is proposed to make museums in every part, and I think that excellent. But we must observe how it is that that familiarity with art has been obtained by other people; it has been, not so much by having places to which people were to go to see art, but by rendering it familiar everywhere to their eyes. The ancient Greeks, proceeding from other considerations, which we, as Christians, could not for a moment wish to have considered, such as the public spectacles, and feasts, and ceremonies of Greece, filled their whole country with works of art. Any one that will read the works of Pausanias, or the first book alone, will see how it was impossible for an Athenian to go ten yards in any direction in the city without seeing some beautiful work of art. On every side there were monuments, and statues, and temples, of the most beautiful workmanship and design; and the people became impregnated with the sense of artistic beauty, and therefore whoever, even a mechanic, put his hand to any work, worked under the influence of that feeling. (Cheers.) In a later period in Rome there was the same plan of filling the public buildings, the streets, and squares of the city, with sculptured monuments, and with paintings, hung up so that the people could gaze on them; and Pliny gives us a long list of paintings put up by different emperors; and, by way of showing what was thought by the Romans of our northern ancestors, he says, that among those paintings on the walls of the Forum there was one of a shepherd; and when a German ambassador came to Rome, he was asked at what price would he value that picture? Which shows that it was considered by the Romans to be worth a high price, quite beyond a German's estimate; he having so little idea of art that he did not consider that question applicable to any possible artistic merit, said, "Why, I would not have the man, if he were alive and breathing, if you would give him to me"—he considering it was the value of the man, as a servant, and not of the picture, that he was to regard. In a later age, at Florence, Vasari tells us how he and Michael Angelo, and other artists, used to meet together and then go from church to church to see the beautiful works of art in each, and then to discuss and criticise them. In the middle ages it was the Church, no doubt, which gave to public admiration the specimens of fine art, and kept them before the minds of all, and, in fact, made the people be artists. The consequence of this was, that, as Cellini tells us, when his statue of Perseus, after having been finished, was put into a public place, and when he uncovered it for the first time, "It so pleased God that as soon as ever my work was beheld by the populace they set up so loud a shout of applause that I began to be comforted for the mortifications I had undergone; and there were sonnets in my praise every day fastened up on the gate, and the very day I finished my work twenty more sonnets were set up, with the greatest praises of the work, and Latin and Greek poems were published on the occasion." So well had the Italian public learned how to appreciate a noble work of art!

Now, I look forward with no small expectation to what will be done by the new exhibition which is preparing, because I know that great pains have been taken to collect casts and copies of whatever is most beautiful in every department of art, beginning with the most remote period down to the present time; and if it be really open to the public, and if, especially, it be open for some portion, at least, of that day on which alone the artisan can enjoy it—(great cheering)—then I am sure it will do more towards raising the feeling of the people for art, and consequently towards introducing an improved practice, than any set of lessons or any teaching could do. A very strong remark is made by Dr. Waagen, before that committee, when asked if they shut up the museum at Berlin as they do in England at certain times to enable artists to copy, he says, "By no means, because, I believe, art is far more promoted by the people seeing it than it is by any number of artists making copies." But it appears to me there has been a deficiency in the general education among us in the matter of artistic culture. I cannot but be struck with this when I see that among all the colleges and schools belonging to this country, so respectable and richly endowed, there is not one of them, so far as I know, which has made any collection or museum that might train the young men who are educated there in a familiarity with art. I do not think any college in either of our Universities, Eton, or any of the schools, keeps before the eyes of its young men examples of painting, sculpture, and of other arts of design, which might accustom them during their early years to admire and appreciate art, and thus to contribute afterwards their influence to elevate its character. At the same time, I must observe with sincere pleasure that this is not the case with our Catholic colleges; that, poor and unendowed as they are, there is not one of them which has not striven, at the same time while it has provided itself with a library, far beyond the proportion of its means, if compared with what others have done, to provide also some works of art, and keep them constantly before the students. (Cheers.) At Stonyhurst there are many beautiful things, carving, lapidary, silver work, and jewellery, especially for church purposes. Ushaw, or St. Cuthbert's College, near Durham, is another instance; the walls there are covered with paintings, many of excellent masters, and engravings of great beauty; there is a museum filled with specimens of art; the sacristy of the chapel is growing with proofs of the encouragement given there to modern artists, as well as with carefully-collected specimens of ancient art.

I may be allowed to revert also to the days which I spent in St. Mary's College, at Oscott. There, through the munificence of a departed nobleman, and under the guidance of the refined taste of the greatest artist of this day, because a practical disciple of all the arts—Mr. Pugin—(cheers)—there was collected a museum which would have been worthy of a larger establishment; beautiful specimens of carving, of enamelling, and metal work of every sort, so valuable that persons were sent from the department of practical art on purpose to make moulds and copies of the specimens; and almost all the cloisters were covered with paintings, some by very respectable artists, and others good copies. The students were thus brought up in familiarity with choice objects of art, which has had an influence upon their lives since, and induced them to patronise and encourage art. That collection, moreover, was, in the most liberal way, thrown open to every one who chose to come and visit us; we never saw any feeling of narrow partisanship, or exclusiveness of religious distinction; the house used to be visited every day by parties of people from the neighborhood; and nothing gave me greater pleasure than to see the young men who used to come there, and who were permitted to walk freely through the house. There was, at no great distance, a very considerable establishment for education, richly endowed, and having everything that could encourage the study of literature; but it did not possess, as it appeared, a single object of artistic interest within its walls; and often did the students of that establishment come up to St. Mary's, and roam freely through it, and receive every courtesy. And that was at a time when Oscott was considered almost the centre of a strong proselytising tendency, and I know that personally I was much more engaged in controversy then than I am at the present moment; and it was pleasing, therefore, to see that there was no feeling on the subject which could make it be apprehended as unpleasant for those young men to come to us. Bodies of those young men used to come to St. Mary's, with letters from their principal, couched in the most courteous terms, asking, as a favor, that his students might be allowed to attend the establishment, which could have very little other merit to many than as it was filled with works of art; and on one occasion he informed me that, when any of the students of his house were particularly well conducted, and had especially distinguished themselves, the best reward he could give them was to send them with a letter to us, to come and see Oscott College. Now, it will give you all pleasure to know that this generous, liberal and gentlemanly-minded individual, the head of that neighboring college, was—the Rev. Prince Lee. (Immense cheering and laughter.)

One thing more, I will observe, is important, and that:—that we must not narrow the sphere of art. There is a tendency to do so in this practical scheme of education. I observed in the late report, which may be considered as a programme of the department of practical art, that there are prizes proposed for artistic designs in three different departments—for printed garments, fabrics for carpets, and for paper-hangings. Now, one of the conditions of the four drawings to be sent in to compete for the prize in all three instances is this, "the designs to be flat, not imitative, but conventional, without relief, shadow, or perspective." Now, that is the mediæval principle, and cannot apply to other styles of art; and we are narrowing the sphere of art if you dictate, as a necessary rule of all designs in those three departments of productive art, that there shall not be relief or perspective in the painting—that the flowers must all be of one color, and that there must be no shadow, and no attempt to copy nature, but that the forms must be all "conventional," that is, such as a rose spread out into four parts, with a point between them, and the lily changed into a fleur-de-lis, and no natural forms to be truly imitated. Now, it is folly to think of competing with French art if our artisans are to be educated on that principle, because the beauty of design, where nature is copied—where the flower glows in its own colors—will carry the taste of the public, and I think rightly, in preference to a series of flat and unshaded designs—I think it is a wrong principle; and why? Artists will tell you that the carpet is nothing more than a back-ground for furniture—that the hanging of a wall, paper, or whatever it may be, is nothing but a back-ground for the furniture—and therefore that these must be quiet and of a lower tint, with nothing brilliant, and no attempt at the representation of natural objects. Now, I deny this principle; they are not back-grounds. The papering of the wall is in the place of the ancient painting on the wall; and I do not see why, if you only avoid whatever may offend the eye—such as false perspective—there should not be all the beauty and glow of natural objects given to the pictured papering of the wall. If we are to collect museums, to put before our young artists specimens from the paintings of Pompeii, and then to tell them that these wall paintings are done on a false principle, because they are good representations of natural objects, and not merely conventional drawings, how are we consistent? And, if you tell a young man who designs patterns for carpets that there must be nothing there which would not be, naturally, in such a position—that there must be no sky or flowers there—then you go to make it a mere pavement and nothing better. I should say that the real carpet should take the place of the ancient mosaic. The ancients thought it not amiss to represent whole scenes on their pavement, with sky and rivers, men and horses; and Pliny tells us that there were many celebrated men for this sort of work in Greece; but the most celebrated of all was Sosias; and he says, among his other works at Pergamus there was a remarkable one which was called "The Unswept House." It was a representation which certainly does not give us a very good idea of cleanliness of domestic habits—a floor on which all sorts of refuse had been left to lie about, fragments of meat, and the shells of crawfish, and everything which untidy people might leave after their meals. Such were the notions the ancients had of designs. I should, therefore, be inclined to fear that if we began to deal with art upon a too confined basis, and on principles which belong only to one period of the history of art—and if we now insist on their being made the sole basis of artistic education—we shall produce cramped and narrow-minded artists, and never enable them to take advantage of the great classical patterns to improve their taste. (Cheers.)

In concluding, I think among the greatest errors that language has imposed upon us there is none more remarkable than the sort of antagonism which is established in common language as between nature and art. We speak of art as being, in a certain manner, the rival of nature, and opposed to it; we contrast them—we speak of the superiority of nature and depreciate art as compared with it. On the other hand, what is art but the effort which is made by human skill to seize upon the transitory features of nature, to give them the stamp of perpetuity? If we study nature we see that in her general laws she is unchangeable; the year goes on its course, and day after day pass magnificently through the same revolutions. But there is not one single moment in which either nature, or anything that belongs to her, is stationary. The earth, the planets, and the sun and moon, are not for any instant in exactly the same relation mutually as they were in another instant. The face of nature is constantly changing; and what is it that preserves that for us but art, which is not the rival, but the child, as well as the handmaid of nature? You find, when you watch the setting sun, how beautiful and how bright for an instant!—then, how it fades away!—the sky and sea are covered with darkness, and the departed light is reflected, as it had been just now upon the water, still upon your mind. In that one evanescent moment a Claude or a Stanfield dips his pencil in the glowing sky, and transfers its hue to his canvass; and ages after, by the lamp of night, or in the brightness of the morning, we can contemplate that evening scene of nature, and again renew in ourselves all the emotions which the reality could impart. And so it is with every other object. Each of us is, but for the present moment, the same as he is in this instant of his personal existence through which he is now passing. He is the child, the boy, the man, the aged one bending feebly over the last few steps of his career. You wish to possess him as he is now, in his youthful vigor, or in the maturity of his wisdom, and a Rembrandt, or a Titian, or a Herbert seizes that moment of grace, or of beauty, or of sage experience; and he stamps indelibly that loved image on his canvass; and for generations it is gazed on with admiration and with love. We must not pretend to fight against nature, and to say that we will make art different from what she is. I will read you some beautiful lines, which show how our art must be derived from nature. I translate them from the excellent poem of Schiller, addressed to artists:—

The choicest blossom, which the parterre warms,
In one rich posy skillfully combined—
Such, infant Art crept first from Nature's arms,
Then are the posies in one wreath entwined.

A second Art, in manlier bearing, stands,
Fair work of man, created in his hands.

I believe the idea of these beautiful lines is taken from the anecdote which Pliny has preserved to us of the contest of art between Pansias the painter and Glycera the flower girl; she used to combine her flowers with such exquisite beauty, that they excited the admiration of the chief of artists, and he did not think it beneath his art to copy on the canvass the operation of her naturally-instructed fingers; and then she, in her turn, again would rival the picture, and produce a more beautiful bouquet still; and the painter, with his pencil, would again rival her, and produce by his art the same effect as she had done with the flowers of nature. Let us, therefore, look on Art but as the highest image that can be made of nature. Consequently, while religion is the greatest and noblest mode in which we acknowledge the magnificent and all-wise majesty of God, and what He has done both for the spiritual and the physical existence of man, let us look upon Art as but the most graceful and natural tribute of homage we can pay to Him for the beauties which He has so lavishly scattered over creation. Art, then, is to my mind, and I trust to you all, a sacred and a reverend thing, and one which must be treated with all nobleness of feeling and with all dignity of aim. We must not depress it; the education of our art must always be tending higher and higher; we must fear the possibility of our creating a mere lower class of artists which would degrade the higher departments, instead of endeavoring to blend and harmonize every department, so that there shall cease to exist in the minds of men the distinction between high and low art. I will conclude with another beautiful sentiment from the same poem:—

The bee may teach thee an industrious care;
The worm, in skill, thy master thou must own;
With higher spirits, wisdom thou dost share,
But Art, oh man, hast thou alone.

DR. JOHNSON.—The great Dr. Johnson's ear, in respect of the power of appreciating musical sounds, was remarkably defective: nevertheless, he possessed a sense of propriety in harmonic composition that gave him an unconquerable distaste to all unmeaning flourish and rapidity of execution. Being one night at a concert where an elaborate and florid concerto on the violin was performed, after it was over, he asked a gentleman who sat near him what it meant. The question somewhat puzzled the amateur, who could only say, that it was very difficult. "Difficult!" answered the learned auditor, "I wish to God it had been impossible."

A Concert two Hundred Years ago.

In noticing the preparations making by Jullien for his concerts in New York, wherein that originality of a composer and orchestra-leader proposes to astonish the Empire City amateurs with such combinations and numbers of big and little drums, trombones, trumpets, cymbals, Saxe-horns, "compressed air" trumpets, as were never before heard by them, the New York Courier des Etats Unis sketches the following amusing report of a grand concert given two hundred years ago. We translate it:

"The Messrs. Saxe's improved brass instruments and this terrible 'compressed air' trumpet of Mr. Derche are but children's toys, ventable playthings, when compared with the instruments employed in the monster concerts given by our forefathers. It was with brewers' cauldrons, contrabass, each of which was a load for eight mules, and windmills arranged harmoniously, that they made up their orchestras. Do not laugh; we have before us the proof of what we state; the report in full of a concert 'in action' given at Dresden on the 13th July, 1645, by order of the Elector John George of Saxe. This concert was to represent the episode of Judith and Holofernes. The words were written by Mathæus Naumenker, and the music composed by Hilaire, the court singer. The Elector, having heard the score, was so much pleased with the musician that he presented him with any quantity of beer, and entrusted him with the organization of the fete, without regard to expense. All the artists of Germany, Switzerland, the Vaud, Poland and Italy were invited to unite with their pupils in the Dresden gigantic musical festival, where, by the 9th July, 1845, several thousand instrumental performers were assembled and an army of singers.

"It must have been a strange spectacle—these men arriving from all points of the horizon in crowds, armed cap-a-pie with all the instruments known at the time, and a multitude of others which were unknown in Germany, and many of which had been manufactured for the occasion. A certain Rapotzki came from Warsaw with a wagon drawn by four mules; this equipage being solely to convey an engine of musical war, an enormous contrabasso, which measured seven German yards in height. The artist had ingeniously adapted to his instrument a small ladder, which allowed him to run up and down quickly from the bridge to the top of the instrument, and play with both hands his great bow over the three cables of his contrabasso. What does Bottesini think of that?"

This was not all; a student from Wittemberg, named Kumpfer, promised to sing the score of Holophernes a feat in which he was materially assisted by swallowing an ocean of beer at the expense of the Elector. For fear the contrabasso of the Pole, Rapotzki, should not be powerful enough for the voices of the singers and the terrible noise of the orchestra, the singer Grandmaus bethought him of a wind-mill, between the wings of which he had stretched large cables. Four vigorous performers placed in the top and bottom angles, drew sounds from these cables by rubbing on them as with bows, strong pieces of wood with serrated surfaces. On one side of the orchestra, which took up its position on a hill, was a gigantic organ which father Serapion, a distinguished organist, beat with hands and feet. Next to the organ were the wind and metallic instruments, among which was the brewer's cauldron we have before alluded to, and an enormous bell, recently made and destined for a cathedral. In the centre was closely gathered the mass of the musicians, placed above the singers, who were arranged in good order under two hundred and fifty leaders. Delighted with this magnificent coup d'œil, and wishing to add his part to this musical structure which he had seen created as if by enchantment, the Elector had a dozen bomb-mortars, well charged by the court artillery, placed in battery.

"At the signal given by the discharge of these mortars, the concert began. One voice, immense and multiple, struck the air in all directions, and struck the sonorous vault of ether with millions of vibrations. A spectator could easily have imagined himself into a world of magical creation. But then what zeal did not the artists display on this occasion. The famous prima donna Rigozzi, from Milan, lost her life from her efforts to make more noise than the orchestra. The student Kumpfer, accompanied by the contrabassist Rapotzki and by the wind-mill, sang an air that made the hills tremble. In order to give additional zest to the entertainment, and to please the Elector, the first violinist of the day, named Giovanni Scioppio, from Cremona, played a solo, holding his instruments behind his back. At length a double fugue, sung by the Assyrians flying before the victorious Israelites, was sung with so much energy and so much expression, that the victors, overcome with enthusiasm, and finding that the music expressed imperfectly the desire for revenge that animated them, fell upon the Assyrians, and deluged them with clods of earth. This made the Elector laugh heartily, and terminated joyously this truly monster concert.

"The next day it was discovered that several partizans in the camp of the Israelites and the Assyrians had died during the great musical contest of the day previous."

THE RULING PASSION.—It is related in a biography of Lambert, the astronomer, of Mulhausen, that on being asked how he liked an opera at Berlin, to which he had been taken by some of his friends, he replied, that he had not seen it as he had been occupied during the entire evening in calculating the refraction of light from the lustre!

NO MORE!

Flow on, sad stream, unto the sea!

Thou flowest on as ever,
But the heart most dear no more is here,
Forever and forever.

No more! I hear it in the pines,
Through which the night-winds roar,
Those stars shall shine in eyes of thine,
No more, O, never more!

Sigh on! sad autumn wind, sigh on!
She lies in the grass beneath,—
I make my moan by her grave alone,
For the violets have her breath.

O, lonely night! O, wandering moon!
Hast thou no word for me?

O, love and sorrow! O, day and morrow!
Must ye forever be?

SONG.

O! heavy, heavy, day!
When wilt thou wear away,
And bring her sweet returning?
O, weary, weary, night!
When wilt thou take thy flight,
And bring another morning?

O! stars that gem the skies!
Ye shine not like her eyes,
Where love is ever beaming!

Pass on, O hateful day—
Yet gentle night, O, stay!
For she is mine while dreaming,

In dreams, she comes to me—
In dreams, her eyes I see—
And bliss divine comes o'er me,—
Then let my spirit creep
To thy pavilion, sleep!
While Love flies on before me.

W. W. STORY.

SAYINGS OF MARTIN LUTHER.—"Music," says Martin Luther, has ever been my delight; it has always excited and moved me, so as to give me a greater desire to preach.

"I have always been fond of music. He who undertakes this art is the right sort of a man, and is fit for anything else. It is needful that music should be taught in schools. A schoolmaster must be able to sing, or I do not think much of him. Music cometh near to theology; I would not exchange my little knowledge of it for much money. The young should be constantly exercised in this art, for it refines and improves men. Singing is the best of arts and exercises; it is not of a worldly character, and it is an antidote for all contentions and quarrels. Singers are not gloomy, but joyful, and sing their cares away. There can be no doubt that in minds which are affected by music are the seeds of much that is good; and those who are not affected by it I regard as stocks and stones. Music effecteth what theology alone can effect besides: It giveth peace and a joyful mind. Therefore, the prophets have employed no art as they have music, inasmuch as they have put their theology not into geometry, arithmetic or astronomy, but into music. Hence it cometh, that by teaching the truth in psalms and hymns, they have joined theology and music in close union."

The Night is Mother of the Day,
The Winter of the Spring,
And ever upon old Decay
The greenest mosses cling.
Behind the cloud the star-light lurks,
Through showers the sunbeams fall;
For God, who loveth all His works,
Has left His Hope with all.

To Music: To calm his fever.

BY HERRICK.

Charm me to sleep and melt me so
With thy delicious numbers,
That being ravish'd, hence I go Away in easy slumbers.
Oh make me weep
My pains asleep,
And grant me such repose,
That I, poor I,
May think thereby
I live and die midst roses.
Fall on me like the silent dew,
Or like those maiden showers
Which, at the peep of day, do strew
A baptism o'er the flowers.
Melt, melt my pains
With thy soft strains,
That, ease unto me given,
With full delight
I leave this light
And take my flight for Heaven.

BOSTON, SEPT. 24, 1853.

A NEW VOLUME of this journal will commence with the number for Saturday, October 8th. Just the beginning of the musical season, and just the time for new subscribers to begin to read our paper. We trust our friends, who are satisfied that this paper is worth sustaining, will use a little effort to induce others to subscribe.

We would also state, for the benefit of those who may wish to keep connectedly such mirror of the musical times as we have given for the eighteen months past, that we have a good supply of all the back numbers on hand, with bound volumes of the first year.

The Exhibition of the MASSACHUSETTS CHARITABLE MECHANIC ASSOCIATION has in it many things deserving the attention of a journal devoted in any degree to Art, and, in the uncommon dearth of musical topics on which to discourse to our readers, who, we doubt not, have been pleased to have their attention directed to such matters by the interesting lecture of Cardinal Wiseman (of which we give the conclusion to-day), we are glad to take our text from this Exhibition. This is the seventh of these expositions, which have taken occurred triennially, and have been an established thing among us long before Crystal Palaces were thought of; and it is interesting, in looking back, to see how much progress has been made in New England (for this is essentially a local exhibition), in the productive Arts and the Arts of design, and at the same time very obvious how much yet remains to be accomplished in bringing about that close connection between these Arts of which Cardinal Wiseman so strenuously endeavors to show the importance. The influence of these Expositions, now becoming so universal and frequent, in promoting this end, cannot be too highly estimated, both on the contributors themselves, and on the public at large. For here may be seen, in the successful attempts at a higher style of Art made by some, and in the bald and wretched abortions of others, how, even to the most familiar and common objects of every day use, may be given an elegance of form, design, outline or color, which shall lend a glory and a grace even to these neglected objects, making them teachers of beauty, appealing only the more powerfully because of their very commonness and familiarity. Our manufacturers are beginning slowly to appreciate the importance of these matters, and seem to give, from year to year, an increased attention to the Arts of Design. Schools of Design are organized and successfully carried on, so far at least as the training of the pupils is concerned, though they do not, we believe, receive from manufacturers the patronage which they deserve and require for their permanent and effective existence. We observe in Faneuil Hall some drawings by the pupils of one of these schools, and notice them as a beginning, calculated to draw attention to these institutions, rather than on account of any special merits of these particular specimens. We are inclined to believe, judging from the present Exhibition, that more attention is given to the Arts of Design by the workers in wood and metal than by other manufacturers among us, and observe some fine specimens of wood carving, bronze castings and works in silver; while the productions of the looms seem to have been comparatively neglected, appearing generally much inferior, both in respect to brilliancy of color and in beauty of design, to the productions in the departments alluded to.

Some articles claim our more particular attention. Among the musical instruments, most worthy of note is the noble organ of the Messrs. Hook, which stands in the Rotunda of Quincy Hall. The diapasons are full and round, of especial smoothness and richness; the trumpet uncommonly good, being remarkably free from the harshness so common in this stop, and the full organ in all respects is unusually satisfactory. The noise and bustle of so large a crowd as is constantly passing, renders it difficult to judge with nicety of the more delicate features of this instrument, but we were much pleased with some of the solo stops, and especially with the clarinet and flute, which are faultless in sweetness and evenness of tone. The instrument, we learn, is destined for a church in Pittsfield, in this State, and will add much to the high reputation of the Messrs. Hook.

The Music room (a sort of lucus a non lucendo) from morning till late in the night is a perfect Babel of sweet sounds. Pianos, Seraphines, Melodeons, and all the race of kindred instruments, are tortured incessantly by every passer by, tormenting not a little the ears of the listeners. The Pianos, it seems to us, are of unusual excellence, being, without exception, from our most noted manufacturers, and we observed none of the wretched instruments that are usually exhibited at these Fairs, from inferior makers. The only novelty among them is a small grand of seven octaves by CHICKERING, of perhaps half the usual size of a grand piano. It has a full, strong body of tone, clear and uniform, the action easy and accurate. A quiet half hour enabled us to hear the instrument thoroughly tested, and we are confident that its compact size and form, together with its powerful and brilliant tone, will make it at once a favorite instrument in our drawing rooms.

Turning from Music to the sister Arts, we find but a beggarly collection of Paintings, few in number and poor in quality. The sculptors, on the other hand, are well represented.—STEPHENSON'S "Dying Indian" (exhibited in the great Exhibition of 1851) occupies a conspicuous position in the rotunda, attracting much attention, and is too well known to need any special mention. Near it stands an exquisite portrait bust of remarkable beauty and fine execution by the same artist. BALL sends his large bust of Webster, in marble, and the statuette of Webster of which we have spoken before. KINNEY, of Worcester, we believe a self-taught artist, contributes a fine bust of the Hon. Charles Allen, and some other smaller busts, both portraits and ideal, of an unusual degree of merit.

We saw some specimens of engraving, but none at all remarkable for excellence, and this branch of Art seems to be but poorly represented. Indeed we compare but ill in this Art with Europe, while the prices paid here are much higher for quite inferior work.

Daguerreotypes are exhibited in multitudes, and seem to hold a rather doubtful place; so that one scarcely knows whether to rank them among the productions of chemistry or to give them a higher place among the works of Art. The productions of Whipple and Southworth by their careful artistic arrangement and close attention to all the various shades of effect, are no mere mechanical productions and seem to claim a place in this higher department, and are worthy of attention.

As a whole, the Seventh Exhibition shows a marked improvement on its predecessors. The number of articles exhibited is, perhaps, not so great as on former occasions, and this appears to be owing to the greater strictness with which inferior and ordinary contributions have been excluded, the result, of course, being highly favorable to the character of the Exhibition. A still more rigid censorship will tend still further to raise the character of these Exhibitions, so honorable to Massachusetts industry, and to elevate the standard of the Productive Arts by bringing them into a more intimate connection with the Arts of Design.

Psalmody.

[We are glad to present to our readers the following "notions" of an esteemed correspondent; being always willing to give fair play to both sides. We may speak hereafter of the degree in which they coincide with, or differ from our own.]

MY DEAR SIR,—You are pleased to speak of Psalmody in a way that does not exactly suit my notions, and so I suppose you will let me speak in a way that may not suit yours.

Music does not create any new sentiments in the human heart, nor express any that cannot be defined in words. It is a peculiar and definite language for the utterance of human feelings,—more forcible than words,—answering the purpose of expressing sentiments, in some instances, better than they do, but not expressing anything different from what we can talk about.

Now there are in most men's souls, religious emotions which are entirely distinct from their earthly affections.

Filial affection, is not piety,—trust in God, is not self-reliance,—penitence is more than sadness,—religious joy is infinitely above gayety. We need sacred music as well as secular,—oratorios, as well as operas,—psalms, as well as songs. This brings me to my point. Psalms tunes are worth attending to. They have their influence, and a mighty influence over the nation. It was Billings and Psalm-singing that prepared, in the course of years, this Yankee people for the Messiah of the creation, and the Mount of Olives.

In our days we find two kinds of improvement, so called, in the music of our congregational churches. In some churches we find them forsaking the old choral times and graceful airs of our fathers, to introduce insipid or harsh things of living Bostonians. In others we find hired singers flourishing and making a display of their voices in opera airs, fixed over for church occasions.

Now, Mr. Dwight, I agree with Mr. Bird that this last is the greatest evil of the two. It is better to sing a hymn to the most mean-less tune that Lowell Mason or his feeble imitators ever wrote, than to sing it to an air that is full of a meaning different from that of the hymn. This is the horror of foreign music, which you laugh at; but which I think is a reasonable horror.

Let me give you an instance. I once heard four well trained voices sing Wesley's hymn, "A charge to keep, I have," to a lively air from Corelli, and at another time I heard the same hymn sung to an allegro joyous strain from the Creation,—"A new created world." Now in each instance the whole effect of the hymn was ruined. It might as well have been sung to "Maggie Lauder."

There is a collection of very beautiful music published in New York, called the Beethoven Collection. The music is fine, the hymns are fine, but they are put together without reference to adaptation. The use of that collection in a church, would effectually drive me out of its walls.

But in the Ancient Lyre the words are so perfectly in union with the music, that you know not which was first written, you think they must have flowed from one heart, at one time. A chorister in using it has no difficulty in adapting the music to the hymn.

Now it appears to me that you would do a great service to music, and to religion, if instead of shaking your sides over the whole tribe of psalm-singers, you would tell them how to choose proper books, and take other proper means to improve our Yankee art of music. Pray except Mr. Zeuner's books when you laugh at the church psalm tunes.

Yours, H. T.

Jullien's Concerts.

NEW YORK, September 17, 1853.

I had the gratification of hearing Jullien's incomparable band several times this week, and can assuredly testify to the correctness of any or all the eulogiums passed on his concerts. Those who have not heard him imagine he only excels in the lighter and more volatile performances, but I heard the Scherzo of Mendelssohn's Third Symphony performed in a most exquisite manner. He brings out a pianissimo from the immense mass of stringed instruments in a manner that obliges you to hold your breath; and then his crescendos and decrescendos are perfect. The solo performers are of the most finished character—of course, Bottesini is too well known in Boston to need any praise from my hands—I may add, however, that he has improved since he was with us a few years since. Koenig absolutely sings on his cornet à piston, and not as a third or fourth rate singer, but as a Lind or Sontag sings. He always receives most applause, not that there is half the merit that exists in Bottesini, but the difference lies in the instruments. The clarinetist, Wuille, has a beautiful tone and most finished execution. Lavigne, the solo oboe, is generally considered the first oboeist in Europe; his execution is most exquisitely delicate and the tone very thin and cutting, as it were, like glass. Hughes, the ophicleydist, gets a most astonishing tone from his instrument. This instrument has been almost banished from the modern orchestra on account of its bald, thin, and usually false intonation—the Sax Tuba has superseded it—but, in the hands of Hughes it is quite wonderful. His tone is large, round, and as mellow as anything I ever heard—in fact no performance aroused my attention so much as when in the American Quadrilles he introduced the Star Spangled Banner—it always draws forth a cheer, and really the most experienced musician cannot help joining in. Reichardt, the flutist, makes the most of his Böhm flute—his execution is very brilliant and clear, but the tone has not that softness or body to be obtained on the old flute. Thus far I believe Jullien has not given his fine violinists or violincellists a chance to show their powers, but undoubtedly he has many excellent artists among his strings. As I said before, Jullien will make instrumental music popular in America, and when he does, I hope to be one of the first to subscribe for a medal of thanks to present him. The love of instrumental music among the Bostonians will enable them to appreciate Jullien's orchestra more than the New Yorkers, though if large audiences go to prove a taste or knowledge, they were a learned body who assembled nightly in Castle Garden.

AN ARTIST.

A ROYAL PSALM-TUNE MAKER.—Can it indeed be possible that any "Native Musician" can have been so deficient in national pride, and so lost to a sense of what was due to native genius, as to admit to his collection the productions of a living foreigner, who is not only a foreigner, but a Prince to boot? We hardly believe our eyes.

Prince Albert has pre-ented a Dissenting congregation with two pieces of sacred music of his own composition. The circumstances were these: a committee were engaged in compiling a new tune-book; when, in a collection of tunes obtained from the United States, they found one attributed to Prince Albert. The gentlemen in question were anxious not only to assign every tune to its right owner; but in every case in which it was practicable, to obtain the owner's permission for its use. An application was, therefore, made in the proper quarter, and the origin of the piece was placed beyond a doubt by the permission which its composer immediately granted for its use. That permission was accompanied by the additional offer, upon the part of his Royal Highness, of another of his musical compositions, which was, of course, readily accepted; and accordingly Prince Albert's "Gotha," and a "Christmas Hymn," form a portion of the tune-book.

In another column will be found the announcement of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, who seem to be well prepared for the winter's campaign. We learn that Mr. FRIES has made a valuable collection of new Music for their concerts, and has devoted himself closely during his absence to the study of his instrument. He has also succeeded in obtaining a gentleman to fill Mr. Lehmann's place.

JULLIEN.—Mons. Jullien has engaged the Boston Music Hall and we are informed that his Concerts will commence on the twenty-fourth of October next, when we shall all hear for ourselves his celebrated orchestra.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

Never was such a dearth of music in Boston as now. But the notes of preparation for the coming season are already sounding, and the indications are strong that we shall have an unusually crowded musical season. Announcements of all sorts are already made. Jullien, Sontag, the Germania Musical Society, the Mendelssohn Club and the new Quartet Club are all to be in the field, enough surely of themselves, one would think, to supply the demand. The Oratorio Societies are busy in preparation. We have besides a still uncertain promise of Grisi and Mario, and a host of lesser wandering stars, no doubt, are ready to start in their orbits and try their fortune in the uncertain race. We despair of being able to hear, much less to be able to chronicle the doings of the tenth part of what will be offered to us this coming winter.

The new Opera House begins to make a goodly show, having now risen to the second tier of boxes, and it will not be long, before we shall see it filled to the ceiling with the opera-goers. The form of the auditorium is peculiar, and we believe novel, the effect of which acoustically remains to be proved, and we are informed that it is of greater area than any European opera house, though of course not so high, having only the usual three tiers of boxes instead of the five or six that we find in the great theatres abroad. We hope that the building will prove to be one worthy of its object and of the present state of Art among us.

Appropos of the new Opera House, we find in the New York Tribune the following notice of Niblo's Theatre in New York:

The Opera, after all its pioneer failures in this country, seems finally destined to become a stationary thing among us. The triumph and culmination of Art in a country, or in other words its benign popularization, must depend upon moneyed capital, well distributed. Now, New York is fast taking the first place as the wealthiest spot in the world, wherein will live people of the most means, and where will be the largest floating population with money to pay for costly emotions and pleasures. But there is still a greater reason for the success here of the Opera, or the musico-dramatic stage, conducted in whatever language, of which the Italian Opera is the parent. That consists in the democratic nature of our habits and institutions. It will hardly be believed, but Niblo's Theatre holds more people, by at least 800, than the world-renowned Academie de Musique of Paris—one of the largest opera-houses in Europe. But how is this? How is it that Niblo's, which is not considered a grand theatre which has no great depth of pit, no dizzy fourth, fifth and sixth tiers, should hold more than the great French opera-house, and probably as much as the San Carlo of Naples or the Scala of Milan? What, is it creditable that a theatre which we are accustomed to look upon as provincial in size, should be really, for the practical purposes of its auditorium, as large or larger than the great opera-houses of the Old World? Even so; and the cause is owing to the democratic nature of our institutions. In Europe the exclusiveness of rank and fashion causes the theatres to be built with private boxes, each holding only four to six persons; consequently the six tiers have no depth, and the show of numbers in the boxes is merely superficial. But the principle of republican equality is thoroughly carried out at Niblo's, where fifty instead of half a dozen may be placed in the deep boxes, and hence the theatre be made to do its duty as a popular institution. When we speak of Niblo's Theatre as opera on regards more numbers in the auditorium, it may be placed on the same level with the great houses of Europe; but the stage is inferior in depth and breath, and the accommodations for the orchestra less.

Paris.

The re-opening of the "Imperial Academy of Music" (Grand Opera) was to take place on the 29th ult., but is again postponed on account of the great improvements in the building.

OPERA COMIQUE.—The papers speak of a piece in three acts, by Meyerbeer, for this coming winter. The work is entirely new, both poetry and music; only some unpublished morceaux of the "Camp of Silesia" are introduced into the first scene of the second act. M. Scribe is the author of the words.... Nabab, a new comic opera by Halévy, is announced.... Auber's Marco Spada has been resumed, with Mlles. Caroline Duprez and Favel, and Messrs. Bataille, Coudere, &c., as principals.... Mlle. Wertheimer has returned from Baden-Baden with an ample harvest of applause.... Mlle. Boulard, who at the late concours of the Conservatoire bore off a first prize in singing and a first prize in comic opera, is engaged to make her debut in Mina, the charming operette by Ambroise Thomas.

In the Emperor's grand Fête of the 15th August, music and theatricals bore a large part, though it is complained that, among the many orders and distinctions conferred upon literateurs and artists, not one fell to a musician. A mass was executed at the Tuilleries under the direction of M. Auber, the imperial maître de chapelle. The mass was made up of separate pieces by Cherubini, Auber, and Leuséur. Afterwards there was a concert, consisting of such hacknied overtures as Zampa, La Gazza Ladra, and Masaniello, and choruses from Moïse, Semiramide, the Huguenots, &c. At the Opera Comique three light operas were given. Grétry and Mlle. Lefebvre, composer and prima donna, were bravo-ed in L'Epreuve villageoise; in the Noces de Jeannette, Coudere and Mme. Miolan shared the laurels of the poets and composer; and the Rendez-vous bourgeois; made the audience laugh to tears, as usual. At the Théâtre Lyrique, too, there were three pieces; viz. le Maître de Chapelle, Ma tante Aurore, and Flora et Zephyre.

Poor Marini's gun has grown to a steam engine! The Gazette Musicale states, that "the steamboat, on which he was travelling, met with one of those explosions so common with American steamers, when he was struck in the right hand and obliged to have three fingers amputated."

Henri Herz has published his Opus 166, being a Marche Nationale for four hands.

SIDNEY, (AUSTRALIA).—The Gazette Musicale says of this city, that "although it is not the sanctuary of arts and sciences, and although the people there are chiefly occupied in making their fortunes, still music is considerably cultivated, and one sees in good houses, pianos, violins, flutes, and guitars. There is also a well conducted theatre, which has enriched its impresario, where have been presented the principal Italian operas translated into English, such as Norma, La Sonnambula, &c. The execution, as to the vocal part, is very satisfactory, but there is a dearth of instrumental performers of talent, and the orchestra is a wretched collection of fifth rate violins accompanied by a grosse caisse!"

ROME.—The great event of the day, is the appearance of a new opera: Il Solitario. We do not learn the name of the Composer, but it is stated that he was called before the curtain ninety-seven times.

GRAND CONCERTS! The GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY respectfully announce to their friends and the public of Boston and vicinity, that they give a Series of TEN GRAND CONCERTS, at the

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

Commencing on SATURDAY EVENING, October 22d, and continued every other Saturday Evening.

The ORCHESTRA will be increased by the addition of many of the best artists in the country, thereby enabling the Society to produce the elaborate compositions of the great masters with better effect than heretofore. No expense will be spared to render the Orchestra complete in every department.

The best available talent, vocal and instrumental, will be engaged during the season, to render the series of Concerts equal in point of brilliancy and attraction to any ever given in Boston.

In order to prevent the confusion and disappointment experienced upon the unusual demand for tickets last season, ONLY A LIMITED NUMBER of subscription tickets will be issued. SUBSCRIBERS' TICKETS. A package of thirty tickets to be used at pleasure, $10; half packages, containing fifteen tickets, $5. Subscription papers are now open at all the Music Stores and principal Hotels. The issue of tickets will commence at Wade's Music Store on the 8th of October. Sept. 17. tf

CLASSICAL MATINÉES.

THE undersigned, resident artists of Boston, intend to give a Series of Classical Concerts during next winter, in which the best works of the great composers will be performed; such as Quartets, Quintets, Septets, Trios, Duos and Solos, by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Hummel, Weber, Cherubini, etc. The programme will be made more attractive by Vocal performances between the different pieces, as also Solos for Horn, Violoncello, Piano, Violin, etc., occasionally. Many greater compositions, as, Quartets, Quintets, and Septets for Piano with String and Wind instruments, will be produced, which have never been publicly performed in Boston. To accommodate Ladies and others out of town, we propose to give our Concerts in the afternoon. The time and place will be announced hereafter. The subscription is $3 for the Series of Eight Concerts. Single tickets 50 cents each. Subscription lists will be found at the different Music Stores.

TEMPLI CARMINA:
A NEW MUSIC BOOK,
BY GEORGE KINGSLEY.

THE attention of Teachers and Choirs is especially called to this NEW COLLECTION OF CHURCH MUSIC, as worthy of their careful examination and favorable consideration. It is the result of much discriminating labor on the part of the Editor, and we think will prove highly acceptable to the musical public. Selections have been made from the most distinguished EUROPEAN COMPOSERS, adapted and arranged with scrupulous regard to the elevated purposes of Religious Worship. Many beautiful pieces are from the Compositions of BEETHOVEN, HAYDN, MOZART, MENDELSSOHN, SPORR, NEUKOMM, Dr. LOEWE, and other eminent composers, also many pieces of more simple structure, which are often greater favorites with congregations than music of a more complicated and elaborate style. It contains an Episcopal service, with a large variety of Chants, Anthems, &c. There are also several pages of Chants adapted to the services of Churches of different denominations, the words selected from the Bible and from Psalms and Hymns, with the usual variety of Metrical Tunes. Twenty-four pages are devoted to Elementary Instruction, in which are many valuable extracts from Lablache's Stoffegg. It is hoped, among the multiplicity of Music Books now before the public, that this may not be passed by without examination, for we believe it will be found equal to any modern collection extant, and superior to very many. Valuable recommendations have been received from Philadelphia, Buffalo, Troy, and other cities, from gentlemen at the head of the musical profession in the country.

The TEMPLI CARMINA will be for sale at the principal Book Stores throughout the Country, or it can be obtained directly of the publishers, who will supply all orders at reasonable prices.

P. S. Copies for examination will be forwarded free of postage, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 60 cents in postage stamps.

Massimilla stooped towards the physician and whispered, "You are now to hear a magnificent thing, the conspiracy of Pharaoh against the Hebrews. The majestic air, A rispettati mi apprendi, is the triumph of Caratgenova, who will give us a wonderful representation of the wounded pride and the duplicity of Courts. The throne is about to speak. Having made his concessions, the king will withdraw them, and arm his wrath. Pharaoh will arise to leap on the prey that is about to escape. Never has Rossini written anything so fine in character, never anything so rich, so abounding in power. It is a complete work itself, sustained by an accompaniment most astonishingly elaborated, like all the details of this opera, which in every detail glows with the vigor of youth."

The applause of the whole audience followed this beautiful conception, which was admirably rendered by the singer, and perfectly comprehended by the Venetians.

"And here," resumed the Duchess, "we have the finale. You are again to hear that march inspired by the joy of redemption and by the faith in their God which gives courage to a whole people and enables them to plunge confidently and rejoicingly into the depths of the desert! Ah! dear and living melodies! Glory to the fine genius who can present such sentiments to us! There is something warlike in this march, which tells us that the God of this people is the God of armies! What depth too in these songs so full of thanksgiving! The images of the Bible revive in our minds, and this divine musical scene seems really to make us witnesses of one of the grandest scenes of the solemn ancient world! The religious design of certain vocal parts, the manner in which the voices are added one to another and grouped together, express all that we can conceive of the holy wonders of that primal age of mankind. This fine concert, however, is only a development of the theme of the march into all its musical consequences. This motif is the fecundating principle for the orchestra and the voices, for the song and the brilliant instrumentation which accompanies it. Here is Elcia joining the general mass, and yet made by Rossini to express a regret which shades down the joy of the passage. Listen to her duet with Amenophis. Did wounded love ever utter a finer song? the grace of the Nocturnes breathes in it; it is filled with the secret sorrow of wounded love. What melancholy! Ah, the desert will be doubly a desert to her! At last we have the terrible strife of the Egyptians with the Hebrews!—this rejoicing, this march, all is disturbed by the arrival of the Egyptians. The promulgation of the edict of Pharaoh is accomplished by a musical idea which rules the finale, a low, grave phrase, in which we seem to hear the tread of the mighty armies of Egypt surrounding the sacred Phalanx of God, slowly unfolding it as the great African serpent would enfold its prey. Yet this grace which distinguishes the lamentation of the misused Israelites, is it not rather Italian than Hebrew? How magnificent is the whole movement up to the arrival of Pharaoh which completes the antagonistic array of the two peoples, their chiefs, and all the passions of the drama! What an admirable mingling of sentiments in the sublime octett in which the combat is engaged between the wrath of Moses and the rage of the two Pharaohs! what a conflict, of unchained voices and passions! The famous finale of Don Giovanni after all, only represents to us a libertine contending with his victims, who invoke the vengeance of Heaven; whilst here it is the earth and its powers striving to contend against God.* Two peoples, the one feeble, the other mighty, are opposed to each other. And as he had all means at his disposal, Rossini has skilfully employed all. He has succeeded without any approach to the ridiculous, in expressing to us the movements of a furious tempest, over the roar of which rise, here and there, the terrible imprecations of men. He has availed himself of chords overlaid upon a rhythm in triple time, with a stern musical energy, with a determination which finally gains upon you. The fury of the Egyptians surprised by a fiery rain; the cries for vengeance of the Hebrews, demanded masses of sound most scientifically managed; and do you observe how he has made the development of the orchestra keep pace with the choruses? That allegro assai in C minor is terrible in the midst of this deluge of fire. Confess," added the Duchess, at the moment when Moses, raising his wand, brings down the fiery rain, a point where the composer displays his whole power on the stage and in the orchestra, "confess that music has never more graphically represented trouble and confusion."

"It has carried away the audience," said the Frenchman.

"But what is this? the audience is still in a tumult," replied Massimilla.

In fact, Genovese had sadly marred the effect of this finale by the most absurd irregularities, and the Italian ears of the hearers had been dreadfully shocked by his extravagances. The manager appears and apologises for his tenor, saying that he knew not how he had offended the audience when he was striving to do his best.

"Let him only be as bad as he was last night and we will be satisfied!" cried an amateur.

* Here we must protest. That an Italian lady should be slow to admit the excellencies of German, and above all, Austrian composers, is perhaps natural enough. But M. de Balzac goes too far when he represents a woman as incapable of seeing that in the antagonism of Don Giovanni with his victims nothing less is involved than the "strife of earth and its powers with God." The hostile attitude of the Egyptian King towards the God who is contending against him with earthly means, involves no idea nearly so profound as that conveyed in the conception of Don Giovanni, the heart-denying, soul-defying child of the senses, and a woman such as Massimilla Doni is represented to be, is, of all persons in the world, the least likely to fail of seeing and of feeling this.—Tr.

The entr'acte passes in the discussion of the tenor's conduct and other matters germane to the story, but not to our purpose. The second act opens with the scene between the two Pharaohs, in which Genovese tries to make peace with the pit, and succeeds.

"The phrase uttered by the son upon the key-note, and repeated by the father upon the dominant," says the Duchess, "gives us the true spirit of Egyptian royalty. Certainly the son of a Pharaoh pouring his sorrows into the bosom of his father and making him share them cannot be more nobly represented than by the grave and simple system of this music. Do you not feel yourself something here of that splendor with which our idea of old Egypt is invested?"

"The music is sublime!" answered the Frenchman.

"The air, Pace mia smarrita, now to be sung by the queen, is one of those factitious bravura airs to which all composers are condemned, in order to gratify the vanity of the prima donna at the expense of the general tone of the poem. Nevertheless this musical sop is so largely handled that it is faithfully executed at all theatres, nor do the cantatrici substitute for it their favorite airs, as they do in most operas. But here is the gem of the score, the duo of Elcia and Osiris in the subterranean passage wherein he seeks to conceal her, that he may fly with her to Egypt. They are disturbed by the arrival of Aaron, and we shall hear the king of Quartetts, Mi manca la voce, mi sento morire! This is one of those chefs-d'œuvre which will never perish, for it is borrowed from that language of the soul which fashions do not affect. Mozart has his finale of Don Giovanni, Marcello his psalm, Cæli enarrant gloriam Dei, Cimarosa his Pria ché spunti, Beethoven his Symphony in C minor, Pergolèse his Stabat, Rossini will keep his Mi manca la voce. To obtain this grand effect, Rossini has had recourse to the old fashion of fugues to bring in his voices and pour them into one melody. And the better to throw out the form of these sublime melodies he has silenced the orchestra, accompanying the voices only by arpeggios of harps. But, good heavens! still this uproar!"

The abominable tenor had returned to his tricks, sang worse than the worst man in the chorus, and would have brought matters to a crisis but for the superb efforts of La Tiuti, who outdid herself and overwhelmed all the angry feelings of the pit in a flood of enthusiasm.

"She pours a flood of purple through my soul!" cried a ducal amateur.

"Heaven rain blessings on your head!" shouted a gondolier.

"Pharaoh will revoke his orders," resumed the indefatigable Duchess, when quiet was restored. "Moses will strike him on his throne with the curse upon the first born of Egypt. But this air, Paventa, is an old air of Pacini's substituted for Rossini's and which will doubtless remain in the score, as it furnishes a fine occasion to the bassi for displaying the wealth of their voices. The air too is magnificently threatening, and perhaps we shall not long be allowed to hear it sung!"

A salvo of bravi and applause, followed by a profound and prudent silence welcomed this air—nothing could have been more significant, more Venetian.

The coronation march of Osiris furnishes occasion for a bouderie against Beethoven. Elcia resigns her lover, who is struck down in fulfilment of the curse. "Bravo!" cried the pit, when Genovese was laid low. And the Tinti, delivered from her deplorable companion goes in victoriously to her terrible cavatina, O desolata Elcia!

"Rossini! why art thou not here to hear thy thoughts so grandly rendered!" cried the Duke.

"The Tinti is like that beautiful Indian plant which springs from the earth, gathers in the air an invisible nourishment and scatters from its calyx clouds of perfume which fill our brains with dreams," answered Capraja.

Kisses were waved to the singer, roses showered upon her and a crown hastily woven of the costliest artificial flowers, which the ladies snatched from their Parisian bonnets. The cavatina was encored.

"In this cavatina," observed Massimilla, "the voice and the execution are everything. The singer must bring to it the most brilliant roulade and the soul of a woman who sees her lover dying before her eyes. In order to leave all free to pure art, to the voice, Rossini has here written clear, frank phrases—he has invented these distracting musical exclamations, Tormenti! Affanni! Smania! The Tinti has carried the whole audience with her!"

When the first chords of the harps announced the prayer of the delivered Hebrews, the Italians all disposed themselves to listen with the most religious attention. The prayer was demanded again with earnest applause.

"I seem to be witnessing the liberation of Italy!" said a Milanese.

"This music lifts up the down-trodden and gives the hopeless hope!" murmured a Roman.

"Here," said the Duchess, "science has disappeared. Inspiration alone dictated this masterpiece, it came from the soul like a cry of love! Never will Rossini rise above the simple sublimity of this prayer. We can only find anything analogous to this in the divine psalms of the noble Venetian, Marcello, the Giotto of music. Moses takes up the theme in G minor and ends with a cadence in B flat, which permits the chorus to take it up at first pianissimo in B flat and to bring it back by a cadence to G minor. This noble play of the voices, thrice recommenced, ends at the last stanzas with a passage in G major, the effect of which upon the soul is astounding." "Sing, sing," she went on as she listened to the last stanzas sung, as she was heard, with a stern enthusiasm, "Sing, for you are free!"

She uttered these words with an accent which thrilled the physician, and to draw her away from the bitter thought that ruled then her mind, he raised one of those disputes in which the French excel.

"Madame," said he, "while explaining to me this masterpiece which, thanks to you, I shall come understandingly to-morrow to hear, you have often spoken to me of the color of the music and of its pictorial effects, but in my character of analytical materialist I must own to you that I always am shocked at the attempts of certain enthusiasts to make us believe that music can paint. Is it not like saying that Raphael sings with colors?"

"In the musical tongue," answered the lady, "to paint is to awaken by sounds certain remembrances in our souls, or images in our minds, and these remembrances and images have their colors, they are gay or gloomy. It is but a question of words. According to Capraja, every instrument addresses certain ideas in us just as every color touches certain sentiments. When you contemplate gold arabesques on a blue ground, have you the same thoughts which are excited in you by red arabesques on a green or black ground? In the one case as in the other there are no faces, there are no sentiments expressed; it is pure art, and yet no soul can remain unmoved by these appearances. The hautboy, as well as almost all wind instruments has the power of exciting rural ideas in all minds. The brasses are warlike. The strings, whose substances is taken from organized creatures, attack the most delicate fibres of our system, and go to the bottom of our hearts. Art paints with words, with sounds, with colors, with lines, with forms; if the means differ, the effects are the same. Would you know now in what the superiority of the chef-d'œuvre we have heard consists? I will explain it to you in a few words. There are two orders of music, one little, mean, of the second rank, everywhere the same, which reposes on a hundred phrases that every musician may appropriate to himself, and which constitutes a more or less agreeable chattering, on which the most part of composers subsist. We hear their songs, their so-called melodies, with more or less pleasure, but they leave nothing in the memory. In a century they are forgotten. The nations, from antiquity to our own days, have preserved certain songs which sum up their morals and their manners, I might say their history. Listen to one of these songs (the Gregorian chant has gathered up the heritage of antiquity in this kind), and you straightway fall into a deep revery, things unheard of, immense, unfold themselves before you, notwithstanding the simplicity of these rudiments, these musical ruins. Think of this well, dwell upon this thought—it is melody and not harmony which has the power of traversing the ages. The music of this opera contains a number of these great and sacred things. A work which opens with such an introduction and ends with such a prayer is immortal, immortal as the O filii et filie of Easter, as the Dies Iræ of the service for the dead, as all the songs which in all lands survive so many ruined splendors, so many joys and prosperities forever lost."

Two tears which the Duchess wiped away as she left the box, told plainly enough that she was thinking of Venice; Vendramin, the lover of Venice, stooped and kissed her hand. The representation ended with a concert of the most original maledictions, with hisses lavished upon Genovese and an insanity of enthusiasm for the Tinti.

The events of the night gave rise to two factions, which, after the Italian fashion, speedily divided the city, the Genovesians and the Tintists. How nearly the violence of these factions might have approached to that of the Ghibellines against the Guelphs, or of the Orsini against the Colonna, had time been granted them, it is impossible to say, for the sinews of the war were cut by the reconciliation that came to pass between the tenor and the prima donna. The French physician, who, during the play, as we have seen, acted substantially the part of those interlocutors in the dialogues of Plato, whose business it is to furnish breathing time for the voluble Socrates, appears, at the conclusion of the story, in a more active and creditable character. But in what way this learned disciple of Magen-die, of Cuvier, of Dupuytren and of Broussais, unravels the tangled threads of this strange history, we may not now set forth. Let it suffice that we complete our promised picture of an opera night in Venice with a scene, not more remarkable for the truth of its local coloring than for the fidelity with which it records an experience too common, alas, under all skies and upon every stage!

Returning from the theatre, the melomaniac Capraja urges Genovese to disclose the secret of his fiasco. Genovese raves about his passion for the Tinti. "Yes," interrupts the Duke, "but this does not explain how, from being a divine singer, you have become the most execrable of those who drive the air through their throats without imprinting upon it that enchanting suavity which charms us.

"I!" cried the virtuoso, "I become a bad singer! I!"

At that moment the physician, Vendramin and the others had reached the Piazzetta. It was midnight. The brilliant gulf marked out by the churches of San Giorgio and San Paolo at the end of the Giudecca and the beginning of the Grand Canal so gloriously opened by the Dogana and by Sta. Maria della Salute, this magnificent gulf was perfectly quiet. The moon lit up the ships moored at the Riva de' Schiavoni. The waters of Venice which are unaffected by the tides of the ocean seemed alive with the trembling of millions of sparkles. Never had a singer a more magnificent stage. Genovese with an emphatic motion called the heavens and the earth to witness—then, accompanied only by the murmur of the sea, he sung the famous chef-d'œuvre of Crescentini, Ombra adorata! This song, rising between the famous pillars of St. Theodore and St. George, in the heart of deserted, moonlit Venice,—the words so harmonious with the scene—the melancholy expression of Genovese, all subdued both the Frenchman and the Italians. These four different beings, so poor in hope, believing in nothing for themselves or after themselves, and who granted themselves to be something fleeting, the work of chance, like a blade of grass, or a beetle, caught a glimpse of Heaven. Never did music better merit its epithet of divine. . . . This simple, earnest melody, penetrating the interior senses, poured upon them a flood of light. How holy was the passion of that moment! But what a frightful awakening had the vanity of the tenor prepared for those noble emotions!

"Am I a bad singer?" asked Genovese when the air was ended.

All regretted the nature of the instrument. This angelic music then sprang from a sentiment of wounded self-love. The singer felt nothing—he thought no more of the pious sentiments, the divine images he was arousing in those hearts, than does Paganini's violin, of that which Paganini makes it utter. They all had desired to behold there Venice rising from her shroud, and singing there herself, and the matter in question was the fiasco of a tenor!

John Sebastian Bach.

John Sebastian Bach was born at Eisenach in the year 1685. He was descended of a family in which musical genius had, for many generations, been hereditary; and he may be said to have transmitted it to his descendants: so that the name of Bach is one of the most illustrious in the history of music. The founder (as he may be termed,) of this great family, was Veit Bach. He was a baker at Presburg, in Hungary; but being driven from that country by the religious disturbances in the sixteenth century, he removed with the remnant of his property, into Thuringia, and resumed his trade in a village in the neighborhood of Saxe Gotha. In his leisure hours he amused himself with his guitar, and communicated his musical inclination to his two sons. They did the same to their children; till by degrees there arose a very numerous family, all the branches of which appear to have made music their chief employment, and to have obtained among them most of the offices of organists, cantors*, and town musicians, in Thuringia. Some of these ancestors of John Sebastian Bach were men of eminent talents, and might have obtained both fame and fortune if they had been inclined to leave their native province. But they partook of the quiet, frugal, and contented disposition of the people among whom they lived; deriving their greatest pleasures from the practice of their art, and satisfied with the moderate competence which it procured them. The branches of this family, even when they had become numerous and scattered, were united by those ties of kindred which are observed to be so peculiarly strong among the Germans. It was their custom, every year, to assemble at some convenient place, and to spend a few days together in affectionate intercourse. Their amusements, on these occasions, were entirely musical. As their offices were all connected with the church, and as they belonged to a community among whom piety was more habitual than it has become in later times, they used to begin their pastimes by singing a hymn in chorus. Among their amusements was one called a "quodlibet," which consisted of extempore songs, of a ludicrous, and sometimes not very refined character, sung by all the company; each person singing different words, but in such a manner that the several songs made a sort of harmony together, and much laughter was caused by the quaint conceits and cross-purposes thus produced. This appears to have been an ancient and favorite German amusement; Forkel says that he had a printed collection of quodlibets published at Vienna in 1542.

The father of John Sebastian Bach was John Ambrosius Bach, court and town-musician at Eisenach. He had a brother, who held the same office at Arnstadt, and was so very like him, that even their wives could not distinguish them except by their dress. They were much attached to each other, and similar in voice, disposition, habits, and even in the style of their music. If one was ill, the other (it is said) fell sick also; and they died nearly at the same time.

John Sebastian lost his father when he was not quite ten years old; his mother had died some time before. He was thus left to the care of his elder brother, who was an organist, and from whom he received his first instructions in music. But he outran the pace at which his brother wished to proceed, and finding the lessons laid before him too easy, he used to importune his teacher to furnish him with pieces of greater difficulty. He had observed that his brother had a book containing pieces for the clavichord by the most celebrated composers of the day, and earnestly begged permission to make use of it, which was constantly refused. At last, he found means to get possession of it secretly. It was kept in a cupboard which had a door of lattice-work, through

* "In most parts of Germany, where the Protestant religion is established, each parish has a cantor to teach singing, and to direct the chorists. Though cantor is a general appellation for a singer, it is in a particular manner applied, in this country, to the person who has the direction of singing the psalm and hymns in parish churches. He is precursor, or leader of the psalm, which he likewise ends by singing the last word of every line; so that he may be called the alpha and omega of sacred song. The cantor, who is likewise frequently school-master, besides having a good voice, should necessarily understand counterpoint; if not in a high degree, at least sufficiently to correct such errors as may have crept into compositions through the ignorance or carelessness of transcribers. He should likewise be able to make an accurate score, and from the score to figure the bass, in such a manner as to include all accidents of modulation. 'Without these qualifications,' says M. Walther in his Musical Lexicon, 'as a German organist is not gifted with universal knowledge, no perfect harmony can be hoped for.'

"In the market-towns and villages of Thuringia, in Saxony, where two persons are usually employed in a school, he who directs the music in the choir, or leads the psalm or chorists, is called rector, or schoolmaster, and the organist is commonly cantor."—Burney's State of Music in Germany.

the interstices of which he could pass his little hand, and, by rolling it up, could withdraw and replace it. He set about copying it by night; and, having no candle, was obliged to work by moonlight. He took six months to finish his laborious task; but, just as he had completed his copy, his brother found it out, and cruelly took it from him; and it was not till his brother's death, which took place some time afterwards, that he recovered his treasure.

Being left destitute by the death of his brother, he went to Lüneburg, and was engaged as a treble singer, in a choir at that place, and contrived, at the same time, to improve himself as a performer on the clavichord and organ. In 1703, when he was eighteen, he became court musician at Weimar; and, in the following year, exchanged this situation for that of organist at Arnstadt. Here he began to study most zealously all the works of the great organists of that day which he was able to procure; and even travelled on foot to Lübeck to hear Buxtehude, a famous organist of that town. His talents now began to attract attention; and in 1708, he was appointed court organist to the duke of Weimar. In this situation he cultivated his powers by such unwearied diligence, that, by the time he was thirty years of age, he had become the greatest organist of his day. In 1717, Marchand, the celebrated French organist, who had the reputation of being unrivalled, visited Dresden, where he performed before the king, and obtained such approbation that a large salary was offered him if he would engage in his majesty's service. Marchand was immeasurably inferior to Bach; and this was well known to Volkmier, at that time director of the Dresden concerts; who, wishing to give the young German artist an opportunity of showing his superiority, obtained the king's permission to invite him to a musical contest with the Frenchman. On Bach's arrival at Dresden, Volkmier procured him an opportunity of secretly hearing Marchand. He was not discouraged; but sent Marchand a polite invitation to a trial of skill; offering to play on the spot whatever Marchand should lay before him, and requesting from him a similar complaisance. Marchand accepted the challenge; and, with the king's consent, a time and place were fixed for the contest. A large company of the most distinguished people in Dresden assembled; and Bach was at his post, but Marchand did not appear. After waiting a long time, the company were informed to their great surprise, that Marchand had, that morning, "taken French leave" of Dresden. Bach, therefore, had to walk over the course; and played to the admiration of the assembly. "Bach received on this occasion," says Forkel, his biographer, "praise in abundance; but it is said that he did not receive a present of one hundred Louis d'ors which the king had designed for him*."

Soon after this occurrence, Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cöthen, a great judge and lover of music, invited him to take the office of his maestro di capella; an office which he held about six years. In the year 1723, he was appointed director of music, and cantor to Saint Thomas's school at Leipzig, which situation he held during the remainder of his life.

In 1740 his second son, the celebrated Charles Philip Emanuel, entered the service of Frederick the Second of Prussia. That prince, who, besides being a statesman and a warrior, was a musical virtuoso of the first class, had heard so much of the transcendent powers of John Sebastian Bach, that he frequently expressed to Charles Philip, a wish to see his father. These expressions were frequently repeated to the father by his son; and John Sebastian was at length induced, in 1747, to pay a visit to Berlin. At this time the king had a private concert every evening, at which he himself performed on the flute. One evening, as he was getting his flute ready, and his musicians were assembled, an officer brought him a list of the strangers who were arrived. He ran over the list; and turning to the company, said, with a kind of agitation, "Gentlemen, old Bach is come." The flute was laid aside; and Bach, who had alighted at his son's lodgings, was immediately sent for and introduced to the king, who did not even give him time to change his travelling dress for a chanter's black gown, according to the etiquette of the time. The king gave up his concert for the evening, and invited Bach to try his piano-fortes, made by Silbermann, which stood in several rooms of the palace. The musician went with him from room to room; and he was invited to extemporise on the various instruments. After he had gone on for some time, he requested the king to give him a subject for a fugue, which he treated with his usual genius and learning. The king then expressed a wish to hear a fugue in six parts; but, as it is not every subject that is fitted for such full harmony, Bach chose one himself, and executed it to the astonishment of his auditors. The king being desirous to hear his performance on the organ, he was next day taken to all the organs in Potsdam as he had been to Silbermann's piano-fortes. After his return to Leipsic, he worked up the subject which the king had given him into a regular composition of great depth and learning, and had it published, under the title of "Musicalisches Opfer," (Musical Offering,) and dedicated to the inventor of the subject.

* Burney, in his Present State of Music in Germany, (vol. ii. p. 82,) says that this contest actually took place, and that Bach, "like another David, vanquished this Goliath." But the above account is undoubtedly the correct one.

Soon after this time his sight began to fail, in consequence of the unremitting industry with which he had for so many years devoted his days and nights to the study of his art. He was at length seized with a painful disorder in his eyes; and, having twice submitted to an unsuccessful operation, he became entirely blind. His constitution, which had been uncommonly vigorous, also gave way; and he died on the 30th of July, 1750, in the 66th year of his age.

Bach was twice married. By his first wife he had seven, and by his second wife thirteen children; of whom eleven were sons, and nine daughters. Four of his sons, whom we shall afterwards mention, became musicians of great eminence. He did not make a great fortune, or gain during his lifetime that extensive celebrity which was due to his exalted merit. He had, indeed, a respectable office with a good income; but he had a very numerous family to support and educate. He neither had, nor sought any other resources. His compositions were of too profound and elevated a character, to be popular, or to be a source of profit when published; and he was too single-minded, too much occupied with his art, to court the patronage of the great. Had he, like many other great musicians, chosen to travel, his wonderful genius and attainments would have been the admiration of all Europe. By such means he might have gained greater riches and immediate fame, but not greater happiness than he possessed. He enjoyed what he loved, a tranquil life in the bosom of his affectionate family, a competency, and the respect and attachment of all who knew him.

Dramatic Music.

[From the French of CHORON.]

The invention of the lyric drama of the moderns is considered by many persons to be of very distant date; that is to say, if by the lyric drama we are to understand every representation accompanied by music. And, in fact, although these older representations differ widely from the lyric drama of our time, (as much by reason of the changes that have taken place in music in general as on account of the variations that have been sustained in the particular kind of music which we are now treating) still we cannot fail to remark in the former the foundation and principle of the latter.

Ancient writers speak of representations, both sacred and profane, as having been performed since the thirteenth century. An Orfeo of Angelus Politianus is cited which was composed about the year 1475. A musical tragedy is spoken of as having been performed at Rome in 1480. It is said that, in 1555, Alphonso della Viola set to music, for the court of France, "Il Sacrifice," a pastoral drama by Agostino Beccari; and that, in 1574, an opera was performed at Venice for the reception of Henry III., when, on his return from Poland, he passed through that town, in order to take possession of the crown of France, to which he succeeded on the death of his brother Charles IX. But all these facts are too remote, and so very few vestiges of them remain, that it is impossible to deduce anything positive as to the state of this branch of the musical Art at that period, which, however, is not so very distant, being scarcely more than two hundred and fifty years. We may, however, venture to remark, that, up to that time, the lyric drama had no style of music peculiar to itself, but borrowed from the style then in use in the church, also, from the madrigals and popular songs.

The real epoch to which the birth of dramatic music, properly so called, may be fixed, is that of the invention of the recitative or recited music, which gave to the lyric drama a peculiar language and construction. The following, it is said, was its origin.

Three Florentine gentlemen, J. Bardi, P. Strozzi, and J. Corsi, amateurs of the Art, being little satisfied with the attempts made up to their time, to bring dramatic poetry to perfection, conceived the idea of having a lyric drama written by their best lyric poet, and composed by the most eminent of their musicians. They consequently selected Ott. Rinuccini and Jacq. Peri, both of them Florentines: the former wrote a poem entitled Daphne, to which the latter applied a sort of recitation, in notes, having all the sounds of music, without its regular support and marked time. This work, thus disposed, was performed in 1597, at the house of Corsi, and obtained the utmost success; so much so, as to determine Rinuccini to write two other works, of the same kind, namely, Euridice and Ariana. In the same year in which Ariana was performed at Florence, an oratorio, with the same description of recitative, composed by Emilio del Cavaliere, and entitled Di Anima e di Corpo, was performed at Rome. His work, together with that of Peri, was published in 1608; and in their prefaces the two authors claim the honor of the invention of recitative, which they both maintain to be the revival of the chanting declamation of the Greeks. Each of them, in support of his claim, cites different works written previously to the time of which we have just been speaking; and Emilio, especially, mentions a drama of his own, La Disperazione del Satiro, composed and performed in private since the year 1590, and Il Gioco della Cieca, represented in 1595. If we may credit J. B. Doni, the invention or revival of recitative belonged neither to one nor the other, but to Vincent Galileo, father of the celebrated Galileo the astronomer, who, feeling as well as Bardi and the other amateurs of Florence, the defects in the music of that age, and filled with the ardor of research, occupied himself in recovering the musical declamation of the Greeks, and having imagined the recitative, applied it to the episode of the Count Ugolino, (of Dante.) He composed also, in the same style, The Lamentation of Jeremiah, and sang them himself, with a viol accompaniment, before a numerous assembly. Julius Caccini, of Rome, a young singer, who frequented, with many other musicians, the house of Bardi, was enthusiastic in his admiration of this new style, and himself composed several pieces, with recitative of a very improved description. J. Peri soon became his rival in improvements, and both, according to Doni, cooperated in setting to music the Daphne of Rinuccini. Peri afterwards composed Euridice, and Caccini Cephalus. These pieces were followed by Ariana, which was put into recitative by Cl. Monteverde, of whom we have already spoken.

However the above inquiry may be decided, it is certain that, of all the above-named works, the Euridice of Peri was the first which was performed in public. This representation took place in 1600, at Florence, on the occasion of the marriage of Henry IV. of France with Mary de Medicis. In the preface to the poem, which was printed the same year, Rinuccini states that the music composed by Peri to his Daphne, had made him cease fearing that he should never witness the revival of the musical declamation of the Greeks. In fact, nearly the whole of this work is in recitative; and it is difficult to discover any difference from the rest of the music, in those passages at the head of which is placed the word aria. The same observation applies to all the works composed up to the middle of the same century. It is only in the opera of Jason, written by Cicognini, and set to music in 1649 by Cavalli, that we begin to perceive airs having a melody differing from that of the recitative; yet still these airs are usually insipid, and generally (to give some idea of them) a kind of minuet, written in the time of two-three, and varying repeatedly. A greater degree of progress is perceptible in the operas of Cesti, who, in his Doria, composed in 1663, began to introduce airs in which the talent of the singer might be displayed to advantage. But what is particularly remarkable at this epoch is, that the opera began to degenerate into a spectacle calculated to please the sight alone; inasmuch that, in the works represented about the end of the seventeenth century, no mention whatever is made either of the poet, the composer, or the singers, but only of the machinist and the decorator. This, however, did not discourage an immense number of composers from devoting themselves to this style. So great indeed is their number, that it would be impossible to enter into any details with regard to them, without the risk of being carried too far.

Among these composers, there were many who had great knowledge and genius; to prove which, it is sufficient to name Fr. Gasparini, Peri, Colonna, Lotti, and above all, the celebrated Alessandro Scarlatti, to whom the invention of the obligato recitative is generally attributed. The principal characteristic of these celebrated composers of operas is, however, their science; and perhaps this was all they could do at a period such as that in which they wrote.

In the midst of this confusion, some few among them, and particularly Scarlatti, felt the necessity of making the melody conformable to the expression of the words; and some attempts made to this effect were very successful. This great improvement was, however, left to be completed by the first generations of the eighteenth century; and it is to the illustrious pupils of Scarlatti, namely, to Leo, Vinci, Sarro, Porpora, Feo, Abos, and especially Pergolese, that this approach to perfection is attributable. They were well seconded by the poets of their time, and particularly by Apostolo Zeno, and his pupil Metastasio, who presented them with poems, written with purity and elegance, and full of interesting situations. Three generations may be considered as having followed this same system, profiting by the successive embellishments of melody and of the orchestra. In the first generation is comprehended the men we have just named; the second presents to our notice names not less celebrated, such as Jomelli, Piccini, Sacchini, Guglielmi, Traetta, Anfossi, Terradellas, and others; and the third, formed from the pupils of these last, has been rendered famous by Paisiello and Cimarosa.

This period, however brilliant, as it certainly was, was not exempt from faults; for instance, though their poems present some interesting and dramatic situations, essential errors may be found in the general construction of them, and even in the form of the detailed parts, where dramatic consistency is frequently sacrificed to the music; added to which, the singers, who then began to display abilities before unknown, exacted generally of the poet and composer such situations as would best suit their talents; the result of which was, that though dramatic music was indeed invented, the true lyric drama did not as yet exist. These abuses, deeply felt, and exposed by the best lyric poets, (by B. Marcello and by Metastasio himself) induced men of the greatest talent to make some efforts to create, at length, a perfect lyric drama, that is to say, a drama composed according to all the dramatic rules, and in which the music should be entirely subservient to the action. The first essays towards this were made by B. Marcello, who soon, however, disgusted with the vexations he met with at the theatre on this account, contented himself with laying open his principles in his writings, and giving examples of them in his sublime collection of psalms, an incomparable masterpiece of melody, harmony, and truth. The application of these principles to the stage, with all the fulness of truth, was left to the celebrated Gluck, who, without possessing, as a composer, either the profound science or elegance of the great Italian and German masters, had sufficient talent and genius to complete, about the middle of the last century, (in 1764) this important revolution. He was considerably aided by the poet Calzabigi, who was the first that wrote an essentially dramatic lyric poem, his Orfeus. Gluck thus became a model to his contemporaries, several of whom, such as Piccini, Sacchini, and others, followed in the same track.

After such successful endeavors, the art seemed to be for ever fixed on a firm basis, with the exception of the changes that the variations of melody would probably occasion in it; and indeed, up to the present time, revolutions have taken place in this respect, of which it appears impossible to foresee the term. However, towards the close of the last century, the advancement of instrumental music caused a sensible movement in that of the drama; some composers having endeavored to introduce into operatic accompaniments the richness of the symphony. It is on this plan that Haydn, Mozart, Cherubini, and all of their school worked. This very brilliant system has great advantages, but a difficulty naturally results from it not easily to be overcome, which is that the most essential part, the vocal, supposing it even to have all its requisite qualities, is apt to be eclipsed, and even sometimes to appear less important than the accessory part.

On recapitulating the preceding observations, it will be found that at least six distinct epochs may be traced in the history of dramatic music within the space of two centuries. The first which we shall name, that of the recitative, under Peri, Monteverde, and their imitators; the second, that of the birth of dramatic melody, under Cavalli, Cesti, &c.; the third, that of science, under Peri, Colonna, and Scarlatti; the fourth, that of expression, under Vinci, Porpora, Pergolese, and the other pupils of Scarlatti; the fifth, that of the lyric drama, properly so called, under Gluck and his followers; and the sixth and last, that of dramatic symphony, under Haydn, Mozart, and Cherubini.

In all that we have as yet said, we have principally had in view the tragic drama, or rather lyric tragedy. It will be easily conceived that in what concerns melodic language, the comic drama, otherwise called lyric comedy, comic opera, buffa, interludes, &c. must have experienced the same revolutions; we shall therefore speak of them here in a very summary manner, and this with the view of pointing out those variations that have taken place in the proper construction of comedy, and of recalling to the memory those persons who have most distinguished themselves in it. The invention of lyric comedy is considered to be as remote as that of lyric tragedy. The origin both of one and the other is, however, lost in the obscurity of the middle age; probably we ought to seek it in the farces, moralities, and mysteries with which our ancestors were amused in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

The most ancient lyric comedies expressly mentioned, seem to be of the sixteenth century: of this kind are cited, the Sacrificio of Beccari, set to music in 1555 by Alphonso della Viola; I Pazzi Amanti, in 1569; La Poesia rappresentativa, in 1574; La Tragedia di Frangipani, the music by Cl. Merula; La Poesia rappresentata, &c. 1678; Il Re Salomone, 1579; Pace e Vittoria, 1580; Pallade, 1581, &c.; L'Anti-Parnasso, of O. Vecchi, 1597: all of which were represented at Venice. The music of these works was completely in the madrigal style; and if it had its beauties, it had also its absurdities, which were still more apparent on the stage, where every thing should appear true. Amongst these inconveniences, we shall name, as one of the most remarkable, the use of monologues, sung by several voices, on account of the want of instruments for accompaniment. It is not precisely ascertained when the recitative was introduced into lyric comedy. Several comic operas are known, written in the course of the seventeenth century; but without resting on objects, of the details of which we are ignorant, let us hasten to reach the period when Scarlatti and his pupils introduced expression in dramatic music. Amongst these masters we find Pergolese, who distinguished himself by his talent in introducing declamatory modulation into dramatic music. Logroscino is likewise remarkable, as having, by the invention of finales, given to dramatic melody a new kind of development; and although in the two generations which we have indicated as succeeding this, the greater part of the composers and poets who rendered themselves illustrious cultivated lyric comedy equally with tragedy, still many peculiarly distinguished themselves in comedy; such as N. Piccini for instance, whose Buona Figliola, a masterpiece of grace and truth, announced the composer who was to surpass his model. In this same generation flourished the illustrious Grétry, who made Pergolese his especial model, also the composers who, following his steps, have given to France the true lyric comedy. In fine, comic music, after having been embellished by the genius of Guglielmi, Paisiello, Cimarosa, and other pupils of Piccini and their contemporaries, could not escape from the inroads of symphony: it supported the yoke under the reigns of Mozart and his imitators. Let us not, however, exclaim against an innovation which has produced masterpieces of an entirely new character, but rather let us endeavor to convince all those who would be tempted to take Mozart as a model, that to give effect to such a school of writing, the genius of a Mozart is indispensable.

Foreign and Native Musicians.

We have seen and heard JULLIEN! 'Well, there! there's no use talking.' Nothing like him, nothing approaching him, as a 'leader,' has ever appeared in America. We used to think, when a little boy in the country, that APOLLOS HOPKINS, when he rose in the centre of the gallery of our great, square, straight-backed 'cathedral,' was the greatest leader we ever saw; previously taking out his pine pitch-pipe, (painted red at the same time the roof of our barn was painted, and from the same pot,) pulling it out as far as 'G' on the slide, and, with a preliminary 'Low-low-LUD-low 'um 'um!' 'setting' the tune, in something the same way that an 'expert' would 'set' a saw. Then would he rise, and his 'corps' with him, the women on the right hand and the men on the left, and, with his long blue sheepskin-backed singing-book (its covers rising and falling, like the slow-moving wings of a spread-eagle) in his left hand, and the tips of his great, bony fingers resting on the book, giving the 'upward beat, downward beat,' 'with a short, uneasy motion,' until, with uplifted hand and stentorian preliminary voice he awoke the 'great deep' of nasal 'execution.' Such was APOLLOS HOPKINS, the great musical leader of our time. But JULLIEN is different. Nothing could be more dissimilar than the style of the two performers. JULLIEN seems more graceful. HOPKINS wore no gloves, and his coarse hands were 'brown as the ribbed sea-sand.' JULLIEN wears very white ones; his hands are small, and he 'makes more motions.' JULLIEN is 'more stubbed than what APOLLOS was,' who was tall and lank; and when he stood up, and was under way, you could see, as they say, the leader 'sticking out.' Not so with JULLIEN. He 'fires and falls back,' in his elegant chair, apparently dead of a surfeit of sweet sounds. But, everything else apart, JULLIEN is a wonder. He is a true genius. Nothing has ever moved us so much, in the way of music, as the harmony which he compels from his hundred instruments, all sounding in unison, at once. It is the very perfection of art in its kind, and is really a 'living delight.'—Knickerbocker Magazine.

The Harp.

Of all the musical instruments that have touched the ear and the heart of mankind, the Harp stands foremost. Exquisitely beautiful as is the spirit of its chords when struck by the hand of a master, the glory of its renown lies in associations and memories, tender and sacred, connecting it with the earliest history of our race, and with the most romantic and poetic ages of the past. When the oppressors of Israel asked for a song from the dark-eyed daughters of their captives, as they sat weeping by the waters of Babylon, they pointed to their harps "hung upon the willows" and their lips refused a song of joy. The national instrument might wail a psalm of sorrow to lighten the weariness of captivity, to recall memories of home, but it had no jubilant strain to gladden the heart of a conqueror while the "chosen people" sat in bondage and tears.

But there were exultant strains in the Harp when David touched its strings, and danced before the ark; or when the feet of Miriam moved obedient to its harmonies. The Harp, too, was exultant in the hands of the Northern Skald, as he celebrated the triumphs of his Jarl, or sounded the praise and majesty of his gods in the halls of Wodin, or on the mountain tops consecrated to Thor. There the white-haired and white-robed bard sang to the music of the harp, the history of races and heroes, the glory of religion and the splendors of the immortal state. The wandering Romans, approaching the shores of Britain, thus held the priests and poets of a religion anterior to Christ, piling sacrificial fires and invoking the aid of their deities against the invading Cæsar. In all Northern Europe, the Harp sounded in banquet hall and camp, at the druid altar and at the head of the embattled host. The harper was historian, eulogist, priest and seer.

Kings were harpers of old. The psalmist-monarch uttered his rejoicing and sorrow to the music of the harp. The great Alfred, of Britain, found in his harp a ready key to the camp and tent of the conqueror of his country, and while he charmed the ear of the Dane as he quaffed his mead, he also espied the weakness of a foe who, ere another dawn, felt the fair hand of the royal harper victoriously grasping the battle-axe and the sword. And the great conqueror, Brian Boroihme—a king by might as by right; not heavier were his death-dealing blows on the "Field of the Green Banner," Clontarf, than were his fingers light and wizard when he touched that harp which Ireland still treasures among her relics, and which Bochara claims to have touched to please the ear of a Saxon king. And who has not fancied hearing, in some reverie of the soul over the fall and sorrow of nations, the strains of that mighty harp, viewless but living and immortal—

"The harp that hung in Tara's halls."

Rude or perfected, in all nations the harp has had a home and a welcome. The Hebrew, the Scandinavian, the Cimbric and the Celt have held it hallowed. Saints, pilgrims and heroes have been solaced by it, and we are taught that, ascending to higher glories, the angels of God strike celestial melodies from its strings. It is not strange, then, with such a history upon earth, with such a prophecy and faith attached to its future, that the harp is become a chosen and universal, as it is a sacred instrument. Intrinsically exquisite, in form as in tone, it lacks nothing that could commend it to our sympathies and delight.

These thoughts have been suggested by a glimpse at the magnificent Double Action Harps, at the Crystal Palace, manufactured by Messrs. J. F. Browne & Co., of this city, who were also the leading Harp makers of London. Nothing could be more perfect and beautiful than these instruments, and we do not wonder that, even when less perfect, the sad-fated Queen of France, Marie Antoinette, and the famous Madame de Genlis, were enthusiastic patrons of the Harp. Bochara, the prince of modern harpists, pronounces the Harps of the Messrs. Browne & Co. equal to the celebrated Erard's, of Paris, and excelled by none in the world. In one respect they are superior to any European harps, viz: they are fitted for the extremes of climate in this country. For his improvements in this delightful instrument, which is equally a noble ornament for the parlor, and a source of exquisite pleasure alike to performer and hearer, Mr. Browne has received the Franklin medal of the Society of Arts.

No lady nor gentleman, to our mind, can possess a finer musical accomplishment than the skillful performance of the Harp, and no accomplishment is easier, or grander, if the "Double-Action Harp" be the instrument chosen. The principal teachers and performers have abandoned the imperfect single-action harp, and it is sufficient for the fame of the splendid Double-Action American Harps of Messrs. Browne & Co., that M. Bochsá, the first of living harpists and harp composers, unqualifiedly commends them to the public, and uses no other himself.—New York Mirror.

THE BRIDE OF THE ADRIATIC.

[From the Italian of L. CARRER.]

[A Venetian gentleman loved a young girl who returned his affection. Marriage between them being impossible, the young girl drowned herself. The gentleman would never marry any other person, and being finally chosen Doge, declared himself espoused to the Sea. This is the origin of the feast of the Bucentaur, though the historians refer it to another cause.]

Let the sounds of gladness die
On the azure ways of ocean,
Where amid the rocks I lie
Sighing forth my lone emotion.

Give to me the jewel golden,—
My lamenting I will cease,
Him, who by this token's holden,
I will here await in peace.

Never shall another name him
Spouse, to me who pledged his faith;
His he called me—I will claim him,
Yielded up to me by death.

Softest bridal couch I'm making
For that day—of whitest foam—
Soothing thus my passion aching
Till I win him to my home.

When at last life's final morrow
Sends my long lost spouse to me,
In this cavern of my sorrow
Robed and waiting I will be.

Shells of Venice shall be shining
On my breast and on my hair,
And the seaweeds green and twining
Girdled round my waist I'll wear.

And I'll wear this ring I've treasured,
Flung from off his golden throne;
Years on years this ring has measured
Every throb my heart has known.

"See this ring, dear, can'st thou tell Why 'tis with me, here, away?"
"It is the ring, I know it well,
I gave thee on my festal day!"

"But thou art pale and cold, dear wife!"
"It is the waves have made me so;
Above wert thou with joy and life,
I with the thought of thee, below!"

"Long, my bride, hath Heaven tried thee!
Faithful still hath been thy heart!
Now, at last, I stand beside thee;
Never, never shall we part!"

"I with thee will skim the waves
While the daylight gilds the deep,
And the silence of thy caves
Shall protect our tranquil sleep!"

"Close united thus—in fashion
New at every moment found
Born upon the sea, our passion
But the boundless sea shall bound!"

CHURCH MUSIC.—A correspondent complains that the organs in our churches overpower the voices of the singers. It always seemed to us that singing as a part of public worship is very strangely conducted in Christian churches. The words are always drowned in the tune. If the singing is intended merely as a professional exhibition, it is not generally, we suppose, of a character to justify the attention given to it. If it is intended for a higher purpose, as a part of the public worship, we cannot see the propriety of singing in such manner that the sentiment of the hymn is entirely lost. As the singing in our churches is conducted, the words might as well be in a foreign tongue.—Prov. Jour.

BOSTON, OCT. 1, 1853.

M. Fétis's Musical Testament.

II.

In our paper of September 17, we made some extracts from the commencement of this curious document. We have followed M. Fétis in his rapid review of the history of musical Art, and have seen him, by the light of his eclectic principle that musical genius, musical ideas survive, while musical forms change and grow obsolete, recognize the merit of the various schools of composers from the time when the musical scale lay half developed in the old church modes, and when the plain chant was the whole material of music, down to the modern deluge of Rossini-ism, which swept all before it, about the year 1821. The extravagant rage for the Rossini melody, and the fashion of imitating its mere form, (for form alone, not substance, can be imitated), were, it appears, what first provoked Fétis to commence a formal propaganda of what he held to be the sound principles of taste, by the weekly publication of his famous musical Review. We translate his own account of it.

"It was a time of actual affliction for me, this epoch when I saw the reality of Art called in question; when men deified faults rather than beauties in the works of the composer of the day, depreciating the noble productions of another period, and even those of Mozart, the greatest creator of ideas whom God had sent upon the earth. Surely, no one had more admiration than I for what there was truly beautiful, original and profoundly conceived in the dramatic works of Rossini! The regret I felt at seeing that illustrious man spoil such fine thoughts by common-place formulas which he himself despised, did not diminish in the least the high esteem with which I was penetrated for the inspirations of his genius. And now to-day, when, dropped by the indifference of the vulgar, that genius languishes in isolation and neglect, one voice has remained faithful to him in the proclaiming of his glory; that voice is mine. But, in considering the character of his talent, I assigned to him his place as the representative of an epoch in the history of the Art; an epoch characterised above all by the development of the power of rhythm, by new applications of the enharmonic change, and by formulas of modulation until then unused. It was a long way from that to the idolatry of the multitude, who cried out, No salvation, outside of the music of Rossini!

"After meditating a long time on the best means of enlightening this infatuated world and of dissipating its errors, I settled upon the idea of my Revue Musicale, of which the first numbers were published in the month of February 1827, and of which fifteen volumes appeared within eight years. It was in this collection that I made, for the first time, the exposition of my doctrine of the imperishable worth of works of Art, whatever be their epoch and their principle, when they are rich in ideas, and when the merit of the form is in proportion with these ideas and their principle. I there attacked without concealment all the prejudices opposed to this doctrine; I courageously upheld glories legitimately acquired and which they sought to tarnish; finally, I showed no pity to the bad taste which fashion protected with its influence. Many musical journals had been undertaken in Paris for more than sixty years before; but not one had been able to sustain itself. The time no doubt had grown more favorable, for I found readers, who were wanting to my predecessors; the artists read the numbers eagerly as they appeared; even the elegant world took an interest in them; the provinces saw in them a means of information about the actual condition of the Art and about the worth of its productions; in short, all Europe was moved by the words of a sincere voice which came to affirm to the artists and to all art-lovers, that the history of this Art is not that of a dreadful shipwreck in which all is irrevocably swallowed up. I need not say that the Revue Musicale had also its detractors, that it raised up against itself the recriminations of wounded self-love, and that envy did not pardon its author his success after so many other fruitless trials; but I have never suffered such considerations to shake me when I believed a thing was good and useful.

"My end was already partially attained, and there commenced a salutary re-action in public opinion in favor of good and beautiful music; I then thought the time favorable for entering more deeply into men's convictions, and I organized my historical concerts. People have quite a different sort of confidence in the authority of words, from what they have in the experience acquired by their own personal impressions. I believed, then, that the most rooted prejudices against the music of earlier times would be unable to resist the hearing of this music, when selected with a true discernment of what it has most ideal and consequently most original, and I formed the plan of concerts, in which should be heard the best productions of each kind in a chronological and systematic order, preparing their effect by verbal explanations and by anecdotes. I would not undertake to tell what energy it required to assemble all the means of execution for such concerts, to triumph over difficulties, to put obstacles aside, and carry through the enterprise, in spite of the intrigues of envy and the ill will that surrounded me on all sides. But the certainty of success sustained me; it went far beyond my hopes. Nothing can give a true idea of the enthusiasm that seized the audience of those séances where a whole world unknown revealed itself with its secular forms and produced impressions as lively as they were various. All was new in that world of ideas which they had been wont to consider as forever buried in oblivion. This grand and consoling truth, which I had long been preaching, that the Beautiful is absolute, that it resides in the idea, and that the idea, essentially original, is of no age and cannot grow old; this truth, I say, became perceptible to all the world, and the palpable proof I gave of it seemed like a veritable resurrection of the past. The conception of the historical concerts made no less sensation in foreign countries, than their execution had produced in Paris: all the musical journals of Germany published considerations on this subject; for several years my correspondence brought me congratulations upon this conception, qualified by all the expressions which the artistic sentiment could inspire. Even at this day, in my distant travels, the remembrance of the historical concerts often assures me a touching and most kindly welcome on the part of many persons who are only indirectly occupied with music.

"That work has borne its fruits: an eclectic sense for the beauties of music, of whatsoever age and form, has penetrated everywhere. The beautiful works of past times have re-seized their rights, are listened to with the applause they merit, and inspire sincere delight in souls select. The adepts of this religion every day increase in number, and the reign of formula is drawing near its close."

The conclusion of M. Fétis's "Testament" has not yet come to hand.

Local.

The Address by GEO. R. RUSSELL, Esq., before the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, was delivered before a large audience in the Tremont Temple, on Tuesday evening. The address was exceedingly interesting and commanded the close attention of the audience. It was comprehensive, progressive and liberal; giving a brief outline of the history of ancient Art; showing the true dignity of labor, and its absolute necessity in our country; the beauty and superiority of the golden Arts of Peace to the Arts of War; the connection and mutual dependence of the Fine Arts and the Mechanic Arts, and the duties of mechanics to advance the progress of their respective Arts.

It was written in a lively, interesting style, enlivened throughout with much humor and considerable keen satire: and of a most judicious length, the orator acting on the famous maxim of Lord Chesterfield, to this effect, "When you have made a good impression, leave it!"

The Brigade Band performed several pieces of music very satisfactorily, and their performance gave a very favorable impression of the acoustic qualities of the Hall, as a Music Hall. As a Hall for speaking, we believe it, so far as we have observed, to be unequalled. We shall wait to hear a full orchestra in it, however, before giving a decided opinion in the matter.

After the exercises in the Temple, we learn that the Association held a Levee at the Revere House. From the proceedings there, as reported in the daily papers, we extract the following well deserved tribute to the President of the Association, JONAS CHICKERING, a noble specimen of "a working mechanic," who exalts his calling and reflects honor on himself and the city to which he belongs. The Hon. Robert C. Winthrop writes as follows to the Vice President of the Association.

I had intended to avail myself of the opportunity to propose the health of my valued friend, your President. May I ask you to do this in my name, if it has not previously been done by somebody else?

I have met Mr. Chickering in more than one Association, civil, political and religious. I may almost say, in the well remembered words of Shakspeare, "I have sounded him from the lowest note to the very top of his compass,"—and I can truly add, that I have always found him in perfect chord, and tuned to concert pitch. He makes harmony wherever he goes.

The sympathies of the whole community were with him, when the devouring element arrested his business for a moment, and we all rejoice that he has re-established himself so speedily and so successfully.

I would offer as a sentiment—

Jonas Chickering, who fulfils the whole idea of a President of a Mechanic Charitable Association. He has been tried in the fire, and has come out pure metal.

CONCERTS.—The concert season has begun, as our readers will see by turning to our advertising columns. OLE BULL announces his Farewell Concert for next Tuesday evening, assisted by the favorite pianist, Mr. STRAKOSCH and by Signorina ADELINA PATTI, a child in years (but no mere youthful phenomenon, if what we hear is true), and the sister of the PATTI of old times. The famous Norwegian has a great host of enthusiastic admirers, who cannot soon forget the charm and excitement of the time when they first heard him, and a new generation of concert goers, grown up since his first visit, are eager to hear him.

The new QUARTET CLUB also announce an opening concert, as a sample of their proposed series, to be given in the Tremont Temple. So far as the names of the artists are any guarantee of the excellence of the performance, we may safely expect an interesting series of concerts of classical music from this new Club, and wish them all success in this undertaking.

A complimentary concert to Mr. THOMAS COMER is also announced in the daily papers. Mr. Comer's long musical services in this city, in the Church, the Theatre and the Concert room, well deserve somewhat more than an empty compliment, and if the programme be good, we shall hope to see the Music Hall crowded on the occasion.

New York.

The Tribune cautiously damns with most faint praise, Maretzek's new prima donna, CONSTANZI MANZINI, a soprano from Naples. After making many allowances for a first appearance and other embarrassments, we are told that in person she is young, slender and pretty; in execution pretty fair, but not brilliant; her voice, a soprano, with much facility in the upper notes, which she can take very piano, and swell and diminish with apparent ease; her intonation, excellent; her most marked deficiency being "an inadequacy of intensity and of sympathetic tone." She made her first appearance on Monday, in "Lucia." Such praise is surely not enthusiastic, but it may be that there is something in her. Nous verrons. We will give her fair hearing in Boston, when our turn shall come.

The Italian Opera has closed its first week auspiciously. Two of the three operas given, I Puritani and Ernani, though not new, are not hackneyed, and as such have a special interest with the public. It is remarkable of the Opera of past winters in this City, that it contained singers whose merits appeared only to be fully recognized when they were introduced into the Academie of Paris, or the Queen's Opera at London. Among these may be named Tedesco, Laborde, and Bosio, all now playing the first parts at the great lyrical establishments in the chief cities of Europe. We throw out this hint, because America now should not be backward in determining the rank of artists for herself, but receive them and place them technically where they ought to be. We have frequently heard a company of singers at the boasted Academie of Paris not comparable to the one now at Niblo's; we now speak of the singers, and not of the orchestra or stage effect. But it is the experience of every traveler that he has not unfrequently sought for superiority abroad and found inferiority. But omne ignotum pro magnifico; names come roaring from afar, or down from antiquity, when the same or better would be unnoticed or unknown if placed quietly or indigenously under our own eyes. This is true as regards literature equally with art. There is not a week passes without writing equal to the best in books of English literature, but as it comes anonymously and is printed in the most shadowy of fugitive ways, it passes off with the day or week which gives it birth.

Among the singers at Niblo's is Marni, who in his happiest moments, is the best basso extant, always excepting Lablache. To the student of the Italian language simply, we cannot recommend so good a lesson, as the unimpeachably good recitative of Marini. Salvi is a vocalist of large style, and as such was a star of the Queen's Theatre. Steffanone, on the whole, is the best Norma we have had.—N. Y. Tribune.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.—M. Jullien's season at Castle Garden has ceased, and he begins a second month of Concerts, six a week, at Metropolitan Hall.

We have found nothing to change of our first impression of M. Jullien and his company, given at length on his first appearance. The orchestra now plays better than ever. Habituated to nightly performances, with almost daily rehearsals, laboriously minute and accurate, they rendered on Saturday night, all styles of music, from the symphony to the waltz, with a delicacy and clearness of outline that may be compared to some exquisitely fine cabinet painting.

The great beauty of an orchestra consists in its power and variety,—affording all the necessary lights and shades. The great fault of our orchestra playing, in ordinary, is the want of these. Numbers are deficient, and the contrasts of light and shade accordingly do not appear. Jullien extracts not only a piano passage, but a forte. A forte is not simply loudness, but it is a great body of sound, balanced and varied in its colossal resonance. In an ordinary orchestra the loudness wants this quality—it is noisy without being full. Then, too, for the body of the piano passages, a great mass of stringed instruments is required: these to the number of about seventy, Jullien has, in his immense orchestra of one hundred and two. Both the artistic loudness and softness of an orchestra are dependent on the purity of tone of each performer; and, when we remember that Jullien's orchestra has several performers without equals in the world on their respective instruments; some others who have no superiors, and the balance equal to the average of the players even of the Conservatory Concerts of Paris, we may judge of its capacity to paint truly, musical subjects.

The public, now, under the baton of Jullien, should endeavor to widen its circle of appreciation in instrumental music. They should remember that music has its rhetoric as completely as poetry or prose—as an epic or an oration. While due admiration should be given to the exquisite passionate and heroic solo playing of Koenig on the cornet; to the matchless tone of Reichart on the flute; to the unapproached execution of Bottesini on the double bass; to the wonderfully pure and brilliant tone of Whille on the clarinet; or in another way, while full applause should be extended to the arrangement of national airs, which have invariably merit and generally excellence—being concentrated expressions of feeling wherein the greatest composers have found sources of inspiration or means of elucidation—yet the composition of music should be properly looked to at the same time. The public should now pay attention to combinations, to harmonies—to the exordium, progress, development and peroration of musical ideas—to music as a language of passion and emotion; and they should not merely dwell on individual players and the materialistic suggestion of the imitation of the tramping of men's or horses' feet, and the common place introduction of Fourth of July nationality—mere Yankee-doodle-isms, which are not nationality in a lyrical sense, but as far as they go, the death of high national art, as they raise a false issue in the concert-room.—Tribune.

A NEW VOLUME of this journal will commence with the number for Saturday, October 8th. Just the beginning of the musical season, and just the time for new subscribers to begin to read our paper. We trust our friends, who are satisfied that this paper is worth sustaining, will use a little effort to induce others to subscribe.

We would also state, for the benefit of those who may wish to keep connectedly such mirror of the musical times as we have given for the eighteen months past, that we have a good supply of all the back numbers on hand, with bound volumes of the first year.

Beethoven's Symphony in C Minor.

In one of Jullien's New York programmes, in which the C minor symphony was announced, the public were coolly informed that the Scherzo and Finale were designed to "be descriptive of an advancing army!" We were reminded of an old attempt of our own, in the early Boston Academy days, some fifteen years ago or more, to hint in words the impression which the glorious music made upon us. For better or for worse we reproduce it here, seeing that a new generation of music-lovers may be said almost to have sprung up since that time. To be sure, it is not one of those very common-sense-ical criticisms, which assume that it is absurd to think that music ever means anything, and that therefore only a technical musician has any right to talk about it, and he only technically. On the other hand it is sufficiently guarded against the imputation of forcing one's own private fancy and construction on the innocent composer. There are two kinds of musical criticism. One examines only the musical texture, the mechanical structure of a composition, its harmony, its counterpoint, its thematic development, its instrumentation, and so forth, and should be attempted only by one who is theoretically, if not practically, a musician. The other regards the spirit and intention of the work, the degree and quality of artistic or poetic inspiration that pervades it, the effect which it produces in the soul of him who hears it;—and this demands some qualifications which the mere technical musician does not always have, and which the purely unscientific music-lover, by virtue of his humanity, his genial temperament, may have; although of course it is better when both characters are in the most complete degree united. Your technical critic will magnify a Jullien quadrille into co-equal consequence with a Beethoven symphony, smitten with admiration for the skill displayed in the mere handling of the orchestral or other musical materials. While the unscientific, but poetically, spiritually appreciative critic will sniff perhaps too hastily at the quadrille, as if all quadrilles were trivial, while he may be as fit to discourse on the beauties of the grand musical poem or symphony, of which the written score would be all Hebrew to him, as the poet is to talk of the sublimities of nature, without being a geologist or chemist.

A few words first about the practice of interpreting music into words. For certainly it is quackery to pretend to have found the key or story to a symphony, so that it must suggest just that, or nothing, to one prepared to hear with the understanding. We have been told that Haydn always had some little romance or idyl in his mind when he composed a symphony; and we have frequently had music interpreted to us, almost note by note, by some ingenious and imaginative listener. But the truth is, no interpretation can suggest so much, that the music shall not suggest more; and such limitations of its meaning may sadly interfere with a simple, free and deep reception of its power and beauty. How can we hear the right key, if we have been warned to look for another? And then again, music in its very nature is the language of something which words cannot tell; yes of something which thought cannot comprehend in its narrow, rigid moulds. It begins where speech leaves off. When we have fairly entered its element, it alone is all-sufficing; it explains itself, but it transcends speech and all this defining whim of the understanding. The charm and perfection of music is, that it sets you free, that it delivers you from thought, from care, from all too individual aim or consciousness, and bids your being melt and blend with its all-permeating sentiment. You listen and are transported. It has not addressed your thoughts; it has not spread a picture before your eyes; but it has changed your state; it has warmed out into living, glowing reality the dim mysterious inner world in you, and made it the thrilling element in which all the conscious phenomena of your more outward momentary being float. In a great piece of music you see, you imagine almost everything; it wakes a thousand different trains of thought with equal reason, it suggests a thousand scenes. In no two hearers' minds does it light up just the same phantasmagoria. One imagines this, another that; and each is right, if he do not impose his interpretation upon the rest.

Music is more or less suggestive to different hearers. The thoughts it awakens in each certainly help them to speak to each other of what they have heard, to compare notes, and recal passages, and telegraph mutually the joy they had in it by these poor signs. But then these thoughts, however decidedly suggested, were not the music; these the great ocean tossed up to each of us upon its surface, and these we could rescue and identify; but what do these tell of its great boundless roar and swell, of its unfathomable depths?

And yet it is natural, it is almost inevitable, hearing music, to associate with it some more or less distinct train of ideas; and especially, if it have the unity and logical consecutiveness of a symphony (which is the evolving of a whole harmonious, multifarious world out of one simple theme), one is tempted to trace a connected story or allegory all through it. It is easy, if the principal theme awakes any definite emotion or idea, to use this as a key to all the mysteries which follow, and to recognize some new phase of its history in each successive musical treatment. All this is well. Only this must be borne in mind: that our story is, after all, not precisely an interpretation, but only an allegorical illustration of the music. We can only say, "it seems to sing of this or that; it is as if I saw such scenes and splendors passing before me." Earnestly and significantly the mystic tones appeal to us; but never can we render back in any intelligible statement the whole which they have suggested; never can we feel that we have understood it all; always the sense thereof deepens the more the music takes possession of us; and for every mood we bring to it it answers something. To every hearer it imparts a separate, private revelation. Truly its sense is infinite. It kindles up our imagination to invent those little fictions, poems, or pictures, by which we illustrate it to ourselves, and coin its vagueness into some stamp of definiteness; so does the purling of a brook whisper fairy tales to a poet dreaming by its margin;—but then is this the whole account of the stream of waters, or the stream of harmonies? have they not both something more to say? and is this anything more than one of the countless stories which they have in store? The most that can be done is, to weave a story or an interpretation which shall be entirely in the spirit of the music, and harmonize with it, so that the one shall predispose the mind for the other. With the inventor, therefore, if his story be a good one, be in the spirit of the music, it shows that the music has indeed deeply wrought upon him, even to the prompting of a creative activity in his own mind. With other hearers, to whom he offers his fiction as a key, it will, if not very good, prove an obstacle and a hindrance, interfering with that perfect freedom with which the soul hears music; but if it be a true allegory, inspired really by the music having had more part in it than his own idiosyncrasy or idle, accidental thoughts, then the exercise of tracing through a fancied resemblance will bring them nearer to the music, and cause them to hear it more closely, while it will not preclude any suggestions which it may make individually to each of their minds. This is the true work of interpretation; the only way in which music may be translated into thought. It must be a work of genuine poetic creation. What moved the composer to make a symphony, moves the interpreter to make a poem; out of one and the same spirit, they create in their several ways; and there will be a spiritual correspondence between the two products, so that the impression of the one will not disturb, but only illustrate that of the other. It is the office of the imagination to give form and figure to invisible, felt realities. It moulds its recognition of a divine essence into an image, as of Jove or Apollo. It embodies the vague (which speaks directly only to faith or sentiment within us) in a form appreciable to thought and sense; and this embodiment is no interpretation, but only a type and suggestion of the unutterable essence. Just the same relation must these interpretations hold to music. They are but parables, which hint of something more, namely, the music. And music—it too is a parable, and hints of what cannot be uttered.

After this, we trust we shall not be understood to profess too much in the brief and sketchy interpretation which we offer of a symphony of Beethoven. It must be received with the understanding that it is only our own, it may be a very fanciful, or very superficial interpretation, but yet one which the symphony will admit of. Since it took form in our mind, we have heard various other interpretations suggested by one and the other, outwardly so unlike, as to make it seem an arbitrary piece of business. But upon nearer examination it was found that all these little dramas had a common key-note, and were but so many different fables, setting forth one truth. To one it seemed to preach resolution, moral heroism; and the answering themes in the first movement were two voices, one as of one depending on the eve of some vast undertaking, the other exhorting and encouraging; and the acme of the whole was in the triumphant march of the finale. Another calls it the "Skeptic in the honest and successful search for truth." Another, "Genius struggling with Nature for expression." And another, thinking all these too little and too definite, seems to hear, in its yearning, pleading, wild, upheaving ocean of harmonies, "innumerable spirits demand the crisis of their existence." Who does not see that here is at the bottom, after all, one theme: the great life-struggle, to each one modified by his own experience; to one presenting itself in superficial special incidents, to another generalized into a war of principles, a great life-tragedy. We all heard and felt it in those depths of our being where we are one; but as soon as we began to speak, the confusion of tongues arose. And now to these various testimonies we will add our own, and describe the symphony as it impressed ourselves. The truest account of it would be the impressions which it made upon the greatest possible number of independent hearers, carefully collated.

Beethoven had just reached the period of ripe manhood when he wrote it; that is to say, he was about thirty-seven; when all his tendencies were confirmed, when he had outgrown extraneous influences, and put all himself into his works. Imagine a man haunted, and drawn away from life's actual sympathies, by severe and tyrannizing ideals, filled with a high sense of Art, with convictions of truth and beauty which no one else could understand, and which led him to say, when he met a sympathizing spirit in the young Bettine: "When I lift my eyes I must sigh, for that which I behold is against my creed; and I must despise the world, because it knows not that music is a higher revelation than science or philosophy." "I have no friend—I must live all to myself; yet I know that God is nearer to me, than to others, in my Art." Imagine, too, a heart formed for the tenderest love, but for a love so great and earnest, that there were found none worthy of it (he had been disappointed in his affections.) Add to this, that already he was two thirds deaf, and shut out from the world, and, in his childlike want of worldly tact, subjected to the management of his "evil principle," as he called his two crafty and selfish brothers, who taught him the habit of suspicion;—and we see that the pressure of circumstances lay heavily here upon a soul of the greatest promise; and that, if ever the great life-struggle, the contradiction between the Ideal and the Actual, occupied the soul of an artist, and drove him to his Art for a solution, it did with him. Such is the symphony in question.

The subject is announced with startling distinctness at the outset, in three short emphatic repetitions of one note, falling upon the third below, which is held out some time; and then the same phrase echoed, only one degree lower. This grotesque and almost absurd passage, coming in so abruptly, like a mere freak or idle dallying with sounds, fills the mind with a strange uncertainty, as it does the ear; for as yet the note is wanting, which determines the key of the piece. Still more is this vague apprehension increased, when on the ground-tone of C minor this little phrase, once boldly struck, as if by chance, multiplies itself in rapid, soft reiterations, which chase each other round from voice to voice throughout the whole band, first climbing the heights of the trebles, then again down darting through the unfathomable abyss of bass. It is as if a fearful secret, some truth of mightiest moment, startled the stillness where we were securely walking, and the heavens and the earth and hell were sending back the sound thereof from all quarters, "deep calling unto deep," and yet no word of explanation. What is it? What can all this mean? What a world of earnest, strange, portentous voices we set ringing round our heads, when we chanced to stumble upon that seemingly unmeaning phrase of the three notes! Strange and unendurable suspense, dreading we know not what! Comes there no sign of hope? Yes—when the burst of mingling echoes has once spent itself, there is a moment's pause, and then the distant mellow horns take up the three notes in a higher strain, and fall into another key, the warm and confident E flat major—and on this basis the countermelody is introduced, a strain of sweetest love and promise, an unlocking of the springs of good affection in the soul, as if to drown all doubt. How vain! for still the ground trembles; and even now those three dread notes are never silenced; they only sink down into the bass, and there, all too audible, though deep and muffled, shake away at the foundations, and contradict the upper melodies. These are the themes.

Beethoven, explaining the time of those first three notes one day to a friend, said: "So knocks Fate at the door." It is the dread necessity of the Actual, the limitation which meets us on all sides. It is long before the aspiring genius of man will recognise it to be a necessity. In vain do generous hopes and proud resolves intoxicate for a time, and banish the spectre from their charmed circle. In vain does man's genius come to his aid with glorious promises and sense of power. In vain the rising of the indomitable will, the calling on a latent immortal energy within. In vain the hours of poetry and love; the discovery so often, in the highest action of the mind, of an infinite relationship. All this is ours, and real. But so too is that vague, shadowy foe; that thing which men call Fate. It lurks in the commonest experiences of life; the child finds it in his play; strike your foot against any stone by the wayside, and the whole world rings to it. Many times we meet it, many times are baffled, ere we feel that it is one and the same power hemming us in on all sides. Vex yourself to madness with the strange problem, wrestle with the enemy till you are thrown down insensible; with returning consciousness, quietly and slyly he steals upon you from behind again, (for so we may interpret those passages of the music, where, after all the forces of the orchestra have spent themselves in a long, furious burst, there is a pause as of exhaustion, and the theme sets in again in a low tone from a single instrument.) On every side the problem challenges us. In our thinkings and in our strivings it cuts short the conclusion. In the sweetest and securest love-passages, in the bud of the rose, still it lurks, as in that sweet horn melody in the countermelody. And such is life—this perpetual, alarming pressure of a vague power from without; this struggle with we know not what; sweetened and relieved, however, by many a melody of love and hope; stern, mysterious demands sounding deep within us, like a last trump, while mingled strains of love and hope and pity flow forth to blend the sharp quick calls into a more human melody, winding gracefully around them, like beautiful innocence, flinging herself around the neck of the stern avenger to intercede for the condemned. It is in vain to describe how all this is worked up in the second division of the Allegro. The whole movement seems to represent the genius of man in conflict with necessity—man pleading and wrestling with the iron limitations which rise up against him, chafing with his half-fledged immortal wings against the bars of the Actual. Many details of beauty might be singled out; but who cares to see a single figure cut out from its relative position in a great painting, say the "Last Judgment" of Michael Angelo? Once the struggling forces seem exhausted, and the whole orchestra rocks and pants and groans, while the conflict renews itself by fits; and when the theme swells up again into a long, loud crash upon the dominant, it dies away in an earnest, prayer-like cadenza from the oboe alone, in which you seem to hear the Good Genius entreating: "Now kind heaven grant that this may be the last!" and you hope to hear it pass out into the clear and tranquil perfect key of C major. In vain! still the minor third! the conflict is renewed. Necessity prevails, and man must own it and be reconciled. There is peace even in that. To this consummation the musical conflict perseveres; after a sweet streaming forth of all the blended wind-instruments, the last sounding out of the mysterious three notes is with the consent of the whole orchestra.

And now has the difficulty been looked in the face. Soon must the solution come. Man's struggle with destiny, could he understand it, is nothing but his want of harmony with himself. He has a great lesson to learn: he must renounce. The Fate he dreads is only the moral law,—the law he does not love—in terrible disguise. He must renounce and obey; be content to be faithful to himself, and not ask for the reward, which is in Heaven's keeping. This victory once gained over himself, and Fate and his will now are one voice. So sings the Andante, stately and grave, yet full of tenderness, like the chorus in an old Greek tragedy, chanting the moral of the piece, in the intervals of the action, and celebrating the dignity and beauty of the Law. It seems to be a lyric exposition, both of the appalling difficulties and of the absolute beauty of the principle of self-sacrifice, the terrors and the splendors of the cross. How wisely do the manly and yet tenders tones of the violoncello discourse! With what sober certainty the theme is taken up and varied by the earnest, reedy sounds of the bassoon! How it is insisted and insisted upon with a heavenly authority, as if it were an angel speaking, and bidding us moreover listen to the starry spheres, and to all the winds and woods and waters, and satisfy ourselves that the whole heavens and earth are full of confirmation, that deep calleth unto deep, and the stars sing together of this truth also. In that strange passage, where there is a monotonous rustling for some bars, alternately in the violins and the basses, and which seems to have no meaning, save to effect as much novelty as possible, and carry our thoughts far away from all that has gone before, yet how strangely steals in, in a remote mysterious key, the same theme! as much as to say: "If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy voice reach me." There are passages of deepest grief and despondency heard ever and anon in the pauses of the discourse; the bitter price is weighed; and the prayer involuntarily escapes: "let the cup pass from me." But the sufferings are but for the present time; the safety and beauty of the principle shines out high over all; the truth is glorified; the soul is full of confidence. All this is, as it could only be, in the religious key of A flat major.

And since allusion has been made to the old Greek drama, in which Fate always plays principal part, I may trace some fancied analogy between what is thus far described of the symphony, and an idea once suggested to me concerning the "Eumenides" of Æschylus. In the first scene of that drama we have Orestes pursued by the Furies into the temple of Apollo. The Furies sleep while he prostrates himself before the statue of the god. What is this but man forgetting his daily persecutors, the tormenting cares of the Actual, while he gives himself up to his genius? (Apollo, god of genius.) Genius in its glowing hour rises above all earthly troubles; but not effectually, not permanently. It is a struggle—and we have the music of it in the Allegro movement. Apollo sends him to consult Minerva. Genius cannot save a man; he has need of wisdom. And would not the andante, if it could be translated and congealed into permanent marble, rise before us pure and calm and lofty, in terrible beauty, MINERVA! goddess of Wisdom and of heroic Will.

What can be said of the wonderful music of the Scherzo, which comes next,—such impetuous, reckless strength, and yet such weakest tenderness, such restlessness, and yet such sure and steady preparation and progress towards the acme of the whole, the glorious Triumphal March! It would seem as if the wisdom, which has been sung, were now to be embodied in some glorious deed; as if the artist were gathering up his strength to crowd all the lesson of his life, resolutely, into one soul-satisfying, complete revelation of Art; with a Titan's strength to cast off the weight of the ideal which oppressed him, by action as ideal, and prove that, with all that Hamlet had, his also was the strength which Hamlet had not. Playfully and capriciously he dallies awhile in the Scherzo, as if with sense of abundant riches, with the light-hearted consciousness of having solved the riddle, yet earnest as before, starting and stopping suddenly, resolving and musing by turns, in a fever of preparation, yet sure of what is coming. He only waits the breeze; it is already rising; the sails flutter about in all directions, until the main current of the air shall fill them and decide the course. It is all a sort of loose sketching as in preparation for the glorious utterance in Art which he has in mind, but which has not quite yet taken form. How the basses labor and tug in broken efforts; though baffled oft, they carry the point at last, for there is abundant strength, and the thing is fated, only wait the fulness of time! Hark! has not the happy moment arrived! The spell of inspiration is upon him—a mysterious murmur comes from the depths of the orchestra—then a light tilting movement of the upper melodies, as if ready to break away,—a swinging to and fro of the good ship, with her sails all set and filled, while only one rope holds her to the land: it snaps! and away she shoots triumphantly. It is the march, the magnificent Finale, which bursts forth in the key of C major, in the full noonday blaze of light, and carries with it such a swarming, crowding wealth of melodies and harmonies, and moves with such a mighty on-sweep, that all things open before it, and are swept on with it in its wake. Again and again, with grander energy and richer harmony the theme is repeated; thoughts innumerable keep crowding out, as if the uncontainable impulse never could exhaust itself; as if the composer never could get out the mighty thought which fired his soul. Again and again is the closing chord reiterated, as if he stamped upon the ground from very impatience, as if he could not consent to stop and leave so much unsaid.

And is this all? O no! the impression which Beethoven always leaves upon us is, that there is more, more! A boundless striving to pronounce the unutterable, to embrace the infinite, is the sentiment of all his music; and the hearer, spell-bound, must follow the heaven-storming Titan, as far as his strength holds out.

And here I may add words which Bettine reports Beethoven to have said to her. If he did not say it in words, he certainly did repeatedly in his music:

"The mind," said he, "would embrace all thoughts, both high and low, and embody them into one stream of sensations, all sprung from simple melody, and without the aid of its charms doomed to die in oblivion. This is the unity, which lives in my symphonies—numberless streamlets meandering on in endless variety of shape, but all diverging into one common bed. Thus it is I feel that there is an indefinite something, an eternal, an infinite to be attained; and although I look upon my works with a foretaste of success, yet I cannot help wishing, like a child, to begin my task anew, at the very moment when my thundering appeal to my hearers seems to have forced my musical creed upon them, and thus to have exhausted the insatiable cravings of my soul after the 'beau ideal'."

And again he said (what seems to contain the whole moral of the symphony we have been reviewing): "Would you know the true principle on which the arts may be won? It is to bow to their immutable terms; to lay all passion and vexation of spirit prostrate at their feet, and to approach the divine presence with a mind so calm and so void of littleness, as to be ready to receive the dictates of Fantasy and the revelations of Truth."

CANZONET.

[From the Italian of TOMMASO GROSSI,*]

Pilgrim swallow, that so oft
Pausing on my terrace drear,
Thy lamenting song and soft
Ponrest on my listening ear,
What to me then wouldst thou say,
Pilgrim swallow, in thy lay?

Dost thou, mourning here alone,
Quite forgotten by thy mate,
Match thy sorrow with mine own,
Widowed bird and desolate?
Pour then forth thy plaintive lay,
Pilgrim swallow, in thy way!

Yet, in this more blest than I,
Thou thyself canst still betake
To thy wings, and mourning fly
O'er the hills, and o'er the lake,
Calling on him all the day,
Happy swallow! in thy way!

Might I thus—but ah! the hope
This dungeon dim denies too well!
I must not dream of Heaven's blue cope
Within this sunless, aimless cell,
Whence to thee my feeble lay,
Swallow, scarce can find its way!

Soon September comes—from me
Thou wilt wing thy journey fleet:
Distant shores thou soon wilt see,
Other waves and mountains greet!
Hailing all upon thy way,
Pilgrim swallow, with thy lay!

But while every morning, I
Ope mine eyes upon my woe,
I will still believe thee nigh,
'Mid the frost and ice and snow,
Mourning with me in thy way,
Swallow, with thy plaintive lay!

Coming with the coming Spring,
Planted here a cross thou'lt find;
Fold on it thy weary wing
When the sun has far declined;
Sing my requiem in thy way,
Swallow, with thy plaintive lay!

Michael Kelly.

This witty musical adventurer, from whose pleasant autobiography we have several times drawn food for our columns, was born in Dublin, in 1764. We find the following brief account of him and of his works.

His father, Michael Kelly, was an eminent wine merchant in that city, and for several years master of the ceremonies at the Castle. At a very early period, Michael displayed a passion for music; and as his father was enabled to procure the best masters for him, before he had reached his eleventh year he could perform some of the most difficult sonatas then in fashion, on the piano-forte. Ranzini, when engaged to sing at the Rotunda in Dublin, gave him some lessons in singing, and persuaded his father to send him to Naples, as the only place where his musical propensity would receive proper cultivation. At the age of sixteen, he was accordingly sent there, with strong recommendations from several persons of consequence in Ireland, to Sir William Hamilton, the then British minister at the Court of Naples. Sir William took him under his fostering care, and he was placed in the Conservatorio of La Madonna della Loretto, where, for some time, he received instruction from the celebrated composer, Fenaroli. Sir William Hamilton also did Kelly the honor of introducing him to the King and Queen of Naples, who particularly noticed the young Irishman. Having had the good fortune to meet Aprile, the first singing master of his day, that great artist, being then under an engagement to go to Palermo, offered to take Kelly with him, and to give him gratuitous instruction while there. This proposal was, of course, gratefully accepted, and he received Aprile's valuable tuition until the end of his engagement at the theatre. Aprile's kindness, however, did not terminate there, for he sent Kelly to Leghorn, with the strong recommendation of being his favorite pupil. From Leghorn, young Michael was engaged at the Teatro Nuovo at Florence, as first tenor singer. He then visited Venice, and several of the principal theatres in Italy, in which he performed with distinguished success. He was next engaged at the court of Vienna, where he was much noticed by the Emperor Joseph II. He had likewise the good fortune to be the most intimate friend of Mozart, and was one of the original performers in his "Nozze di Figaro," the part of Basilio having been written for him.

Having obtained a year's leave of absence from the Emperor, for the purpose of visiting his father, (at the end of which time he was to go back to Vienna, where he was in such favor that he might have ended his days happily,) he returned to England by the same opportunity as Signora Storace. In April, 1787, Kelly made his first appearance in Drury Lane Theatre, in the character of Lionel, in the opera of "Lionel and Clarissa." Here he remained as first singer until he retired from the stage. He was also for several years musical director of that theatre. Kelly sang at the King's Ancient Concerts at Westminster Abbey, and at all the principal music meetings and theatres in Great Britain. He was, besides, for several years, principal tenor singer at the Italian Opera in the Haymarket, where he was stage manager.

The death of his dear and lamented friend, Stephen Storace, in the year 1797, first induced Kelly to become a composer, since which time he wrote and selected the following sixty pieces for the different theatres, by which it will appear that no English composer has ever contributed more largely to the public stock of amusement. It may be necessary to add that, in addition to the following list, Kelly has composed a great number of Italian and English songs, duets, trios, &c. &c., which retain their popularity: "A Friend in Need," 1797; "Chimney Corner," 1797; "Castle Spectre," 1797; "Last of the Family," 1797; "Blue Beard," 1798; "Captive of Spielberg," the comic music, the serious being by Dussek, 1798; "Aurelio and Miranda," 1798; "Federal Times," 1799; "Pizarro," 1799; "Of Age to-morrow," 1800; "De Montford," 1800; "Remorse," 1801;

"Gypsy Prince," 1801; "Adelmorn," 1801; "Algomah," 1802; "House to be sold," 1802; "Urania," 1802; "Hero of the North," 1803; "Marriage Promise," 1803; "Love laughs at Locksmiths," 1804; "Cinderella," 1804; "Counterfeits," 1804; "Deaf and Dumb," 1804; "Hunter of the Alps," 1804; "Land we live in," 1804; "Honeymoon," 1805; "Youth, Love, and Folly," 1805; "Prior Claim," 1805; "Forty Thieves," 1806; "We fly by Night," 1806; "Royal Oak," 1806; "Adrian and Orilla," 1806; "Adelgitha," 1807; "Town and Country," 1807; "Time's a Telltale," 1807; "Young Hussar," 1807; "Wood Demon," 1807; "Something to do," 1808; "Jew of Mogador," 1808; "Africans," 1808; "Venoni," 1808; "Foundling of the Forest," 1809; "Fall of the Taranto," 1809; "Britain's Jubilee," 1809; "Gustavus Vasa," 1810; "Humpo," 1812; "Absent Apothecary," 1813; "Polly," 1813; "Russian," 1813; "Nourjahad," 1813; "Peasant Boy," 1814; "Unknown Guest," 1815; "Bride of Abydos," 1818; "Abudah," 1819; "Grand Ballet," 1819.

Kelly died in 1825. He has left a most entertaining account of his own musical career, in a book published in London, in 1814, in two vols. 8vo., called "Musical Biography of Michael Kelly."

Lachner.

Franz Lachner, Maitre de Chapelle of the King of Bavaria, was born in 1804 at Krain, a little town of that kingdom, where his father was organist. From his earliest infancy he was instructed in music, and so rapid was his progress that it was soon necessary to think of giving him more skilful teachers. He was sent first to Nuremberg and then to Munich, where Winter became his master in composition. Winter dying before Lachner had completed his studies, he was placed under the direction of Eisenhofer, with whom he completed his musical education.—Already his learning was extensive in the theory and practice of his Art; nevertheless, believing that much yet remained for him to learn, he went to Vienna, where he hoped to find favorable opportunities for the development of his talent: he was not deceived in his expectations, for he soon formed friendships with the most distinguished artists of the Austrian capital, and especially with the Abbé Stadler, whose counsels were of much service to him. At this time he read with avidity all the best works extant on the theory, practice and æsthetics of his Art; his taste and judgment were formed from the best models; and finally, to the talent of a skilful executant on the organ, piano and violin, he added the merits of a great erudition. At a trial for the place of organist of the Evangelical Church of Vienna, he bore away the palm among thirty competitors; but he did not long retain the position, abandoning it in the following year for that of director of music at the theatre of the Porte de Carinthie. In 1834, he resigned the latter post for that of Maitre de Chapelle of the Ducal Court at Mannheim. He met with the most brilliant reception in this city where he celebrated his arrival by the execution of his third grand symphony. In 1835, a prize being offered at Vienna for the best symphony, Lachner composed one with the title Sinfonia Passionata, and handed it in to the jury who were to decide on the merits of the competitors. (This symphony was performed several seasons by our Musical Fund Society in Boston.) The first prize was awarded to him; M. Strauss, Maitre de Chapelle at Carlsruhe, obtaining the second. Lachner had no sooner completed his symphony than he received his appointment as Maitre de Chapelle to the King of Bavaria, and he departed to Munich, leaving to his brother his place of director of music at the Court of Mannheim.

Previous to Lachner's establishment at Munich, the greater part of his great compositions had been heard only in Vienna, where they enjoyed the greatest consideration. Among his principal works are: 1st. The four ages of man, oratorio: 2d. Moïse, idem; 3d. First Symphony for grand orchestra, in mi bémol; 4th. Second do. in fa; 5th. Third do.; 6th. Fourth do. (Sinfonia Passionata), which received the prize at Vienna. Among his lesser works are: 1st. Sonate pour piano et violoncelle, op. 14, Vienne, Mechetti; 2d. Grande Sonate pour piano à 4 mains, op. 20, Vienne, Leidesdorf; 3d. Premier nocturne à 4 mains sur des thèmes français, op. 12, Vienne, Pennauer; 4th. Deuxième idem sur des thèmes d'Oberon, op. 22; 5th. Des caprices et des marches à quatre mains, ibid; 6th. Deux grandes Sonates détachées pour piano seul, op. 25 et 27, Vienne, Pernauer et Mechetti; 7th. Rondeaux brillans pour le piano, op. 8 et 17, ibid; 8th. Introduction et variations brillantes sur un thème original, op. 15, ibid; 9th. Des recueils de chansons allemandes.

MUSIC AND FLOWERS.—Yes, two gifts God has bestowed upon us that have in themselves no guilty trait, and show an essential divineness. Music is one of these, which seems as though it were never born of earth, but lingers with us from the gates of heaven; Music, which breathes over the gross, or sad, or doubting heart, to inspire it with a consciousness of its most mysterious affinities, and to touch the chords of its undeveloped, unsuspected life. And the other gift is that of Flowers, which, though born of earth, we may well believe, if anything of earthly soil grows in the higher realm—if any of its methods are continued, if any of its forms are identical there, will live on the banks of the River of Life. Flowers! that in all our gladness, in all our sorrow, are never incongruous—always appropriate. Appropriate in the church, as expressive of its purest and most social themes, and blending their sweetness with the incense of prayer. Appropriate in the joy of the marriage-hour, in the loneliness of the sick-room, and crowning with prophecy the foreheads of the dead. They give completeness to the associations of childhood; and are appropriate even by the side of old age, strangely as their freshness contrasts with the wrinkles and the gray hairs; for still they are suggestive, they are symbolical of the soul's perpetual youth, the inward blossoming of immortality, the amarantine crown. In their presence we feel that when the body shall drop as a withered calyx, the soul shall go forth as a winged seed.—Rev. E. H. Chapin.

'THE DEVIL'S SONATA.'—A singular story respecting one of Tartini's most celebrated compositions is told on the authority of M. de Lande, chapel-master to Louis the Fourteenth: "One night, in the year 1713, he dreamt he had made a compact with the devil, and bound him to his service. In order to ascertain the musical abilities of his new associate, he gave him his violin, and desired him, as the first proof of his obedience, to play him a solo; which, to his great surprise, Satan executed with such surpassing sweetness, and in so masterly a manner, that, awaking in the ecstasy which it produced, he sprang out of bed, and instantly seizing his instrument, endeavoured to recall the delicious but fleeting sounds. Although not attended with the desired success, his efforts were yet so far effectual as to give rise to the piece since generally admired under the name of 'The Devil's Sonata.' Still the production was in his own estimation so inferior to that which he had heard in his sleep, as to cause him to declare that, could he have procured subsistence in any other line, he should have broken his violin in despair, and renounced music for ever!"

JOSQUIN DES PRÉS.

Josquin Des Prés, or Deprés, is enumerated by Guicciardini among the musicians of the Flemish school. He may justly be called the father of modern harmony, and the inventor of almost every ingenious contexture of its component parts, nearly a hundred years before the time of Palestrina, Orlando di Lasso, Tallis, or Bird, the great musical luminaries of the sixteenth century, whose names and works are still held in the highest reverence by all true judges of the genuine style of choral compositions. Adami, in his historical list of the singers in the pope's chapel, mentions Josquin as one of the greatest cultivators and supporters of church music. He calls him uomo insigne per l'invenzione. After quitting Italy, he was appointed chapel-master to Louis XII. of France, who reigned from 1498 to 1515, and it is scarcely probable that such an honor should have been conferred upon him till he had attained great eminence in his profession. He must have acquired the public favor, either by his works or performance, before he could be noticed by a sovereign; and it has been well observed, that it is as difficult for a prince to get at a man of merit, as it is for a man of merit to approach a prince. It appears that Josquin was an ecclesiastic; for it is related that when he was first admitted into the service of Louis, he had been promised a benefice by his majesty; but this excellent prince, contrary to his usual custom, (for he was in general both just and liberal,) forgot the promise he had made to his maestro di capella; when Josquin, after suffering great inconvenience from the shortness of the king's memory, ventured, by a singular expedient, to remind him publicly of his promise, without giving offence: for being commanded to compose a motet for the Chapel Royal, he chose part of the 119th psalm, "Memor esto verbi tui servo tuo;" "O think of thy servant as concerning thy word;" which he set in so exquisite and suppleting a manner, that it was universally admired, particularly by the king, who was not only charmed with the music, but felt the force of the words so effectually, that he soon after granted his petition by conferring on him the promised preferment: for which act of justice and munificence, Josquin, with equal felicity composed, as a hymn of gratitude, another part of the same psalm, "Bonitatem fecisti cum servo tuo, Domine;" "O Lord, thou hast dealt graciously with thy servant."

Josquin seems to have possessed a certain vein of wit and humor, in addition to a musical genius, of which Glareanus has given his readers several instances, besides those just related.

In consequence of the procrastination of the performance of Louis XII.'s promise relative to the benefice, Josquin applied to a nobleman in high favor at court, to use his interest in his behalf; who encouraging his hopes with protestations of zeal for his service, constantly ended with saying, "I shall take care of this business: let me alone;" laissez faire moi, (laissez moi faire;) when at length Josquin, tired of this vain and fruitless assurance, turned it into solmization, and composed an entire mass on these syllables of the hexachords, la, sol, fa, re, mi; which mass is among Josquin's productions in the British Museum, and is an admirable composition.

The following circumstance, which likewise happened during Josquin's residence at the court of France, has been recorded both by Glareanus and Mersennus. These writers inform us, that Louis, though music afforded him great pleasure, had so weak and inflexible a voice, that he never was able to sing a tune, and defied his maestro di capella to compose a piece of music in which it was possible for him to bear a part. However, the musician accepted the challenge, and composed a canon for two voices, to which he added two other parts, one of which had nothing more to do than to sustain a single sound, and the other only the key note and its fifth, to be sung alternately. Josquin gave his majesty the choice of these two parts, and, beginning with the long note, after some practice his royal scholar was enabled to continue it, as a drone to the canon, in spite of nature, who had never intended him for a singer.

Among musicians, Josquin was the giant of his age, and seems to have acquired a universal dominion over the affections and passions of the musical world. Indeed, his compositions were as well known and as much practised throughout Europe, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, as Handel's were in England. In the music book of Prince Henry, afterwards Henry VIII., which is preserved in the Pepys collection at Cambridge, there are several of his compositions; and we are told that Anne Boleyn, during her residence in France, had collected and learned a great number of them. In a very beautiful manuscript in the British Museum, consisting of French songs of the fifteenth century, in three and four parts, there are likewise many of Josquin's compositions. It is, perhaps, sufficient to observe, without enumerating the mere names of this great musician's professional contemporaries, either on the continent or in England, that they were every way inferior to him in talent, and that Josquin's fame has chiefly been acquired by his masses, and still more excellent motets; a large collection of which, perhaps the most valuable now extant, is preserved in the British Museum.

IMPRESSING MUSICIANS. In 1454, in the reign of Henry VI., it was so difficult to procure musicians, that the government found it necessary to impress them, as in later times they impressed seamen. Henry VIII. gave power to officers to impress children who had good voices, for the choirs of several cathedrals. In 1550, Edward VI. commissioned Philip Van Wilder to take, in any places within England, to the king's use, such and as many singing children, or choristers, as he or his deputy shall think good. The Queen Elizabeth, authorized Thomas Gyles, to take up such apt and meet children as are most fit to be instructed and framed in the art and science of music and singing, as may be had and found out within any place of England or Wales, to be by him educated and trained for service in the cathedral church of St. Paul.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXVII.

NEW YORK, Sept. 10.—Thinking over the conversations I have had with people at the West during the past summer upon music, I am struck with the often expressed desire for something in the way of music better, higher, nobler, than what my Western friends have been able to get or to hear. That pleasant evening at the Saint St. Marie comes up, and the breathless attention with which that little musical circle listened to my feeble attempts to give them some idea of the profound depths of expression, which mark not only the great masterpieces of Oratorio, Opera, Mass, and Orchestral Music, but works for the piano by such as Mendelssohn, Chopin, Weber, Beethoven, Hummel, and their like. One of the ladies then present touches the piano with a masterly hand; her execution is singularly fine, her expression admirable; she has from her earliest childhood studied the instrument with good instructors so far as the merely mechanical goes, and yet had never seen a Sonata! Waltzes, Quicksteps, &c., and arrangements from operas form her musical library. She felt that there must be something higher and nobler, and was delighted to hear that there was. Is there no way of satisfying this craving for good music? Must all who live without the limits of our cities be condemned to the miserable twopenny trash, which lies in piles on so many of our pianos?

There is more musical spirit and culture at the West than we are apt to think; but it is found here and there, too much scattered to produce the fruit it otherwise would. At Detroit there is a good deal of it. There are several very fine singers and pianists, and it is a mystery to me that a common love for the divine Art does not unite them. There is a better prospect for a "Handel and Haydn" Society there, if the musical people would unite, than there was in Boston in 1815. There is, I think, a Lyric Society there, but just what it is doing I am not informed.

I found a fine piano at one of the copper mines, Lake Superior, and it is not there as a mere piece of furniture either—which is encouraging. Our good Yankee people do carry with them their bibles, their psalm-books, their love for singing schools, and their pianos or fiddles, as the case may be, their good morals and their love for books and artistic enjoyment. God bless the Yankees! Where they settle in any numbers you may depend upon it music will in time take root and flourish.

Little musical societies are springing up all through the Lake States, and here and there is to be found a singer capable of a solo. Short cantatas are a commodity greatly wanted in the music market, fitted for such associations. African song-singing "families," and quartets with high sounding Greek names, who deliver platitudes and insipidities and whining sentimental bathos, are nuisances; but our Mrs. Bostwicks, Kate Hayeses, little Patts, &c., &c., are doing a good deal of good. I guess they will have good music out West some time or other—I should not like to speak slightly of some cities there now.

Sept. 23.—The Musical World translates an article by some German, in which the authenticity of "Beethoven's Studien" is called in question. That some portions of that work are transcripts from Fux and others has long been known—the fugue from Fux's "Gradus," for instance. I care not for that; but the charge, or insinuation that the thing was got up to sell, and is a fraud on the public by Toby Haslinger and von Seyfried, is too base and calumnious not to be noted.

Mark how plain a tale, &c.

Beethoven died March 26, 1827; soon afterward the proper committee was appointed by the court to take an inventory of the property left. In the very book under consideration the names of the committee, and of the persons invited to be present, are given; among them are Czerny, Pringer, Haslinger, Artaria, and Sauer,—all names known to students of German musical history. The inventory made under oath, is also given, and in this document, No. 149 reads, "Contrapunktische Aufsätze. 5 grosse Packets."

At the auction Haslinger purchased them, and four years after they appeared, edited by Seyfried. Unless we can suppose that Beethoven's strange chirography was not known to those who for thirty years had been in constant intercourse with him, and that all that bright galaxy of musicians at Vienna in 1832 were the most gullible of human beings—in short, unless we can believe in the most monstrous absurdities, we may rest assured that the Studien were Beethoven's lessons in the science of music while studying with Albrechtsberger.

No one supposes, who knows anything about it, that this is a regular work on the science of music by Beethoven. It is not; and has no value as such. It is, however, a most interesting publication, as it shows the course which he was forced to pursue in his studies, at a time when he had already become known as an author and was the pet of one half the Vienna cognoscenti as the great pianist of his day. How his spirit rebelled against the dry rules of Fux and Marpurg, &c., is sufficiently evinced by the sarcastic and humorous remarks which sprinkle the pages of the Studien.

Sept. 30.—Last night was Jullien's "Beethoven Night," and a noble bill was presented for the first part of the performance. The Lenore overture, with the difficult passage for the violins, and the trumpet behind the scenes; the allegretto from the 8th Symphony, that Haydnish movement, so full of the cheerfulness and good nature of Haydn; the exquisite Le Desir Waltz, instrumented; the song "Kennt du das Land," which Beethoven sang to Bettine in the "shrill voice;" and the superb C minor Symphony! I came away then!

Apollo! won't Dwight luxuriate when Jullien gets into the Music Hall! There has never been anything like his leading in this country, or like his orchestra. Such tones from the brass and wood, such a body to the strings, such time, such crescendos, diminuendos, pianos and fortes!

There were some new readings in the symphony. The pauses and rests made longer than usual, the allegros taken slower. The result was a clearness and impressiveness quite new. The Hall was perhaps two-thirds full! The Boston folks will appreciate him better—I hope.

Some days after the first performance of the "Messiah," Handel went to pay his respects to Lord Kinnoul, who complimented him on the noble entertainment which he had lately given to the town. "My lord," said Handel, "I should be sorry if I only entertained them; I wish to make them better."

Psalmody.

When the "notions" of our excellent correspondent, "H. T." appeared in our paper of the week before last, we happened to be away among the mountains, listening to the great, solemn, cheerful psalm of nature, which forever sounds about the grey or snow-clad summits of Mount Washington and his great brothers, with a sublimity of never-ending fugue beyond the possibility of all "arrangement" or "adaptation" to the Procrustes measure of our Yankee psalm-book makers. Not the less pleased were we to read our friend's remarks, and it is with pleasure that we now return to them. We thank him for doing us the justice to "suppose that we would let him speak in a way that might not suit our notions;" but then his "notions," as just now stated, do suit our's much better than he seems to imagine. In fact there is scarcely a sentiment expressed in the letter of "H. T." with which we do not harmonize, and not one which we are prepared positively to contravene. His opening general statement, to be sure, that "music does not express any sentiments that cannot be defined in words," is one whose accuracy we entertain some doubt about. But this is a metaphysical and speculative question and not vital to the point on which we seem to be at issue.

Our friend mistakes the point of our objection to the Psalmody business. We say psalmody business, because it is not to Psalmody in itself, as a legitimate and valuable form of sacred musical art, that we have ever objected; but it is to that great business done in psalmody by hosts of quasi musical adventurers in this country;—peddling swarms who trade upon the musical ignorance of the people, multiplying indifferent copies of a certain article quite extravagantly beyond the natural need therefor, and manufacturing the demand that they may have the privilege and profit of also manufacturing the supply. "Psalm tunes are worth attending to;" that we have never doubted. But what psalm tunes? how many of them? and with what kind and degree of attention? It is enough for us to say now that we insist on some discrimination and some limit (and so does "H. T." if we understand him); we shall return to it again.

What we object to is this indefinite and fearful multiplication of psalm tunes and "Collections." We are drugged with the article. It has become a trade, much more than it is an Art. Psalmody as an Art, psalmody as a work of earnest, original, inspired invention or creation, is in the nature of the case very limited. The short and simple type does not admit of indefinite multiplication of copies, without loss of every vital characteristic. It becomes a mere mechanical exercise in the grammar, but without the soul, of music. Now of the sincerest advocates of psalmody we complain, not that they are not interested in a noble and religious work, but that they over-estimate the importance of plain psalm-singing as compared with other forms of sacred music. Real, genuine, inspired psalmody, the old Gregorian and Lutheran chorals, for instance, and many of the beautiful quartet pieces for small choirs, that have maintained their place so long in the affections both of musicians and of uncultivated worshippers, are good, are a part of our best musical treasure. The form is legitimate; but then it is only one form among many; and the attempt to multiply an infinite number of varieties of this one form robs it of all its virtue, and dilutes it into a wishy-washy formalism. A good psalm, or choral, an "Old Hundred," for instance, is a good and grand thing; but the production of one such is also a rare thing in the ages,—as rare as the creation of a true and inspired little poem. What should we think if volume after volume of new collections of ephemeral magazine poetry, by all our swarms of little poetasters, were given to be read through as class books to the children in our schools, just as the new collections of psalmody are put upon all the choirs and singing schools throughout the land? Would taste for the beautiful, or earnestness of mind, or deep and pious tone of life, be much increased thereby? Now this, we fear, is what these many great Yankee psalm-book manufacturing factories are doing.

We agree with our friend, that "we need sacred music as well as secular;" although we recognize a sacredness in all earnest, deep, true Art. We too insist on a distinction. A waltz, a quickstep, a negro melody or operatic bravura aria in a religious service is the height of impious absurdity. Our friend himself complains that "in some churches we find them forsaking the old choral tunes and graceful airs of our fathers, to introduce insipid or harsh things of living Bostonians." This is but the echo of our own complaint. Again: "In others we find hired singers flourishing and making a display of their voices in opera airs, fixed over for church occasions." This he thinks the greater evil of the two; and "this," it seems, "is the horror of foreign music," which we are said to laugh at. If this be it, well may we laugh at it; for who are the arrangers and fixers up of opera airs for church occasions? who are the chief sinners and authors of this sort of abominations? Who but the native psalm-book makers, who ransack all the operas and classics of the Art, to find bits of melody and harmony, which they may cut and mould and twist into the shape of psalm-tunes to fill out their "Collections," and to persuade the ignorant public that they are spreading all the riches of Mozart and Beethoven, or (what is more often to their purpose) of Rossini, Donizetti and Verdi, before their prurient appetites for musical novelties? We mean by the "foreign music," which we defend, the real music of good masters, in its original and lawful form, unaltered, uncurtailed, and unarranged by sacrilegious hands into New England "parcels to suit purchasers." We like a Mass, a Gloria, a Benedictus, a Motet, a Hymn of Palestrina, Mozart, Mendelssohn, &c., in its original, unaltered form; but our psalm-book makers give you Batti, batti, Zerlina's sweet, coquetish melody, "fixed" into a psalm-tune, and tell you that you hold in your hands a new and altogether transcendent collection of sacred music, much of which is by the great masters, such as Mozart!

In conclusion we have only room now to say that we do not wish to be understood as "shaking our sides over the whole tribe of psalm-singers," as if no good could come out of Nazareth; that we do not condemn or laugh without discrimination, as if all who make or collect psalm-tunes were necessarily guilty of "the unpardonable sin;" that we share in our friend's respect for Zeuner's "Ancient Lyre," to which favorable allusion has been more than once made in these columns; and that we mean soon to sketch out our own ideal of what we think might be a good system of church music, in which the choral, or plain psalm, in all its simplicity and with its time-hallowed associations should bear its part.

How they Review Music in Germany.

We have been often called severe in our notices of new pieces, variations, arrangements, &c., by our young native or naturalized composers: but what would the sensitive gentlemen think if we made them the subjects of such frank, unmincing criticism as their betters often get in the Leipsie Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, the most severe and at the same time most interesting of musical journals; the most respected, too, and in the long run most affectionately regarded by musicians, because it is sincere and makes it a point of conscience not to praise anything and everything out of a lazy abundance of good nature and smooth flow of words! Here is a specimen, which we translate:

C. REBBELING. Op. 2. Valse brillante. Pièce de Salon pour le Piano. Magdeburg, &c.

The composer has proposed to write a saloon piece, and chose therefor the form which C. M. von Weber has used in his "Invitation to the Dance." But he seems to have found such great contentment in the Weber composition, that he has not only slavishly imitated the form even to the number of bars, but has even found it impossible to get away from the melodies of the "Invitation," and has imitated them more or less . . . The result of it is a forlorn twin sister to the work of Weber, bearing about the same relation to this that a cretin bears to the Medicean Venus, or the ourang-outang to a man, which former animal, tradition says, the devil fabricated, to parody God's work.

We know not who C. Rebelling is; but why should not the honest truth be told him and the music-buying public? Such little reviews the Zeitschrift gives us under the generic head of Unterhaltungs-Musik, Modeartikel, which may be rendered: "Amusement Music, the fashionable article,"—a very proper rubric for such dilettante songs, variations, fantasies and polkas as the throng of modern virtuosos write, and one which covers the entire publication business of most of our American music shops. Here is another specimen:

L. DAMES. Op. 7. Songs for Soprano or Tenor, with pianoforte accompaniment. Magdeburg, &c., &c.

These songs stand little or not at all above the ordinary day-and-fashion-products, with which the music market is overflowed year by year. What the composer says, has all been said in a much better manner before; the text-distortions, false declamations, long-winded text-repetitions, &c., we have often heard already, and, in spite of the most energetic war upon such nonsense, it is always, as the publication figure shows, in great demand. We wish that the composer, who evinces a certain skill in the treatment of the voice part, might, after earnest study of good models, quit the path he has here entered and strike into a better direction.

C. WISENEDER. Op. 17. Three Poems for an Alto or Baritone voice, with piano, &c.

Three very dilettantish and very nothing-saying insignificances—and already opus seventeen! The case is quite beyond criticism.

The frequency of such notices in the weekly list of the Zeitschrift proves that Germany too, musical, spiritual, deep-souled Germany, has her full proportion of feeble, vain and insignificant composers; nay, and in spite of her Schubert, her Mendelssohn, her Robert Schumann and Robert Franz, large hosts of fifth and tenth-rate song composers—a fact which it behoves our well-meaning publishers of "Gems of German Song," and our concert lieder-singers, carefully to bear in mind. But these critiques are not all nor generally of this pungent quality; credit and encouragement are also gracefully and generously given, while each new work is brought up to the truest standard in its kind and measured; and we find abundant recognition of good and wholesome products, even when they happen to be, as in the following case, from the despised soil of Italy:

G. MAGAZZARI. Serate romane. Album vocale di sei pezzi da camera per canto con accomp. di Pianoforte. German translation by J. C. Grünbaum. Vienna.

These songs are genuine Italian, and although kept quite easy, yet on account of their national coloring not uninteresting. The tender and melodious predominate, the centre of gravity lies in the voice part, the accompaniment is entirely a secondary matter; yet they are far removed from the fade and outrée manner of the latest Italian opera. Sung with the Italian lifeness and with the original text—not with the somewhat clumsy German—these songs will not fail of their designed effect. Those taken from the mouth of the Roman people, as for instance the canzone I Moccioletti di Roma, seem to show that the Italian people itself is still always more productive and more musically sound, than its so-called Maestri, who control the theatres.

A work by so important a name as Littloff is thus characterized:

H. LITTOFF. Op. 79. Tarantelle infernale. Grande étude de vélocité pour le Piano. Magdeburg.

Performed by a clever pianist, this Tarantella will not fail of its effect. It is vivaciously, skillfully and tastefully put together; but then only put together, since one finds nothing new in it. It partly reminds you of other similar pieces of music, above all of the Tarantella in the Muette di Portici, which in originality and musical value far surpasses this imitation and indeed may pass for a model of this species of dance.

So much for the present. These were gleanings from a single number. We propose from time to time, by means of the Zeitschrift and other foreign sources, to keep our readers somewhat informed of the new publications and new fashions in the European music market.

WELCOME BACK!—We have had frequent inquiries during the summer past about our "Diarist." Where is he? And: "We trust he has not ceased to diarize." A very pleasant feature in our paper has undoubtedly been missed. But to-day, to the satisfaction of our readers and ourselves, our friend appears again and answers for himself. Early in June, half fagged out with the midnight labors of a great newspaper office in New York, the Diarist sought health and strength in wholesome travel and adventure, and joined a geological expedition to the copper mines of Lake Superior. The first extract from his diary to-day proves that he has looked after the musical as well as the mineral resources of that region. Music and Beethoven lie still at the very heart of his being, not to be rooted out or paralyzed, and out of that heart he will still speak to us in his own quaint, instructive way.

The N. E. School of Design.

MR. DWIGHT.—Dear Sir:—In an article on the Mechanics' Exhibition, in a late number of your paper, you speak of certain drawings and designs in a way which has led many to infer that they are the production of the pupils of the "New England School of Design for Women." We are anxious to correct this impression. The designs referred to are from a private school, by a gentleman and his pupils who have no connection whatever with this school. The "New England School of Design for Women," which is the School kept for two years past in Thorndike's Building, Summer street, and which was incorporated by our last Legislature, sent nothing whatever to the Exhibition. Their reasons for not doing so seemed satisfactory to the Committee, but any one who is interested in their work can see specimens of it at the School room.

We are happy to learn that this School opens this third year of its establishment under very favorable auspices—several of its former pupils are earning their living by the practice of the branches taught in it, and others of great talent are preparing for similar situations. One of the pupils lately received a diploma at the Dedham County Fair, and almost immediately after, obtained a very desirable situation for work. It seems to be slowly but surely winning its way to public confidence and success. E.

We cheerfully give place to the above, since we know the "New England School of Design for Women" too well, and esteem it too highly to wish to have it confounded with any other institution. The article on the Mechanics' Fair was written in our absence, and our friend who kindly occupied the editorial chair for us, had certainly no intention of attributing the specimens which he saw at the Fair to the New England School. It was simply from inadvertence that he omitted to mention that the School alluded to was Mr. Whitaker's.

MISS HOSMER'S PROGRESS.—A correspondent of the Home Journal writes from Rome, where the young sculptress continues to reside:

"You will be pleased to learn that Miss Hosmer is getting on bravely—I presume, exceeding the expectations of most of her friends at home. She very wisely placed herself under Mr. Gibson's tuition, and is pursuing her studies in the most thorough and judicious manner. Mr. Gibson is very fond of her, and very proud of her, and I, for one, as an American am proud of her, too, she certainly has talent of a high order; and if she should prove to have physical strength adequate to the demands of an arduous profession, she will surely attain to great eminence. Since her arrival in Rome, Gibson has kept her, until quite recently, closely studying and copying from the antique. One of the most exquisite bits of modelling I have seen for many a day was her copy—not a servile copy, for it was twice the size of the original)—of a celebrated torso of Venus. At this time she is engaged upon an ideal head, working out her conception of Daphne. It promises to be very lovely, as well as artistic, in its composition, and in its forms true to the most beautiful nature. Our mutual friend, Crawford, is progressing rapidly with his mammoth horse and rider, and, to my taste and feeling, he is doing the thing quite successfully. There can be no doubt that his Richmond Monument will be one of the grandest and noblest of modern works. It must place him, as an artist, in a very high position."

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—Mr. AUGUST FRIES arrived in the last steamer from Europe, accompanied by Mr. KREBS, who takes the place vacated by Mr. Lehmann. The Club will soon be ready to take the field, we doubt not, with undiminished popularity and success.

"MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY."—This is the name of a new Society just formed in this city under very gratifying auspices. It already numbers some 125 members, with the following organization: President, B. F. Edmands; Vice President, Geo. Kurtz; Secretary, M. N. Boyden; Assistant Secretary, I. D. Brewer; Treasurer, R. Kemp; Librarian, W. L. Elliot; Directors, S. A. Stetson, S. B. Ball, H. Hitchings, J. D. W. Joy, W. L. Brown, W. E. Durant, Thos. H. Chandler.

The Society will commence rehearsals at Cochituate Hall on Monday evening, October 10th, and as soon as Mr. CARL BERGMANN arrives in town, he will take his place as teacher and conductor.

It is the intention to give the "Messiah" on Christmas night, with the assistance of the "Germania Society."

NEW PIANOFORTE WAREROOM. Bostonians, who are familiar with some twenty or thirty pianoforte warehouses in the southern section of the city, will come at once to the conclusion that there is nothing new or novel in our caption, but this is not so. It will be seen by a card in our advertising columns, that our fellow citizen, Mr. JONAS CHICKERING, whose fame as a manufacturer of pianofortes is world wide, and whose old and extensive establishment on Washington street was totally destroyed by fire about a year since, has taken the Masonic Temple, Tremont street, and converted it into a splendid, spacious, convenient and elegant mart for the sale of his celebrated instruments.

He has expended upwards of $3000 to effect the change, and the work reflects lasting credit on his good taste in the detail. The old Temple is now a modern Temple, hereafter to be devoted to musical purposes. Persons most familiar with the locality, will hardly recognize it in its present condition. On entering the front door, a wide and spacious stairway leads directly up in front, landing near the centre of the old hall. Over this stairway is a ceiling in oak panel work. Over the entrance way is a business office, with small private rooms to the right and left. Still higher (the locality of the old gallery) is the private room of Mr. Chickering, where the immense operations of his whole establishment will be originated, for the hands of his numerous artisans. From this point he has a view, from oval port-holes, of his entire suite of rooms. On the right and left of the stairway are two splendid drawing rooms, each 23 by 23, carpeted, and the walls covered with a beautiful satin paper, and otherwise furnished and fitted in excellent good taste.

At the head of the great stairway, two ponderous doors open into the great wareroom, which is 60 by 40 feet in dimensions. The floor is covered with a neat Brussels carpet; the long windows upholstered with heavy green damask curtains, fringed; the walls covered with a rich and elegant gold and satin finished paper, in large panels, with pilasters between each panel, on which there are figures emblematic of astronomy, architecture, sculpture, painting, music, &c., with a gothic arch from pilaster to pilaster, formed of flowers in gay tints, true to nature, lying in masses. Over this is a broad frieze, entirely around the hall on which there are a mass of figures emblematic of all the arts; the whole combined is chaste and elegant. This paper was manufactured in Paris, and imported expressly for this room. The whole suite of rooms are to be lighted with gas from chandeliers. The finish throughout is in the gothic style, and in keeping with the external architecture of the building.

This is a model establishment, and the most splendid in the country for a similar purpose. It must be seen to be duly appreciated, and after to-day the numerous friends and patrons of Mr. C. will have an opportunity to see it in perfection. The site is one of the most desirable that could be found, being remote from the noise of Tremont street, with a southern aspect on Temple Place, which is a private way, and little frequented by carriages.

The reputation which Mr. Chickering has earned, as a manufacturer, needs no praise from us. An experience of thirty years of uninterrupted labor and trial in one vocation, has enabled him to reach as near perfection in his beautiful art, as is possible for one mind to achieve. The extensive sale of his instruments throughout the broad extent of this country, in England, France, the Continent, the East and West Indies, fully attests to this fact.

Mr. Chickering's establishment has always been the head quarters for musical intelligence, and all artists of celebrity seek his presence on arrival in the metropolis, where a warm and friendly reception is sure to greet them.

We congratulate Mr. Chickering on his future prospects in his new Temple. Long may he preside over it, which we venture to assert, will meet with a hearty response from his hosts of friends.—Transcript, Oct. 4.

JONAS CHICKERING, PIANO-FORTE MANUFACTURER, MASONIC TEMPLE, Tremont Street,

HAVING removed from his former location in Washington Street, and fitted up Warerooms in the above named beautiful building, is now prepared to attend upon such of his friends and the public as may honor him with a call. His time for the past six months having been exclusively devoted in endeavors to render his manufacture more perfect than ever, he is confident of being able to fully satisfy all who are desirous of possessing a good instrument.

Residents in the vicinity and adjacent States will please notice particularly his address, as there is another person in this city bearing his name, and with whom he is frequently confounded.

Mr. C. flatters himself that his experience and reputation of thirty years, must convince all who anticipate purchasing, that this is the best testimonial that he can offer of the excellence of his Pianos, and of the satisfaction which has invariably been manifested with regard to all the qualities which constitute an unexceptionable instrument.

John Bunyan's Immortal Allegory.

Probably no Book, save the Bible, has been so extensively read as Bunyan's Immortal Allegory,

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

It has been translated into nearly all the different languages of Christendom, and been perused with delight and holy fervor by all nations. Art has lent her attractions in nearly all the forms of illustration, from the rough Wood Cut to the exquisite Steel Engraving. But to the middle of the nineteenth century, and to an American Clergyman, are we indebted for the only true pictorial conception of this immortal work.

The novel and sublime idea of embodying the ENTIRE STORY, and transferring the same to a SINGLE PICTURE, showing the wanderings of Christian from the "City of Destruction" to the "Celestial City," presenting at one view to the eye the varied scenes through which he passed, originated with DANIEL WIGHT, of Massachusetts. His truly original and beautiful conception was reduced to a most elegant design by HAMMATT BILLINGS, and from this design, JOSEPH ANDREWS, the distinguished historical engraver, has produced, after four years of labor, a Picture which will take rank among the most superb and elaborate productions of human genius, taste, and skill.

The Picture is now ready, and will be offered for sale at the Bookstore of the Publishers, and by Agents duly authorized by the Publishers.

GRAND MUSICAL FESTIVAL,

IN THE SPLENDID

New Hall of the Tremont Temple!

THE undersigned, resident artists, respectfully announce to the Citizens of Boston and Vicinity, that they will give a

GRAND VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL CONCERT,

On Saturday Evening, Oct. 15th,

In the beautiful Hall of the Tremont Temple, on which occasion will be performed: Hummel's famous Septuor in D minor, for piano, flute, oboe, horn, &c.; a Quartet for French Horns; a Fantasia for Piano, with orchestral accompaniment, assisted by the best artists of the city. Miss MARY ELINA CURRAN, a very promising Vocalist, will make her first appearance, and sing some fine ballads of Schubert, Mendelssohn, &c. Miss MARY SAUL, a wonderful Pianist, nine years of age, will perform a Duo-Sonata by Mozart, with Mr. PERABEAU, and also a Solo from the "Child of the Regiment."

Our subscribers to the Classical Matinées will please use their tickets for this Festival; and we pledge ourselves hereby that our Subscription Concerts will be in no way inferior to this one. Professors are respectfully invited to get their tickets at T. T. Barker's music store.

☞ Tickets 50 cents each, to be had at the usual places. Subscription lists to our Classical Matinées will be found at the different music stores; $3 for the whole series of Eight Concerts.

RESPECTFULLY inform their friends that Circulars respecting their Concerts and Rehearsals will be issued on the arrival of AUGUST FRIES from Europe, who is expected about the 28th September. Arrangements have been made with an excellent artist from Leipzig to take the place of Wm. Lehmann in the approaching season. Their repertoire will be found complete, by the addition of many new, standard works. Sept. 24.

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY.

GRAND CONCERTS! The GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY respectfully announce to their friends and the public of Boston and vicinity, that they give a Series of TEN GRAND CONCERTS, at the

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

Commencing on SATURDAY EVENING, October 22d, and continued every other Saturday Evening.

The ORCHESTRA will be increased by the addition of many of the best artists in the country, thereby enabling the Society to produce the elaborate compositions of the great masters with better effect than heretofore. No expense will be spared to render the Orchestra complete in every department.

☞ The best available talent, vocal and instrumental, will be engaged during the season, to render the series of Concerts equal in point of brilliancy and attraction to any ever given in Boston.

☞ In order to prevent the confusion and disappointment experienced upon the unusual demand for tickets last season, ONLY A LIMITED NUMBER of subscription tickets will be issued "SUBSCRIBERS' TICKETS." A package of thirty tickets to be used at pleasure, $10; half packages, containing fifteen tickets, $5. Subscription papers are now open at all the Music Stores and principal Hotels. The issue of tickets will commence at Wade's Music Store on the 8th of October. Sept. 17. tf

CLASSICAL MATINÉES.

THE undersigned, resident artists of Boston, intend to give a Series of Classical Concerts during next winter, in which the best works of the great composers will be performed; such as Quartets, Quintets, Septets, Trios, Duos and Solos, by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Hummel, Weber, Cherubini, etc. The programme will be made more attractive by Vocal performances between the different pieces, as also Solos for Horn, Violoncello, Piano, Violin, etc., occasionally. Many greater compositions, as, Quartets, Quintets, and Septets for Piano with String and Wind instruments, will be produced, which have never been publicly performed in Boston. To accommodate Ladies and others out of town, we propose to give our Concerts in the afternoon. The time and place will be announced hereafter. The subscription is $3 for the Series of Eight Concerts. Single tickets 50 cents each.

Subscription lists will be found at the different Music Stores.

Hummel, and his Works.

Johann Nepomuk Hummel, the great composer and pianist, was born at Presburg on the 14th of November, 1778, where his father was music-master in the military school of Wartberg. At the age of four he learned to play the violin, but without evincing a decided bias for music. The next year he began to take lessons in singing and on the piano; from that time his faculties were rapidly developed: in a single year he acquired remarkable skill for a child. At this period, his father removed with him to Vienna, and became chef-d'orchestre in Schikaneder's theatre, when the little Hummel, scarcely seven years old, attracted the attention of Mozart and the other distinguished artists. Mozart, in spite of his repugnance to giving lessons, offered to take charge of the boy's musical education, provided he would live with him, and be always near him. Of course the proposition was gratefully accepted. With such a master, the boy made prodigious progress in two years. At nine, he excited the admiration of all who heard him.

His father then thought to turn his precocious talent to account, and they travelled together through Germany, Denmark, Scotland. His first public appearance was in a concert at Dresden, 1787; next he played before the court at Cassel. At Edinburgh the child pianist created great enthusiasm; there he published his first work, a theme with variations, dedicated to the Queen of England. After spending the years 1791 and 1792 in London, he visited Holland, and returned to Vienna after six years' absence.

He was then fifteen years old, and his execution could already be considered the most correct and brilliant of the German school; meanwhile his studies became more serious than before. His father, who was excessively severe, exacted incessant labor from him; and when he had become a man and famous artist, he was still subject to his will. At Vienna he studied harmony, accompaniment and counterpoint with Albrechtsberger, and formed a friendship with Salieri, who gave him useful hints about singing and the dramatic style. In 1803 he entered the service of Prince Esterhazy, and composed his first mass, which won the approbation of Haydn. About the same time, he wrote ballets and operas for the theatres of Vienna, which were favorably received. Hummel was now twenty-eight years old; his works, especially his instrumental music, and his fine talent for execution, had rendered him famous in Germany; but his name was absolutely unknown in France, until the year 1806, when Cherubini carried home from Vienna his grand fantasia in E flat, (Op. 18.) which was executed at the concerts of the Conservatory that same year, and, although only understood by artists, it so raised his reputation in Paris that all the pianists sought his works.

In 1811 Hummel left the service of Prince Esterhazy, and until 1816 had no other employment than that of professor of the piano, at Vienna. Then for four years he held the place of chapel-master to the King of Wurtemberg, and then entered the service of the Grand Duke of Weimar, in the same capacity. Two years afterwards he obtained leave of absence to make a pedestrian tour in Russia. St. Petersburg and Moscow gave him the most brilliant reception. In 1823 he went through Holland and Belgium, and finally to Paris, where his success was worthy of his talent. His improvisations on the piano excited the liveliest admiration. Returning to Weimar, he did not leave that place until 1827, when he heard of the approaching end of Beethoven, between whom and himself there had been some unpleasant differences. He hastened to the bedside of the dying artist, and could not repress his tears; Beethoven reached out his hand to him, they embraced, and all was forgotten.

Two years afterwards Hummel again visited Paris and London; but his playing did not produce the same sensation as before; pianists noticed the approach of age and a certain timidity of execution in his performance. After a journey to Poland, he passed the remainder of his days peacefully at Weimar. He died on the 17th of October, 1827, at the age of fifty-nine.

Hummel was equally distinguished as a performer, (on the piano,) an improvisator, and a composer. In execution, continuing the mixed school of Mozart, improved by the regular principles of mechanism which he learned of Clementi during his two years in London, he became himself the founder of a new German school, in which many celebrated artists have been formed. The epoch of Hummel among the German pianists was a real epoch of progress and of transformation. Greater difficulties have been conquered, greater power and severity of tone have been produced in piano playing since his time; but no one has gone beyond him in purity, regularity, and correctness of execution, in raciness of touch, in coloring and expression. His execution was less the result of a desire to display prodigious skill, than the attempt to express a thought continually musical. This thought, always complete, manifested itself under his hands with all the advantages of grace, delicacy, depth, and expression.

In his improvisations, Hummel had such power of fixing and giving regular form to his fugitive ideas and inspirations, that he seemed to be executing premeditated compositions. And yet there was nothing cold or mechanical about it; the ideas were so felicitous, the manner so charming, the details so elegant, that his audience was lost in admiration.

Hummel's very remarkable productions, especially in the sphere of instrumental composition, have placed him in the first rank of distinguished composers of the nineteenth century; doubtless, his fame would have been still greater, had he not been the contemporary of Beethoven. The general opinion has hardly estimated his best works highly enough. His great septuor in D minor, (Op. 74;) his quintet for piano, (Op. 87;) his concerto in A minor, (Op. 85,) in B minor, (Op.

89,) in E major, (Op. 110,) and in A flat, (Op. 113;) some of his trios for piano, violin, and violoncello; and the grand sonata for piano with four hands, (Op. 92,) are works of a finished beauty, where all the qualities of the art of writing are united with noble or with elegant and graceful thoughts. But these qualities, beautiful and estimable as they are, cannot compete against those outbursts of genius, those original and overpowering conceptions of Beethoven. A fine composition of Hummel leaves in the mind the idea of perfection; but the pleasure which it causes never amounts to frenzy. Had Beethoven come a quarter of a century later, he would have left to Hummel the undisputed glory of being the first instrumental composer of his age. In the dramatic style and in church music, Hummel also holds a high rank, though his works in these departments are not marked by any very distinctive quality.

The works of this celebrated artist may be classed as follows:—

I. Dramatic Music.—1. "Le Vicende d'Amore," opera buffa in two acts. 2. "Mathilde de Guise," opera in three acts. 3. "Das Haus ist zu verkaufen," in one act. 4. "Die Rückfahrt des Kaisers," in one act. 5. "Eloge de l'Amitié," cantata with choruses. 6. "Diana ed Endimione," an Italian cantata with orchestra. 7. "Hélène et Paris," ballet. 8. "Soppho de Mytilène," ditto. 9. "Le Tableau parlant," ditto. 10. "L'Anneau Magique," pantomime, with singing and dances. 11. "Le Combat Magique," ditto.

II. Church Music.—1. Mass for 4 voices, with orchestra and organ, in B flat, (Op. 77.) 2. Second Mass in B flat, (Op. 80.) 3. Third Mass, in D, (Op. 111.) 4. Gradual, (Quodquid in orbe), for 4 voices, orchestra and organ, (Op. 88.) 5. Offertory, (Alma Virgo), for soprano solo, chorus, orchestra, and organ, (Op. 89.)

III. Instrumental Music.—1. Overture for grand orchestra, in B flat, (Op. 101.) 2. Three string quartets, (Op. 30.) 3. and 4. Grand Sereuade, for piano, violin, guitar, clarinet, and bassoon, Nos. I. and II. (Op. 63 and 66.) 5. Grand Septuor, in D minor, for piano, flute, oboe, horn, alto, violoncello, and double bass, (Op. 87.) 7. Grand Military Septuor, in C, for piano, flute, violin, clarinet, trumpet, and double bass, (Op. 114.) 8. Symphony Concertante, for piano and violin, (Op. 17.) 9. Concerto for piano, in C, (Op. 34.) 10. Easy Concerto for piano, in G, (Op. 73.) 11. Third Concerto in A minor, (Op. 85.) 12. Fourth Concerto, in B minor, (Op. 89.) 13. "Les Adieux," Fifth Concerto in E major, (Op. 110.) 14. Sixth Concerto in A flat, (Op. 113.) 15. Brilliant Rondos for piano and orchestra, (Op. 56, 98, and 117.) 16. Themes Variés for piano and orchestra, (Op. 97, 115.) 17. "Le Cor enchanté d'Obéron," grand fantasia for piano and orchestra, in E major, (Op. 116.) 18. Trios for piano, violin, and violoncello, (Op. 12, 22, 35, 95, 83, 93, 66.) 19. Sonatas for piano and violin, (Op. 5, 19, 25, 28, 37, 50, 64, 104.) 20. Sonatas for piano with 4 hands, (Op. 43, 92, 99.) 21. Sonatas for piano alone, (Op. 13, 20, 36, 81, 106.) 22. Detached pieces for piano solo, viz.: 3 Fugues, (Op. 7;) Rondos, (Op. 11, 19, 107, 109;) fantasias, (Op. 18, 123, 124;) Etudes and Caprices, (Op. 49, 67, 105, 125;) Variations, (Op. 1, 2, 8, 9, 40, 57, 118, 119, &c.) 23. Complete Method, theoretic and practical, for the piano.

Chest-voice. A voice which comes from the chest, and which, if properly cultivated, brings a great deal into it. Tenors, possessing chest-voices, with real C's at the end of them, are gradually becoming extinct; and tenors with voce di testa, or voices which are detestable, are rising on all sides, to the terror of civilized Europe. The Emperor of Russia used to be the chief speculator in tenors, but America has now come into the market, and threatens to outbid him completely. If the present demand for genuine tenors continues long in America and Russia, their value will become so enormous that England and France will not be able to afford anything more expensive than basses, and an occasional baritone. We believe that the terms on which Mario has been engaged to sing in America are as follows:

1. A salary of 20,000 a year; being twice the amount received by the President of the United States.

2. Half the receipts for three nights in the week, and a clear benefit on the other three nights.

3. Certificates of bronchitis, inflammation of the larynx, and other vocal disorders, to be at his command, whenever he feels indisposed—to appear on the stage.

4. The manager to receive him at the door of the theatre, walking backwards, and holding four wax-candles in each hand.

Chorus. A musical composition written for many voices; also the proprietors of the voices for which the said musical composition is written. The chorus is principally employed in operas for the following purposes:

1. To congratulate the proprietor of a village on his return to his birth-place. Choruses of this description may be said to belong to the "Hail, happy-day" school, and will be found to be written more or less upon the model of the subjoined specimen:

Hail, happy day!
Happy day! Happy day! Happy day!
Hail, happy day!
Let's be gay! Let's be gay! Let's be gay!

2. To celebrate the triumph of a monarch. The raw materials for this species of chorus is, "Long live the King!" to which the obligato rhyme is of course "sing."

3. To celebrate the downfall of a monarch—"Down with the Tyrant," &c.)

4. To make a vivâ voce declaration of war against the inhabitants of some neighboring kingdom, none of whom are present at the time of the declaration being made. The most remarkable thing about a chorus of this description is, that the singers generally deliver it in the same attitude as that in which they congratulate the proprietor of the village on his return to his birth-place.

At some minor theatres the chorus and ballet consist of the same persons. It has hitherto been impossible for us to find out whether these persons are singers who have not yet learned to dance, or dancers who have not been taught how to sing.

Contralto.—In operas, a woman who has a man's voice; in cathedral choirs, a man who has a woman's.

Cornet.—A junior officer in an orchestra,—we beg pardon: we mean a tenor wind instrument in a cavalry regiment.

Critic. A gentleman, or other person, assuming the office of judge, and taking particular delight in summing up against the public, who, in most musical trials, should be allowed to play the part of jury. Critics of music are remarkable for their fondness for technical terms, and are supposed to be great admirers of all musical dictionaries (excepting, of course, the present one.) Some criticisms of music are so full of notes, keys, chords, and modulations, that one might imagine they were written with a clarinet, or the how of a violin, and that they were intended not to be read, but to be played on the dulcimer, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of musical instruments. It is pretended that the great object of musical critics, in introducing a superfluity of musical expressions, is to render their articles unintelligible to the "general public." It would be sufficient, however, for them to endeavor to write English correctly, in order to attain that desirable object with the greatest certainty. We have seen some criticisms so full of "stringed instruments," "the wood," "the brass," "instruments of percussion," "massive orchestration," "phrases for the oboe," "passages for the corni di bassetto," and all sorts of other uninteresting and frequently unmeaning details, that to look at the newspaper which contained them was sufficient to give one the headache. Musical criticisms are generally full of "sonnd," sometimes of "fury;" always, we may add, "signifying nothing." We have known instances of an English critic finding fault with the accent of an Italian prima donna, who had lived nearly all her life in Florence; but in order to be able to perform this feat with any degree of confidence, it is essential that the critic should never have quitted Brixton. The golden rule for criticising music resembles the rule for criticising pictures, as given in the Vicar of Wakefield: "Say that the composer would have succeeded better if he had taken more pains with his orchestration, and praise the works of Sebastian Bach;"

The Orchestra—Jullien.

The October number of "Putnam" contains a long and well written article with the above title, to which we would commend the attention of those readers who wish to have some more definite ideas as to the composition and arrangement of a grand orchestra than they are able to get from their own unassisted observation. The writer seizes the opportunity presented by Jullien, who, for the first time in this country, offers to us what can, with strict propriety, be called a "grand orchestra." He says:

When the advertisements speak of a grand orchestra, they are almost invariably devoid of truth. The smallest number of a grand orchestra is sixty, and then the hall wherein they play should not be very large. Eighty and upwards, however, are necessary to the greatest effects. An orchestra of eighty was only heard on three occasions last winter in this city, for the first time in our national history, a smaller number than that having been the limit theretofore. M. Jullien's orchestra, numbering one hundred and two performers, is the largest, therefore, yet heard in this city, or country.

He claims for Jullien the characteristics of a man of mind, having the powers of a leader; and states his purpose in the article under notice to be, to throw out hints, when necessary, as to the real qualifications for lyrical leadership, thus seeking to extend a due appreciation of the intent and spirit of High Art.

He then gives a sketch of the life and adventures of Jullien, with which our readers are sufficiently familiar, and which have been doled out ad nauseum in weekly instalments for a long time back to the readers of the London Musical World, which seems to exist chiefly as a vehicle for the puffing of Alboni, Jullien, and Albert Smith, though sometimes enriched with articles of much value, and worthy of the rank which it claims to hold as the leading musical paper of London.

After a brief consideration of the great improvements in the fabrication of musical instruments (instancing, by way of example, the Piano Forte, which has undergone eight hundred distinct changes of combination, proportion and shape to bring it to its present perfection), the writer passes to an account of the compass, tone and quality of the different human voices, and of the various instruments of the orchestra, illustrating this part of his subject by a table showing the "Extent of Voices and Instruments." He then gives an idea of the modus operandi of a composer, in writing an opera, which will be found of very considerable interest, containing much information which will be new and most acceptable to many persons, and will clear up their ideas on some matters connected with the orchestra, and with the subject of musical composition. This part of the article is illustrated by two pages giving a sample of a full score, being a part of a Grand Symphony in C.

The impressions we have derived from a close consideration of M. Jullien on several occasions is, that he can magnetize and fire an orchestra, and through it an auditory, with a preëminent degree of force. This truth the vehement, tumultuous, and overwhelming plaudits of the thousands who go six nights a week, rain, or shine, to hear him, irrefragably affirm. In his original compositions which have been performed here he shows himself an unsurpassed master of the art of displaying the properties of each and every instrument, and bringing out of virtuosos their highest qualities. His arrangement of American airs concluding with a description of a battle is the best piece of purely imitative music we have ever heard. It may be safely said that this community did not know the possibilities of a truly grand orchestra until developed by Jullien. Several of his leading solo players have no equals in the world, and the whole body is composed of choice spirits. The accuracy, strength, and splendor of an inspired musical colossus are evolved by the passion, power, and unity of the immense mass which he seems to clutch in his musical hand, and mould at his musical fancy. He is so interesting and arousing the public admiration and love for the beautiful revelations of which he is the arch-apostle, that were he to stay among us a few months he would level the forests and drain the swamps of our musical territory, and so far as the public fiat could assert, he would thenceforward be kept among us to contemplate the large results of his energy, courage, skill and genius.

The article is well worth reading by all amateurs, and we commend it accordingly to their attention.

Allegri's Miserere.

Gregorio Allegri, who appears to have been a dignitary of the Church, being styled the Reverend, was a native of Rome; the precise date of his birth is unknown, but must have taken place either the latter end of the sixteenth century or the beginning of the seventeenth, as he was admitted into the Pope's Chapel in 1629, as a contra tenor. He was of the family of Correggio, the celebrated painter; who also bore the name of Allegri, and received his musical education from the famous Nanini, who was contemporary with Palestrina. His vocal abilities were not of a first-rate order, but he was accounted an admirable master of harmony; joined to this, he bore an excellent character for benevolence;—it is said his door was daily crowded by the poor and needy, who never went unrelieved; besides which, he made a practice of visiting the prisons, in order to bestow his alms on distressed and deserving objects.

Among the compositions of Allegri, (which were chiefly confined to the Church) is the celebrated Miserere, performed in the Sistine Chapel at Rome, on the Wednesday and Friday in Passion week, being, for its excellence, reserved for the most solemn occasions. This Miserere is composed in five parts, viz., 1st and 2d soprano, alto, tenor and bass, and is written in the key of G minor. In construction it is of great simplicity, and its appearance does not convey any great intelligence of the wonderful impression made by it, when performed in the Pope's Chapel.

The author of a "Tour in Germany," thus relates the manner in which it is performed at Rome, during the solemnities of Lent.

"Allegri's famed Miserere, as sung at the Sistine Chapel at Rome, during Easter, justifies the belief that, for purposes of devotion, the unaided human voice is the most impressive of all instruments. If such a choir as that of his Holiness could always be commanded, the organ itself might be dispensed with. This, however, is no fair sample of the powers of vocal sacred music; and those who are most alive to the 'concord of sweet sounds,' forget that, in the mixture of feeling produced by a scene so imposing as the Sistine Chapel presents on such an occasion, it is difficult to attribute to the music only, its own share in the overwhelming effect. The Christian world is in mourning; the throne of the Pontiff, stripped of all its honors, and uncovered of its royal canopy, is degraded to the simple elbow-chair of an aged priest. The Pontiff himself, and the congregated dignitaries of the Church, divested of all earthly pomp, kneel before the cross in the unostentatious garb of their religious orders. As evening sinks, and the tapers are extinguished one after another, at different stages of the service, the fading light falls ever dimmer and dimmer on the reverend figures. The prophets and saints of Michael Angelo look down from the ceiling on the pious worshippers beneath; while the living figures of his Last Judgment, in every variety of infernal suffering, and celestial enjoyment, gradually vanish in the gathering shade, as if the scene of horror had closed forever on the one, and the other had quitted the darkness of earth for a higher world. Is it wonderful that, in such circumstances, such music as that famed Miserere, sung by such a choir, should shake the soul even of a Calvinist?"

Although the harmony of this celebrated composition is pure, and (for the time it was written) bearing a considerable share of ingenuity and a peculiar kind of beauty, yet it owes its reputation more to the theatrical manner of performance than to the composition itself. The same music is many times repeated to different words, and the singers have by tradition, certain customs and expressions which produce wonderful effects, such as swelling or diminishing the sounds at some particular words, and singing entire verses quicker than others. Some of the greatest effects produced by this piece, may perhaps be attributed to the time, place, and solemnity of the ceremonies. The Pope and conclave are all prostrated to the ground, the candles of the Chapel and the torches of the balustrades are extinguished one by one, and the last verse of the Psalm is terminated by two choirs, the chapel-master beating time slower and slower, and the singers diminishing the harmony by little and little to a perfect point, followed by a profound silence.

The Miserere is the 51st Psalm, whence Allegri has selected part of the 1st, and the whole of the 2d, 4th, 6th, 8th, 10th, 12th, 15th, and 18th verses, and concludes with part of the 19th. So sacred was this composition at one time held by the Church, that the penalty of a copy was almost tantamount to excommunication; the thunders of the Vatican being hurled against the miserable wretch who dared to disregard its dictates. Padre Martini states, that there were never more than three copies made by authority; one for the Emperor Leopold, another for the King of Portugal, and the third for himself. Respecting the former, the following anecdote is narrated.

"The Emperor Leopold the First, not only a lover and patron of music, but a good composer himself, ordered his ambassador to Rome, to entreat the Pope to permit him to have a copy of the celebrated Miserere of Allegri, for the use of the Imperial Chapel at Vienna; which being granted, a copy was made by the Signor Maestro of the Pope's Chapel and sent to the Emperor, who had then in his service some of the best singers of the age; but notwithstanding the abilities of the performers, the composition was so far from answering the expectations of the Emperor and his Court, in the execution, that he concluded the Pope's Maestro di Capella, in order to keep it a mystery, had put a trick upon him, and sent him another composition.

"Upon which, in great wrath, he sent an express to his Holiness, with a complaint against the Maestro di Capella, which occasioned his immediate disgrace, and dismissal from the service of the papal chapel; and in so great a degree was the Pope offended at the supposed imposition of his composer, that, for a long time, he would neither see him nor hear his defence; however, at length the poor man got one of the cardinals to plead his cause, and to acquaint his Holiness that the style of singing in his chapel, particularly in performing the Miserere, was such as could not be expressed by notes, nor taught or transmitted to any other place but by example; for which reason the piece in question, though faithfully transcribed, must fail in its effect, when performed elsewhere.

"His Holiness did not understand music, and could hardly comprehend how the same notes should sound so differently in different places; however, he ordered his Maestro di Capella to write down his defence, in order to send it to Vienna, which was done, and the Emperor, seeing no other way of gratifying his wishes with respect to this composition, begged of the Pope, that some of the musicians in the service of his Holiness might be sent to Vienna to instruct those in the service of his chapel how to perform the Miserere of Allegri."

It is well known that the powers of Mozart's memory were truly astonishing, and the manner in which he obtained a copy of the Miserere is highly characteristic and amusing.

When in his fourteenth year, Mozart travelled with his father to Rome, and was invited by the Pope to the Quirinal Palace: this happened just before Easter,—while in conversation with his Holiness, he solicited a copy of the Miserere, but was refused in consequence of the prohibition. He then asked permission to attend the only rehearsal, to which he listened with the utmost attention. On quitting the Chapel, Mozart spoke not a word, but hastened home and wrote down the notes. At the public performance, he brought his manuscript carefully concealed in his hat, and having filled up some omissions and corrected some errors in the inner parts, had the satisfaction to know that he possessed a complete copy of the treasure thus jealously guarded. When afterwards this manuscript was compared with the one sent by Pope Pius the Sixth to the Emperor of Germany there was not found the difference of a single note.

Although Allegri set many parts of the Church service with divine simplicity and purity of harmony, yet there does not appear to be a single composition of his, save the Miserere, which has withstood the ravages of time.* As while he lived he was much beloved, so when he died was he deeply lamented. His death occurred on the 18th of February, 1652, and he was buried in the Chiesa Nuova, before the Chapel of St. Philip Neri, the place of interment for the singers of the Pontifical Chapel, upon the wall of which is engraved the following epitaph:

CANTORES PONTIFICII
NE QUOS VIVOS,
CONCORDS MELODIA
JUNXIT:
MORTUOS CORPORIS,
DISCORDS RESOLUTIO
DISSOLVERIT:
HIC UNA CONDITI
VOLUERUNT.
ANNO 1640.

PAGANINI.—It may be recollected that the celebrated violinist Paganini died at Nice about fourteen years ago, and that the bishop refused to allow his remains to be interred in consecrated ground, because he had died without receiving the sacrament. Paganini's executors had the body removed to a private place, and commenced legal proceedings to obtain right of sepulture. The court of Nice having decided against them, they appealed to the Arch-Episcopal court of Genoa, which reversed the sentence of the lower court, and ordered the body to be buried in the cemetery. On this, the court of Nice appealed to the court at Turin, which, however, has confirmed the burial. As a last recourse, the court of Nice has appealed to a tribunal of Judges to be nominated by the Pope.

* Kircher has inserted in his Musurgia, published in 1652, the year in which Allegri died, a quartetto of his composition for two violins, tenor and bass.

Beethoven, according to M. Jullien.

Prevented from enjoying the performances of Monsieur Jullien's orchestra since his second Concert at Castle Garden, we had the good fortune to revive our reminiscences of that almost incomparable band of artists, and their truly incomparable conductor, on Thursday evening, when the whole of the first part of the programme was devoted to the works of Beethoven. M. Jullien showed, in our judgment, a thorough knowledge and nice appreciation of the works of the great epic composer, in the mere selection of the compositions for performance on this occasion. From all that he has left us, no other five works could be chosen better suited to give to a promiscuous audience a comprehensive view of the character of his mighty genius.

Egmont is in every way the finest of his overtures. Its thoughts are intrinsically finer, the treatment of them is bolder, and what is above all,—considering that it is an overture, an introduction to a dramatic performance—it is more dramatic in its character than any other of his compositions. In the whole range of the musical drama there is no more impetuous and fiery passage than the final presto of this overture. The entire composition is remarkable for an absence of that self-contemplative spirit which gives character to almost all the works of this composer. It has a few passages unmistakably his, no matter whose the name under which it might be produced, but except these few, it might have been written by the author of Der Freyschütz and Oberon.

The selection from the 6th symphony, in F, called the Pastoral, presented the audience not only with the best portion of that work, but with the finest of Beethoven's few attempts at descriptive composition. In the second movement of the same symphony,—which is suggestive, not descriptive, in its aim, seeking to awaken emotions kindred to those excited by a walk by the side of a rivulet on a spring day, but not attempting to imitate the flow of water, or the sigh of the breeze, any more than the light of the sun,—in this movement there occur direct imitations of various birds: but this is the very lowest kind of art, and though Beethoven has employed it with signal success and in a manner peculiar to himself, the aim is trivial and the effect unworthy. The allegro, which M. Jullien gave us, is one of the most characteristic of those peculiar movements in triple time which Beethoven created and substituted for the Minuet and Trio of the old Symphony and Quartet. It is a quaint and fairly graphic embodiment of the spirit of rustic hilarity. To execute it well, great delicacy of execution is needed and equal nicety and promptness in taking up the parts by the several instruments. It was exquisitely well done under the direction of M. Jullien. The Storm Movement, which puts a sudden stop to the rural festivities, is a marvellous exhibition of profound knowledge of counterpoint and mastery of its resources compelled into the service of portraying the fury of the elements. It is impossible to imitate lightning or rain by music; and though drums furnish a pigmy thunder, wind can be but feebly counterfeited by any or all of the instruments in the orchestra. But Beethoven's storm lacks the effect of neither lightning, rain, wind nor thunder. His composition arouses in us lively reminiscences of the emotions with which we see the heavens riven by fire, and sheets of water sweep over prostrate fields, and hear fitful gusts howl in alternate fury with the bellows of black browed clouds. The subsiding of the tempest is perhaps yet more graphic; and yet it is needless to say that no storm ever died away in such sweet strains. The music is not imitative, but suggestive; a distinction to which we drew the attention of our readers some years ago, in commenting upon the performance of this same symphony, and again in remarking upon the purely imitative labors which deform Haydn's otherwise noble Creation. This storm movement was a remarkable exhibition of skill on the part of the orchestra and control on that of the conductor. The violoncellos and double basses, which have passages not easy of performance and yet very essential, were handled with admirable effect; and the violins bowed like one man. The drums, which in this movement are very important instruments, were admirably played.

The next piece, Adelaida, which was sung by König's cornet, is before all other compositions as an expression of unutterable love and utter wretchedness. It is a grand and incontrovertible assertion of the great school of music, the school of thought, that it can give voice to passion, that it can express the keenest pangs of grief, and with a power that dwindles the efforts of the declamatory writers, how fine so ever they may be in themselves. There is nothing petty about the love or the anguish of Adelaida. The passion is heroic; and the art is high art. Not only this—there is a broad and very remarkable distinction between its sentiment and that of the Italian declamatory writers. Its excellence is not only of degree; it is of kind. The beauty of Tu che a Dio spiegasti l'ali—and it is beautiful—multiplied a hundred fold would not be a thought nearer the beauty of Adelaida. In the former, and in all the compositions of its school, the passion is not heroic; it is not grand. It is a passion which seeks utterance. It is not all-absorbing; for it can busy itself with thinking about itself, and seek assuagement of its sorrows by pouring them into the ears of others. It delights to be a martyr; and revels in the luxury of its woe. Recall the finale of the second act of Lucia, and that of the first act of La Sonnambula, and observe that Edgardo, in the one, and Elvino and Amina, in the other, declaim their grief and linger over their own expression of their own sorrows. This sort of passion is very moving in its utterance; but somehow or other, though sometimes for dramatic effect it kills itself, we feel no certainty that, if it were not for the dramatic effect, it could not get safely through its misery, and do it all over again. Not so with the passion of Adelaida. In that the cry of grief is wrung from the tortured soul. We see the effort made to restrain the utterance of the agony, which breaks forth in strains which express, but do not diminish or assuage a woe which, though utter and hopeless, is not pitiful or even pitiable, and which seeks no sympathy. Edgardo kills himself; but he who loved Adelaida has no need to put himself to death;—he dies. His heart is cloven by a keener edge than that of steel. He does not put an end to a grief which he is too feeble to bear; he bears it until it puts an end to him. Every strain, every note of Adelaida breathes heart-broken anguish. It is a musical picture of a strong soul wrecked and shattered. The melody is a cry which a mighty spirit cannot stifle, and the accompaniment, in itself a marvel of art, throbs and leaps and quivers with the pulse of woeful passion.

We remind our readers that we drew and insisted on this distinction in criticising the performances of Jenny Lind. We found her at first comparatively incapable for declamatory effect; but afterward in the great school of music, herself unapproachably great.

A restless discontent, a yearning after he knew not what, is as much the characteristic of Beethoven's music, as a mild and noble melancholy was that of Mozart's, and a glad and hopeful spirit that of Haydn's, and this is not in any of his works more manifest than in the waltz theme which has been well named Le Desir. The man who wrote that strain could never be happy, and would never be satisfied. It tells plaintively of an aching void, that will never be filled. It was played very smoothly and expressively, and the variations were very nicely executed; but we had rather they had been left unplayed, and in truth, unwritten. They but fritter away the sentiment of the theme, instead of expanding and varying its expression. That air is not to be varied. Beethoven might have done it; but he didn't.

The greatest of instrumental compositions formed the fitting finale to such a selection. The Symphony in C Minor contains no finer thoughts, perhaps, than are to be found distributed through the other works of its composer; but no one of his instrumental works is equal as a whole to this. People have puzzled themselves to discover what it means. What matter? It meant something to Beethoven, without a doubt, or it would be meaningless to us; but our enjoyment of it depends not on the thought or the fact which moved him to write it, but upon its power to please our sense of beauty, and to suggest to us the same emotions which had possession of his soul when its twin-born marvels of melody and harmony came into existence. We would willingly linger over its varied beauties; varied from grandeur and majestic power to delicacy and tenderness and quaint grotesqueness. But our space fails us; and these are themes upon which we have more than once descanted lovingly. Its greatest movement is the second; greatest in its thoughts, and in their treatment. Perhaps in the whole range of orchestral music there is no such succession of beauties as in this movement. The noble theme announced by the violoncellos; the tender loveliness of the succeeding strains for flutes, oboe, and clarinet, repeated, but with a difference, by the violins; the placid dignity of the second theme, the surprising enharmonic change by which it passes to the trumpets and becomes stately, majestic and awe-moving; the passage by mysterious harmony back into the original key; the repetition of the same strains, the same yet ever varying, again and again, at each recurrence enhanced with some new and unexpected charm; the hurried, impatient passage which breaks the even and dignified progress of the movement; the startling return to the theme and the reproduction of all its beauties with the freshness of novelty and the charm of recognition, make it a nonpareil of musical art. M. Jullien feels it profoundly and comprehends all of its beauties. It was as a whole admirably well given; but in some passages towards the close, in which a charming variation in the effect is produced by the alteration of the time of two notes in a group of four, the point was neglected, to the marring of what would otherwise have been a perfect performance.

The difficult Scherzo was well done, except that the horns were too overbearing in the second theme, and that the double basses, though unusually distinct were not distinct enough in the Trio. It is hoping too much perhaps to hope for a better performance of this Trio, which in fact is only enjoyed thoroughly by reading it in score after having heard it attempted.

If the final March had not been mutilated and overborne with brass, nothing could have been wished for in its performance. The whole of Monsieur JULLIEN's brass band was here let loose. It was too much. It was more than BEETHOVEN wrote for. The merciless array of trumpets overwhelmed even that large body of strings, and the balance of the instrumentation was destroyed. The ophicleide told well in taking the part of the fabulous contrafagotto of the score; but even here we were reminded continually that its register was an octave too high. The curtailment of the movement by the loss of the first part was decidedly injurious. Those themes should be heard again and again to produce their full effect, and the ear needs long preparation for that furious presto. These points excepted the performance was truly splendid. We owe Monsieur JULLIEN much for giving us such music in such a manner. To the credit of our city the house was entirely filled.

We inform a respected correspondent that we have by no means lost sight of Monsieur JULLIEN's humbug, and shall endeavor at the proper time to justify our correspondent's kind expressions and comply with his suggestions. What we have said on this score is mild and gentle in comparison with what we have to say; although we shall speak as we did, in the utmost kindness. But hereafter we shall deal principally with an accomplice of the great conductor, who is both the cause and the occasion of his humbug.—N. Y. Courier & Inquirer.

THALBERG'S NEW WORK.—M. Thalberg has published an elaborate compilation of music, entitled "The Art of Singing applied to the pianoforte." It is thus noticed in a London paper:—"Few musical publications furnish ampler text for a lecturer than this. The entire history of arrangements for the Pianoforte of music not written for the Pianoforte might be sketched—also, the rise, progress, and changes in style of cantabile playing—with reference to its contents. While turning over these elaborate pages,—while testing the examples that they contain, in which executive steadiness and ingenuity are forced to their extreme boundaries,—we have glanced back to the days when single notes and a figured bass were all that were submitted to the amateur who was called to give some account at his harpsichord or pianoforte of the Concertos of Corelli—the Overtures of Handel—the Symphonies of Vanhall—or the opera songs of Jomelli, Hasse, and Sacchini. Sound musical knowledge was in those days strictly demanded from players of the first class; but how has the art of prestidigitation (to borrow a word from the conjurors) been since then cultivated! The pianoforte is now expected to represent the solo instrument, the vocal concerted piece, the opera chorus, with full orchestra, of its sole self:—nay more, while representing these, it is perpetually required to throw into the bargain some new arpeggio, or monster chord, or airy chromatic passage. The habit and the call have, indeed, become matters of every-day occurrence; and here M. Thalberg assembles some of the most arduous specimens of embroidery, and having prefixed a few intelligent remarks on diversities of taste and of tone in touch, calls, the work 'The Art of Singing applied to the Piano.'—Such a title suggests retrospect, as has been said, and challenges examination." A long criticism follows, the substance of which is, that M. Thalberg has produced a work, the compositions of which are so overloaded with ornaments and so hemmed in with difficulties, that few besides himself can play them.

ARTISTE.—Artiste (as all but artistes are aware) is the French for "artist;" and tenth-rate musicians, professors of parlor magic, unappreciated tumblers, etc., have now appropriated the word in a manner which says much for their self-appreciation. Writers, many of whom have exhibited a tolerable amount of art, never call themselves artists. The class of persons who in England have hitherto been generally known by the name of artists, are beginning to get ashamed of the word, and to call themselves painters illustrators, caricaturists, lithographic draughtsmen, or by any title which may indicate the especial branch of art which they cultivate. Singers, such as Viardot, continue to call themselves singers. Dancers, such as Taglioni, will always call themselves dancers.—Thalberg is a pianist; Ernst, a violinist. But Tomkins, of the Casino band, Miss Gherkins, who was hissed at the Surrey Music Hall, Squalinalto, who was tenor ("in the chorus," understood) at the Scala, etc., etc., all insist upon being called artistes. An artiste is the name of a person who lives upon Art while destroying it, like a blight upon a flower.—Diogenes.

The Bell Casting at Breslau.

Once dwelt there a Bell-caster
In Breslau's city fair,
In his craft an honored Master,
Of skill and counsel rare.
From churches and from chapels
In the city all around,
The praise of God is ringing
From his bells, with solemn sound.
The bells all round are ringing
So loud and full and clear,
Of Faith and Love seem singing,
So sweet their tones appear.
But of all the Master's labors,
The glory and the crown
Is called "The Bell of Sinners,"
At Breslau, in the town.
In the tower of St. Magdalen's
This master work doth hang,
And speaks to many a sinner
Of God in its solemn clang.
How doth the worthy Master
With care the work attend!
Both day and night he labors
Until the work shall end.
And now the time drew near;
The mould already stood,
And, bubbling in the furnace,
Was the metal hot and good.
Then to his side the Master
A stripling fair doth call,
"Watch thou beside the furnace,
Watch thou—alone—of all;
"For I before the casting
My strength with wine will cheer,
For now the molten metal
Will flow both full and clear.
"Take heed how on the flood gate
Thou even lay thy hand;
Thy life shall be the forfeit,
I swear it, as I stand!"
The boy stands by the cauldron,
Into its depths looks he
On the metal, foaming, boiling,
And raging to be free.

In his ears is a gentle whisper
Doth lure him to draw near
And but to place his finger
On the gate—with curious fear.

Now in his hand he grasps it—
And now the gate doth turn—
Then grows he anxious, fearful,
Nor knows what he hath done.

Swift runs he to the Master
And will his guilt unfold;
For pardon now he prayeth,
And fast his knees doth hold.

Scarce had the Master listened
To what the boy did say,
When sudden madness seized him
And held him in its sway.

His dagger keen he plungeth
Deep in the stripling's breast;
Swift to the furnace runneth,
In mad, unconscious haste:

Perchance he yet may hinder
The stream of fiery glow.
But lo! the casting's ended!
No drop doth downward flow.

Now quick the Master hastens
To break the mould of sand,
Sees, without spot or blemish,
The Bell before him stand!

On the ground the boy is lying
And the work sees nevermore.
Ah! Master, cruel Master,
But thou did'st smite him sore!

Before the pitying Judges
The Master Founder stands—
His bloody crime confesses—
They bind his murderous hands.

But none may save the Master,
Blood must for blood atone,
And calmly now he heareth
The words of fearful doom.

And now his days are ended;
The Master forth is led,
And hears the solemn Masses
That are chanted for the dead.

"I thank ye," said the Master,
"Oh friends most dear and true,
And yet, one little favor
My heart would beg of you:

"I would I once might listen
To the tolling of my Bell—
With care the mould I fashioned,
I would know if all is well."

His dying wish is granted;
And solemnly and slow
The Sinner's Bell is tolling
As he to death doth go.

He hears the Bell's sweet ringing,
So full and clear and slow,
And as he hears it ringing
His eyes with tears o'erflow.

His look grows glad and cheerful,
For with every stroke that rang
The Bell did tell of Heaven
With mournful, solemn clang.

His head he meekly bendeth
To the headsman's glittering knife,
Through the Gates of Death he passeth
To the promised Better Life.

Of all the Master's labors,
The glory and the crown
Still hangs there in St. Magdalen's,
At Breslau, in the town.

'Tis called "The Bell of Sinners,"
And for the passing soul
From that time forth forever
With solemn sound doth toll.

NEW YORK, October 8, 1853.

Last evening we heard for the first time the great orchestra of Jullien. It was his "eleventh concert at Metropolitan Hall, and thirty-fifth in New York," and the crowd and the enthusiasm showed that the charm still worked. The programme was characteristic, but not one of Jullien's best, not like that of the night before, when he gave one of his "Beethoven nights," which we should prefer to hear before undertaking to fathom the depths of the great Jullien's musicianship as an appreciator and conductor and interpreter of the greatest kind of music. The critic of the Courier and Enquirer, however, speaks of that both intelligently and eulogistically this morning. Our locum tenens will please copy. But such an orchestra and such conductorship, with such solo-playing on all sorts of instruments, is certain to delight one the first time, even if there be nothing great or classic in the programme; and after all, it did contain some fine and many clever things. It was undoubtedly a fair specimen of Jullien in his speciality. There was something imposing in the mere assemblage of an orchestra of a hundred persons, embracing so many celebrated virtuosos, the best on their several instruments that Europe could afford, on a stage brilliantly decorated and in that brilliant hall; and when the magician (whose outward man has been abundantly described) rose from his throne, and carefully surveying all his forces, raised his wand, it was plain that the best understanding and best feeling existed between him and all his artists.

The overture was Semiramide, one of Rossini's best, and rather seldom heard among us. What a rich and pure sonority in the full, loud chords! The power and blended quality of tone of that great orchestra exceeded all that we had ever heard. There were no uncertain, characterless, or noisily obtrusive sounds; it was one rich, vital tone, a harmony in the best sense of many pure, effective, justly related individual tones. The ear and mind rejoiced throughout the evening in this satisfactory and vital fulness of the tutti. The quartet of the horns was played deliciously sweet and crisp. The witching little theme of the violins, starting with those light and quick reiterations of the first note, was given with elastic delicacy and precision by the broad mass of strings, and the crescendos and diminuendos and retardandos, and other points of expression were caught with sympathetic unity and certainty from the expressive baton and gesture of the conductor. We never heard an overture made so brilliantly effective; every point of melody, of rhythm, of harmony, of instrumental coloring, of light and shade, was boldly, delicately, happily brought out. We recognized the truth of what is often said of the expressive indications of Jullien's baton, it seems spontaneously to trace the outline of each melodic figure in the air; were it a lighted stick and moving in the dark, we might almost see the music. Nor was it possible to doubt that there had been consummate judgment and tact in the selecting, combining, training and tempering the instruments that made up that orchestra. Every instrument seemed a distinct and living individuality, whether emerging into the foreground with a solo passage, or kept back in the humbler function of mere common chord accompaniment; there was no mere unindividualized mass of sound in any portion of the band.

There was one brief specimen from Beethoven, the graceful Allegretto from the eighth symphony, which we have enjoyed quite as well at the hands of the "Germanians," since it does not depend for its effect on a great orchestra; but it was genially, tastefully and lovingly, as well as accurately rendered.

As for the dance pieces, in which lie Jullien's forte and popularity, we could not but enjoy them also, for some time, because of the wonderful mastery of instrumental effects displayed in them; although there is little in such music that survives apart from these effects of varied and contrasted instrumentation; reduce it to a piano-forte arrangement, and it is nothing; whereas a solid work of Beethoven, for instance, a composition with ideas and inspiration in it, will convey the magnetism of its character through a mere outline, as the great paintings do through good engravings. Yet as Jullien gives them, with all his orchestral resources, they are among the most brilliant and individual novelties in music. It is in these too that he displays the character and as it were draws the peculiar soul out of each solo instrument. His famous "American" Yankee-Doodle battle quadrille is certainly a wonderful exhibition of instrumental effects, both solo and combined. Its twenty solos, by such artists as Koenig, whose cornet is truly said to sing, Hughes on the ophicleide, the hard, round, solid tones of which, such as we never heard before, are grandly expressive in their way, Lavigne and Wuille, with their exquisite oboe and clarinet, were a new revelation of the best modern skill in instruments. Nor was this all; the contrapuntist's art came much in play, especially in the wonderfully imitative effects of the battle, as well as the deep boom of the "monster drum," which in so grand a combination supplies a necessary craving of the ear. There was a new polka, of Jullien's, called the "Katydid," suggestive of summer evenings at Castle Garden, in which the insect's tick is imitated by a machine devised by Jullien for the purpose; a humorous and graceful affair it was, to be sure. But all mere brilliancy, all mere effect will cease to satisfy, because it astonishes but does not inspire you; and so we found our senses dull and mind fatigued before the long list of quadrille, waltz and polka fireworks was exhausted.

That Jullien is a masterly conductor, a scientific, classically trained musician (for he had Cherubini for a master), a shrewd observer of men and feeler of the public pulse, a man of wonderful vivacity of temperament, alive to all outward impressions, and with much inventive faculty to render them in music, we cannot doubt. That he is a reverent and sympathetic interpreter too of the great and true tone-poets, we are assured, and saw some proof of it last evening. But of his power to create and originate great music, we must say the "grand operatic selection and fantasia from his Pietro il Grande," left us unconvinced. There was no lack of a musician's skill and knowledge; but it did lack (to us at least) the stamp of inspiration, the charm of individual ideas; there was form without vitality; there was repetition and prolongation of common-place cadences, as if to secure new chances of reaching what he had vainly tried to reach. But Jullien is a creator in one sense; he is the creator of perhaps the world's finest orchestra; and is that not glory enough for one man? Consider whether it does not mark a man of decided character and large grasp of thought.

Mlle. ANNA ZERR seems to be an unsympathetic, uninspiring singer, having high soprano notes of rare beauty in themselves, with three or four extra high notes, fitting her for the songs of the Queen of the Night, in the Zauberflöte. Her rendering of Mozart's divine melody: Deh vieni non tardar, a melody which only JENNY LIND has sung in all its pure height of heavenly simplicity, and which even SONTAG injured by false but graceful ornament, was, to us, almost an act of musical sacrilege. All simplicity and and purity of melody, the vital characteristics of that song, were gone: it was loaded with embellishments and trills and the most unmeaning, common-place cadenzas of Italian opera. Her "I've been roaming," won an encore from a portion of the audience. We feel unwilling, however, to pronounce any judgment from a single hearing on a singer of such note and of no considerable reputation, and trusting we have not heard the best of Anna Zerr, shall wait till we hear her in Boston.

There were some admirable instrumental solos, of which we have not time now to speak.

Ten Years Ago.

We present below, as an interesting reminiscence of the days of our ignorance, an extract from the leading editorial article of the first number of a musical periodical started in this city in 1842 by Messrs. George J. Webb and T. B. Hayward. It is difficult to realize that so great a change can have been wrought in the musical taste and knowledge of our people as is shown by contrasting this article with that contained in the number of our Journal of Music for April 30, 1853 (Vol 3, No. 4), in which we gave a list, as full and complete as we could, of the classical music which had been performed in Boston, during the past winter; and, did not our own memory bear out the assertions of the article from which we quote, we should almost disbelieve the story that it tells. Familiar now, as every concert goer among us is, with all the Symphonies of Beethoven, with many of those of Haydn and Mozart, to say nothing of those of Mendelssohn and of modern living composers; familiar with the principal Italian operas now on the stage; with classical chamber music of the highest order; having heard within a few years past many of the most distinguished singers of the day, JENNY LIND, ALBONI, SONTAG, and a host of others of less celebrity; having listened to the brilliant efforts of the most famous instrumental performers, so that all these matters are familiar to us as household words, we can scarcely appreciate the wonderful change that has come over the musical public in what seems to be so short a period.

We ask our readers to compare the following statements with those contained in the number of our Journal alluded to.

We speak, and justly, with the highest admiration, of Handel, Haydn and Mozart; and we have a very few of their compositions in this country, which some of our societies perform in a manner that does themselves credit.

But the few pieces that we have, are very little spread in this country; and these masters are generally regarded but as men of yesterday; whereas they lived and wrote and died, before most of the present generation were born. Their works are also very voluminous, and it is hardly probable that the twentieth part of them ever reached our shores. Of that species of musical composition, of which Haydn was the inventor, for which he is most celebrated, and on which rests his fame as a composer and a man of genius more than on anything else, viz.: the Symphony, properly so called, the public performance has been attempted in this country in but few instances. Now the voluminous works of these men, to say nothing of numberless others, have been before the public in Europe from fifty to a hundred years, and in the way of frequent performance in hundreds of places; and it may well be imagined what must be the effect on the public taste. Fifty years ago, the musical world of Europe was listening to and enjoying the works of these great masters; while the musical public of Boston was luxuriating upon the productions of—Billings and Holden; and strange to say, we even now have among us men, who still prefer the latter. The Quartet, for two violins, a viola and violoncello, with which it is so common for amateurs to entertain themselves in a private way in Europe, is rarely attempted here, unless it be by a small club of foreigners; nay, it is almost unknown in this country.

Of Oratorios, very few, probably not more than a half dozen, have ever been performed in this country; and these with little or no success, except in two or three places. Nor is it yet twenty-five years since the first attempt to give a regular Oratorio was made. Now of this species of composition there are probably several hundreds in existence, many of which are regarded as standard works, and parts of still more are considered as furnishing the most valuable selections for public performance, that can be made. Handel alone has bequeathed to the world about twenty.

It is not twenty years since the first successful attempt at the representation of the Italian opera was realized; and this it has been found impossible to sustain. In Boston it was never attempted. The only operas which we have had here are what are called English Operas, of which we have seen but four or five, and Ballad Operas, which have been somewhat more numerous. In Europe, great numbers of new operas are brought out every year; and the accumulated mass would amount to thousands. It is true, most of them enjoy but an ephemeral existence; few of them lasting more than two or three years. But many of them contain songs, or other movements, which are so valuable as to be published separately, and share a high and a lasting popularity.

There are several whole species of musical composition, which are as yet scarcely known at all in this country. Two of these, the Symphony and the Quartet, both of which are instrumental, have been already mentioned. Others still might be added; but it would carry us beyond our purpose to enumerate them here.

Of vocal music, too, there are many kinds, as the Cantata, the Serenata, of which we have but few specimens; and several, of which we have none. Indeed, most of the vocal music in this country, except psalm tunes, is almost wholly confined to the large cities. The more common kinds, such as Songs, Duets, Trios, Glees, Madrigals, &c., are but little circulated in the country; and indeed our whole stock of these is very limited.

Of the immense mass of standard instrumental music, whether for the piano, the organ, or for single wind and string instruments, we have an equally limited proportion.

To supply some of these deficiencies, particularly those enumerated in our Prospectus, by establishing a work which shall serve as a regular periodical organ of circulating as widely as possible a choice selection from these treasures of art, is the design of the present undertaking. It rests with the public to determine whether such a work is worthy of their support.

Mr. WEBB, the editor of the periodical from which this extract is made, is entitled, not a little, to the credit of having brought about this change. As conductor of the various Oratorio Societies in Boston and of the "Boston Academy of Music," and of the "Musical Fund Society," he has exerted a most useful influence on the development and progress of a high musical taste among us.

MRS. SEGUIN.—We mentioned, more than a year ago, that Mrs. Seguin intended to expand her private classes in vocal music, into a more public institution—an Academy of Music—wherein the most advanced and thorough instruction in the art, might be imparted to a large number. The lamented death of Mr. Seguin, interrupted the formation of her plans; but her intention has never been abandoned, and she is now engaged in the preliminary steps for founding the proposed institution. Mrs. Seguin is especially adapted to be at the head of such an academy. She has not only the advantage of being herself a mistress of the vocal art, but she received her own musical education in the "Royal Academy of Music," of London, which is an institution precisely similar to that which Mrs. Seguin designs to establish. She is, therefore, already familiar with the practical working of musical academies. We heartily wish her most abundant success in her enterprise. Mrs. Seguin has received great encouragement from home and foreign musicians, who feel that an academy for the complete mastery of vocal music, is a real desideratum among us. Mr. Benedict, the eminent composer and leader, of London, who is well known here in connection with the concert tour of Jenny Lind, writes to Mrs. Seguin, as follows:—

"2 Manchester Square, London, 20th Jan., 1853.

MY DEAR MRS. SEGUIN,—I have heard with the greatest concern, the news of your sad bereavement. Every one who knew your excellent husband, must feel your terrible, irreparable loss; and none better than myself—tried in the school of Misfortunes and domestic calamities—can appreciate the whole extent of your sorrows. But you have still holy duties to fulfil, and I hope you will persist in your former plan of forming a Singing Academy. Your great experience in both the classical and modern styles, your perfect taste, your high musical acquirements, hold out the certainty, that you must succeed in a country where talent, united to an unimpeachable moral character, can never fail to enlist the sympathies of all. With the best wishes for yourself and family, believe me, Always yours, very truly,
JULES BENEDICT."

We shall soon be able to give further particulars of Mrs. Seguin's plan. Meanwhile, we commend it and her to the consideration and confidence of the musical public.—Home Journal.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

THE GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY begin their concerts on Saturday next, at the Boston Music Hall, and in spite of the attractions presented by Jullien's monster orchestra, will be most cordially welcomed back to Boston, by their numerous friends, and fellow citizens, as they may fairly call themselves, having taken steps to become citizens of the United States. The Germania Society has been for some years our beau ideal of a well trained orchestra, and with the largely increased number of members that will compose the Society this winter, we do not fear that their performances can suffer by any comparisons. We are informed that Mlle. CAROLINE PINTARD, from Paris, will appear at these concerts as vocalist. She is said to have a fine contralto voice and to be an accomplished singer, and beside all this, to have no ordinary personal attractions. Subscription tickets will now be delivered by Mr. Bandt, the agent, at Wade's Music Store.

OLE BULL'S CONCERT on Friday of last week was very well attended, by an enthusiastic audience. We were not able to be present at this concert, but would remind our readers that his next and last Farewell Concert will take place this (Saturday) evening at the Music Hall. The programme will be found in another column.

The Concert of the new Quartet Club, to be given to-night in the Tremont Temple, presents great attractions. It will be the first opportunity we have had of hearing a concert in the new hall, as well as the first performance of the new Club. Hummel's celebrated Septuor in D minor will be performed and will be the chief attraction of the programme. The subscribers are assured that the subscription concerts to be given by this Club will be in no way inferior to this one. If the performance should be equal to the promise, we may surely expect a very delightful series of concerts.

evening last. Although the evening was quite rainy and unpleasant, the choir numbered 130 voices, the parts being about equal. Mr. Bergmann, of the Germania Musical Society, has been selected as Conductor for the season; but, as he had not arrived in the city, at the request of the President of the Society, Mr. George J. Webb conducted this Rehearsal. The "Messiah" was taken up, preparatory to its performance on Christmas evening.

Immediately after the choice of officers, a few weeks since, Mr Webb was unanimously elected an honorary member of this Society, a well deserved compliment, coming from those who have been formerly under his instruction and who appreciate his exertions and sacrifices in the cause of the advancement of vocal music in this community.

JONAS CHICKERING, PIANO-FORTE MANUFACTURER, MASONIC TEMPLE, Tremont Street,

HAVING removed from his former location in Washington Street, and fitted up Warerooms in the above named beautiful building, is now prepared to attend upon such of his friends and the public as may honor him with a call. His time for the past six months having been exclusively devoted in endeavors to render his manufacture more perfect than ever, he is confident of being able to fully satisfy all who are desirous of possessing a good instrument.

Residents in the vicinity and adjacent States will please notice particularly his address, as there is another person in this city bearing his name, and with whom he is frequently confounded.

Mr. C. flatters himself that his experience and reputation of thirty years, must convince all who anticipate purchasing, that this is the best testimonial that he can offer of the excellence of his Pianos, and of the satisfaction which has invariably been manifested with regard to all the qualities which constitute an unexceptionable instrument.

John Bunyan's Immortal Allegory.

Probably no Book, save the Bible, has been so extensively read as Bunyan's Inimitable Allegory,

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

IT has been translated into nearly all the different languages of Christendom, and been perused with delight and holy fervor by all nations. Art has lent her attractions in nearly all the forms of illustration, from the rough Wood Cut to the exquisite Steel Engraving. But to the middle of the nineteenth century, and to an American Clergyman, are we indebted for the only true pictorial conception of this immortal work.

The novel and sublime idea of embodying the ENTIRE STORY, and transferring the same to a SINGLE PICTURE, showing the wanderings of Christian from the "City of Destruction" to the "Celestial City," presenting at one view to the eye the varied scenes through which he passed, originated with DANIEL WIGHT, of Massachusetts. His truly original and beautiful conception was reduced to a most elegant design by HAMMATT BILINGS, and from this design, JOSEPH ANDREWS, the distinguished historical engraver, has produced, after four years of labor, a Picture which will take rank among the most superb and elaborate productions of human genius, taste, and skill.

The Picture is now ready, and will be offered for sale at the Bookstore of the Publishers, and by Agents duly authorized by the Publishers.

The best works on Piano Instruction existing.

IN PRESS.—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO-FORTE, translated from the latest and most approved German Edition, by G. A. SCHMITT.

Also JUL. KNORR'S REVISED EDITION OF A. E. MULLER'S METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.

The above works are in reality the most complete, elaborate, and, at the same time, condensed works on the subject of which they treat. They contain Studies and Examples which will lead the scholar to a mastery of all the modern achievements of the Art; and are, in the opinion of leading German critics, the best books on musical instruction extant. THE GUIDE is not only a key to the succeeding work, but contains a list of over two hundred pieces, by the first masters, in progressive order, with notes of advice to the teacher, showing how they might be best practised for the advancement of the pupil.

THE COMPLETE METHOD contains many suggestions of the greatest importance to Teachers and Pupils that have not been mentioned in any other book of instruction.

These exceedingly valuable works are in press, and will be ready at an early date.

IN THE SPLENDID

New Hall of the Tremont Temple!

THE undersigned, resident artists, respectfully announce to the Citizens of Boston and Vicinity, that they will give a

GRAND VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL CONCERT,

On Saturday Evening, Oct. 15th,

In the beautiful Hall of the Tremont Temple, on which occasion will be performed: Hummel's famous Septuor in D minor, for piano, flute, oboe, horn, &c.; a Quartet for French Horns; a Fantasia for Piano, with orchestral accompaniment, assisted by the best artists of the city. Miss MARY ELINA CORRAN, a very promising Vocalist, will make her first appearance, and sing some fine ballads of Schubert, Mendelssohn, &c. Miss MARY SAUL, a wonderful Pianist, nine years of age, will perform a Duo-Sonata by Mozart, with Mr. PERABEAU, and also a Solo from the "Child of the Regiment."

Our subscribers to the Classical Matinées will please use their tickets for this Festival; and we pledge ourselves hereby that our Subscription Concerts will be in no way inferior to this one. Professors are respectfully invited to get their tickets at T. T. Barker's music store.

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY.

GRAND CONCERTS! The GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY respectfully announce to their friends and the public of Boston and vicinity, that they give a Series of TEN GRAND CONCERTS, at the

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

Commencing on SATURDAY EVENING, October 22d, and continued every other Saturday Evening.

The ORCHESTRA will be increased by the addition of many of the best artists in the country, thereby enabling the Society to produce the elaborate compositions of the great masters with better effect than heretofore. No expense will be spared to render the Orchestra complete in every department.

[The best available talent, vocal and instrumental, will be engaged during the season, to render the Series of Concerts equal in point of brilliancy and attraction to any ever given in Boston.

[In order to prevent the confusion and disappointment experienced upon the unusual demand for tickets last season, ONLY A LIMITED NUMBER of subscription tickets will be issued.

SUBSCRIBERS' TICKETS. A package of thirty tickets to be used at pleasure, $10; half packages, containing fifteen tickets, $5. Subscription papers are now open at all the Music Stores and principal Hotels. The issue of tickets will commence at Wade's Music Store on the 8th of October.

CLASSICAL MATINÉES.

THE undersigned, resident artists of Boston, intend to give a Series of Classical Concerts during next winter, in which the best works of the great composers will be performed; such as Quartets, Quintets, Septets, Trios, Duos and Solos, by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Hummel, Weber, Cherubini, etc. The programme will be made more attractive by Vocal performances between the different pieces, as also Solos for Horn, Violoncello, Piano, Violin, etc., occasionally. Many greater compositions, as, Quartets, Quintets, and Septets for Piano with String and Wind instruments, will be produced, which have never been publicly performed in Boston. To accommodate Ladies and others out of town, we propose to give our Concerts in the afternoon. The time and place will be announced hereafter. The subscription is $3 for the Series of Eight Concerts. Single tickets 50 cents each.

admire the perfect loveliness which is their result. Two points of singular excellence may be technically described; first, the return to the principal subject, (which is peculiarly felicitous even for Mendelssohn, who rarely suffers this always prominent feature in a musical design to elude some particular manifestation of his power,) where the first employment, throughout the score, of the basses and the commencing of the melody before the return to the key are the means from which the effect is derived; second, the reversion of the chief phrase of the song in the concluding symphony, which surprises all hearers by the newness of effect of which it shows a familiar idea to be susceptible.

As a matter of art, the introduction of this piece is most masterly, since thus is obtained a relief to the agitated character of the scene in which it is an episode that heightens the effect while it prevents what might else be monotony; and, to recur to the close of the previous piece, the change from major to minor which may, perhaps, give too much of transiency to the brightness that so lovingly expresses the last words of Stephen, is well considered to unite the present number in the general color that pervades the scene, avoiding a violent contrast of key in its introduction.

As a matter of imagination, there is a most subtle, refined, and delicate beauty in the idea of thus opposing the gentle benignity of Heaven to the vindictive ferocity of man—a pertinent symbol of the principles of good and evil.

No. 8.—To separate the actual from the ideal, the history from the illustration, it is needful that the soprano voice, which has been engaged in the last Aria, should no longer continue the narrative, and the brief recitative that now follows is therefore assigned to the tenor, which is, with this exception, reserved, in this introductory portion of the Oratorio, to personate, dramatically, the character of Stephen.

The Recitative relates how they, the people, rush upon their victim, and thrust him out of the city. Thus are we led to that extraordinary dramatic conception which, upon a first hearing at least, makes a more prominent impression than any other of the many very striking movements in this Oratorio, the chorus of the people, "Stone him to death!" a piece of such powerful representation of a will and an act, a curbless, furiously raging, maddened lust for life and its ferocious gratification, as cannot be surpassed, and has most rarely been equalled. If it be the province of art so to paint the passions of men that through its medium we see into the heart-secrets which to the world are known but in the deeds they prompt, and yet, while laying bare this metaphysical anatomy, so to clothe it in the investiture of ideality that in thus presenting all of truth, it shows this very truth to the naked sense (which would, with indifferent likelihood, be lovely or repulsive), to be all of beauty; if it be the province of art so to embody a thought, a feeling, as to make it live in the sense of those who witness its presentation, and thus to create a sympathy not only between them and the artist, but amongst them with one another; if it be the province of art, the true engine of magnetism, to make a multitude one-minded and one-hearted, and to fill this universal mind and heart with a sense of greatness that is akin to, if not identical with its possession; if such be the province of art, then must we all own that the highest art fulfils its noblest province in the composition under notice, where the fiercest passions, sublime like the tempest, from their being above human control and beyond human power, are brought before us in that very quality of truth which reveals the inmost beauty of its most hateful aspect.

I shall have to revert to this chorus in noticing another, near the end of the work, upon its connection with which I will not here further remark; it is more to the present purpose to recur to the last choral piece, where the multitude interrupt the oration of Stephen, which I do in order to remark upon the very different expression that is here given of the same words, showing how inadequate are these, words only, to convey a meaning without the adjunction of some other form of language or medium of expression to endue them with such vital character as alone can realize their signification. Declamation is a medium that is indispensable; and music may be, and this music is the highest class of declamation. "He blasphemes God," mutter the people in the former chorus, awed by the eloquence of their intended victim, and striving mutually to renew the energy each of other by their passing from mouth to mouth the token word of their resentment. "And who God blasphemes," is the voice of their growing confidence: "He shall perish!" is the cowardly bravado of their interassurances of their unanimity. Unimpressed by the dignified composure, the gentle majesty of Stephen; irritated, rather, by his firmness, and impatient of his calm demeanor, they can no longer wait for the judgment of the council, but hurry him from the tribunal with the cry of "Stone him!" justifying themselves in the murderous violence they are about to perpetrate, by declaring in loud vociferation to the world, "He blasphemes God! and who God blasphemes, he shall perish!" Will is now their only law, infuriated bigotry its only interpreter, and the right of might the all-sufficient authority for its administration.

It is now to be technical. The conclusion of the Recitative in the key of G minor, with the half-close on D, the voice ending upon the fifth of the chord, is most skillfully contrived to give every possible poignancy to the unisonous A flat, (colored by the unhacknied and therefore peculiar tone of the trombones) that afterwards becomes the minor ninth of G, with which the chorus opens. Bitter, severe, vindictive is indeed the expression of the clamorous entry of the successive voices, and all-powerful the unanimous exclamation of the whole choir upon the resolution of the discord. It would be tedious to trace, bar by bar, every point of mastery this chorus displays; but one cannot forbear to remark upon the immense power of the passage of descending scales for the whole of the string instruments, while the voices, supported by the brass band, declare with vehement emphasis the crime of their victim, and the savage punishment of this, wherein they are exultingly engaged. Further must be noticed the especially effective application of the plagal cadence, and of the ancient practice of closing with the major chord of the tonic a piece in a minor key; the vague, one may say, inconclusiveness of which is well in keeping with the feelings here embodied, that are rather gratified than satisfied, or at least not satisfied in their gratification;—the appetite for horrors, once stimulated, grows by what it feeds upon.

No. 9.—One cannot but wonder that the composer could have resisted the temptation of the most lyrical, the beautifully expressive words of Stephen, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge! Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" to write an extensive Air, which would, which must have become to us a memory to hang our love upon, and to treasure up in our hearts a sacred, a personal, a household feeling, wherein the sympathies of every one of us who has ever been wronged and has forgiven; who has ever loved and, loving, trusted; who has ever been chastened by sorrow and in such chastening has known a spring to unlock the tenderest emotions of his soul;—a feeling in which the sympathies of every such a one would find a home. But one must more admire the exquisite sense of dramatic propriety evinced in the treatment of this passage, which consists of the simple declamation of the text, with such inflection of the voice as is true alike to the sense of the words and to the situation in which they are uttered.

The death blow has been dealt. Overcome but not subdued, kneeling amidst the murderous missiles of his assailants, teaching by his example, even more than in his precepts, the doctrine and its beauty for which he suffers, Stephen, still strong in his wonted firmness, cries aloud the prayer that would avert the judgment of Heaven from those who have destroyed him. His life ebbs fast. He resigns his soul into the hands of that Savior in whose faith he has lived, and suffered, and dies; becoming fainter and fainter with every sound that passes his lips. "And, when he had said this, he fell asleep," is then rendered with such picturesque beauty as suggests to us, more touchingly than any words could do, the gentle state of peace with all the world and unity with heaven, in which the martyr's spirit is expired, and shedding forgiveness like an odor from its wings, takes its flight into those realms where truth and light, the substance and the shadow of deity, are unhidden by the ignorance and prejudice of man.

A most happy artifice is here employed—the acute wind instruments sustain the incomplete chord of A flat, upon which the solo voice has ended, and the chorus, and the organ, and the string orchestra commence, through this, with very deep tones, in the key of F minor, the most beautiful of all the Lutheran Chorals I have ever heard: "To Thee, O Lord, I yield my spirit," which seems like the pall with which mortal grief decks what it has loved and lost, while the pure spirit, hovering over, delays its passage to heaven.

No. 10.—A short Recitative, for soprano, tells how Saul, by his presence, sanctions the assassination of Stephen, thus introducing the hero of the work with such unimportance as, at that period of his career, his historical character bore, and leaving it to the representation of his subsequent deeds, and their influence upon mankind, for the development of that great conception for which the treatment of these introductory incidents has admirably prepared us, and in which Mendelssohn has proved himself fully equal to his subject. The Recitative proceeds to relate the lamentation of pious men over the body of the martyr. In this piece of plain recital, the composer, by attempting nothing, succeeds the most.

No. 11.—This lovely chorus, which concludes the portion of the subject that is to be regarded as introductory of the principal action, is a benediction upon him who has suffered for purity and love; and, with what perfect beauty the pronunciation of this blessing is rendered, with what exquisite ideality the assurance of tranquil and eternal happiness (the genial lulling eventide, with its kissing coolness and its whispered warblings of everlasting peace and love,) is conveyed, no words can serve to say, but yet no sense can fail to feel. Where genius has set its seal, it is not for theorism to break assunder, and the sovereign charm of this mighty talisman attracts all sense as it repels all system; we believe and we feel, but we cannot understand.

A brief examination of the plan of this melodious movement may help us to a knowledge of where its beauty lies, though it cannot teach us of what it consists. The chief subject is given at full length in the opening symphony by a resonant, mellow combination of tenor instruments, and the expression this embodies is strengthened by a phrase of gentle confirmation, introducing the harmony of the seventh upon the key-note, for the flute and clarinet. This subject is then dispersed successively among the voices, and afterwards analogously to the form of a first movement in any instrumental composition upon the classical model, it gives place to a second subject in the fifth of the original key, which will be recognised by the moving together for the first time of all the voices in harmony.

Substituted for the elaboration of the subject, with which we have now been made familiar, that mostly constitutes the second part of an instrumental movement, is an episode of a somewhat different character, to the words, "For, though the body die, the soul shall live for ever."

With one of those beautiful surprises in which Mendelssohn especially excels, we return to the chief subject in the original key, and this is followed, to carry out the analogy before noticed, by the second subject in the same key, instead of, as at first, in the key of the dominant.

The second subject is here most artfully prolonged into a coda of great interest, a prominent and most beautiful feature in which is formed by the two unaccompanied phrases for the voices, through which, only, during the whole movement, the figure of semiquavers ceases, that is otherwise maintained, in a manner peculiar to the composer, with most fortunate effect.

The concluding symphony is a repetition of the first, with the orchestral distribution of the principal melody reversed, those phrases that were before assigned to the tenor instruments being now given to the acute, and those that were before given to the acute instruments being now supported by the tenor.

Thus is completed the representation of the state of Christians and of Christianity at the time when St. Paul entered upon the scene of history. We see the seditions by which the scribes incite the people; we see the fanatic fury thus induced and its violent action; we see the dignified firmness, the zealous enthusiasm of the first martyr; we see his suffering and his intercession for mercy upon his enemies; we see his faith and his resignation. In the fierce, vindictive spirit of the Peoples' Choruses is delineated the present character of Saul; in the gentle, peaceful beauty that contrasts these is displayed the nature of the creed which, at first so active to suppress, he was subsequently more sedulous and more influential to extend.

The purpose I have ascribed to these introductory pieces is thus, I think, powerfully fulfilled; and we are now duly prepared to enter upon the main action of the Oratorio.

The Grand Opera at Paris.

The Grand Opera, (says the correspondent of the Atlas) restored at a cost of $70,000, again affords the fashionable part of Paris a charming means of passing away the evening. The opera of Les Huguenots was selected to do the honors of the house warming. M. Meyerbeer took unusual pains to present his opera as perfect as possible to the public. He even wrote three new dances for the third act, and he personally directed the last rehearsal of this reprise with as much care as if it had been the first, instead of the 233d performance of his celebrated work. He made the chorus repeat in couples, then in small numbers, and lastly in chorus. He observed every note of the violins, and of the drums, and of the cymbals; scolding heartily every musician whose notes were not irreproachable, and making them begin again the whole piece, whenever there was any slow or fast movement which the partition did not require. The chorus was increased by a hundred additional voices.

The claqueurs are in future obliged to dress in black and wear black cravats, the orchestra to wear black with white cravats. Turning to the material changes, we shall find the vestibule painted in imitation of marble above the first six feet, which is painted to resemble open wainscoting. The ticket offices have been placed nearer the wall, to allow a larger space for circulation. The public foyer is painted in imitation of white veined marble, while the between-columns and tympana of the archivolt are in green marble; the ground of the wall and the ceiling is white, while all the ornaments, the carvings, the frieze, the cornice, are gilded. M. Barre's bust of Louis Napoleon is placed on a pedestal in the style of Louis XV., fronting the large door. Twenty-eight gilded consols sustain busts of Lulli, Quinault, Mehul, Monsigny, Gluck, etc., and at one end is M. Duret's Mercury and Neapolitan dancer. Divans and chairs in red velvet invite loungers to a luxurious repose.

One of the best modifications in the interior of the Salle, or theatre proper, is the suppression of the balcon, the portion of the tiers in front of the boxes, where gentlemen sat and not unfrequently annoyed the ladies in the boxes, by their impertinent gaze; and during the entr'actes would completely screen the boxes from the rest of the theatre, by standing up with their backs to the orchestra, gazing on the inmates of the boxes. The boxes have now small salons behind them, where the party may retire during the between-acts. The corridors are painted in imitation of white marble, and lighted with lamps in the style of Louis XIV. Instead of the paintings which formerly decorated the galleries, gilded carvings on white grounds are placed.

The cupola is painted azure, and contains several groups of allegorical persons. The cornice is gilded, and is separated from the azure vault by a gilded balustrade. The columns, which were entirely gilded, are now white and gold; their flutes are filled with gilded ornaments of the Louis XIV. style. A quadrille, in the same style, and gilded, decorates the base of the columns. The between-columns remain as they were, with this difference, that the fronts of the boxes are more richly charged with gilded carvings. Upon the four grand pendentives formerly covered with painted figures, are four colossal gilded spread eagles, relieved by a black-enamelled white and gold ground. The Imperial Arms, in gilded carved wood, are placed upon the golden brocade mantle lined with ermine. The first tier of boxes has been improved by alternate gold and white balustrades on a red ground; the three other tiers of boxes are decorated with trophies of music and kindred objects, sustained by garlands of flowers and of foliage, all gilded and placed on a white ground.

Each of the three grand divisions of the salle are subdivided into three parts by motives, wherein are children and heads, sustained by garlands and fissures in white, which rather neutralize the garishness of the gold. The boxes are hung with red velvet paper, and are furnished with sofas and arm-chairs. The salle is lighted by a chandelier of crystal and gilt bronze, containing 128 gas jets, and eight new girandoles. When you are informed that all the gilding is of the purest gold leaf, and recollect that it still has the freshness of novelty, you may conceive the splendor of the opera house. This is the last restoration this opera house will receive, the government contemplating building a new opera house before long.

Rubini.

[The following interesting account of that rara avis, a great tenor, is from the French of M. Escudier, and was written as long ago as 1840. Rubini is now living, in princely retirement, in the neighborhood of Milan.]

Rubini is still young. He was born in 1795 at Romano, a little estate situate at four leagues from Bergamo. In 1811 he formed part of the choruses of the theatre of that town, and was the last of the choristers. He was subsequently attached to a strolling company, which he soon left to go on a pilgrimage through Italy with a violin player of the name of Modi. But the tribulations and vicissitudes of that wandering life soon disgusted him, and he accepted an engagement at Pavia. His success there was attended with great éclat, and summoned him successively to Brescia, Venice and, lastly, to Naples, where the director, Barbaja, made him appear before the public with Pelligrini and Nozzari, in two operas composed for him by Fioravanti, Adelson y Salvini and Comingio. In 1819 he sang at Rome in La Gazza Ladra with Mlle. Monbelli, and at Palermo with Lablache and Donzelli. At Naples, whither he returned after those bright excursions, he found Mlle. Chomil, a distinguished cantatrice, who shortly after became his wife, and thence he proceeded with her to Vienna, which capital gave him a memorable reception.

It was on the 6th of October, 1831, that Rubini appeared for the first time at Paris, in La Cenerentola. His career as an artiste has been since but an uninterrupted series of triumphs in France, England, Austria, and Italy, the cradle of his fame. Those triumphs are too recent, and have excited too much attention in the musical world, to require any detail of them at our hands. Besides, it is not a biography of this great singer that we wish to write, but rather an analytical examination of his method, which, without ever having been written, has had nevertheless, like Garcia's, an undeniable influence over all the schools of singing.

Rubini's voice is that of a tenor, in the full acceptance of that word. It begins from E, and rises in petto notes to B above the lines; it continues in di testa notes to the F, ever in an intonation of perfect justness and evenness. Thus the scale which it runs over is of two octaves and one note. But that is but its ordinary compass; for we have heard Rubini in Donizetti's Roberto Devereux leap even to G. He had, indeed, never ascended so high; and he himself, after that tour de force, appeared astonished at the feat.

So much for its extent. As for its power, it has not been below what the strongest dramatic expression may require from a singer. But this strength, however great, never offends the ear by too rough bursts. His voice is enveloped, as it were, in a light gauze, which, without interfering with the most rapid leaps, softens the asperities almost always inseparable from an energetic vibration. Hence the unspeakable sweetness and charm which spreads round the singer when he utters passages of sorrow and tenderness. It is of him that one may say without exaggeration, that he has tears in his voice.

We willingly acknowledge that nature comes in for a large share in those qualities so rare and so precious, but what art has added is immense. One of the wonders of that art is revealed in the transitions from the chest to the head voice, and vice versa. When he has reached the limit of the chest register, E, for instance, the change in entering the head voice is effected so marvellously that it is impossible to seize the moment of the transition. Another of those wonders is that, gifted with very broad lungs, and which respire a large quantity of air, he measures his respiration with so much dexterity that he loses of his breath but just what is required to produce the sound proportioned to the value of the notes. His manner of drawing breath is also one of the secrets of art for which it is impossible to account. He so cleverly dissembles the artifice of respiration, that, in the longest passages, one cannot perceive the moment when his breath is renewed. To explain such a phenomenon, he must fill and empty his lungs almost instantaneously, and without the least interruption, as would be the case with a cup which one emptied with one hand and filled with the other. It may be easily imagined what advantage a singer must derive from such a faculty, which he is as much indebted for to nature as to practice. By this means he can impart to his phrases a brilliant and varied color, for his organ retains in its graduation the strength necessary for commencing, pursuing, and ending, without any interruption, the longest periods.

There are those who, after seeing Rubini, will tell you that he is a cold and stiff actor, if they do not even add that he is no actor at all. This is another error that it is easy to dispel. This immobility he is reproached with is the necessary consequence of his manner of singing. Behold Rubini in those famous adagios, when motionless, and his head inclined backwards to open to sound a broader passage, he raises that harmonious and limpid voice which moves the audience so deeply! The slightest motion of the body would produce a waving in that voice which is of itself so sure, and deprive it of that evenness and finish whose charm is unspeakable. It is his voice that weeps, and makes you weep; you are moved—you feel enraptured; Talma himself, with his admirable mimic powers, did not produce more stirring effects.

Such are the various aspects under which this great singer presents himself. Nature and art have combined to render him a real phenomenon. His voice is strong, sweet, just, and even; it is nature which has made it thus, and nature never proved more liberal. His method is a perfect one, because it is founded in truth and the most exquisite taste. Rubini has carried scientific singing to perfection; he does better all that was done before him, and art is moreover indebted to him for many innovations which have already enriched all methods. Thus, to mention but one, Rubini has been the first to introduce into song those vigorous aspirations which consist in protracting a sound upon the same note before the solution of the cadence. This shake imparted to the voice, this sort of musical sob, ever produces a great effect, and there is now no singer that does not strive to imitate it.

Yet, as nothing in the world is quite perfect, Rubini likewise pays his tribute to human nature. In our opinion he is too negligent in his manner of delivering a recitativo. Then again in ensemble pieces, he does not even take the trouble to sing; and when he condescends to open his lips, it is to remain completely silent. One may say that Rubini does not exist in ensemble pieces. He likewise often sings with his chest voice. It is, perhaps, to these naïf artifices that Rubini is indebted for the so complete preservation of his organ, which is now as fresh as in his most youthful days; but it is not the less true, that by that excessive laziness he may endanger the dramatic conception of the composer, and paralyze the exertions of his comrades.

We have said nothing of Rubini's private character, for our object was the artist only; but we cannot dismiss this brief sketch without doing justice to his generous feelings, the simplicity of his habits, and the kindness of his heart. All his comrades, and all who have had opportunities of knowing him, will bear witness to his eminent qualities, both as an artist and as a man of the world.

A correspondent of a morning paper, writing from New York, says one of the uppermost of the upper ten thousand, in the Dress Circle, at the Opera the other evening, boasted of wearing jewelry that had cost $2500 at a Broadway establishment the day before.—We are told by the same writer, that the receipts at the Italian Opera average about $2500 per night; the Broadway theatre $3000; the National $3000; the Bowery $2000; Wallack's $2200; Burton's $2200; the Hippodrome $3000; Barnum's Museum $1500; Jullien $1500; making, with an addition of $2000 more for the various other places of public amusement, a nightly expenditure of $22,000! Immense this; but then they think nothing of it in New York.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

That "Monster Concert by Young Ladies."

FRIEND DWIGHT:—In thy journal of the 7th month and 6th day thou dost speak of a concert given by the pupils of Friend Taylor. Old Quakerdom seldom replieth to anything, lest peradventure he should stir up the Old Adam both in himself and others; still he doth decide to speak a few words to thee, not in behalf of himself, (because truth compelleth him to tell thee it is unnecessary, as Friend Taylor possesseth a reputation throughout the Southern States that thou and thy journal do not, and he doth verily fear never will) but that thou mayst know more in regard to the object &c., &c. of music in the Southern Female Institutions. And furthermore, he verily thinketh that not only thee, but thy German encomiast "Hoplit" could gain a wrinkle or two from Madison even, although he doth not expect thee to look to Madison for the music of the future. (Query.—Doth the world musical acknowledge Boston as the place to look to for the music of the future?)

To criticize fairly, Friend Dwight, thou shouldst take into consideration the object, performers, &c. &c.—Verily thou wouldst not expect the same from young school girls, that thou wouldst from Jullien's troupe!

That thou mayst better comprehend what I say to thee, I will put "Old Broadbrim" under my chair for a while and speak to thee in thy own worldly tongue.

Music, in the Southern Female Institution, is taught as a recreation and accomplishment, and not with a view of making Artists. The time given to it by the pupils is one hour a day, during one or two years, and in some few cases from three to four years. A Concert is usually given once a year, for the double purpose of showing the improvement of the pupils, and the gratification of their parents and friends. These Concerts have an effect upon musical taste, and those of us who direct them, are responsible in a measure for the improvement of the taste of the mass, but one cannot expect us to improve the taste, otherwise than by degrees. It will not do to force an apothecaries' shop down a sick man's throat, at once; because a few pills at a time do him good.—We are all musically sick, that is, there is music which we cannot appreciate; but when given us in broken and repeated doses, improves our musical health. Germany, the very heart and brain of music, has had composers who were not appreciated in their times. Why are they now? Because by frequent bearing of their compositions, musical taste has been improved.

The performers at the "Monster Concert" were school girls, some of whom had taken lessons but a few weeks; it is not expected that they would be able to play the most Classic Music. There are those who are called Artists (and Boston is not clear in this) who would have a much better effect upon their hearers if they confined themselves, in public, to such music as is within the bounds of their ability and appreciation. We claim to be progressive here; and if the music of Von Weber, Jullien, Donizetti, Strauss, Boieldieu, Labitzky, Auber and Meyerbeer, being played by young (and musically, in regard to the length of time of practice, very young) ladies is not progressive and calculated to improve musical taste in your judgment, then we must agree to forever disagree. Perhaps you will say such music will do very well if it was played well. In answer to this, I will state, in behalf of the young ladies of the "Monster Concert," that there were between one and two thousand of the most intelligent sons and daughters (whose opinion, collectively at least, I presume is worth nearly as much as that of Mr. J. S. Dwight, editor of Dwight's Journal of Music, individually,) of Georgia and sister states present, and although in a very warm room, and so much crowded that from two to three hundred persons had to stand for the space of two and a half hours, without intermission, there was as much interest manifested, and as good order kept, as I have ever seen in your city or New York, during a musical performance.

Although such a piece as No. 1, Part 2d, of "Monster Concert" may have no real high merit as a musical composition, still it serves a very important purpose—unless the pupils were well drilled in time, they never could keep together in such a combination.

As to No. 1, Part 3d, although we like much that is foreign, especially in music, and had no celebration of the last Fourth of July, still, had you been present at the performance of this piece, you would have seen no "intensely harrowing excitement," but that we love our country.

Some time ago, a review of the different Musical Journals appeared in the Visitor, (a copy of which was sent to you) of this place, under the signature of "Chord of the Seventh," in which, although Dwight's Journal was well spoken of, still the review recommended more cordially to the public, The New York Musical World & Times. Do you not think that this had a "little bit" of influence on you when you wrote the article headed "Monster Concert by Young Ladies?"

Having more important matters to attend to, I have deferred noticing the "Monster Concert" till a moment when I have nothing else to do. In fact, I intended, (owing to the limited circulation of your Journal,) to say nothing, nor should I now, were it not that the article had been copied by the Yankee Blade.

Should you get a chance to slip out of the chair editorial long enough for a visit South, give us a call, and we will both show and teach thee something—don't open your eyes in astonishment, and think, Well! here's presumption; but come, for I tell ye again we will teach and show you something, even if you be a "Great Bostonian," and we nothing but a "Little Madsonian."

Respectfully Yours, etc.,

GEO. C. TAYLOR.

P. S. If being in favor of a lady learning to play the violin, viola, violoncello, or contra-basso, is being a Woman's Rights man, then I am one, most emphatically.

REMARKS.—As the writer of the above appears to feel aggrieved by us, we give him the full benefit of his complaint in his own peculiar vernacular. Most of our readers may have forgotten, or never noticed that, some two or three months since (Aug. 6 was the date) we amused ourselves, and thought to amuse our readers, under the above caption, with a very formidable and curious concert programme, which it was hardly possible to treat seriously. The conductor thereof, our aggrieved "friend," was an entire stranger to us, so that we could not bear him any malice. It was the intrinsic humor of the thing, (the grand array of pieces played on "nine pianos," the "quintette by 114 hands," the grand Yankee Doodle battle piece, &c., &c.), that moved us. We thought the thing in itself a droll monstrosity and think so still. At this late date, Mr. Friend Taylor sends us this, his well-tempered, but sarcastic, withering reply. To print it is to add something to the fun, at the same time that in so doing we "fulfil all righteousness" to the aggrieved party. We remind the writer, that we made no criticism on the performance of his pupils, since we did not hear them; that we did consider the fact that his exccutantes were scholars in a literary seminary, where music could hold only secondary regard, and for that reason did we marvel that their precious hours should be spent in preparation for displays so only quasi musical; and we assure him that we have no disposition to measure the worth of our own "individual" musical judgment against that of "the collective judgment of two thousand sons and daughters of the South," &c. Moreover we assure him that we never saw or heard of the "Visitor" to which he alludes, so that no notice in it of our journal could have spited us in the way which we are too happy to leave to thin-skinned professors. Editors are not apt to have the same sensitiveness, as musical professors, to what the newspapers may say.—ED.

FEMALE ORCHESTRAS.—Such things are not unheard of, or at least not unimagined. That luxurious travelling genius, William Beckford, pretends to have seen and heard as follows in Venice, in 1780.

"The sight of the orchestra," he says, "still makes me smile. You know, I suppose, it is entirely of the feminine gender, and that nothing is more common than to see a delicate white hand journeying across an enormous double bass, or a pair of roseate cheeks puffing, with all their efforts, at a French horn. Some that are grown old and Amazonian, who have abandoned their fiddles and their lovers, take vigorously to the kettle-drum; and one poor limping lady, who had been crossed in love, now makes an admirable figure on the bassoon."

From my Diary. No. XXVIII.

NEW YORK, Oct. 6. I like this little passage in one of Auerbach's Black Forest Village Histories, which being translated runneth thus: Reinhard, a painter, has married a peasant girl and taken her to the city, where one evening he takes "Lorle" and the Assistant Librarian, his friend, to a concert.

After a Beethoven Symphony, the Librarian said, "Now tell me honestly, would you not rather have heard a good waltz?"

Lorle replied, "To tell the truth, yes!"

The Librarian, overjoyed, went to Reinhard and said, "You have a noble wife, and one of a thousand, for she has just had the courage to confess openly that she grew weary with Beethoven."

Reinhard bit his lips, but on getting home said gently to Lorle, "You must not be deceived by the Librarian; he is all taken up with his books, you must never laugh at or venture an opinion upon what you do not fully understand. That is not the only music which sets the body in motion; there is also music by which we allow our souls to be elevated and depressed, to which we give full sway, raised above all earthly things—the soul free and alone. I cannot explain this to you, you will find it out yourself; but you must cherish a feeling of respect for things to which so many great men have devoted their lives. Only pay due attention and you will in time understand these things."

Lorle promised to take heed.

At the last concert of the winter, the Librarian, after some piece, asked her again what she thought, and her reply was:

"On everything, yet I don't know on what. When the flutes and trumpets and violins are talking so together, now calling to each other, and then all speaking together, it is indeed as if other beings than men conversed, and it is such a delight to think of all sorts of things, and that so peacefully; it is as if the thoughts had gone rambling in a musical world, here and there."

The Librarian muttered to himself, "Oh wo! she is also growing enlightened."

Oct. 10. Rub-a-dub, Rub-a-dub, slam bang crash! There goes the third of those heaven-assaulting bands by our windows within the last hour. A friend says that some of these bands actually play tunes! This must be apocryphal, for if so, they would not cover them up with such a horrible racket.

One dark, foggy morning, the story goes, Napoleon ordered 300 drummers to march up to the walls of a beleaguered city. The thundering noise led the besieged to suppose the whole French army on the move, and at the proper moment, by their reckoning, they touched the train to a mine, explosion followed and not one of those three hundred drummers has written to his friends since.

Fill your glasses, friends, and drink to the memory of Napoleon!

Oct. 12. A Mendelssohn Night at Jullien's! There is no necessity now to make the grand tour to hear music. Could you have been with me, Will W., you would cease to sigh for those Sinfonie Soirées in the Schauspielhaus. I do think Jullien is the finest conductor I ever saw, and what a programme he gave us! That A minor Symphony, so exquisitely melancholy, and yet so expressive of the struggle of despair—Prometheus chained to the rock—yet that Scherzo is anything but a despairing Prometheus—is worthy of Beethoven, when played. Had not Mendelssohn the finest taste of all composers? Is not his instrumentation the richest? Are not his combinations, especially of the wood band, more delicious than those of any other? Is he not the Claude of music? He seems deficient in mere melody, in long, regularly constructed airs, with beginning, middle, and end,—[Indeed! friend Diarist, do you not forget?—Ed.] doubtful if there is one in all his works, like those of Mozart, Rossini, or even of half a dozen second and third rate composers, but a flow of melodious harmony from the entire orchestra! None but a composer of the first rank could have chained that great audience to-night, in a city, too, not over and above distinguished for its appreciation of orchestral music (ask the Philharmonic Society), as that was chained. I declare, it was delightful, after all the misery suffered last winter at the Philharmonic concerts from whisperers, and talkers, and nestlers, and fidgetters, and hummers, and drummers, to be able to listen to a whole symphony in peace. Peace be within the walls of those people for it!

Then that Midsummer Night's Dream music; how indescribably beautiful in itself, how doubly beautiful when so given! And how Jullien himself enjoys it! Call him a humbug! Why, he actually filled the hall with fairies—and those who could not see them had better procure a pair of the spectacles of fancy for the next time. As the Turks say, there is one Mendelssohn and Jullien (to-night) was his prophet. Think of "Elijah" being performed by this orchestra with singers and chorus to match!

Anna Zerr sang "Hear ye Israel," from that Oratorio, and sang every note tremolo. Hayter used to play the organ tremolo in the Dead March in Sampson, and the effect was most powerful. But it is quite another thing when heard continually in the throat of second and third rate prima donnas. It is abominable. When Gretry heard Mehul's "Uthal," in which were no violins, he exclaimed, "I would give a Louis to hear a cricket chirp at this moment." I would have given half that to have heard one pure, smooth tone sung to-night. My brother has a dog call made tremolo by a little ball inside. It is a very bad whistle. I reckon the Frauleins with a dry pea in her throat. No matter, 'twas a great concert.

Oct. 14. The N. Y. Tribune has a proof reader who exhibits a remarkable knowledge of Shakspeare. In Jullien's Concert Bill this morning is the following:

4 COMIC MARCH of Bottom, Quince, Senig, and the others, proceeding to their Dramatic representation—the characteristic Overture to the Mock Drama of "Pyasenus and Thisbe."

Fine Arts.

"Pilgrim's Progress" in One Picture.

This curious engraving we have already mentioned with some admiration. It is now ready, (see our advertising columns) for purchasers, and we learn that it is meeting with a rapid sale. To look at it again is to perceive new beauties, and to feel new wonder at the manner in which the designer and engraver have contrived to overcome so many difficulties. Truly they have solved what would seem to be an impossible problem in Art. They have made a beautiful, harmonious, artistic whole out of a wilderness of almost unmanageable details, and grouped into one present picture a long, imaginary series of events. To be sure, we cannot and never could be partial to the employment of pictorial and plastic art upon allegorical subjects. Allegory is better told in old John Bunyan's plain vernacular way, than painted. It is fitter for the mind's eye, than for the eye of sense. No allegorical picture can ever be a very great picture. All the warm coloring, the delicate and luxurious fancies of Cole never could quite reconcile us to his "Course of Empire" and vision of "Life" pictures. There will be something cold, faint, abstract and mechanical about all such products; they still lack the wholesome, solid impress of reality.

Viewed purely from the side of Art, therefore, no pictorial illustration of Bunyan's allegory could belong to the best and greatest kind of Art. But the picture now under notice is not to be so viewed; it belongs rather to a mixed, ambiguous category; its sphere is one that lies between Art proper, (which first of all things must address the eye, dealing entirely with the concrete,) and poetic allegory, whose beginning and end are in the mind, the only dwelling place of intellectual abstractions. But this mixed sphere legitimates itself, in a case like the present, by the plea of illustration and instruction. It is as an aid to the memory and comprehension of Bunyan's allegory, and not as a pure Art-product, that it makes its claim on our attention. In furnishing this aid, it may borrow more or less from Art, according to the skill and taste and genius of the illustrator. A good translator of a foreign poem must be something of a poet; so a good translator of a word-woven into a linear or colored design, must be something of an artist. And we feel that the requisition is well met in this design of Hammatt Billings, as engraved by Andrews. The Pilgrim's progress is here clearly, beautifully illustrated; spread before the eye at one view in its entirety and in all the mutual connection of its parts; at a glance the whole history lies and glows before us. In every house where Bunyan's work is cherished, it would be well that there should hang this fine key and invitation to the glorious thought-journeys of the poem.

SONG OF THE GOLDEN WEB.

INSCRIBED TO HIS LITTLE STATUE, "THE WEAVER,"

BY B. H. KINNEY, SCULPTOR.

I spring the treadle with a cheerful tread,
And ply the shuttle of the golden thread,
And swing the lathe with an earnest blow,
That merrily round the wheel may go.
For I am the weaver of the Golden Web.
And spring the treadle with a cheerful tread.

My woof I weave from the golden beam,
And curb the dashing mountain stream,
To twirl the spindle, and speed the loom,
And I gaily laugh mid the busy hum;
For I am the weaver of the Golden Web,
And ply the shuttle of the golden thread.

I weave a golden robe for all,
Who never shrink from duty's call;
And a golden mantle ever fling
O'er Genius, like an Angel's wing.
O! I am a weaver of the Golden Web,
For I ply the shuttle of the golden thread,
And I spring the treadle with a cheerful tread,
For I am the weaver of the Golden Web.

WANTED.—A heavy Premium will be paid for a new Tema, of eight to sixteen bars, upon which to exhibit instrumental "ground and lofty tumbling." The "Carnival de Venise" having been in constant use from Paganini down to the present day, has been worn threadbare, and critics and the public will endure it no longer. Apply to any of the instrumental soloists of M. Jullien's band, or to any other Solo instrumentalist now in the country.

P. S. Musical journals throughout the world are requested to copy the above.

BOSTON, OCT. 22, 1853.

Music at Home.

The musical season is opening apace, and with a rush of preparation and great promise. Plainly, the multitude of concerts, even if you weed out all that is spurious and trashy, and confine the number strictly to the concerts of good music, will exceed any person's power of close and critical appreciation. We shall report as fully and as fairly as we can, within the natural limits of our time, strength, opportunity, fit state of mind and body, and so forth. To notice every speciality; to weigh out to each individual what he may deem his just portion of notice; to consider all the little private interests and personalities that go to the making up of a concert, is more than any reasonable mortal can expect of us amid such distracting frequency and promiscuity of intellectual feasting. But we may do perhaps what is far better. We may cull out from the bewildering multitude of topics, a practicable number of good texts, whereby to draw attention to important general truths and principles in Art and in the formation of sound taste. We may use the worst, sometimes, as well as the best, of what we may hear performed, by way of text and warrant for renewed attempts to point out and insist upon the true, the noble, the alone satisfactory and enduring in our Art. Would that the individuals, the artists, whose productions or performances we have to notice, could be as content to merge their private personality in this great work of opening the ears and souls of people to good music, as we shall be to dismiss and disregard all personal considerations in our passing comments.

Meanwhile the campaign has begun. First of all come the light skirmishers, the fantastic solo-players, virtuosos, brilliant executionists. These "finger knights" and wizards steal a march upon the advancing solid columns, to figure a little in the foreground of the season, while the field is free. They choose their time shrewdly, for we verily believe their day is short! Once let the grand orchestra, the grand chorus, commence operations, and who is any longer dazzled by their feats? Now is not here a text, and of the gravest, though the suggestors thereof be fantastical and light. Had we the eloquence of the old prophets we would fain preach upon this text a solemn lesson, in tone at once affectionate and fearless, on the false tendency into which so much musical talent and unwearied culture has been coaxed and flattered by the cheap and noisy admiration of ignorant and superficial publics. What youthful energies and precious time are thrown away upon the sheer vanity of showing the world one's skill in the achievement of unmeaning difficulties! How pitifully the virtuoso's art lies in astonishing and making the idler portion of an audience clap their hands, than in expressing aught that music should express! How much music is written first and then performed and kept unreasonably in the foreground of the public hearing, simply to show off the musician! How much of the most painfully laborious virtuosity, is yet sadly not in earnest, since it thinks more of the effect than of the intrinsic quality of its own Art!

In noticing the concerts already past, let us begin with the one which may be considered the novelty of the season; namely:

GOTTSCHALK.

The extravagant fame and the peculiar kind of enthusiasm which preceded the arrival of the young New Orleans virtuoso, announced in the bills always as "the great American pianist," had forewarned us what to expect of him. We expected brilliant execution, together with perhaps some little touch of individuality enough to lend a charm to pretty but by no means deeply interesting or important compositions of his own. Some of the compositions we had heard from other players, and by their triviality were forced to feel that either these belied him, or that it was by sheer professional puffery that he had been so long proclaimed the peer of Liszt and Thalberg and even Chopin; all of whom, particularly the last, have been true tone-poets, of decided individuality, which is stamped upon their written works, with which the Gottschalk Bananiers and Dances Ossianiques bear no more comparison than the lightest magazine verses with the inspired lyrics of the great bards. Yet upon composition, it would seem, he takes his stand; for in his programme of Tuesday evening every piece performed by him was of his own composing; and the newspaper and pamphlet biographies of him, innumerable letters from abroad, and eulogistic critiques in the papers, from New York to New Orleans, harp upon this with a peculiar energy.

Well, at the concert—which, by the way, did not half fill the Boston Music Hall, owing partly we believe to the one dollar price, and partly, we hope, to distrust of an artist who plays wholly his own compositions—our expectation was confirmed. There was indeed most brilliant execution;—we have heard none more brilliant, but are not yet prepared to say that Jacell's was less so. Gottschalk's touch is the most clear and crisp and beautiful that we have ever known. His play is free and bold and sure and graceful in the extreme; his runs pure and liquid, his figures always clean and perfectly defined; his command of rapid octave passages prodigious; and so we might go through with all the technical points of masterly execution. It was great execution. But what is execution, without some thought and meaning in the combinations to be executed?

Could a more trivial and insulting string of musical rigmarole have been offered to an audience of earnest music-lovers than "American Reminiscences" to begin with! These consisted of a thin and feeble preluding, in which the right hand ran with exquisitely liquid evenness and brightness up and down the highest octaves, over and over, without any progress of ideas, as if it were mere scale-exercises, followed at last by fragmentary and odd allusions to "Old Folks at Home," and then by that homely tune, (which seems to be a sort of catching, melodic itch of the times) fully developed, and then varied in divers difficult and astounding ways. Also "O Susanna" (if we remember rightly) in the same fashion. There was an eruption of silly applause here, and an encore which he answered with—"Yankee Doodle"! We say silly applause; for who, that admired such execution as a power worth having, could but feel melancholy to see the power so thrown away? and who that went there eager to hail and praise a young native artist, could but be mortified to see an artist so little in earnest with his Art, and to find the dilettante public still so ready to extol as Art what properly is little more than sleight of hand!

The most imposing piece of Mr. GOTTSCHALK was called "Jerusalem, a triumphal fantasia," for two pianos, in the great difficulties of which he was ably seconded by Mr. J. PYCHOWSKY, who played at disadvantage from a hastily made manuscript copy. In portions of this there was a certain De Meyer-like pomp and breadth of harmony; but the ideas seemed commonplace and the work as a whole left but a heavy and confused impression. There was a certain grace and individuality in the Savanna and Bananiere, which he styles "Poetic Caprices," though not enough to build the fame of genius on. His "Carnival of Venice" we did not hear.

Skilful, graceful, brilliant, wonderful, we own his playing was. But players less wonderful have given us far deeper satisfaction. We have seen a criticism upon that concert in which it was regretted that his music was too fine for common apprehension, "too much addressed to the reasoning faculties," &c. To us the want was that it did not address the reason, that it seemed empty of ideas, of inspiration; that it spake little to the mind or heart, excited neither meditation nor emotion, but simply dazzled by the display of difficult feats gracefully and easily achieved. But of what use were all these difficulties?—"Difficult! I wish it was impossible," said Dr. Johnson.) Why all that rapid tossing of handsfull of chords from the middle to the highest octaves, lifting the hand with such conscious appeal to our eyes? To what end all those rapid octave passages? since in the intervals of easy execution, in the seemingly quiet impromptu passages, the music grew so monotonous and commonplace; the same little figure repeated and repeated, after listless pauses, in a way which conveyed no meaning, no sense of musical progress, but only the appearance of fastidiously critical scale-practising.

We seriously doubt if Gottschalk's forte is composition. A far less brilliant fortune would have been a far truer friend and teacher to him. They have wronged him, who have assured him that his trivial though graceful fantasies were enough to place him in the rank of finely original piano-forte composers. He must do more and very different from that to earn the title. But in justice to him, we are assured that he does play the compositions of the masters with real understanding and indeed con amore, and it promises well for him that in his second programme he announces his determination to play classical music, from Beethoven, Onslow, &c. We shall rejoice to forgive and forget all hitherto, if with his splendid execution, he will evince the soul and fire and judgment also for the interpretation of such works.

Mr. GOTTSCHALK was assisted by a singer, Mlle. BEHREND, who possesses a voice of truly beautiful quality, power, and great compass, but with little skill of execution. In the rapid harmonic variations of Mme. Sontag's Swiss Song, half the notes were inaudible; but now and then a simple, sustained tone filled the great hall gloriously.

A charming feature of the concert was the admirable harp-playing of Mr. APTOMMAS, a young Welshman, who had lived long in France and England, hearing the best masters, but forming his own school. There is a fresh glow of youth and health in his cheeks, and he has the appearance of a modest, earnest, genial artist. We have never before heard the harp so played; its clear, rich, mellow tones rang through the hall like a bell. Every ear craves new refreshment from his minstrelsy. But away with the romantic stuff about "Welsh harper;" he plays the modern, artificial, Erard double action harp, (one of the most difficult of instruments), and his music is modern and metropolitan as that of Thalberg, though he is Welshman born.

In responding to the encore of his Dance des Fées, he had the ill luck to suppose the audience wished to hear "Yankee Doodle," not having been present in the beginning of the evening and not knowing that Gottschalk had already selected the same rare and marvellous theme. We are sure he is too earnest a musician to repeat this experiment.

OLE BULL.

The Norwegian opened the season, and has given three or four concerts in the Boston Music Hall, to large and applauding audiences. He has been playing his old pieces, mostly the same by which he first introduced himself in America, in the days of our childish hero or rather virtuoso-worship. Ole Bull's position as an artist is well enough settled to require no criticism now. We heard him but once, and for a few moments. We entered the hall and found him deep in the middle of "Yankee Doodle" unaccompanied, looking as if rapt and wrestling with the inward spasms of a Pythian frenzy under the influence of that emptiest of all tunes, which people "whistle for the want of thought." And so we have it. With Ole Bull the word is "Yankee Doodle"; with Gottschalk, also, "Yankee Doodle"; and Aptommas "keeps it up"; when Jullien comes it will be "Yankee Doodle Dandie!" It would seem as if the good report of our last year's musical season, and the purification of our temple from these evil spirits by that grand series of true classic concerts, had provoked said spirits to beleaguer our fair city in the outset of the season and endeavor to surprise us unawares, reversing our fair fame; and there is always enough of the old Adam left in all promiscuous audiences to lay us open to the enemy's insidious or bold and impudent approaches. But we fear not; the good seeds have been sown.

Ole Bull played his "Carnival of Venice" with wonderful beauty, and grotesque humor. The rich tones of his instrument seemed in that hall the richest and purest that we ever heard from the violin. He was assisted by STRAKOSCH, the pianist, whom we did not hear; and by the charming child canta-ricce, little ADELINA PATTI, whose voice is of the rarest beauty, purity and penetrating power. Her delivery of Jenny Lind's "Herdsman's Song" was truly admirable, and bespeaks the greatest promise.

GRAND FESTIVAL IN TREMONT TEMPLE.

Here was a beginning of something serious, and therefore to be respected. The concert announced for Saturday last by Messrs. ECKHARDT, KEYZER, SCHLIMPER, FRENZEL, MAASS and PERABEAU, did not draw the audience it deserved, considering that there was so much excellent in the programme. Hummel's Septuor could not fail to interest; but there seemed to our ears a lack of perfect unity of pitch among the instruments, which chilled the effect. The horn part, too, was stammering and uncertain, so that we scarcely recognized those exquisite little obligato passages which fall to its share. Mr. PERABEAU executed the piano part with skill and brilliancy, but we thought with rather a tendency sometimes to over-hasten the tempo. The quartet of Beethoven, by Messrs. ECKHARDT, KEYZER, &c., was very well played. Miss CURRAN, a young lady of pleasing, modest appearance and who looks as if she meant to be in earnest with her Art, made her first appearance as a vocalist. She has a mezzo soprano voice of bright, clear quality and considerable power, as yet not much developed, though there is some charm and promise in her singing. By the way, did not the pianist take the Mendelssohn song: Auf Flügeln des Gesanges, quite too fast for her? Miss MARY SAUL, the "wonderful pianist" of nine years, did not impress us as wonderful, but only clever. We must doubt the policy of introducing unripe school performances in a public concert.

The Classical Matinées of these gentlemen will soon commence, and we wish them all success.

So much for what is past. To-night we renew the old feasts and triumphs of the

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY.

This little orchestra has long been our standard of the good and genuine in instrumental music; and even in the presence of Jullien's great means and mastery, we still look to them for our purest and most enduring musical satisfaction. This time, however, they are a big orchestra. Their numbers are more than doubled, increased to about fifty! It made us happy in their rehearsal to see the well known faces of our best resident musicians, mingled in their ranks. This new harmony cannot but be productive of the best results. Now we shall have the fine outline of the old Germania symphony enriched by the instruments of a grand orchestra. Ten excellent violins they have now, where they had only two or three! And it is a pleasure to recognize among them FRIES and SUCK and KEYZER and others of our own.

The new feature of to-night will be Wagner's overture to Tannhäuser. Here is something new, and great as new. We have heard it, and burn to say what—but patience! we will not speak yet. The programme of the whole concert is in another column.

JULLIEN.

On Monday night the good people of Boston are to hear a greater orchestra, with greater solo-players, and a more famous conductor, than they have ever heard before. At first everything will please and excite, because of the novelty and beauty of instrumental effects. After that, by degrees, we shall grow more critical and exacting as regards the programme. But Jullien can play the best kind of music. If he makes a colossal toy of the grand orchestra in his quadrilles and polkas, he has also his Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Mozart nights, in which he proves his love and power of interpreting the finest works. Since our letter from New York, we were present last week at his Mendelssohn Night, and never before have we so felt the power and beauty of the A minor (or Scotch) Symphony. That Scherzo, which we shall hear on Monday, was made thrice beautiful by the exquisite neatness and distinctness of his solo-instruments in those little passages for oboe, flute, &c., which wind in and out in the very complex texture of the composition.

Jullien is to play every evening for a fortnight. What better way to familiarize the public ear with orchestral effects? Jullien takes his stand as the musical indoctrinator of the masses. Does he not miscalculate, then, in putting his tickets at a dollar! In Castle Garden he had half-a-dollar; there his orchestra exceeded a hundred; here, we are told, it will consist of but sixty or seventy instruments. We fear the masses will not go many nights to pay more for less than was given in New York. M. Jullien will find it for his interest, too, to give afternoon concerts.

PARIS.—Mme. Bosio, from the Royal Italian Opera in London, is now here.—Le Nabab, a new opera by Halevy, and Marco Spada, continue to attract crowded audiences to the Opera Comique.—Madame Lagrange and Signor Calzolari have returned to Paris from Lyons, where they have been performing with great success at the Italian Opera.—M. Brandus & Co., the music-publishers, have announced their intention to publish in a cheap form the vocal scores of Robert le Diable, the Huguenots, the Prophète, the Juive, and the Chaperons blancs.—Mlle. Claus has left Paris for Geneva (Switzerland).—Meyerbeer's new comic opera, provisionally entitled L'Etoile du Nord (libretto by Scribe), was read to the vocalists last week.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

The Germania Musical Society

HAVE the honor to announce to their kind patrons and the music-loving community of Boston and vicinity, that they will give their First Grand Subscription Concert, On Saturday Evening, Oct. 23d.

Being thankful for the past liberal support received from the Concert-going public, the Society have readily gratified the desire of their patrons, to enlarge the Orchestra in all its departments, and it consists at present of about

FIFTY THOROUGH MUSICIANS, INCLUDING THE MEMBERS OF THE QUINTETTE CLUB,
and many of the best resident musicians in Boston, forming in all as complete an orchestra as can appear in this city.
They will also be assisted by

Mlle Caroline Pintard,

A very superior Vocalist, and Carl Hause, Pianist.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

1. Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67, Beethoven.
Allegro con brio—Andante con molto—Scherzo—Finale.
2. Aria, from the Opera "Maria di Rudenz," Donizetti.
Sung by Mlle CAROLINE PINTARD.
3. Invitation to the Dance, Weber.
Arranged for the Orchestra by Hector Berlioz.

PART II.

THE GREAT AMERICAN PICTURE. John Bunyan's Immortal Allegory.

Probably no Book, save the Bible, has been so extensively read as Bunyan's Immortal Allegory,

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

It has been translated into nearly all the different languages of Christendom, and been perused with delight and holy fervor by all nations. Art has lent her attractions in nearly all the forms of illustration, from the rough Wood Cut to the exquisite Steel Engraving. But to the middle of the nineteenth century, and to an American Clergyman, are we indebted for the only true pictorial conception of this immortal work.

The novel and sublime idea of embodying the ENTIRE STORY, and transferring the same to a SINGLE PICTURE, showing the wanderings of Christian from the "City of Destruction" to the "Celestial City," presenting at one view to the eye the varied scenes through which he passed, originated with DANIEL WIGHT, of Massachusetts. His truly original and beautiful conception was reduced to a most elegant design by HAMMATT BILLINGS, and from this design, JOSEPH ANDREWS, the distinguished historical engraver, has produced, after four years of labor, a Picture which will take rank among the most superb and elaborate productions of human genius, taste, and skill.

The Picture is now ready, and will be offered for sale at the Bookstore of the Publishers, and by Agents duly authorized by the Publishers.

The best works on Piano Instruction existing.

IN PRESS:—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO-FORTE, translated from the latest and most approved German Edition, by G. A. SCHMITT.

Also JUL. KNORR'S REVISED EDITION OF A. E. MULLER'S METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.

The above works are in reality the most complete, elaborate, and, at the same time, condensed works on the subject of which they treat. They contain Studies and Examples which will lead the scholar to a mastery of all the modern achievements of the Art; and are, in the opinion of leading German critics, the best books on musical instruction extant. The GUIDE is not only a key to the succeeding work, but contains a list of over two hundred pieces, by the first masters, in progressive order, with notes of advice to the teacher, showing how they might be best practised for the advancement of the pupil.

The COMPLETE METHOD contains many suggestions of the greatest importance to Teachers and Pupils that have not been mentioned in any other book of instruction.

These exceedingly valuable works are in press, and will be ready at an early date. OLIVER DITSON, Boston. iii 14 3m

The Purest Tones the Most Effective.

The propagation of sound, both as regards intensity and area, is wonderfully influenced by the purity of the tone:—a quality so frequently neglected by singers and by instrumentists, in favor of dazzling virtuosity or mere rude strength of tone. Many seem not sufficiently aware how important a part is played, both in the æsthetics and the physics of tones, by purity of tone, that is, by the greatest regularity and uniformity in its vibrations; otherwise they would certainly expend more pains upon a property as beautiful in itself as it is most fruitful in its effects.

We have already remarked that, the purer a tone, the more beautiful and positive will be its color (Klangfarbe). We have also found that the purer a tone, the more distinct its impression; and we have now to learn that, the purer a tone, the weaker it may be and yet operate on the ear with the same intensity as a tone that is stronger but less pure. More good results combined could scarcely be desired from one source; and one would think, since the three fundamental conditions of good singing are beauty in the formation of tones, clearness of expression, and moderation in the means, that all singers would strive to acquire these qualities by following the way of purity! But, how many singers are there who sing purely? Since purity of tone depends on uniformity and unity in the vibrations, it is possible to perceive the faintest agitations, if they repeat themselves in perfectly regular sequence and so sum themselves up to a perceptible effect. The tone of the boatswain's whistle is heard through the creaking of joists, through the fluttering of sails, the roar of waves and the howling storm! In the greatest noise and thunder of battle are heard the signals of the horns and trumpets. For, although simultaneously excited by a thousand tones and noises in irregular succession, still the ear remains more susceptible for the steady recurrence of much weaker impulses, which succeed each other at equal intervals.

For the same cause, the Russian horn music—confessedly the type of perfectly pure instrumental music, because every instrument is tuned to only one tone, and in this is tuned perfectly pure—is heard at the distance of nearly a long German mile (5 $\frac{3}{4}$ English miles); other instrumental music, under particularly favorable circumstances, is heard at the farthest but a short German mile (3 $\frac{1}{2}$ English miles); whereas you may hear the marching of a company of soldiers, which is always rhythmical and energetic, only 2000 feet at the farthest. The trampling of a squadron of cavalry on the walk is heard only 1800 feet, but regular gallop 2600 feet.

Entirely similar observations may be made with fire arms. There is no doubt at all which gives the purer, stronger and more far-reaching sound: the discharge of a six-pounder or a salvo of fifty muskets. The quantity of powder fired is in both cases the same, but the fifty men do not press the trigger with perfect simultaneousness, the operation of their fingers is neither concentrated in time nor space, and the consequence is, that the effect of the cannon is much more intense. On the contrary, a well-maintained firing in file, in which each fires immediately after his next man, is far more perceptible to the ear, than the simultaneous platoon firing of the same number of guns; since the platoon fire is always only an irregular and not a precisely simultaneous crack; whereas in the other case blow follows blow with rhythmic regularity. Most completely was this witnessed in the parade firing of the French under Napoleon, known by the name of feu roulant. The troops were trained to fire so quick and regularly one after the other, that blow followed blow, and the salute made an impression as if tone swiftly followed tone in drawing the hand over the keyboard of a piano. This rolling fire, therefore, was comparable in its regularity to the Russian horn music in its purity, and produced, like this, relatively the greatest effect.

The applications of all this to music are self-evident. A purely tuned tympanum rings clearly and distinctly out through twenty drums; one pure solo voice penetrates through a whole choir of singers; one pure solo violin sounds through the whole accompanying orchestra; it is therefore relatively stronger, that is, more perceptible, more sensible to our ear.

Of absolute strength it is not here the question, since it is a well-known fact that by excessive strength a tone is overdone, i. e. becomes impure. When singers with weak voices sing in large theatres, they almost invariably over-reach the tone. They scream, in order to be heard, and the whole effect is that they sing tremulously and make the tone impure! So every wind instrument may, by blowing too hard, be driven to false tones. String instruments, especially steel strings on pianos or harps, are liable to the same thing. If they are struck too violently, the string begins to make not only transverse, but also longitudinal vibrations; these vibrations are not uniform, the tone becomes impure and therefore without resonance, indistinct, and relatively less strong than a more moderate but purer tone. If all the pianoforte drummers would but consider that!

With the harp it is a well-known fact, that its piano and mezzo forte is finer than the forte and fortissimo. The consequence is that the harp is much more resonant in smaller rooms, than in a concert hall or as an orchestra instrument. For in the latter cases the player is compelled to attack the instrument more energetically and therefore overdo the matter, so that the strings lose the beautiful regularity of their entirely free vibrations, and this absolutely most beautiful tone among all string instruments becomes feebly resonant and choked. We know of famous violins of famous concert masters, which under the heavy stroke of the bow no longer sing, but scream and groan. The tone is gone—since the greatest intensity was sought by means of strong bowing, whereas precisely the reverse is the result, and not only the beauty and but even the strength of the pure sound is lost.

Orchestras especially are very apt to sin against this law of strength in unity and purity.—Here too it must be considered that, under equal exciting force, the high tones are always more perceptible than the low ones, and the clear tones more so than the dull ones. For the higher tones, (as is known from Savart's experiments with the Syren) require less intensity in the exciting power in order to be heard. According it never would occur to any chapel-master, to man the piccolo flute with more strength than the low wooden wind instruments, whilst even celebrated directors find nothing laughable in placing only one man on the harp part in an orchestra of about sixty men! And yet every one would laugh if only one viola and violoncello should be set against twenty-four first and second violins!

In Choruses the Soprano is almost always too strong, the Alto almost always too weak. It is not to be presumed that the ladies on the Alto develop less activity of lungs, than the Soprano voices; but they sing deeper, they are commonly fewer in number, they restrain themselves, sing impure or hum, and the choral effect is disturbed. To proceed according to the right principle, the Alto voices should always out-number the Soprano, and the viola should be manned at least as strong as the first violin part. Experience teaches, that in the solo vocal quartet, as in the string quartet, the highest voice, if not reined in with great discretion, almost always covers up the other voices, simply because it is the highest. Only the Bass or the violoncellist escape being covered up, since they develop more intensity of lungs or bow. The tenor either screams, or he is asthmatic or fat;—in all these cases there is a loss of strength and purity, and the consequence is, that in Australia and California great lumps of gold are far more frequent, than good tenors are in Europe, so that with us the first tenors are literally worth their weight in gold!

That the brass almost always cover up the string instruments, is too well known. Hence thoughtful instrumental composers are in the habit latterly of indicating in their scores the number of performers on each part; a direction, alas! which is almost never followed, so that the effects are naturally lost. The vibrating column of air in a brass tube requires much more expenditure of strength to set it in motion, than the vibrating strings of the string instruments, with the exception of the double-basses, which, in proportion to the weakness of their number, are more liable to growl ("rumple") instead of ringing out in pure, clear tones. That one trumpet can out-sound all the violins, or one bombardoon all the double-basses, follows very plainly from the intensity of the manner of setting it to vibrating; and yet we almost always find the same disproportion in the manning of an orchestra. To be sure, these requisitions are not always practicable; but then the brass should be as much subdued in tone as possible; and frequently there is no obstacle but custom or convenience in the way of a reform. To double the kettle drums, which as instruments of percussion, operate still more intensely than wind instruments, would scarcely suggest itself; but should it happen (as in the Dresden Palm Sunday concerts in the opera house), then the flutes should be at least quadrupled, instead of doubled.

The Kook Concerts.

[They have funny concerts and a funnier musical critic in the city of Troy, N. Y. The following, from the Troy Daily Budget, is worthy of Punch or Thackeray; and like the satirical sketches of those moralists, it admits of a pretty wide application. We are sorry to have to abridge it at all.]

Last Friday evening it was our fortune to be present at a Concert at the Female Seminary by the Kooks—spelt, you will observe, with a K. There is an old proverb that "too many cooks spoil the broth"—whether this be true or not, we have no means of knowing, but we are fully prepared to say that too many Kooks can make a Concert a complete bore.

Besides the Kook Family, a Signorina Valentini, Prima Donna of the Theatres of Milan, Turin and Venice was announced to appear. And she did! If she was ever Prima Donna at the Theatres above mentioned, all we have to say is, they must have been pretty short of timber. A morning paper yesterday pronounced compliments on this Signorina that would make Sontag blush—but we will venture that she did nothing of the sort. Master Kook, likewise, was compared to Herz, Thalberg, De Meyer, and what not. This sort of thing is abominable. Our gorge rises at it.

Had not these persons given a pair of additional concerts, we should not have felt called upon to notice this stupendous humbug. We went on Monday evening to hear them, merely for the innocent amusement which it afforded—and we found plenty of it. By dint of specious programmes scattered over the city, bragging and disgusting puffery, an audience of perhaps two hundred was collected at Harmony Hall.

Master Sebastian Kook opened the concert in the same way as before—namely, by playing a Fantasia by Herz—and to do him justice, he played it very well. Indeed, his playing is the only endurable feature in the whole affair from beginning to end. He plays with a good deal of facility and no inconsiderable degree of taste—as well, perhaps, but certainly not better, than many children of his age who have not set themselves up as prodigies. We feel inclined to give him all the praise he deserves, but it is not in our heart to say that we consider him terribly prodigious.

After him came the Fat Woman—no, we were thinking of something else—but Signorina Valentini as she calls herself, and a very pretty name she has too. Her appearance created a sensation; we think it would do that almost anywhere. She is an apoplectic-looking female—florid and flabby—adipose and able-bodied, and not calculated to inspire in the beholder a very exalted idea of her promise as an interpreter of the poetical, romantic or spiritual music. She would sooner suggest the idea of Bacchus in petticoats in a fit of absence of mind. In yesterday's programme we perceive she is called the "Italian Lark"—heaven forgive her godfather! Had she been dubbed the "Dutch Owl," no one we dare say would have deemed the soubriquet at all inappropriate.

She "threw herself," to use the language of Young America, into "Casta Diva," that inevitable and everlasting rock on which every singer, good or bad, feels bound to split. But it has no such effect on her—although her audience was ready to split—with laughter. She electrified the house. Somebody in a morning paper says that he thinks the Oleaginous Lady's "Casta Diva" is better than Jenny Lind's! Perhaps it is—every one to his taste—there may be persons who prefer the screech of a peacock to the thrilling warble of a nightingale.

"The Warrior's Banner," came next on the catalogue of musical sweetmeats, and it was given by Master Louis Kook, a little Stunner of only nine years old—at least that is the age put down in the bills. This Warrior's Banner may be a very good thing in its way, but in Mr. Kook's way it was almost anything else. It would be no very easy matter to say exactly what it was, it was so near indescribable—but as near as we could get at it, it was a frantic affair—and with regard to tone of voice, as androgynous and epicene a performance in the way of a noise as we have heard for many a day.

The truth is, these infantile phenomena are nothing but another name for bores. From the Infant Drummer to this last infliction in the shape of Louis Kook (always excepting Paul Jullien) all these youthful prodigies in our opinion are unmitigated gags. We hear their efforts with the same sensations that we experience in seeing a juggler swallow a sword—we wonder a little, but we shudder a great deal more as cold chills chase each other like streaks of chain-lightning down the spinal column. How often have we been compelled to listen in admiring horror as some misguided mother trotted out her precocious offspring to display their musical or elocutionary accomplishments. On such occasions we suffer the nervous tremor of one about to undergo a surgical operation—we resign ourselves to our fate and sigh for a pocket handkerchief saturated with chloroform. "With sad civility" we endure the ordeal, setting our teeth and clenching hands—we perhaps feel called upon to mutter a salvo of grim praise while our mental aspirations aim at a consignment of the little dears to the bottom of the Red Sea. And so it is generally, we apprehend, with the long suffering, patient and good-natured victims of infantile music.

It is said that Dr. Johnson used to relieve himself of these juvenile tormentors by refusing to hear the songs they could sing or the verses they could recite. On one occasion, however, he was persuaded by a fond parent to listen to his two children repeat Gray's Elegy; the father wishing to have them take alternate verses, that the doctor might judge which had the happiest cadence. "No sir," said the doctor, "let the brats speak their verses both at once; they will make more noise, and it will be sooner over."

"Coming through the Rye," by Miss Louisa Kook, a seven year old, next claimed attention. She forgot the words once or twice, and when she remembered them, she "took no note of time" any more than Adam did when conversing with Eve in the garden of Eden, for the Obese Lark, who played the accompaniment, had much ado to keep within gun shot of the child as she elbowed her way through the Rye. She got through, though, and we were glad of it; it seemed barbarous to force such a pretty child to torment herself and others by such an unnatural and uncongenial display, when she might be a real blessing to mothers, by revolving in her proper sphere—the nursery.

The "Happy Birdling," ejaculated by the Dropsical Donna, was the next draft on our enthusiasm.—To say that it was unique is not saying more than is true.

It is hardly worth while to break a fly upon the wheel, but the humbuggery of these people has been so offensive that we cannot pass their efforts in silence.

Young Louis is announced in a separate paragraph in the programme, and in small capitals, "Ah he is THE BOY FOR BEWITCHING THEM, and making your sides ache with laughter." "Them," we suppose refers to the softer sex—for we are sure no masculine being in his senses could be bewitched by such a pitiable exhibition of abortive straining as was displayed by this Master Louis. We feel sorry for him, and have felt so ever since last Friday evening—our pity has prevented until this time any expression of opinion upon his merits. As he was fore-ordained to bewitch, he sung a song called "I'm the boy for bewitching 'em"—labeled "comic" on the programme—but how or where we racked our brain in vain to discover. Like the frogs in the fable who were stoned to death, we could say, "it may be sport to you, but it is death to us." We have no recollection of ever before feeling so melancholy under the infliction of a comic song. As to voice, the poor little fellow had none at all—he writhed and yelled like one in pain—at first he seemed to have a colic—but subsequent observation satisfied us that he was trying to burst a blood vessel or to split his thorax.

There had been some tittering, not to say giggling, at several previous musical revelations, but now every face was as gloomy as the Dead March in Saul. We firmly believe the ladies (especially those at the Seminary) were all more or less affected. It was certainly most lugubriously laughable—positively, the most lachrymose of funny songs.

The probability is, that the boy's guardians have committed an error; he is not the "Boy for bewitching 'em"—at least not just now. He should lie by a few years to cultivate his seductive powers; he should permit them to ripen somewhere near maturity, before he should venture with any confidence of success into the enterprise of fascinating the fair.

As to Master Sebastian, his piano-forte performance, as we have said before, is very well—nay, it is more than respectable. But neither his playing, nor any body's else could survive the neutralizing tendency of such coadjutors. This Signerina bears about the same relation to him in the way of benefit that a mill-stone would to a shipwrecked man in want of a life-preserver. We advise him to let her go, and tell his little brother and sister to retire with all possible despatch into the shade.

With respect to his own endeavors, let him not attempt too much. He should lay aside at present his ambition of appearing as a composer, and practice diligently the works of others who have gone before him, and who have written much better than he ever will. If he must give Yankee Doodle with the variations, let him rather follow Herz, Wallace, DeMeyer, Jullien, or the five hundred others of less note who have worked upon this theme and twisted it into every conceivable form, than endeavor to please the public with his own crude compositions on it, which, in our humble opinion bear very faint affinity to the original, plain, patriotic Doodle.

Yankee Doodle.

["Yankee Doodle" literature ought to be at a premium while Jullien is about. We saved the following from a country paper some time since.]

Watson, in his "Occurrences of the war of Independence," says—This tune, so celebrated as a national air of the revolution, has an origin almost unknown to the mass of the people of the present day. An aged and respectable lady, born in New England, told me she remembered it well, long before the Revolution, under another name. It was then universally called "Lady Fisher," and was a favorite New England jig. It was then the practice with it, as with "Yankee Doodle" now, to sing it, with various impromptu verses—such as:

Lydia Locket lost her pocket,
Lydia Fisher found it—
Not a bit of money in it,
Only binding round it.

The British, preceding the war, when disposed to ridicule the simplicity of Yankee manners and hilarity, were accustomed to sing airs or songs set to words invented for the passing occasion, having for their object to satirize and sneer at the New Englanders. This, as I believe, they called Yankee Doodle, by way of reproach, and as a slur upon their favorite, "Lydia Fisher." It is remembered that the English officers then among us, acting under civil and military appointments, often felt lordly over us colonists, and by countenancing such slurs, they sometimes expressed their superciliousness. When the battles of Concord and Lexington began the war, the English, when advancing in triumph, played along the road "God save the King," but when the Americans had made the retreat so disastrous to the invaders, these then struck up the scouted Yankee Doodle, as if to say, "See what we simple Jonathans can do!"

From that time the tune of intended derision was assumed throughout all the American colonies, as the national air of the sons of liberty, even as the Methodists—once reproachfully so called—assumed it as their acceptable appellation. Even the name of "sons of liberty," which was so popular at the outset, was a name adopted from the appellation given us in Parliament, by Col. Barre, in his speech. Judge Martin, in the history of North Carolina, has lately given another reason for the origin of "Yankee Doodle," saying it was formed at Albany, in 1755, by a British officer, then there, indulging his pleasantry on the homely array of the motley Americans, then assembling to join the expedition of Gen. Johnson and Governor Shirley. To ascertain the truth in the premises, both his and my accounts were published in the Gazettes, to elicit, if possible, further information, and the additional facts ascertained seemed to corroborate the foregoing idea. The tune and quaint words, says a writer in the Columbian Gazette, at Washington, were known as early as the time of Cromwell, and were so applied to him then, in a song called "Yankee Doodle," as ascertained from the collection he had seen of a gentleman at Cheltenham, in England, called "Musical Antiquities of England," to wit:

Yankee Doodle came to town,
Upon a little pony,
With a feather in his hat,
Upon a macaroni.

The term "feather," &c., alluded to Cromwell's going to Oxford on a small horse, with his single plume, fastened in a sort of knot called a "macaroni." The idea that such an early origin may have existed seems strengthened by the fact communicated by an aged gentleman of Massachusetts, who well remembered that, about the time the strife was engendered at Boston, they sometimes conveyed muskets to the country concealed in their loads of manure, &c. Then came abroad verses, as if set forth from their military masters, saying:

Yankee Doodle came to town,
For to buy a firelock;
We will tar and feather him,
And so we will John Hancock.

For Dwight's Journal of Music. MY SPIRIT BRIDE.

AFTER THE GERMAN.

I.

Silently walk I by the sea-side, when the waves are still, and the scene is bathed in liquid moonshine, but I am not alone.

II.

A spirit walketh at my side, noiseless, speechless. The pebbles that rustle as I tread, stir not under her footfall, for she is a spirit, lighter than the breath of zephyr. Not Calmilla, whose naked foot the bearded corn hurt not, is lighter, for behold she treads the foamy wave from whence sprang Aphrodite the Beautiful.

III.

But when I touch her hand, it is as vapor, and her breath is cold, like the chill breath of Eternity. I would fain dally with her golden locks—but they wreath away and are gone, like smoke from the pipes of burschen. If I gaze into her eyes, alas! they are vacant. Doth my heart speak to her? Behold she vanisheth and is not!

IV.

Yet walk I by the sea-side, for she is with me, but whence or whither, tell me if thou canst, Prophet of Mystery!

V.

I have wandered up and down in the earth seeking my betrothed. Into the clear fountains of many eyes have I gazed to find my soul's image. Many golden curls have I seen in the breezes disporting—and often I have peered into the orbs of azure deep as heaven.

VI.

Now walk I joyfully again by the sea-side, on my arm rests a hand, warm and tender. Here are ringlets of gold that cling round my finger—and soft lips that return my gentle pressure—and her eyes I do not see for very clearness—but the pearly thoughts that glisten through them from the soul's deep caverns.

VII.

Now walk I once more silently by the sea-side—a Spirit walketh at my side, speechless, noiseless. Gaze I on more in the laughing eyes of maidens—no more sigh I for their sweet lips—the pure love of the spirit is sweeter. She that I loved better than all the world, is now in Heaven! She that loved me in the flesh now loves me more in the spirit!

AT A SOLEMN MUSIC.

Blest pair of syrens! pledges of Heaven's joy,
Sphere-born, harmonious sisters, Voice and Verse,
Wed your divine sounds, and mix'd power employ,
Dead things with inbreath'd sense able to pierce;
And to our high-raised phantasy present
That undisturbed song of pure consent:
Aye sung before the sapphire-color'd throne
To Him that sits thereon,
With saintly shout, and solemn jubilee;
Where the bright Seraphim, in burning row,
Their loud uplifted angel-trumpets blow;
And the Cherubic host, in thousand quires,
Touch their immortal harps of golden wires,
With those just spirits that wear victorious palms,
Hymns devout and holy psalms
Singing everlastingly:
That we on earth, with undiscording voice,
May rightly answer that melodious noise;
As once we did, till disproportion'd sin
Jarr'd against nature's chime, and with harsh din
Broke the fair music that all creatures made
To their great Lord, whose love their motion sway'd
In perfect diapason, whilst they stood
In first obedience, and their state of good.
O may we soon again renew that song,
And keep in tune with Heaven, till God, ere long,
To his celestial concert us unite,
To live with him, and sing in endless morn of light!

MILTON.

New Music.

New publications have been accumulating on our desk at a rate which makes it impossible to notice them all with anything like critical discrimination. We make a beginning, however, with a few of the most important.

Oliver Ditson sends us:

1. The Don Giovanni, of Mozart, being a piano-forte arrangement of the entire opera, in style uniform with his edition of Norma and other standard operas. The moderately skilful pianist may hereby recall all the ideas and essence of Mozart's most masterly and magical creation for himself; and indeed, so fascinating must be find it, that he will be unconsciously drawn into practice and made skilful with his fingers. The arrangement, with the exception of a few places, is not very difficult, and is clearly, neatly printed in the small Philadelphia music type. The best German arrangement is strictly followed, and the proof seems to have been carefully read. That is, of the music,—which is the main,—not so, however, of the little introductory scraps of the Italian words, which are prefixed to each movement. These are shamefully misspelt,—a defect which might have been easily enough avoided. Thus we find: "Ah! chi mi dis ce mai," for Ah! chi mi dice mai; "Madaminar," for Madamina; &c., &c. But we cannot too earnestly commend such a work to young pianists, amid the flood of trashy variations, fantasies, &c., all sound and finger-difficulties, "signifying nothing," which solicit them on all sides.

2. Variations for the Piano, by MOZART, in a series of twenty-four numbers, of which three are issued. These are upon simple themes, selected with a Mozart's taste and tact, and the variations are models in their way. In them you have all the grace, consistency and never-failing charm of Mozart's style. Here too the young pianist can practice with the certainty of learning something; something higher and better than mere execution, at the same time with that.

3. Six Lieder of SCHUBERT, transcribed for the Piano by STEPHEN HELLER. We have seen but the first, which is the popular and lovely "Serenade." The transcription is a very simple, literal one, compared with that of Liszt; but the genial purity of Heller's musical style guarantees the excellence of these little works.

BOSTON, OCT. 29, 1853.

First "Germania" Concert.

The Boston Music Hall was just comfortably filled, last Saturday evening, with an audience too happy to sit once more within those harmony-inspiring walls, awaiting the renewal of the dear old feasts. It was a graceful token of sentiment, which led the Society to decorate the hall with evergreens and place the wreathed busts of Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Mozart on the front of the stage, Beethoven being in the middle. The "GERMANIANS" had about doubled the numbers of their orchestra, and took their places amid general and hearty plaudits. We counted eight first violins, seven second, four tenors, four violoncellos and four double-basses, together with such increase in the wood and brass departments as made the whole number not quite up to fifty. Conductor BERGMANN'S entrance was the signal for prolonged and special greeting. And it was soon clear that the old virtue had not departed from his baton, which swayed the grand as easily as it had done the smaller orchestra, and that he stood there the same clear-headed, earnest, sure interpreter of the great tone-poems into whose spirit he was wont so ably and so fondly to initiate us.

The old C minor symphony was brought out with a fire and breadth and grandeur which we have not known before. It is true, we missed sometimes that perfect sharpness and evenness of outline, that always distinguished the original Germanians; but this was forgotten almost more quickly than perceived, so greatly did the additional string instruments add to the energy and fulness of the now broad, majestic river, and now dashing and compressed mountain cataract of tones. We never heard the spirit of the music and of Beethoven more successfully brought out. The Andante, (taken a little slower than we sometimes hear it,—some, we are aware, would say too slow), came out as clear in form as a newly cast bell, and seemed profoundly to impress and satisfy the audience. The triumphal march finale rang through that sympathetic hall sublimely.

Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" displayed the brilliant instrumentation of Berlioz in a bright light; though it seems to us essentially a pianoforte piece, and to lose something of its delicacy and swimming abandon in any other form. The orchestra colors are warmer, but appear to overload it; while the movement, taken prodigiously fast, (we suppose according to the design of Berlioz) sometimes forbids that perfect clearness of outline which it can only have under one pair of hands, working from one brain. The violoncello sang the slow recitative prelude and conclusion with rare beauty and expression.

The novel and, next to the symphony, the great feature of the concert was the overture to the romantic drama of "Tannhäuser and the contest of the minstrels at the Wartburg," by Richard Wagner. It made us more than ever eager to hear the opera itself, about which the musical world abroad is so divided. It settled the question, for us, with regard to Wagner, as a great creative genius in the sphere of instrumental music, and as a profound musician. This overture is full of power and beauty. The ideas are both original and pregnant, and they are developed and sustained with wonderful strength and skill, leaving the conviction in the hearer's mind of an abundance of reserved power. There is a masterly progress in its dramatic interest; it is one of the most exciting overtures we ever listened to, in that respect resembling the Leonore of Beethoven, though wholly different in the character and working up of its ideas. Whatever may be said of Wagner's theories of Opera and Drama, of his "emancipation of the tones" from the received laws of modulation, &c., &c., as described in our previous articles about him; and whatever party opposition there may be to him abroad, one could not hear the overture without thinking to himself: The man who wrote that is not to be put down. Certainly the Tannhäuser must take its place among the great overtures of Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Cherubini and Mendelssohn.

Doubtless there were various impressions about in a large audience listening for the first time; to some what was to us sustained, heroic strength, seemed only repetition; some were lost in its complexity; some had not read the composer's key to its dramatic design, published in our last. This was quite necessary to an intelligent reception and enjoyment of the music; and admirably it corresponded. How grave and solemn and middle-age-like were the opening sounds of the distant pilgrim's chant in slow procession, (intoned by horns, bassoon and the low chalmereau notes of the clarinet)! Buoyant, determined, full of faith as its movement was, yet it conveyed the idea of eyes cast down to earth and thoughts introverted. How the harmony swells to rich pomp and majesty as the march approaches, and how solemnly the sounds recede again, and melt into sombre, twilight harmonies! And now an utter change; the buoyant, happy and defiant snatch of melody, that suddenly seems flung laughingly upon the breeze, is the voice of the tuneful minnesinger, Tannhäuser, merrily advancing on his way to contend with the other minstrel at the Wartburg. This little strain, so perfectly original and exquisite, is like a challenge. He is in danger, this bold bard! He means to sing of love, and his thought is not pure from worldliness. Charms and mysterious snares surround him. He is in the dangerous neighborhood of the "Venusberg," the mountain in the German forest where the old Christian superstition supposed the heathen goddess to be banished and confined. Here the orchestral harmony is finely divided into light, thrilling strains of aerial music, (there being in portions of it some eight separate violin parts), in the midst of which the little snatch of Tannhäuser melody is flung back and forth from various voices. The enchantment grows richer and more complex and bewildering, and finally swells to an almost stunning pitch, and subsides amidst wildly wailing under-tone accompaniments preceeding the re-entrance of the solemn pilgrim chant, the last repetition of which, fortissimo, by the brass instruments, on the dark, rich back-ground of a persistent wailing figure kept up by the whole mass of violins, makes a sublime finale. That aerial, fairy music in the middle seems fully equal to Mendelssohn in that line, and yet entirely original. The overture was played with great precision, spirit and true fervor, and it is music of exceeding difficulty.

A repetition of the Tannhäuser at last Wednesday's rehearsal fully confirmed the first impression. It should be given at another concert, that it may be more generally appreciated.

Mendelssohn's overture to "Athalia" made a noble finale to the concert. With nothing very striking in its ideas, it is worked up with masterly power, so as to cast a certain shadow of cold, solemn, simple, antique thoughts over the hearer's mind. It is neither sacred nor romantic music: indeed in such a Grecian subject the composer precluded himself the warmth and wealth of ideas belonging to his usual romantic vein.

Miss CAROLINE PINTARD, who sang two pieces, made a very agreeable impression. She has a contralto of most rare richness, evenness and sweetness; not of great power, yet by its purity and true intonation pervading all parts of the hall distinctly. She has been well schooled, and sings with simplicity and nobleness of style, with large, round phrasing, and without any nonsense. Such at least was the impression of her first piece, an aria from Maria di Rudenz, properly written for a male voice. Whether she have the inspiration to make a great singer, we cannot yet judge. Her second piece, Alary's Polka, was unsuited to her voice; it depends for its effect upon the bright soprano tones, as Sontag sings it, and loses all its brightness when let down to the contralto register. The pleasing appearance and marked propriety of manner of the young debutante also did their part to prepossess the audience in her favor.

The new pianist, Herr CARL HAUSE, by no means played the "Don Juan" fantasia of Thalberg as Jaell plays it; but we saw reason to suppose that he labored under accidental difficulties, which did not suffer him to do justice to himself, and hence refrain from judgment. It would have been more effective, had he commenced farther back, and not immediately with the serenade melody, which suffered from lack of something to relieve it and from the nervousness of the performer. Mr. ZERRAHN played the flute concerto of Briccialdi admirably, but the piece is too long

The GERMANIA REHEARSALS began on Wednesday afternoon, with a large, not crowded audience, and with a rich selection of music, including Beethoven's fourth Symphony, the overtures to Tannhäuser and some lighter music. Such excellent music, at such very low price, will not fail to crowd the hall soon to the overflowing measure of last winter.

Jullien's Concerts.

So far (for three nights) the "Monster Concerts" have been on a greater scale in all respects than in that of great audiences. The Boston Music Hall, even on Jullien's "Beethoven Night," has not been two-thirds full. The terrific storm of course put a great audience for anything out of the question on the first night. This is not as it should be, nor can we believe that it will so continue. The dollar price is really cheap for such an unparalleled combination of talent as Jullien has had the enterprise and tact to muster and train together to complete unity for our entertainment. Ordinarily a dollar would be cheap for hearing any one of his five and twenty solo-players, each the very best in his speciality afforded by all Europe. Think of an orchestra in which every instrumental part is manned or led off by such artists! Add to this that all in the rank and file are good; that the orchestra is complete and in the full sense of the term a grand orchestra: that they play with most perfect unity and precision; that their truth of intonation is refreshingly infallible; that the ensemble of tone, or collective sonority of the orchestra, considered as one complex instrument, is exceedingly bright and beautiful; and that they play so much of the best, as well as so much merely effective music,—and the wonder is, how can the public keep away at any price! True, Jullien had a hundred in New York, and has only sixty here:—but we assure our readers that in our Boston Music Hall these sixty tell with at least twice the power the hundred did in Metropolitan Hall. And would you hear the best solo-playing of the world in the very room in all the world where it can be heard to the best advantage, you will take care not to lose this brief combined opportunity of Boston Music Hall and Jullien.

Again, such education of the ear as is afforded by these concerts it would be shiftless on the part of any music-lover to forego. Never have we had such a chance to learn what a great orchestra can be and is. One evening at Jullien's is as good as a year's lessons about the peculiar characters and powers of instruments, the effects producible by various combinations, the means and possibilities of instrumental effect, and in impressing on the mind indelible types of crescendos, diminuendos, staccatos, and other dynamic and rhythmic arts. We think it must chip the shell of many a latent thickly encrusted musical sense, to hear Jullien's orchestra.

Of course the expense at which all this is provided for us, nightly, must be enormous; and greatly as we rejoice in the tendency to cheap amusements, we cannot expect the best artists of the old world engaged for us at double their European salaries, for a price of admission which the Music Hall well filled could hardly make remunerating.

Such numbers as have so far come within the sweep of the magician's bâton, have been completely captivated and carried away with enthusiasm. To be sure, much of this enthusiasm is of a superficial kind; much of it we laugh at while it brings us on our feet; many of his instrumental effects and bold surprises, we call laughably fine; and much of the contagious pleasure we associate with the large bonhomie of the conductor himself, his vivacity, but not extravagance of gesture, and the inimitably self-satisfied and happy air with which he sinks down into his velvet seat at the end of each tuneful victory, making the whole audience happy along with him. Yet there has been a large dollar's worth, each time, of real musical enjoyment and instruction. Steal our purse, rather than steal that from us.

Several distinct points of interest stand out in one's recollection of a Jullien concert. First and most prominent is:

The Orchestra itself, in its ensemble, considered as a great organic, complex mechanism of musical effect, and without reference to the kind of music played by it. It is impossible, too, to separate it from its creator and conductor; it is the outward form and organism of his idea, and it moves in sympathetic obedience to his signal. Ten first violins, 6 second, 4 tenors, 4 violoncellos, and eight double-basses (besides BOTTESINI!) make a grand string department, where every man is an artist. But the two middle parts are evidently much too weak in numbers. Flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, each are represented in the first and second parts; the brass is very powerful, and the drums, in readiness at any moment to swell a whirlwind crescendo or a battle finale into monster proportions. The huge ophicleid, the flageolet (a sweeter substitute sometimes for the shrill and saucy piccolo), the monster drum, &c., are instruments not common in our orchestras. The brilliancy, precision, point, expression, &c. with which this great organism performs its functions we have sufficiently indicated. The perfect symmetry and swiftness with which it rolls up a crescendo, from the faintest murmur to its forty drum power maximum of sound, is one of the tricks in which Jullien has trained it to infallible success. But we cannot say that we have yet heard a genuine pianissimo among its other remarkable virtues; it can play lightly as well as play loudly, it can drop out voices and contract its tens to units; but we do not observe that wonderfully beautiful and ideal effect of an entire tone-mass subdued to the distinctest whisper. Bright, gorgeous sunshine or gas-light, and no soft twilight, seems Jullien's peculiar sphere. His day is all noon, his house all blazing ball-room. As his art lies chiefly in effects, and grand surprises, and the nursing up of great fires in the audience, there is naturally a tendency to make the most of ponderous ophicleids and shivering trumpets and trombones. There is always something like a sonorous battle and a siege laid to your poor private castle of dullness. Your nerves are kept upon the strain, and finally the mind is fatigued with the reiterated thunder crash and lightning glare of his intense fortissimo.

2. Next, we would fain do justice to his unrivalled solo-players. There is BOTTESINI, who makes the double bass play themes and variations, with all the fluency, all the sweetness and more than the richness of tone of violins and cellos; while his rapid transitions from the lower to the highest octaves of the colossal viol, and his revellings in its aerial harmonics, are as smooth and finished and graceful as if it cost no effort. M. REICHERT exceeds what we had supposed the possibilities of the flute, producing a tone of unrivalled solidity and roundness, and sweeping through long scales with a rapidity and evenness that we had thought belonged to the hands of Jaells and Gottschalks on the piano-forte. A beautiful melody of his own made the theme for his tasteful variations in the solo which we heard. Even more wonderful was the oboe solo of LAVIGNE. His tone is thinner and finer than that of some of our best oboists: but it is a purely reed tone, more sharply contrasted with the clarinet tone than theirs, and never harsh. His execution is most smooth and flexible; he plays it con amore and with exquisite expression, looking like a Pan with half-closed eyes, and reeling jolly figure, half-drunk with the delight of his own music. Verily he was born with a reed in his mouth. In him you have the whole individuality of his instrument embodied. And how he holds his breath! He sustained and trilled a note, now swelling, now diminishing, for twice the time we ever heard a note sustained (the Atlas says a minute and a sixth by watch), and the fine, pure beauty of that tone lingered within the resonant walls of the Music Hall as if it loved the place. KOENIG'S cornet-à-piston has been abundantly described. In tone, expression, execution he leaves nothing more to be demanded of the instrument. He is the model of a true solo-player, in that he lays himself out more in expression, than in flourish, and sings a melody with an intelligent and voice-like style.—The round and solid tones of HUGHES'S ophicleid are as satisfactory and expressive in some passages, as they were novel to most ears. He executes also with a rare facility.—WULLE'S clarinet is the sweetest-toned and most cunningly modulated of all the specimens of that best and most human voice-like of wind-instruments. And there are many other solo-players yet to take their turn, whom we have not room here to mention. It is, however, in the little passages where each emerges into occasional prominence in the orchestral performances, that we are most charmed with the mastery of these solo-instruments.

3. The dance music—the music in which M. Jullien is peculiarly himself. His quadrille, waltz and polka compilations are all set in most brilliant frame-work, and treated with a consummate mastery of brilliant instrumentation, which make them absolutely exciting. Here you may study the effects of all kinds of instruments. Thus his famous "American Quadrille" owes its astonishing effect to the skill with which homely, humdrum melodies are brightened up, and set off against each other with all sorts of novel and grotesque instrumental coloring; especially to the brilliancy with which he invests Yankee Doodle (thus verifying Emerson's saying: "the meanest object is beautiful if placed in a strong enough light.")—There are some happy touches here: thus his simply isolating the first note of the strain all the time by a strong accent, makes almost a new thing of the Yankee Doodle; then the manner in which it is first boyishly whistled in the flageolet and flute, then grotesquely tooted on the bassoon, then droned out, bag-pipe-like, by two oboes, &c. And finally, and chiefly, to the crescendo progress in the entire arrangement, Yankee Doodle at last coming in fortissimo by all the instruments, in swifter and swifter tempo, and then the battle and drum cannonading, and Yankee Doodle stronger still in sign of triumph, and the shout of voices too, thrown in; the inevitable uproarious applause of the many; the preconceived rising of the musicians, as Jullien turns with air of solemn invitation to the audience, who involuntarily rise also, as "Hail Columbia" peals forth in large chords!—This is, to be sure, making a colossal toy of the orchestra, as we have before said! but the effect is most ingeniously and most triumphantly managed. His "Katydid Polka," "Prima Donna Waltz," and other pieces of this kind, are equally effective in their way, although the themes are often old and hacknied. The precision and spirit with which these things are played, could never be surpassed.

4. The Classical Music. To hear the great works of the masters brought out in the full proportions of so large an orchestra, where all the parts are played by perfect masters of their instruments, is a great privilege and great lesson. So we must think, in spite of any criticisms to which M. Jullien's conductorship in symphonies may be open. Where everything is so distinctly rendered, and all on so large and bold a scale, it cannot but open many ears and souls to the grandeur of a Beethoven's conceptions to hear one of his masterpieces from this orchestra. To take our examples from the "Beethoven Night" (Wednesday): was it not something to hear that scrambling bass passage in the Scherzo of the C minor symphony, brought out into bold, broad outline by the nine double-basses, with BOTTESINI among them! We confess it was the first time we ever heard that passage actually with our ears; save for a piano arrangement we scarcely knew its shape before. And how magnificent the triumphal march became with such a powerful tutti! But here we are constrained to make a beginning of criticism, and to own, that after all the joy we felt in such bold renderings, M. Jullien's leading in symphonies is open to criticism. Why did he omit a large part of that glorious finale? Why was the sweet counter-theme, led in by the three horn notes on the dominant of key, in the Allegro, played so heavily? Why was there never any pianissimo? And why was the time changed so arbitrarily, more than once in the course of the same movement, and no settled rate of movement maintained? We fear the answer to such questions must be found in the answer to another: Why does he on the programme call the Scherzo "descriptive of an advancing army?" In the Larghetto of the second symphony, on another evening, (the programme said Adagio) he retarded the last measures in a manner as unmeaning as it was strikingly marked.

The Leonora overture was superbly played, as were the Freyschütz and some other overtures, on other evenings. The Adelaide was "sung" by Koenig's cornet with great beauty and feelingness, but with something too much of the Italian tenore sort of pathos. The Andante was not slow enough and the impassioned last movement much too slow. We could not see the propriety of introducing into a Beethoven programme those grotesque orchestral variations of the Le Desir waltz, which has long since ceased to be attributed to Beethoven, but which the programme informed us that Schubert wrote and "dedicated to Beethoven"! There was a little too much of the "monster concert" and too little of the "classic" about this!

We have our doubts whether Jullien's forte lies in classical music, although we do thank him for much enjoyment of it. It would seem as if much limitation to the short forms of dance music, in which he is like a metronome personified, caused him to get lost in the longer forms of symphony music, so that he cannot hold the time with constancy. With less brilliancy of ensemble, less largeness of outline, and less consummate skill and individuality in the separate instruments, we confess to catching the spirit of the symphonies more satisfactorily from the Germanians under Bergmann's bâton. There all is certainty, and conscientious, even religious, fidelity to the composer; and if less imposingly executed, his conceptions are more appreciatingly and (in the German sense of the word) more genially indicated.

We should hesitate to avow these strictures, were it not that they have such confirmation from the best musicians in Germany and here. Meanwhile, we regard Jullien and his orchestra as a great God-send; and all who have any music in their souls must go and hear him while he stays. He is no "humbug," no mere superficial parader of clap-trap, but a thinking and observing man, who loves and studies nature, seeks the laws of tone-effects in nature, and shows a masterly power of combination in whatever he does.

We had almost forgotten to speak of Mlle. ANNA ZERR. In our Music Hall her voice tells to far more advantage than it did in New York. Moreover her selection of pieces has not been so unfortunate for her, as that of Vieni non tardar, which influenced our impression there. Here her delivery of the passionate Queen of the Night's song, with the extra high notes (to F in alt), was a brilliant and finished piece of execution. The sweet little Alpine Melody which she sings, too, ("Forget me not"), was rendered with great expression. Yet her voice in general is worn and too often tremulous, and her style cold; to those few extra high notes she would seem to owe her European fame.

Next week M. Jullien announces more classical nights. We cannot doubt that he will crowd the Hall before he has done with it. Boston audiences warm up slowly, but very surely, when a thing is good.

Gottschalk.

Jullien has left us no room to say what more we wish and feel in duty bound to say about the young pianist. For the present we let this suffice:

Had his first concert been like his second, we should have had a far pleasanter task in writing about it; for the second gave us a better opinion of him as an artist. In the first he was a virtuoso; and much of the exception which we took to him, was simply the instancing in his case of our profound conviction of the false and superficial tendency of the whole modern virtuoso school in Art. We could not but judge him by the extravagant claims that came before him, claims of genius, both in playing and in composition, equal to that of Liszt and Chopin. And as his first programme seemed a re-assertion of that claim, as it consisted wholly of his own compositions, it was impossible not to dwell more upon their triviality and heaven-wide distance from Chopin, &c., than upon his transcendent powers of execution, which we admitted to the fullest extent.

In the second concert he played some classic music and played it well,—with clearness, delicacy and feeling,—especially the sonata for four hands, by Onslow, in which he was ably seconded by Mr. PYCHOWSKY. The surpassing beauty of his touch lent a rare beauty to these works. The "Kreutzer Sonata," with Mr. Suck as violinist, we enjoyed; but not more than we have done at the hands of several less remarkable pianists. There might have been more of the Beethoven fire and earnestness in opening the Adagio, if they had first wrought themselves up to the true pitch of fervor by playing the first movement.

Again, on the first night, Mr. Gottschalk appeared to play with a cold nonchalance, like a merely executive virtuoso. This time his very sadness (from the news of his father's death, as well as from wounded self-esteem at missing the enthusiasm here which he had raised in Paris), seemed to re-act in the way of inspiration on his playing; there was a touch of genuine feeling added to his grace of execution.

Again, the few little pieces of his own which he did introduce, had more charm of individuality than those he gave before; and they did not disappoint us, because they did not claim too much. They were quite unpretending, pleasing little fancies; the ballade, with which he answered an encore, was even more than that. But who could think for a moment of comparing them with such fine inspirations as any of the little mazourkas or nocturnes of Chopin; the "Invitation" of Weber; the little tone-poems of Henselt, Stephen Heller, &c.; and much more that we might name.

His execution of Liszt's fantasia on Lucia was wonderful, and electrified his audience. But was it wise and artist-like to introduce more difficulties into the piece than Liszt had written? We saw the wondrous feats; but with our eyes shut would the music have sounded any better for them?

A Complaint from Mr. Perabeau.

MR. EDITOR:—In your Journal of last Saturday I find some very false and unjust remarks in regard to our Concert, which you will oblige me in correcting. Firstly, you say, "but there seemed to our ears a lack of perfect unity of pitch among the instruments," etc. But it seemed not so to our ears. Our musicians have ear enough to tune their instruments perfectly, and in regard to the Horn, I must tell you, that all wind instruments, when cold, are flatter than when used some time, when they grow sharper, by the warmth of the respiration. I am at a loss to "recognize those exquisite little obligato passages" for the horn; if you would have said solo for obligato, it would have been right. Your remark about "a tendency sometimes to over-hasten the tempo," shows that you are ignorant with this Septuor; if you would take the trouble to look into the composition you would find accelerandos, i. e. hasten the tempo. I studied music in Germany, Mr. Criticos, heard the greatest artists play and can therefore not agree with your notions about performing Chamber Music.

Your query, "Did not the pianist take M.'s song quite too fast for her?" I respond trembling, that I committed the unpardonable sacrilege, in not consulting your infallible oraculum about the tempo. Miss Mary Saul seems to draw all your wrath on her; our Programme does not say anything about "wonderful pianist of nine years," you are therefore not authorized to say so. You call her performance "unripe school performance." Please allow me to be of a different opinion; if it had been so, I would of course not have brought her in a public concert. Miss Saul is with nine years riper than many others with nineteen (in musical point of view) and I hereby defy you, to find me another Miss of nine years to compete with her; if she had appeared with another Society, you would have lavished the whole repertorium of your superlative praises on her. Miss Saul has composed Waltzes, Marches, etc., and what is more, has written them down, is capable of writing the harmony to a given melody; but this is "only clever." I send you hereby our Programme in order to persuade you there is no puffing about "a wonderful pianist, nine years," in it.

Ne Sutor supra crepidam.

Schustor bleib' bei del'm Leisten.

H. PERABEAU.

P. S.—Your remarks remind me of "Diogenes Dictionary of Music" in Friday's Transcript, Oct. 7 "Say that the Performer would have succeeded better if he had taken more pains with his instrument." You will do me the greatest favor, in not commenting my performances in your Journal anymore, let them be in my favor or otherwise.

H. P.

OUR REPLY.—But we must "comment" this "performance," which is decidedly more "otherwise" than wise. For the writer's own sake we are sorry he insists upon our printing it; it never could be in our heart to do him so unkind a deed. For, look you, Mr. Perabeau:

1. You deoy that the instruments were out of tune, and then excuse it by showing why the horn was flat.

2. As to obligato and solo, you quibble. Musicians use both terms indifferently in speaking of scraps of melody which fall to the share of single instruments in a concerted piece; although obligato also covers more ground than that.

3. As to the tempo in your piano-playing in the Septuor, we spoke of over-hastening, and of a general tendency (as we have fancied, constitutional in you) to hurry.

4. We vented no "wrath," and even found no fault with your promising pupil; we only made a friendly suggestion to the concert-givers.

5. Read your own announcement in our advertisements of Oct. 15th, and you will find: "Miss Mary Saul, a wonderful Pianist, nine years of age, will perform," &c.

6. We do not answer the insulting insinuation about "another society." You must trust our motives, before we will parley with you.

7. We shall comment, independently and freely, impartially and kindly, upon all public performances when it shall to us seem fit. In many cases we should be too happy to accept such release as you offer us, could we only make it consistent with our duty to our readers.

Finally, we print your letter of our own free will. Let no one take it as our pledge to print every angry self-defence which any artist we may choose to criticize, may write. He plays, the public pays, and we say our say about it. Personally we know him not, and own no controversy with him.

MR NATHAN RICHARDSON'S new Music Store is by far the most elegant and tasteful establishment of the kind in this country. Indeed it is new in kind, a fine ideal of his own. It is an honor to our city and is worthy of the cause of Music. It is worth a visit to Boston to see so beautiful a store; the music-lover finds himself there surrounded with all the materials and worthy emblems of his art. The gilded bust of Beethoven looks down upon him as he crosses the threshold; busts and portraits and medallions of the great composers and artists adorn the long vista of the main store, till you reach the elegantly furnished sanctum in the rear, where artists congregate, to hold exchange, and try new music, and read the latest musical journals of this country and of Europe. One side of the store is stocked with all the best foreign music, under the charge of Mons. HILL, who has had long experience of the business in one of the largest firms in Paris; the other with American publications, politely and obligingly dispensed by Mr. FOYE, well known for years past in the store of Mr. Ditson.

Mr. Richardson is himself a musician, familiar with the music and the artists of Germany, and presides over the whole with the most liberal enthusiasm for his Art, as is evinced by so much generous and tasteful outlay. Nothing on his part will be neglected for the accommodation of artists and art-lovers. His place is truly what he styles it in his advertisement (see last page), a "Musical Exchange." We can assure our friends also, that they may buy foreign music of him at the cheapest prices.

On Thursday evening of last week, over a hundred artists, amateurs and critics were present, by invitation of the proprietor, at a charming little social dedication of his store. The scene was beautiful, the hospitality both bountiful and graceful, and all were bappy in the opening of such good times for music. There was an elegant banquet, toasts and speeches and bouquets and music, and all seemed to augur such success as the liberal enterprize of Mr. Richardson undoubtedly deserves.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS!

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce that his Series of Twelve Orchestral & Vocal Concerts,

Commencing Monday, October, 24th, will be continued every Evening of next week until the Series is completed, which cannot be extended, as M. JULLIEN will leave Boston on the 7th of November, to appear in New York on the 8th, and Philadelphia on the 9th.

It is his design to give during the week three evenings of classical music, viz:

A Beethoven Night,

A Mendelssohn Night,

And a Mozart Night.

Several of M. Jullien's most remarkable Solo-Performers, who have not yet been heard alone in Boston, have yet to make their appearance, besides the unrivalled artists who have already had such unbounded applause. Among these are the brothers Mollinhaus, whose violin performances have created such a sensation in Europe and in New York.

CONDUCTOR.....M. JULLIEN.

Hereafter the doors will be opened at 6 $\frac{3}{4}$, and the Concert commence at 7 $\frac{1}{2}$.

Admission to all parts of the Hall, $1. Family Tickets to admit Five, $4. To be purchased during the day, at the principal Music Stores and Hotels.

NOTICE.

Inquiries having been made as to the probability of a reduction in the price of admission to these Concerts, the Manager respectfully informs the public that, in consequence of the enormous expense attending the production in the United States of the greatest Instrumentalists of Europe, such a course cannot be complied with.

JONAS CHICKERING,

PIANO-FORTE MANUFACTURER,

MASONIC TEMPLE, Tremont Street,

HAVING removed from his former location in Washington Street, and fitted up Warerooms in the above-named beautiful building, is now prepared to attend upon such of his friends and the public as may honor him with a call. His time for the past six months having been exclusively devoted in endeavors to render his manufacture more perfect than ever, he is confident of being able to fully satisfy all who are desirous of possessing a good instrument.

Residents in the vicinity and adjacent States will please notice particularly his address, as there is another person in this city bearing his name, and with whom he is frequently confounded.

Mr. C. flatters himself that his experience and reputation of thirty years, must convince all who anticipate purchasing, that this is the best testimonial that he can offer of the excellence of his Pianos, and of the satisfaction which has invariably been manifested with regard to all the qualities which constitute an unexceptionable instrument.

THE NEW SACRED MUSIC BOOK.

THE BOOK OF THE SEASON!

POLYHYMNIA.

A COLLECTION of original Hymn Tunes, Anthems, Chants, and Sentences, for Sabbath Services; with a Sketch of a new method in the art of Singing, for Organists and Teachers of Singing. Composed by CHAS. F. HEUBERER, Professor of Music.

This new and most valuable collection of Church Music, which has been delayed from various causes, is now published and offered to the musical public. We hesitate not to pronounce it a book which will take rank among the very best collections of Sacred Music from the American Press. In style it is not unlike the admirable work of Zeuner's, the Ancient Lyre. Prof. Heuberer is one of the most talented of German Composers, and having been many years in this country, has had an opportunity which but very few of the distinguished Germans have had of becoming sufficiently acquainted with our customs and feelings, both social and religious, to prepare a well adapted book of Sacred Music. It is beautifully printed, on fine white paper, with large clear type, which can be easily read without injury to the eye, with but two lines upon a page, and each staff containing but one part—and a greater number of ORIGINAL AND BEAUTIFUL TUNES than can be found in any modern collection. The attention of Professors of Music, Teachers of Singing Schools and Leaders of Choirs, is especially invited to this work.

We shall also Publish Immediately,

By the same author, in connection with Prof. PERABEAU, a new and splendid collection of Glees, Part Songs, &c., under the title of EUPHONIA.

It is literally a Book of Musical Gems, and we believe will be so considered by the Musical World.

John Bunyan's Immortal Allegory.

Probably no Book, save the Bible, has been so extensively read as Bunyan's Inimitable Allegory,

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

It has been translated into nearly all the different languages of Christendom, and been perused with delight and holy fervor by all nations. Art has lent her attractions in nearly all the forms of illustration, from the rough Wood Cut to the exquisite Steel Engraving. But to the middle of the nineteenth century, and to an American Clergyman, are we indebted for the only true pictorial conception of this immortal work.

The novel and sublime idea of embodying the ENTIRE STORY, and transferring the same to a SINGLE PICTURE, showing the wanderings of Christian from the "City of Destruction" to the "Celestial City," presenting at one view to the eye the varied scenes through which he passed, originated with DANIEL WIGHT, of Massachusetts. His truly original and beautiful conception was reduced to a most elegant design by HAMMATT BILLINGS, and from this design, JOSEPH ANDREWS, the distinguished historical engraver, has produced, after four years of labor, a Picture which will take rank among the most superb and elaborate productions of human genius, taste, and skill.

The Picture is now ready, and will be offered for sale at the Bookstore of the Publishers, and by Agents duly authorized by the Publishers.

The best works on Piano Instruction existing.

IN PRESS:—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO-FORTE, translated from the latest and most approved German Edition, by G. A. SCHMITT.

Also JUL. KNORR'S REVISED EDITION OF A. E. MÜLLER'S METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.

The above works are in reality the most complete, elaborate, and, at the same time, condensed works on the subject of which they treat. They contain Studies and Examples which will lead the scholar to a mastery of all the modern achievements of the Art; and are, in the opinion of leading German critics, the best books on musical instruction extant. The GUIDE is not only a key to the succeeding work, but contains a list of over two hundred pieces, by the first masters, in progressive order, with notes of advice to the teacher, showing how they might be best practised for the advancement of the pupil.

The COMPLETE METHOD contains many suggestions of the greatest importance to Teachers and Pupils that have not been mentioned in any other book of instruction.

These exceedingly valuable works are in press, and will be ready at an early date. OLIVER DITSON, Boston. iii 14 3m

MR. RICHARDSON has resided in Europe for the last five years, during which time he availed himself of the instruction of the most distinguished Teachers of Composition and the Piano-Forte, for the purpose of acquiring a thorough practical knowledge of MUSIC. While there, he became personally acquainted with all of the most celebrated publishers, and dealers in Music, and learned their peculiar methods of transacting business, with a view of establishing a Music Store in this city. Profiting by the knowledge acquired by visiting the Music Stores on the continent of Europe, as well as those in England, Mr. RICHARDSON formed a plan, differing from that of every other, and which he flatters himself possesses decided improvements over all.

In fitting up his Store, his object has been to make it an attractive resort for the Ladies, and the musical profession generally, and no expense has been spared towards rendering it every way worthy the patronage of the public,—and he trusts it will be the means of encouraging and improving the taste for Music among all classes.

The stock of Music comprises the most complete collection, of both Foreign and American, ever offered to the public. It was selected by the proprietor himself, and he has endeavored to avoid that which is not of an instructive character,—seeking rather to elevate the taste to the highest standard of Musical excellence. A Catalogue of the Music is being prepared, and will soon be issued.

All publications of this Store will be of a superior order, and got up in fine style. No pieces will be published that are not fully worthy of it,—and no compositions accepted for publication that are not worth paying for.

The above Music Store comprises two departments—American and Foreign. Mr. J. M. FOYE, who has had many years' experience in the business, in this city, will take charge of the American department; and Mons. A. HILL, from the celebrated publishing house of Brandus & Co., of Paris, will have charge of the Foreign department. And the Proprietor trusts, by devoting his whole attention to business, to receive a liberal share of patronage. Being in constant correspondence with many eminent Professors and Publishers of Music abroad, he will at all times be happy to give any information with regard to musical matters that may be in his power.

Foreign and American PIANO-FORTES and ORGANS, from the most celebrated manufacturers, constantly on hand. Also, some of the best specimens of large sized SWISS MUSIC BOXES that have ever been imported, may be seen at the Store.

PIANO-FORTES, of the best German, French, and American manufacture, selected and sent to any part of the United States, at the lowest Cash prices. Mr. R. will WARRANT every instrument he recommends, and will assume the whole responsibility of a safe arrival at the residence of the purchaser.

The largest and richest variety of OPERA GLASSES and FANS, of entirely new styles, ever offered by any other house in the United States, are ready for inspection. Also, French UMBRELLAS and CANES; those in want would do well to examine, before purchasing elsewhere.

LITHOGRAPHS, BUSTS, MEDALLIONS, and PORTRAITS, of the most distinguished Musicians and Composers,—as Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Chopin, Dreychock, Liszt, &c., always on hand.

Those desiring the services of good Teachers, in any of the different branches of Music, may learn their addresses and terms of Mr. Richardson, who will interest himself in such matters, without any partiality.

Mr. R. is a subscriber for all the Musical Journals published in England, France, Germany, Italy, and America, and they may always be found in the Saloon connected with his Store.

Foreigners will find themselves quite at home in this Store, as French and German, as well as English, will be spoken.

experience of it at every "monster concert," which, under the circumstances, produces not a greater, but relatively a less intense effect, than a normal orchestra of from sixty to eighty men; to say nothing of the æsthetic pleasure which must always be disturbed by too great a multitude, since an artistic unity can never be brought about in so multifarious an assemblage.

DEATH OF MADAME MENDELSSOHN.—The Frankfort papers announce the recent death of Madame Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, widow of the composer, at the age of thirty-five,—and her interment in the Free Town with solemn musical ceremonies. The event had been for some time expected by the friends of the deceased lady,—since her health was, by them, known to have been slowly and steadily declining for more than a twelvemonth. It must not pass without its word of respectful commemoration; since whenever the story of the life of the composer of 'Elijah' is told,—a place of no ordinary love and honor must be kept for the worthy wife of the greatest modern artist; who rejoiced in the extraordinary triumphs of his brilliant but short career, with a simplicity, cordiality, and modesty excellent in one so beautiful and accomplished as she was; and who supported his loss and accepted the trial with a quiet and dignified resignation, made all the more touching by the depth and earnestness of affection which she loved to express when speaking of him who went before her—by but a little while—to the grave.—Lond. Athenæum.

[From the London Athenæum.]

Death of George Onslow.

Some years ago, when the immediate surprise and delight excited by Beethoven's earliest works had subsided, and before chamber-musicians or chamber-audiences had begun to relish his later compositions,—before also the peculiar genius of Mendelssohn was fully developed,—the music of Onslow was in great request among our choicer amateurs, and the announcement of his death might have excited a livelier regret than it will now excite. Yet, in more respects than one, the composer just deceased claims an honorable mention amongst the distinguished and individual artists of the past half-century.

He was born at Clermont, in the Pay-de-Dôme, in July, 1784. His father was a member of the well-known English family—his mother a Brantôme. Thus, he learned music merely as a gentleman's accomplishment; and though he studied the pianoforte under Hullmandel, Dussek, and Cramer, besides learning the violoncello, it was not, we are assured, till some time after boyhood was passed that a hearing of Méhul's Overture to "Stratonice" excited in him that desire of trying to exercise creative power which was only to be allayed by his devoting his life to the study and production of music. Unlike many other amateurs who confound wishes with means, and ideas with complete works,—determined too, to undertake musical composition in its most delicate and complex and intellectual forms,—Onslow, we are assured by M. Fétis, shut himself up, and toiled laboriously ere he gave out his first stringed Quintet; from that time until within a short period of his death producing and publishing unceasingly most successful as well as most fertile compositions for the chamber. A few Symphonies and three Operas (no one of which is particularly striking), 'L'Alcalde de la Vega,' 'Le Colporteur,' and 'Le Duc de Guise,' are the only other works by Onslow which have been laid before the world. So far as we are aware, he never attempted sacred composition.

The large mass of chamber music, however, finished by Onslow well merits the epithet of remarkable. It is thoroughly original without being extraordinarily striking,—delicate and interesting without sickliness or the absence of occasional vigor,—suave in the phrases, ingenious in structure,—not always, it may be, sufficiently varied by happy strokes of episode, but always thoroughly well reasoned out, and interesting to the players, from the closeness of attention and readiness in dialogue, reply and imitation which it demands. During later years—as frequently happens with those whose first thoughts are more pleasing than powerful—Onslow, in straining after novelty and contrast, became only affected or fragmentary. This may have done its part in abating the zeal and sympathy of his admirers:—but enough remains from his pen to be referred to, to be returned upon, to be performed and partaken of with pleasure, so long as music is bound by its present laws, and as those who enjoy it retain their present canons of enjoyment. It would be superfluous to single out any of the well-known Quintets which have won for Onslow an European celebrity,—or to do more than mention his Pianoforte Sextet, his Pianoforte Duets in F minor and E minor, his Pianoforte Trio in G major (a singularly sweet and gracious specimen of his style), his Pianoforte Sonatas, with violin (in G minor and E major), and with violoncello (in F major and G minor). The above are all classical works, having a beauty, an intricacy, and an expressiveness totally their own,—appealing to the thoughtful, as opposed to the sensual musicians,—happily conceived and carefully finished.

The habits of Onslow's life were gentle and retired, tending to encourage self-occupation. He resided principally in his native Auvergne,—travelled little, we believe, save to Paris, where he succeeded to Cherubini's membership of the Académie des Beaux Arts,—and mixed in the concerns of the world of music only sparingly and occasionally. The kindness of his nature took the form of an over-graciousness of manner, which made intercourse with him fatiguing to all such as prefer discriminating judgment and fresh, if irregular, sallies of humor to compliment, be it ever so courtly, or approval, be it ever so sincere. His health had been for some time declining,—but his death, at the close of a walk, was sudden. It is presumed that it may be followed by some votive honors in the country to which by right of citizenship, and more by the manner of his art, he may be said most closely to belong.

Adolph Bernard Marx.

Adolph Bernard Marx, doctor and professor of music, was born at Halle the 27th of November, 1798. He received instruction in the elements of music and on the piano, and was taught harmony by Türk; but, in his youth he cultivated the art only imperfectly, being obliged to give himself to the study of jurisprudence. Having completed his course at the University, he obtained an appointment on the tribunal at Halle, which, however, he soon abandoned for one more important in the college at Naumbourg. But the strong desire of devoting himself entirely to the study of music, decided him to remove to Berlin, where for several years, contending successfully against many obstacles, he pursued his musical studies. In 1823, Schlesinger committed to his charge the editorship of the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung, and the successful manner in which he conducted it for seven years, made him advantageously known and was the cause of his receiving, in 1830, the appointment of Director of Music in the University of Berlin. He subsequently received the diploma of Doctor in Music from the University of Marbourg, and his published works justify his title to this honor.

Among the productions of Marx are the following:

1st. Die Kunst des Gesanges, theoretisch-praktisch. (The Art of Singing, theoretical and practical.) Berlin, 1826, 4to. 347 pp. This work is in three divisions; the first containing the principles of music; the second, treating of the theory of the voice and its formation; the third being made up of detailed observations on the application of the art of singing to different styles of music.

2nd. Ueber Malerle in Tonkunst. Ein Mairgruss an die Kunst-Philosophen. (On Painting in Music. A May greeting to the Art-philosophers.) Berlin. 1828. 67 pp., 8vo.

3d. Die Lehre von der musikalischen Composition, praktisch-theoretisch, Selbst-unterricht. (Theory and practice of musical composition.) 2 vols. Leipsic. 1838.

4th. Allgemeine Musiklehre. Ein Hilfsbuch für Lehrer und Lernende in jedem Weise musikalischer Unterweisung. (General Music Teacher.) Leipsic. 1839.

5th. Berliner Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung. 1823–1828.

6th. Ueber die Geltung Händelscher Sologesänge für unsere Zeit. Ein Nachtrag zur Kunst des Gesanges. (On the value of Handel's solo songs for our time. A contribution to the Art of Song.) Berlin. 1829. 4to.

7th. Betrachtung ueber den heutigen Zustand der Deutschen Oper, (Considerations on the present state of German Opera,) &c.

Marx also wrote several articles in the Universal Lexicon of Music, published by Schilling; among them, those on Bach, Beethoven, Gluck, Fasch, Grétry, Haydn and Handel. He is also known as a composer by several musical dramas, symphonies, &c., and by his Oratorios, "Saint John the Baptist," which was performed in 1835, and "Moses," recently performed under the direction of Liszt, at Weimar. Dr. Marx is at present associated with Dr. Kullak, in the direction of a Musical Academy in Berlin; for an account of which see vol. 1, page 170, of this Journal.

A Letter about Jullien.

DEAR MR. DWIGHT:—A private letter from one of Jullien's audience last night fell into my hands to-day, and I thought in spite of its hasty style and its slight satire upon us Bostonians it might amuse your readers. I have not spared even the allusion to yourself. The writer does not pretend to any musical knowledge, but as you will doubtless give us a full and fair analysis of Jullien's performance, I thought this dashing criticism might meet a response in some minds and could do nobody any harm.

BOSTON, Oct. 27, 1853.

DEAR E:—Last night we heard Jullien. What a wonderful man he is! Why, he has met Yankeeedom on its own ground and beaten it entirely. Such a command of means, such an understanding of effects I never saw before, but the aim is petty, trivial, purely of to-day and this world. He understands our weak side and relied upon the Boston reputation for appreciation of a grand orchestra and the classical music, which our friend Dwight insists so much upon, and so supposed he could put the dollars in his pocket here as fast as he did the fifty cents in New York. Many things Jullien understands, but not the Boston public. His music is essentially popular, and he needs the great democratic masses to receive and reward it. The musical public in Boston is of necessity small, and we have not that perpetual influx of new people which enables New York to furnish a fresh audience every night. Jullien needed every person that ever goes to a concert, and that for more than one night each, to make out his twelve audiences of two or three thousand. The prestige of success is a part of his art, and he ought never to allow himself to have an empty house. We Bostonians have a notion that a half dollar is enough for a concert, and you know what Boston notions are. Fashionable people, indeed, attend only dollar concerts, but they are few in number after all; and as for us sober people, if curiosity overcomes economy for once, yet it is only for once—we see the elephant and are satisfied. Then, too, a half dollar audience is so much more impressible and sympathetic. Why, Jullien would have every one of them on their feet and answering his shouts as they did in Castle Garden; but how can he expect people who are "genteel" and can afford their dollar a ticket, to peril their reputation by a display of patriotism. Imagine Park and Beacon streets, which closed their windows when Kossuth went through, rising up to honor "Hail Columbia," and "Who fought and bled in Freedom's cause."  Oh, it was very funny to see a few grave people rise while Jullien was playing Yankee Doodle with the broadest fun and satire gleaming through it everywhere, and laughing at them to their faces, and they knew nothing, of it! Old Connecticut and wooden nutmegs, ticking clocks and jingling picayunes, Mexican wars and Bowery boys, all seemed fairly represented. Again and again come in the same rub-a-dub, the same unmeaning, hacknied phrase:

Yankee Doodle is the tune Americans delight in,
'Twill do to whistle, dance and sing,
And its just the thing for fightin'.

Then that booming cannon, and the battle, and the shouts all worked up with grand effect; and after the victory—no song of thanks going to the gods, or mass to be performed in the churches;—what had they to do with whipping the British? "We beat 'em boys,"

"Yankee Doodle keep it up, Yankee Doodle dandy."

"The British can whip all the world—and we can whip the British." We laughed as if we were children again. I did not quite forgive Jullien that he did not fully take us captive, that he did not extemporize and repeat in louder and louder, wilder and wilder strains, like the prisoner who played the magic pipe in the fairy tale, until we had to rise and dance at his bidding. I did not wish to pay reverence to "Hail Columbia"—which I think anything but hale at present, but I did want to feel like a boy when he first hears a military band and give myself up once more to a popular impulse.

It was profane to hear Beethoven in this connection. I half suspected it before we went, but after a ten years' worship of him, I could not risk losing the possibility of hearing a whole series of his music finely played; but it was like using Raphael's Cartoons for fourth of July fireworks. Nothing can wholly eclipse such genius, and occasionally the grand Beethoven thought broke through; but there was no unity of expression; the effect was distracting and confused, until it came to the triumphal march; that was grand—it was the march of an army—not the marshalling of all the elements of the universe, as it has always seemed to me before,—still its vigor, its precision, its masterly execution were very great. W—— compares him to Horace Vernet, whose battle pieces are the finest possible, but who fails in every other department. How we wished for I——, with his severe taste and his intellectual perfection of musical expression, to see the tantalizing effect which this masterly power over the instruments, with the entire failure to reproduce the idea, would have had upon him.

We came away fully satisfied that we had had our money's worth,—having of course taken a family ticket of five—another queer feature of the concert; for the groups of five in every direction gave that peculiar aspect of arrangement to the audience which might be indicated by the way in which we used to sing—five times three are fifteen, five times four are twenty, five times five are twenty-five, and five times six are thirty. How smoothly and nicely it used to run, didn't it? and just so did Jullien's concert. Long live Jullien!—we have never seen his like before, and hardly think we shall soon again. The witching hour of night found us still comparing notes on his performance, and I only wish you could have been of the party. R—— must have enjoyed him to the utmost.

Yours for Classical Music, D.

The Dead March in "Samson."

Is not our good friend the "Diarist" mistaken in speaking of the Dead March in "Samson" being played in Boston? He may be right, but I never chanced to hear "Samson" with any other than the Dead March from "Saul."

And this gives me a chance to say that the substitution of the Dead March from "Saul" in the Oratorio of "Samson" was, I think, a great mistake. The march in "Samson" fills up its place exactly; the march from "Saul," when put there, is out of place.

One day last Spring, I was riding with K., when I suddenly said, Did you ever hear this air? and then hummed,

No; said he: what is it? Tell me what it expresses, said I. I cannot tell, exactly, was his reply, but it seems like eulogy. As our wagon rattled a good deal I said no more. Some time after, when he had forgotten it, I played it on the piano, according to Dr. Clarke's arrangement, and without telling K. what it was, asked him to analyze it. It is, said he, the utterance of a soul too full to refrain from utterance, and yet with emotions so nicely balanced that it does not know whether to break out into lamentation or into eulogy. Still a third time, some months afterward, I was riding with him on top of a stage-coach, and said: K., do you remember this tune? and then whistled it. No, said he, I do not. What does it express? said I. It is a puzzle, he answered; it seems not to know whether to weep or to break out in praises.

Now when you remember that Handel places this march between the chorus, "Weep, Israel, weep," and the bass solo, "Glorious hero," you must acknowledge that he put it in the right place, and it is a meddlesome interference to substitute any other music for it.

The whole Oratorio of "Samson" bears the criticism of K. equally well. He has never heard it, except as I have given him detached portions on the piano, or hummed the airs, and yet without knowing the words, he always gives correctly their expression. I will occupy your space with only one more example. On my humming the air of the words, "Then round about the starry throne of Him who ever rules alone," he said it expressed clear and undoubting hope with a reference to previous despair. Now it is preceded in the oratorio by the recitative, "My genial spirits droop, my hopes are fled."

Vive la Bagatelle.

On Monday night M. Jullien was again in his glory. Enough, too much, has already been said of this dictator in the realm of sound. But we can not forbear one word in vindication of his genius.

'Humbug,' 'clap-trap,' these are words as closely connected with the name of le grand Jullien as are 'trashy' and 'noisy' with the Valse and Gallop among the pseudo-critical. What if the great maestro with his mammoth band and monster concerts is a hum, and his titanic drum a hum-drum,—what if his exquisite echo is blown from a horn out of a back window,—what if His Imperial Highness (does he not ape the majesty of his Roman namesake?) condescendingly nods and braves each obsequious solo, and recalls them upon very slight pretence for an encore,—what though he perch his unique and graceless figure

High on a throne of royal state, which far Outshines the wealth of Ormus or of Ind, but which in fact is only tinsel and fustian,—what if his halo is gilt and his majesty a mockery,—is he not at least the prince of humbogs? Be it so, say we, for behold a greater than Barnum is here! The man is a study in himself. His cravat,—Jullien's cravat, Jullien's waistcoat, Jullien's gloves, are they not each and all wonders in their way? And when under the magic of his bâton the muses and the graces all spring up and gather into sight—when with his massive shoulders, Atlas-like, he seems to hold up the heavens while it thunders, and vast volumes of sound are rolling and fulminating about his head,—when the electric spark from his finger's end seems to dart to the remotest corner of the orchestra,—when at the quiver of his wand the note comes shaking and tremulous from a score of instruments—and tones clear as light answer the flashing of his eyes—when his nod, like the Olympian Jove's, unbinds all the bolts of sound and lets loose the thunder of the drums, not only in the Hall, but in the lower entry, then the study becomes mystery and wonder verges on admiration.

All this has been said much better before. It is in everybody's mouth and in everybody's ears. It has been well said too that he gives us too much of the monster and too little of the muse: that he has imbibed the genius of imperial Rome: that when he plays Yankee Doodle, it is to display the agility of his leviathan parts, a display only paralleled by the tight-rope performance of Nero's elephant. So his battle scenes and shouts of victory remind us no less of the mock fights and naval conflicts of the amphitheatre translated into sound.

The American mind wants repose. But Jullien, like a true artist as he is, and not a social philosopher, appeals to those elements which it has, not to what it lacks. If the trash which he serves up to his audiences is nightly devoured with avidity, and better selections meet with little favor, as is the fact, who shall blame Jullien for the tastelessness of his hearers? It is his purpose to please not to instruct. Moreover it is his boast that he has popularized orchestral music. Who then shall dub him "hum," while he succeeds so eminently in what he undertakes? Go and listen. Graciously permit yourself to be pleased; for it is due to the artists who make an effort to please you,—suffer yourself to whirl away in the mazes of that Byronic "Prima Donna," in which Buckingham Palace, with the crowned head and court in it, and the Iron Duke himself at their head to lead the waltz, seems sucked up into a maelstrom of sounds, and after riding aloft and spinning for a while on each of its towers is at last safely restored to its massive foundations. When one is swept off his feet by each fell swoop of those fiddle bows, one cannot but wish to make a new combination of parts of the "Prima Donna" and give it a new name. Then might we have a "Witche's Dance" after our own heart—not that easy grace with which Ole Bull's witches, twining their arms in sisterly affection, glide into the dance with a gentle movement, like well-bred young ladies,—but a weird, screaming, chattering, squeaking, gibbering jig that should raise one's hair and stop one's breath till at last they are swept off to upper air by one circling eddy of sounds, as in John Martin's picture of Macbeth. It needs a man of terrors, like the gloomy Paganini, whose life was a tragedy, to do this.

Quid multa? One word touching the "Atlantic," and then adieu to him of the golden wand. This Gallop, performed for the first time, was a disappointment. So grand a theme should not be so poorly treated. It lacks incident—not that it should be too specific and descriptive—but certainly it should not be so general as to be vague and senseless. The imagination needs a standpoint from which to regard the tumultuous, wavy scene—of course the vessel is taken as the only available one—the only idea intelligibly conveyed is that of waves beating against her side. This may be the chief feature of the voyage to those who roll, sea-sick, in their berths, but it is not enough for an enthusiastic audience. If the subject is monotonous, let him indulge in a poetic license and vary it,—few of his hearers would detect the fraud; for this continued thumping, were the illusion complete, could only produce nausea, never pleasure. But the field is wider. Where, for instance, are those varieties of time and tone and quality which the different waves afford? Where all those incidents which lend to sea life the little interest it possesses? Here the composer's genius seems to have deserted him. Where is the boatswain's call, piping the hands on deck, the wind howling through the shrouds, so well expressed by the strings of such an orchestra,—the rising storm—hail—thunder—then the calm—the entry of smooth water—the nearing the harbor—in strong relief against these strains, the gun which announces the arrival at port—and then the jubilant strains and palpable extasies at the re-union of friends?—we cannot but blame Jullien for not using some of these materials and making more of the "Atlantic," for that great name deserves more at his hands. When he shall pay a visit to his Imperial Brother of the Celestials, let him compose a "Pacific" for an overture to his first "sing-sing" in China, and, our word for it, the long-nailed and pig-tailed critics will look, from their little eyes, with favor on him. Success to Jullien, say we, Vive la bagatelle! R. S. R.

Jullien: A Sketch from the Life.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX,

Author of "Pen and Ink Sketches."

Years ago, as some of our readers, perchance, may remember, we published a sketch of Paganini, Emperor of all the Fiddlers. One or two friends have requested "a crack of the old whip" in the shape of a companion picture of Jullien, Czar of all the Conductors. Willingly we take up our pen and commence an outline.

Many times have we looked upon M. Jullien. Evening after evening have we passed in the Drury Lane Theatre, when he stood "monarch of all he surveyed" in the midst of his magnificent troupe of instrumentalists, and never did we tire of listening to his spirit-stirring compositions. Those "Seasons" were wont to wind up with a Bal Masqué, and many an American visitor to London will remember the scene of fun, frolic, and festivity which was presented on such occasions.

But we once saw M. Jullien under very different circumstances. Even he has had "to wage with fortune an unequal war." Emperors and kings, like common people, are sometimes compelled to abdicate, and the great, or electrically speaking, the "Prime Conductor" was one sad day obliged to lay down his bâton and exhibit his Hyperian curls in—alas! that we should say it—in the Court of Bankruptcy!

Somehow or another the expenses of his Concerts had exceeded the receipts; and while all London imagined Jullien to be making a fortune, he was hurrying to a failure. A crash, more startling than any his orchestra could have produced, ensued, and an inexorable gentleman of the Hebrew persuasion laid his rude hand on the hitherto unsullied coat of our harmonious friend. His "entertainment" came suddenly to an end, contrary to musical canons, by sundry "overtures" to his creditors—pending which, Jullien had the honor of making his bow, not to his admirers, but to a crusty old Commissioner in Bankruptcy, who knew more about a "balance sheet" than a sheet of music, and put a "bar" to the harmony for the present by asking the luckless composer, not about his last Quadrille, but respecting his first Schedule.

Yes—there in that dingy court in Basinghall Street, stood our friend, altered indeed in position and dress, but the same as ever in face and, as Mr. Turveydrop has it, "deportment." The faces of the commissioner and of the composer were studies—the one all crabbedness and sourness, the other all blandness and beatitude. Jullien took the examination very easily. It was no use for a grim opposing barrister to try to damage his fair fame, the Bankrupt smiled him down, and the result was, that when the examination ended—the Commissioner complimented Jullien on his honorable behavior—the creditors saw that he acted like an honest man, and professed themselves satisfied, and the Jewish gentleman, with the hooked nose, defiled no more the coat of the composer.

And now, here we are in the Boston Music Hall to look on our old favorite once more; for his fame has flown before him; and the musical quid nuncs of the city are anxious to hear whether "common rumor" has in this case, turned out to be a "common liar." Patience, ladies and gentlemen,—you will be satisfied ere long that the lady of a hundred tongues has, for once, adhered to truth.

It is half-past seven o'clock, and the Hall is about two thirds filled. The Dollar ticket has kept many away, doubtless, and perhaps it would have been more politic in Jullien to have fixed a lower price, but that is his business. Those who are present are on the tip-toe of expectation, for his portraits in the music-shop windows—and music-sheets with the American flag gaudily displayed thereon—and "authentic" accounts of Jullien's early life and times, and of the desperate duel he once fought—have all together excited much curiosity respecting the hero of Schottisch and Quadrille. Then his very name is musical, and young ladies lisp it lovingly to their enamored beaux, who wish in their hearts that they had been equally fortunate, and are quite indignant at their parents for having bestowed on them the unromantic appellations of Hiram W. Hinks or Jabez J. Timmins.

One by one the members of the Orchestra make their appearance. The sudden rise of innumerable jets of gas reveals an amazing number of beards and mustachios—all these gentlemen might be known to be musicians had you met them at the North Pole. A discriminating eye could have told upon what instrument any one of the gentlemen played. The Bassoon had a grave and solemn look, and the buccinator muscles were particularly well developed, presenting a striking contrast to the Flute, who had pinched up lips and drooping upper eye-lids. The Cornet-a-piston was florid, and rather red about the whites of the eyes; and the Violins ("who were in great force") had each of them a shaky sort of air. The Drum was remarkably pompous; and the Piccolos volatile and flighty. As for the Violoncello he looked like a grumbler, and the Oboe reminded one of Byron's "deep-mouthed Bæotian."

The tuning of an orchestra is by no means a delightful subject either to listen to, or to write about—so we shall not attempt any description thereof. Indeed we have no time, for the clock strikes eight, and the audience are becoming impatient.

Suddenly a lightly built(?) but a symmetrical figure makes its appearance on the platform, and the owner of it cannot be mistaken. As he glides gracefully towards the little raised scarlet covered platform, on which stands a chair of crimson velvet and gold, and a gilded music stand, he takes little or no notice whatever of the applause which greets him. But, once on his throne, he makes a slight obeisance, and then casts a glance over his musical realm.

Yes! there stands Jullien, in faultless coat—irreproachable shirt bosom—immaculate wristbands—unexceptionable trowsers, and glistening little boots. From the curls of his head to the sole of his patent leathers it is Jullien all over—"none but himself could be his parallel." He is, as we heard a lady near us say, "a duck," though, considering his musical predilections, we should have imagined him to be a rather more musical kind of bird. There is nothing of the "quack" about our conductor, who now lifts his white wand and taps lightly on his music stand.

Every one is on the qui vive now—audience as well as orchestra. The eyes of each musician are fixed upon their great chief, who with bland and beaming face takes a final glance to assure himself that all is right. The bows of the fiddles are half raised, and slope over the nicely tuned strings. The man at the big drum grasps with one hand the stick, and in the other holds a cymbal; the Cornet-a-piston nears Herr Koenig's lips, the Bass Viols erect their ponderous proportions. The Concerts of the Week.

JULLIEN has had the whole field. The amateurs seem almost to live their evenings in the Boston Music Hall, deepening their attachment to the place, while every night surprised by some new instrumental wonder. Who ever believed he could sit out so many quadrilles and so many repetitions of the Yankee Doodle slam-bang!

Thin houses lasted just a week; on Monday there was a great increase of audience; on Tuesday greater yet; and on Wednesday, Jullien's benefit, the great hall fairly overflowed, so that an eager surf of listeners broke over the stage itself and hardly left room for the ponderous ophicleid to turn about. This was but the infallible result of a continued siege by such a body of musical knights errant, real invincibles, as come here banded together under Jullien. Every onslaught has developed new resources.

Jullien is decidedly the topic, judging, among other things, from the number of communications sent to us about him. Three of these we print to-day, rather as amusing specimens of the impression Jullien makes on various bright, observing persons, who only love music, than as critical appreciations. It is well to see a fact from many points of view. Our own view is perhaps neither represented by the hero-worship of the sprightly "pen and ink sketch" of one, nor by the sceptical pleasantries and strictures of the other two. Yet there are good hints in them, and each makes out a kind of case in his own way.

The "Beethoven night" last week was followed by a "Mendelssohn night." We must say that we enjoyed the Scotch Symphony (in A minor), as fully as we ever did; in many respects more so. There has been, and there perhaps will always be, a question about the tempos. Some of them were taken a little faster than has been usual here. But the spirit and intention of the work we could not miss; it felt right; it came home to us. The Adagio never sank more deeply into our soul. Every piece of music of decided character, to be sure, sets its own time; but is that time always precisely the same? There authorities differ. We never could help suspecting that tempos were in some measure subjective to each one of us, seeming faster or slower according to our individual temperaments, and to the varying pulse of one and the same individual. We have heard an anecdote of Mendelssohn, to the effect that, being asked by a conductor how fast he should take one of his compositions, he replied by the question: "How fast do you like to take it? So? then you had better take your own time." There may have been a double entendre in this, to be sure. At all events we liked Jullien's rendering of the Mendelssohn Symphony far better than we did that of the C minor of Beethoven. Nor with regard to all of Jullien's classical renderings, can we go so far as one of our correspondents, who thinks that the "thought of the composer only broke through occasionally." In spite of what seemed to us defects in the rendering, we rarely missed the thought; Beethoven's thought stamps itself so positively, that where every part is clearly, fully and correctly sounded, as it must be in such an orchestra, with such master per-Oboe gives symptoms of volcanic action, and the Trumpets prepare for a decided "flare-up." As for the Flutes and Clarinets, they seem to know that they are about to recover their wind and get ready for flourishes and cadenzas. In a word, it only requires a wave of the magic wand of Jullien to awaken those enchanted instruments into life and beauty.

Mark you, how calm, how self-assured the great man appears. Not a fear has he—not the most distant idea of discord! He knows his men, and they won't make a mistake! As soon would Jullien believe that the planetary system would become deranged during the next half-hour, as that Koenig or Lavigne or any of the others would play a false note. No, no! he has little fear of such a catastrophe. One more look, and now he rests the tips of his gloved fingers on the music-stand, bends the left knee, artistically points the right toe, and raises his bâton, as if it had been the wand of an enchanter; the effect is—A CRASH!

A crash of music, not chaotic, or fragmentary, but a crash of harmony. Suddenly the white wand gently waves, and the left hand moves over the rippled waters of melody. And now the flutes warble deliciously, the strain being continued by the cornet-à-piston, which after "loosening the chords in a silver shower," utters a sound "so fine that nothing lives 'twixt it and silence." Now a look sets the host of violin bows into frantic paroxysms of sound, and the bassoon grumbles at a look from the master. A glance upward is a signal for the drum, which thunders a recognition, and the cymbals clash sympathetically. Faster and faster waves the wand, and as Jullien's curls tremble with excitement—for he is excited now—the harmony swells and deepens, and the whole orchestra is in motion. From a seeming momentary confusion, comes the air of a national piece, and "Hail to the Chief" elicits a burst of applause. Scarcely is it ended before "The Star Spangled Banner" renews the testimonials of delight, and on goes Jullien, conquering and to conquer.—The audience become almost frantic as the guns boom, without as well as within the Hall, and not being, as the Home Journal has it, "tied with strong ropes," they leap to their feet and cheer and stamp and wave hats and handkerchiefs. The enthusiasm is prodigious, and when it is at its height, a shout bursts from the lips of the musicians themselves, which is echoed by all present, and amidst a hurricane of cheers Jullien flings himself gracefully in his gilded chair and enjoys his triumph.

But he is forced to rise, and at an encore "Hail Columbia!" is pealed forth at the intimation of his wand. The excitement is now greater than ever, and all own the power of the great conductor. Shrewd fellow! he has tickled the national vanity; and as he once more takes his seat, a smile of intense satisfaction plays over his broad, pleasing face, and well chiselled features. The ladies look lovingly at him, and some pronounce him irresistible, whilst the men declare him to be "a brick!"

There, dear reader, we have, as well as we were able, touched off our musical friend for your especial benefit. If you doubt the accuracy of the sketch, out with your dollar and go and see for yourself.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXIX.

NEW YORK, October 31.—Mendelssohn (apropos to the question addressed to the Diarist in the Journal of Oct. 15,) fascinated me more in his music than any other composer. I know no other term which will convey an idea of the manner in which it affects me. Whatever it be, the theatre music of the "Summer Night's Dream," the concert-room music of his symphonies, his chamber-music, his piano-forte compositions, or the lofty movements of "Elijah" and "Paul," he seizes and holds me fast, fills every thought, for the time being, and I wake up at the close, seldom able to rescue a single passage, which has been sung or played, unless the work be one which has become familiar by oft hearing. When listening to a new work of his, I can never anticipate a measure—I might as well undertake to guess what the Æolian harp is going to sing next. I cannot whistle a tune of his, nor did I ever hear anybody whistling or singing him for want of thought.

The most exquisite melodic phrases abound in his works, but when I recall one to mind, and hum it over, in about three measures it lands me—nowhere. Just so soon, however, as the power of whistling or singing all the forty parts of a grand orchestra is attained, there is no doubt that Mendelssohn will become as whistleable and singable as Mozart, Rossini, Bellini, or Billings. Some seventy years since, the "Magic Flute" was produced, and its melodies, after being in everybody's mouth in Vienna, started off on their travels, and are going yet. Who does not know "Away with Melancholy"—a comic chorus in that splendid work?

How Rossini's melodies have gone everywhere! Di tanti palpiti, for instance. There's that famous melody in the overture to Masaniello—that sets all the heels, toes, canes and umbrellas within hearing in motion. Then again, take our Scotch and Irish melodies—which by the way I cannot hear with any patience if sung with an accompaniment—(query, How did Beethoven succeed in arranging the Scotch songs for Thompson?) these seem to be pure melodies—the musical thought flows along clear and bright as a line of silver. Take old Billings' psalm tunes, or Swan's—take Pleyel's themes (in his sonatas), or Beethoven's in his adagios, that in the trio Op. 11, for instance, or that in the Sextette—and many others—all these are of the stamp which I described as constructed with beginning, middle, and end. I cannot find such in Mendelssohn. Nor do I want them, but a good many of my neighbors at the concert do.

The other day I was looking at some fine pictures. All the colors were arranged so as in each case to tell a story—their subjects were brought out something as a fine melody is brought out by an orchestra. The other day too, I went over to Jersey City, and noticed that the great landscape painter had been at work upon all the foliage that so richly covers the lofty river banks up Hoboken and Weehawken way, and had clothed the whole shore with the richest and most gorgeous colors. They were put on in inextricable confusion—still they were so harmonious!—they told of Autumn just as Mendelssohn would sing of it.

Nov. 1.—I scrawled the above yesterday, and "in view of this subject"—as our old minister used to have it—I turned over the leaves of "Elijah" (Reed's beautiful edition) this morning. Nowhere, or, at most, only in mere melodic phrases here and there, could I separate a single part from the rich, golden, mellow luxuriance of the extraordinary instrumentation, by which every thought and feeling represented in the text is so magically painted. In the Arias, and concerted pieces even, memory did not reproduce the singing of Ball, Anna Stone, and the others at the Melodeon, or Formes, Miss Dolby and their associates at Exeter Hall, or Madame Tucek, Herr Mantins and their associates at the Berlin Sing-Akademie, but as somebody once wrote (didn't he?) It seems to me that we cannot speak of "accompaniments" in Mendelssohn's music, nor in Schubert's, for the part sung and the parts played, form but one integral whole. Think of beginning a solo in "Elijah" with a guitar-like trum-tum, tum, trum-tum, tum! I reckon it will be some time before that "theme for variations," recently advertised for, will be picked out of the works of Mendelssohn.

—"The rich stream of music [which] winds along

W., the friend to whose sleeve (and Dwight's) I pin my musical faith, was present at the Germania Concert in Boston the other evening. He was here yesterday, [There's that bell again! I declare, the most melancholy sound in nature is that cracked bell on the city hall—chug, chug!] and divided mankind into two classes—those who have heard the Overture to Tannhäuser, and those who have not. He describes it as a new revelation to him in Music—most original and wondrously fine. The place in which he heard it, too, he describes as utterly unparalleled—he is familiar with all the noted halls in Europe, but has never seen one which can be compared with the Boston Music Hall as a place in which to hear Music, which is what halls should be built for. When will our New York Metropolitan nuisance be abated? When shall we hear the Tannhäuser overture?

formers on each instrument, one hardly can mistake it. Every figure tells distinctly; such large sonority, such bold, clear euphony adds vastly to the impressiveness of the music, and makes its complication more appreciable, doubtless, to ears unfamiliar. How grand the Euryanthe overture one evening! the various stringed masses came in with such unmistakable positiveness in the answers of the fugue subject!

The other Mendelssohn pieces went not like the symphony. The "Midsummer Night's Dream" music was here and there coarsely rendered. There was none of that fine pianissimo in the Overture, and the Notturmo was hurried out of its true character and expression. The "Wedding March" took us off at too brisk a rate for a theme of such weight and thoughtfulness, as well as joyous pomp; and rich and euphonious as the crackling brass did sound, we could have wished it considerably less loud.

The promise of Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Mozart nights this week was, it seems, hastily made. But the great public has found potent attraction enough without these. Mozart has not been unrepresented. Mlle. ZERR has twice sung the passionate Queen of the Night's song, with those clear extra high notes and that brilliant execution which make that song her own; also the Batti, batti and Vedrai Carino, with far less expression and far less chaste abstinence from common-place Italian cadenzas, than the Italian Bosio. One night, too, we had an orchestral potpourri from "Don Juan," opening with the sublime and freezing harmonies of the ghost scene, in which those ponderous marble tones of Hughes's ophicleid spoke grandly for the statue. Would that that entire finale, (or the first finale) had been thus played through in its order! for it was a treat indeed to hear it from that orchestra. Instead of that, there were Donizetti-ish transitions from this sublime to lighter passages, like La ci darem, or the serenade; there was much emphatic rendering of what was never in "Don Juan," and the said solid ophicleid tones soon left their superhuman rôle, to thunder out with equal force the ordinary recitative of mere mortals. We cannot say that Jullien's operatic fantasias have been among his peculiarly effective productions; such potpourris cannot have the interest that an entire scene or portion of an opera has, when arranged in its dramatic sequence.

In the way of symphonies, we have had two of American production, namely by WILLIAM HENRY FRY; one called "A Day in the Country," which seemed very clearly and skilfully instrumented, but not to translate the sense of summer and the fields into unmistakable music, like Beethoven's "Pastorale." The second suffered from a sentimental name and programme: "The Breaking Heart;" but seemed to have more to say, and said it in a manner that commanded consideration, with more unity of development and some fine management of accompaniment. Both are departures from the so-called symphonic, or sonata form. Perhaps we should hear them more; as yet they do not haunt us with those after vibrations that have always remained when we have heard a symphony of Beethoven or Mendelssohn or Schubert.

It was an extraordinary programme which drew out and raised to the highest pitch of enthusiasm the crowded audience of Wednesday night. Jullien's benefit was his greatest triumph. Many of the orchestral selections and arrangements were from his own opera of "Peter the Great," brought out last year in London. Much of this was striking, rather Meyerbeer-ish and sometimes Verdi-like in its suggestions. But there was one piece, an Introduction, to the fourth act, commencing with a solemn canto fermo, and followed by a fugato movement played in soft, staccato manner, somewhat reminding one of that sombre, church-like andante in Mendelssohn's A major or Italian symphony, which certainly was very impressive. Such learned, and at the same time expressive, counterpoint is worthy of a pupil of Cherubini. The critical musician must either doubt the authenticity, or own that Jullien by this piece proved himself a composer in a far higher sense than that of a mere arranger of quadrilles and polkas. But traces of this same art lie hidden also underneath the glitter, if we mistake not, of those same ad captandum quadrilles, even if "the aim be trivial." For fugue, uttered or implied, is still the principle of all true, vital form in Art.

As for the dance music, where Jullien is himself par excellence, we find the "Katydid Polka" returns to us with more certainty of an inward welcome than any of the other pieces. It is more of a poem; is more redolent of summer nights, and trees and limpid waters, and takes the thoughts back verily to Castle Garden. Then it presents a quiet picture; it does not stun you and fatigue you, like the "American Quadrille." It is a fresh, wholesome bit of nature, and has not the stereotyped sentimentality of the "Prima Donna Waltz," in which Koenig's cornet repeats every night the same long-drawn, pathetic and unvarying cadenza. But then those things are not made to be heard every night, but for fresh audiences. We cannot recall all the sparkling novelties of this sort which Jullien has given in the week past; for in truth all dance music sounds so much alike, that it is easier to let it extemporize itself ad libitum in one's own head, through the whole idle day, than to remember one strain from another. The thundering monotony of the "Atlantic" galop made one hope that the next voyage might be more "Pacific."

At Jullien's benefit, he brought out the great gun, which (we are told) saved him once in London, when a rival company seduced all his orchestra away, except the faithful Koenig—(who does not see in every movement that the cornet hero is the Little John to our brave Robin Hood), and Jullien flew over to the continent, recruited a new orchestra, and composed the "Great Exhibition Quadrille," with which he rose phoenix-like again, to the entire discomfiture of his enemies. It is certainly a stirring affair, this Great Exhibition Quadrille. Making so much of our so-called national melodies, one can imagine how he would work up, and contrast, and illuminate in all sorts of colors the national airs, hymns, dances, of all the world. There is great stir of preparation first. Out steps from the second violins young Jullien, junior, commander of the Janizaries, and satrap over all the sheepskins, to take his central place high back among the drums and guns and gongs and bells, ready now to head the general fanfara, and now to manipulate at "London Chimes," or any other curious and exoctic effects. And verily the whole thing works itself up to quite a grand excitement, along with the animating master spirit. "God save the Queen" rings out sublimely at the end.

This piece is richer in themes, and full as brilliant as the "American;" but it has not the same artistic unity and progress, and does not take audiences captive by quite so fatal a crescendo of excitement. He has done wisely of late to put the "American" at the end of the programme; for, if it must figure every night, it is better to place it where those who have had enough of its noise, and have exhausted the joke of rising up to "Yankee Doodle," may hear the other things without having to endure that cannonading first. "D" is right in thinking that such concerts are for the masses, rather than deep music-lovers; since that love is oftenest coupled with a quiet disposition, and shuns this great noise and brilliancy, as a general habit, just as the thoughtful philosophic or poetic nature shuns great balls and fêtes. More quiet music, where the soul and thought of the composer, rather than a brilliant and extraordinary performance, is the point of interest, is far more "fit for human nature's daily food." This is not retracting what we have before said of the value of these orchestral performances in the way of educating the ear and gaining a knowledge of instrumental effects. It is a privilege which we ought to cultivate while it lasts.

In his solo department, Jullien keeps bringing out "treasures new and old." Faithful, sentimental KOENIG, BOTTESINI, (grave and scholastic-looking as some Middle Age academician), Pandean LAVIGNE, and REICHAUT, and WUILLE, have continued to repeat their solos almost nightly, and never was there such a chance to make acquaintance with the very inmost nature and utmost capabilities of instruments. The "Carnival of Venice" has been the obedient, graceful slave of very many masters and magicians. Among the new appearances, the brothers MÖLLENHAUER have been most note-worthy; in their violin duets the tones were as pure and truly blended as two souls perfectly in unison; of course only in such purity is such unity possible. Mr. HUGAES, with his great ophicleid, has also stepped down to the foot-lights, but musically he could not make himself more prominent or admirable than he is always in the ranks. The flageolet solo of M. COLLINET, was enough to make one not despair of hearing fine concert music evoked from a penny whistle; it was as artistically fine as it was funny. But this and all the other solo instruments are far more interesting in the orchestra, than outside and in front of it; for there they contribute their individualities to the illustration of a collective thought, emerging each into expressive prominence from time to time; there the instrument serves the music; whereas in the solo exhibition, Music, the mistress, is tortured (no matter how gracefully or skilfully) into the service of the instrument, her slave.

JULLIEN gives his last secular concert this afternoon; and on Sunday evening we shall hear this orchestra, for the last time, in arrangements of great sacred music, and in accompaniments of sacred choruses sung by the new "Mendelssohn Choral Society."

P. S. Not quite alone has Jullien had the field! The GERMANIA REHEARSAL filled the Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, when the D major symphony was admirably played, making three Beethoven symphonies which the Germanians have already given us this season. The charm of the music and the beauty of the scene, were quite up to the reminiscences of last year, in spite of the greater brilliancy of the Julien orchestra.

To-night they give their second concert, when we shall hear that Ossianic, sea-shore sounding symphony of GADE, a repetition of the Tannhäuser overture, songs by Miss PINTARD, and other good things. The hall will certainly be crowded.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The true music-lovers will rejoice at the quiet "good time coming," when they read the announcement of our old friends. The intimate communion with Beethoven and Mozart and Mendelssohn and Schubert and Schumann is to be renewed, and doubtless we shall find it deeper and purer than before. The Club have changed their night to Tuesday, which we think will accommodate the greatest number; and on Tuesday evening, Nov. 22d, we expect to meet all the well known faces, and many more, in the Tremont lesser Temple, which barbarous Greeks call "Meionaeon."

OTTO DRESEL'S Soirees are remembered among the very choicest of the musical reunions of last winter, or of our whole lives. The same opportunity is offered us again; and if we would not forget the charm of sonatas and trios of Beethoven, exquisite reveries of Chopin, and Lieder of Mendelssohn, purely, spiritually discoursed, without any mixture of clap-trap or commonplace, and sitting in a sphere of sympathetic listeners, we shall make haste to bespeak our tickets for the season.

NEW YORK.—The Maretzek opera troupe, at Niblo's, has made a great hit with Masaniello. The Prophète, and Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, are among the pieces promised.

PHILADELPHIA.—Mme. SONTAG is giving concerts without orchestra, with JAELL and PAUL JULLIEN. Her gratuitous day concerts for the public school children have created most interesting scenes. CARL ECKERT, her conductor, has sailed for Europe, having been appointed conductor of the court opera at Munich. The MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY announce their first instrumental and vocal concert. Mile. CAROLINE LEHMANN sings for them; we hear that this lady has been studying Italian in Philadelphia, preparatory to an engagement with Maretzek's troupe. —OLE BULL is giving concerts for the sufferers at Oleana.

A NEW AMERICAN VOCALIST.—Private letters from Europe speak most highly of the great progress made by Miss May, of Washington City, who has been for two years pursuing a severe course of study with a view to becoming an operatic singer. For several years she received instruction from the best masters in this country, and in Italy she has had the advantage of the best to be found in Naples and Florence. In the latter city she has been taught by Romani, and has enlisted the warm interest of Rossini, the composer, who has frequently given her his valuable counsel in her studies. Having acquired a perfect knowledge of the Italian language, as well as all that her masters can teach her of their art, (as they themselves acknowledge,) she will probably make her debut in one of the European capitals at the next musical season. She has visited Paris, where Meyerbeer, Halévy and other musical celebrities have expressed the highest admiration of her acquirements and her remarkable powers of voice.—Phil. Bulletin.

Foreign.

A letter from the Hague states that the King of Holland intends establishing a theatre devoted to the production of Dutch opera, of which the text and music are to be exclusively written and composed by natives of Holland. King William III. as is well known, is a good patron of the musical art, and is himself a composer of more than ordinary merit. An opera brought out at the Hague some short time since, entitled "Lambert Simnel," attributed in the bills to M. Van der Does, his Majesty's maître de piano, is now well known to have been nearly wholly composed by the King, and the opera was much applauded.

One of the operas of the celebrated French composer, Lesueur, entitled "Alexandre a Babylon," is in preparation at the Imperial Academy.

Among Italian operas forthcoming during the winter season, in Italy, the Gazette Musicale announces, on Italian authority, "Ida di Benevento," by Di Gioia; "Matilda di Ostan," by Pistilli; "Valenza Contadino," by Moscenza; "Margarita di Ostrogogna," by Petronini; "Cesare di Bazan," by Traversari; "Angiola di Ghemme," by Nicotia; "I tre Peccati di Diavolo," by Cortesi; and "L'Alchimista," by Rosi.

Johanna Wagner made her debut at Vienna in Bellini's Romeo. Her success was not over great. Madame Marlow, on the contrary, who played the part of Juliet, was called four times—after her death.

The prizes for musical composition have just been distributed at the Conservatoire; the first grand prize was awarded to M. Galibert, and the second to M. Durand.

CLASSICAL MATINÉES.
THE undersigned, resident artists of Boston, intend to give a Series of Classical Concerts during next winter, in which the best works of the great composers will be performed; such as Quartets, Quintets, Septets, Trios, Duos and Solos, by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Hummel, Weber, Cherubini, etc. The programme will be made more attractive by Vocal performances between the different pieces, as also Solos for Horn, Violoncello, Piano, Violin, etc., occasionally. Many greater compositions, as, Quartets, Quintets, and Septets for Piano with String and Wind Instruments, will be produced, which have never been publicly performed in Boston. To accommodate Ladies and others out of town, we propose to give our Concerts in the afternoon. The time and place will be announced hereafter. The subscription is $3 for the Series of Eight Concerts. Single tickets 50 cents each.
Subscription lists will be found at the different Music Stores.

JONAS CHICKERING,
PIANO-FORTE MANUFACTURER,
MASONIC TEMPLE, Tremont Street,

HAVING removed from his former location in Washington Street, and fitted up Warerooms in the above-named beautiful building, is now prepared to attend upon such of his friends and the public as may honor him with a call. His time for the past six months having been exclusively devoted to endeavors to render his manufacture more perfect than ever, he is confident of being able to fully satisfy all who are desirous of possessing a good instrument.

Residents in the vicinity and adjacent States will please notice particularly his address, as there is another person in this city bearing his name, and with whom he is frequently confounded.

Mr. C. flatters himself that his experience and reputation of thirty years, must convince all who anticipate purchasing, that this is the best testimonial that he can offer of the excellence of his Pianos, and of the satisfaction which has invariably been manifested with regard to all the qualities which constitute an unexceptionable instrument.

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

IMPORTER, PUBLISHER, AND DEALER IN

FOREIGN AND AMERICAN MUSIC,

PIANO-FORTES, ORGANS, MUSIC BOXES,

Opera Glasses and Fans, French Umbrellas and Canes,

BUSTS, MEDALLIONS, PORTRAITS, &c.

282 Washington Street, Boston.

MR. RICHARDSON has resided in Europe for the last five years, during which time he availed himself of the instruction of the most distinguished Teachers of Composition and the Piano-Forte, for the purpose of acquiring a thorough practical knowledge of MUSIC. While there, he became personally acquainted with all of the most celebrated publishers, and dealers in Music, and learned their peculiar methods of transacting business, with a view of establishing a Music Store in this city. Profiting by the knowledge acquired by visiting the Music Stores on the continent of Europe, as well as those in England, Mr. RICHARDSON formed a plan, differing from that of every other, and which he flatters himself possesses decided improvements over all.

In fitting up his Store, his object has been to make it an attractive resort for the Ladies, and the musical profession generally, and no expense has been spared towards rendering it every way worthy the patronage of the public,—and he trusts it will be the means of encouraging and improving the taste for Music among all classes.

The stock of Music comprises the most complete collection, of both Foreign and American, ever offered to the public. It was selected by the proprietor himself, and he has endeavored to avoid that which is not of an instructive character,—seeking rather to elevate the taste to the highest standard of Musical excellence. A Catalogue of the Music is being prepared, and will soon be issued.

All publications of this Store will be of a superior order, and got up in fine style. No pieces will be published that are not fully worthy of it,—and no compositions accepted for publication that are not worth paying for.

The above Music Store comprises two departments—American and Foreign. Mr. J. M. FOYE, who has had many years' experience in the business, in this city, will take charge of the American department; and Mons. A. HILL, from the celebrated publishing house of Brandus & Co., of Paris, will have charge of the Foreign department. And the Proprietor trusts, by devoting his whole attention to business, to receive a liberal share of patronage. Being in constant correspondence with many eminent Professors and Publishers of Music abroad, he will at all times be happy to give any information with regard to musical matters that may be in his power.

Foreign and American PIANO-FORTES and ORGANS, from the most celebrated manufacturers, constantly on hand. Also, some of the best specimens of large sized SWISS MUSIC BOXES that have ever been imported, may be seen at the Store.

PIANO-FORTES, of the best German, French, and American manufacture, selected and sent to any part of the United States, at the lowest Cash prices. Mr. R. will WARRANT every instrument he recommends, and will assume the whole responsibility of a safe arrival at the residence of the purchaser.

The largest and richest variety of OPERA GLASSES and FANS, of entirely new styles, ever offered by any other house in the United States, are ready for inspection. Also, French UMBRELLAS and CANES; those in want would do well to examine, before purchasing elsewhere.

LITHOGRAPHS, BUSTS, MEDALLIONS, and PORTRAITS, of the most distinguished Musicians and Composers,—as Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Chopin, Dreysebeck, Liszt, &c., always on hand.

Those desiring the services of good Teachers, in any of the different branches of Music, may learn their addresses and terms of Mr. Richardson, who will interest himself in such matters, without any partiality.

Mr. R. is a subscriber for all the Musical Journals published in England, France, Germany, Italy, and America, and they may always be found in the Salon connected with his Store.

Foreigners will find themselves quite at home in this Store, as French and German, as well as English, will be spoken.

Tickets for the first class concerts may always be found at the Musical Exchange. Also subscriptions taken for the leading Musical papers published in Europe and America.

NO. 6.

The Adagio must transport the two players into the higher regions of joy, for such harmonious fulness, with such manifold intertwining of melodic motives, must be doubly charming, when the arrangement is so perfect in regard to practicability as it is here. The closing movement may perhaps be called the ne plus ultra of all existing arrangements, but at the same time the most difficult task as it regards execution; the reason of this lies in the work itself, which here presents contrapuntal combinations of too essential a sort to be left out or in any way transformed. Properly studied, even this part (so significant in the history of Art) will produce an effect, such as scarcely any other arrangement in the world can.

And now all pianists of the genuine stamp are challenged to form themselves into brotherhoods of two, and set before them this Liszt arrangement as the goal of their activity. Two firm, well-tuned grand pianos; two of those nimble masters of the keys, with ever-whetted fingers; and a few sterling friends in Apollo for an audience,—so may there be right frequent meetings for the glory of the ninth Symphony and of its immortal arranger! LOUIS KÖHLER.

The Fairy Wife.

AN APOLOGUE, BY VIVIAN.

A merchant married a Fairy. He was so manly, so earnest, so energetic, and so loving, that her heart was constrained towards him, and she gave up her heritage in Fairyland to accept the lot of woman.

They were married; they were happy; and the early months glided away like the vanishing pageantry of a dream.

Before the year was over he had returned to his affairs; they were important and pressing, and occupied more and more of his time. But every evening, as he hastened back to her side, she felt the weariness of absence more than repaid by the delight of his presence. She sat at his feet and sang to him, and prattled away the remnant of care that lingered in his mind.

But his cares multiplied. The happiness of many families depended on him. His affairs were vast and complicated, and they kept him longer away from her. All the day, while he was amidst his bales of merchandise, she roamed along the banks of a sequestered stream, weaving bright fancy pageantries, or devising any gaieties with which to charm his troubled spirit. A bright and sunny being, she comprehended nothing of Care. Life was abounding in her. She knew not the disease of reflection; she felt not the perplexities of life. To sing and to laugh—to leap the stream and beckon him to leap after her, as he used in the old lover days, when she would conceal herself from him in the folds of a water lily—to tantalize and enchant him with a thousand capricious coquetries—this was her idea of how they should live; and when he gently refused to join her in these childlike gambols, and told her of the serious work that awaited him, she raised her soft blue eyes to him in baby wonderment, not comprehending what he meant, but acquiescing, with a sigh, because he said it.

She acquiesced, but a soft sadness fell upon her. Life to her was Love, and nothing more. A soft sadness also fell upon him. Life to him was Love, and something more; and he saw with regret that she did not comprehend it. The wall of Care, raised by busy hands, was gradually shutting him out from her. If she visited him through the day, she found herself a hindrance and retired. When he came to her at sunset, he came pre-occupied. She sat at his feet, loving his anxious face. He raised tenderly the golden ripples of loveliness that fell in ringlets on her neck, and kissed her soft beseeching eyes; but there was a something in his eyes, a remote look, as if his soul were afar, busy with other things, which made her little heart almost burst with uncomprehended jealousy.

She would steal up to him at times when he was absorbed in calculations, and, throwing her arms round his neck, woo him from his thought. A smile, revealing love in its very depths, would brighten his anxious face, as for a moment he pushed aside the world, and concentrated all his being in one happy feeling.

She could win moments from him, she could not win his life; she could charm, she could not occupy him! The painful truth came slowly over her, as the deepening shadows fall upon a sunny Day until at last it is Night: Night with her stars of infinite beauty, but without the lustre and warmth of Day.

She drooped; and on her couch of sickness her keen-sighted love perceived, through all his ineffable tenderness, that same remoteness in his eyes, which proved that, even as he sat there grieving and apparently absorbed in her, there still came dim remembrances of Care to vex and occupy his soul.

"It were better I were dead," she thought; "I am not good enough for him." Poor child! Not good enough, because her simple nature knew not the manifold perplexities, the hindrances of incomplete life! Not good enough, because her whole life was centred in one whose life was scattered!

And so she breathed herself away, and left her husband to all his gloom of Care, made tenfold darker by the absence of those gleams of tenderness which before had fitfully irradiated life. The night was starless, and he alone.—London Leader.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

A Pilgrimage to Salisbury Cathedral.

BY A BOSTON ARCHITECT.

"Firm was their faith, the ancient bands,
The wise of heart, in wood and stone,
Who reared with stern yet trusting hands
The dark gray towers of days unknown:
Huge, mighty, massive, hard and strong
Were the choice stones they lifted then,
The vision of their hope was long,
They knew their God, those faithful men."

I had already passed nearly three weeks in England without seeing a cathedral. Perhaps this may seem a sufficiently curious omission in a travelling architect, and yet it was not altogether without a plausible show of reason. The extreme beauty of the landscape, so new in its loveliness to the eye of an American,—the variety and interest of the different castles, parish churches, and even of the still less ambitious remains of mediæval taste which had happened to lie more immediately in my way,—joined too to the hearty and most truly English hospitality of numerous friends, had occupied one day after another with a constant change of pleasures, and filled up each hour with some delightful novelty of sensation, from which it required no inconsiderable amount of self-denial to make any serious attempt to escape. In such pursuits it may well be imagined that my time slipped easily and almost imperceptibly away. But now that the first flush of this new excitement was over, and I had leisure to deliberate upon the choice of fresh delights,—to become an epicure even, if I may call it so, in antiquarian and artistic enjoyments, I resolved that my first impressions of the full force of Gothic Architecture should be taken from the great Minister of Salisbury. To accomplish this, however, I found that I must pass, without stopping, through the interesting old city of Winchester, and when there must resolutely turn my back and shut my eyes to the fascinating remains of rare old Wykeham's imperishable skill. This might at first sight seem a very hard thing to undertake. But contrary to my expectation,—and I set down this mental experience for the benefit of future travellers who may find themselves similarly perplexed,—I found it much harder to come to this resolution in the first place, than to keep it with unflinching firmness, when once it had been fully taken up.

It was not however without a hearty feeling of regret, accompanied by many lingering looks behind, that I at length left Oxford, by the railway train for Salisbury. It happened to be on a mild and pleasant though occasionally showery day in the middle of July. As the gardens and groves, the towers, domes and graceful spires of that fine old seat of learning faded from the sight and were lost in the blue distance, I felt indeed most forcibly that the three days I had passed there had been far too short a period of time to convey any very distinct picture of their individual beauties to the mind. A momentary pang could not but steal across me, then, as I bid them farewell. But I endeavored to console myself with the reflection, perhaps not an uncommon one in such cases, that I had even a still higher pleasure before me, and that a ride of a few hours only would bring me under the shadow of one of the most beautiful, majestic and interesting structures in the kingdom. From a child, indeed, I had always felt an intense desire to visit the Cathedral of Salisbury. Well do I remember a nice old colored print of it, with some placid water and plump ducks in the foreground and in the middle distance a group of equally plump and placid clergymen in full canonicals, which had come into my possession as a Christmas present when at school, and made a deep and lasting impression on my youthful imagination. In maturer years, too, I had learned that more perhaps than any other ecclesiastical edifice in England it might claim to be harmonious in design, excellent in workmanship, and unsurpassed in the bold and daring flight of its constructive skill: in fine, that it might fairly be considered "the Parthenon of English Architecture." It was with no irreverent footstep then, nor for the gratification of a merely idle and shallow curiosity, that I was about to approach this glorious relic of a devout and earnest age of Art. Nor did I, with these impressions, feel wholly unworthy to add another to the crowd of pilgrims, who for centuries had gazed in wonder over its picturesque and varied outline, or stood before its sculptured portals in silent admiration.

The ride itself formed no unfit accompaniment to the full enjoyment of these more pleasurable feelings. As we flew rapidly along the line of the railway, it was impossible not to admire the delicious cultivation of the landscape, which everywhere presented itself like a succession of lovely pictures, to the eye. The hedgerows of hawthorn, holly and privet, here and there interspersed with taller trees, rising up from among them and thus breaking up what would otherwise become a tame uniformity of lines,—the broad, smiling fields, fresh with the glistening raindrops, and occasionally dotted with the whitest possible sheep, or tenanted by placid looking cows, so intent upon their grazing as rarely to lift their heads for a glance at the passing train,—the groups of quiet horses, gravely standing in circles and putting their heads together under a tree, perhaps discussing the corn question, or taking wise counsel upon the grievances of their overworked brethren in the cabs of London,—the delicate gray-green of the new mown hay, relieved by the golden color of the plentiful ricks which had been already gathered in,—the long, low, rambling farm houses, with their tiled or thatched roofs, occasionally gathered into hamlets around the humble gray tower or the more conspicuous spire of some old yet not neglected village church,—all these, together with the distant windmills, rolling their white sails lazily round in the sunlight, combined to form a panorama which must, however familiar to the Englishman of taste, be to his eye even, always new; and is enchanting, indeed, beyond any power of expression, to a stranger who comes to it fresh from the newer and more prosaic life of the western world. The language of description may, at least, be owned inadequate to convey anything more than a faint outline of the constant variety of loveliness, and the almost inexhaustible combinations of beauty.

Leaving Strathfieldsaye, the seat of the great Duke, on the right, and to the left, a little farther on, the ruins of Basing House, so famous in history for its defence, when besieged by Cromwell in 1645, we shot with the speed of lightning through the environs of Winchester and stopped seven miles beyond it for a change of carriages at Bishopstoke. Here the branch road to Salisbury intersects the main line,—and on the latter we beheld our late fellow travellers speed away for Portsmouth and Chichester. Twelve miles more through the same scenes of rural beauty, and the easy train rolled quietly into the Station House, with a succession of determined coughs from the engine, already on a side track of its own, which clearly intimated to the practised ear that we were to go no farther in that direction.

I do not confess to being, in general, of a very nervous or impressible disposition. But I must frankly own to feeling my heart beat pretty forcibly with expectation as the trimguard opened the door of the carriage, jerking from him, at the same time, with that dry, hard manner which only the repetition of the same thing a hundred times a day can teach, the curt information, 'Salsbry: stop.' Without waiting to look after my luggage—since my previous experience on English railways had taught me that short of a miracle it could not go wrong—I rushed to the opposite door of the booking-office, which I judged, and not incorrectly, might afford an uninterrupted view of the town. The scene which broke at once upon the eye it is not easy to forget. There it stood! at a little distance only, before me,—the grand, gray old spire, as yet unharmed by the ruthless hand of time, shooting heavenward from amidst rich masses of ancestral elms, to a height of more than four hundred feet; its fretted and lace-worked outline relieved against gorgeous piles of clouds in the reddening western sky. Beneath it, stretched out the huge, antique pile of nave, choir, and transepts, rising high above the surrounding houses, with a broad, mellow light thrown across the walls, and their steep roofs and airy pinnacles, beautifully grouped, yet each sharply defined, in the clear, warm light of the summer evening. So fresh, so sound, so perfect, after the lapse of six hundred years, that it seemed as if the common destroyer had been awed by their mysterious beauty, and while touching the majestic old pile, here and there, with those indescribable tints of mossy gray which his finger alone can produce, had forborne to displace one fragment from its buttresses, or to throw down one stone from its venerable towers.

After seeing my travelling equipments duly cared for by the pretty bar-maid of the famous White Hart Hotel, I repaired at once to the street. Passing under an arched gateway, at no great distance from the inn, I found myself in the close, or cathedral precinct, immediately surrounding the church. The houses in this spacious enclosure,—in one of which lived for many years the amiable and well known Canon Bowles,—wear that quiet and picturesque look peculiar to such haunts of learned ease, and comfortable seclusion. In the centre of the whole, surrounded by lofty trees, velvet lawns and nicely kept gravel walks, stood the venerable and impressive pile, in all its solemn majesty,—open on the east, north, and west sides, but hidden from public view on the south by the cloisters, the Bishop's palace and the private gardens. From the open grounds which thus surround the building, its appearance is indeed unequalled by anything of the kind which I have since beheld. Erected in the brightest and purest period of the early Gothic, all its various parts are grouped together in the most masterly pyramidal outline,—the long succession of buttresses and pinnacles, the sharp roofs and lofty turrets, all leading the eye to the central point, the spire, with a peculiar lightness and elegance, yet grandeur of effect that can scarcely fail to call forth an involuntary exclamation of wonder and delight. The vertical line, so expressive of the hopes and aspirations of Christianity, thus becomes the controlling feature of the composition, and the mind at once recognizes the idea that religious awe and profound solemnity of impression was the first and most earnest aim of its builders. It is a temple in which man feels it almost profanation to remain upright,—a temple in which he is instinctively led to "worship and fall down, and kneel before the Lord, our maker."

Every structure raised by the hand of man derives, indeed, much of its value as a work of art from the feelings of the human soul. We cannot separate the idea of the orator from the forum, of the senate from the capitol, nor of the monastic procession from the cathedral aisle. But apart from its historical interest, and from those charms of association which are derived from the visible stamp of sanctity, the Gothic style, as exemplified in such a building as this, is yet rich in all the elements of a great, original, and peculiar manifestation of art. Above all other styles, it must be admitted to abound in those grand physical effects which never fail to call forth mingled sensations of sublimity and beauty in the mind of the spectator. As the work of Pagans, or intended for Pagan purposes, it would lose nothing in this point of view. It would still impress us, as the result of the most powerful energy, tempered by the most refined and poetical conception. Its peculiar modes of form and distribution,—rendering it impossible for the whole structure to be seen at once, from any particular spot,—its long lines of vertical or pyramidal composition,—its constant succession of receding shadows, its daring flight of arches and vaulted roofs,—and above all its graceful spires, shooting aloft with a grand and feeling simplicity,—create a degree of pleasing amazement, and awaken an impression of power, and self-dependent skill on the part of its inventors, that belongs in an equal degree to no other monuments of ancient architecture.

A. G.

The Opera of Masaniello at Niblo's.

The operatic hit of the season is indisputably Masaniello. The plot is good; it is not supernatural; and while it involves the treatment of the tenderest of relations in domestic life, it discourses largely and eloquently on national life, and the popular fire curling and roaring round the edifice of privilege and prescription. Added to this, there is, under the masterly treatment of the dramatist, a constant progression and increment of interest from the first to the last scene. The mute eloquence of Fenella, betrayed and ruined in the dawn of her career, represented by pantomimic action and seconded by the model music of the illustrious composer, form a curious piquant novelty in the staple of dramatic picture, or musico-dramatic illustration. Without the flexible action of the professed pantomimist, and the equally flexible, elegant, eloquent and academically correct music of the author, this character would not be practicable; but, as these are both compassed, the success is complete.

The Overture to Masaniello is so fine a production—so thoroughly consistent in its parts, and indicative of the locality, persons and incidents represented, that it forms a splendid introduction to the whole. The strong and bold opening—the crashing diminished sevenths with the hurly-burly chromatics—expressive of the roar and laughter of multitudes; this followed by a peasant-like dash of a slow movement—interrupted suddenly by the recurrence of the first crash; this followed by a minor agitated movement, where Italian forms and tarantella-hints lead us to the minor sternness of the furious cry for vengeance; this interwoven with the solo painting the despairing Fenella, running into the famous triumphal chorus; and after the repetitions of these materials, the whole crowned with a vigorous military coda, is certainly a work of genius, and prophecies the characters and action to come.

The choruses of this Opera are drawn with a master hand. Sometimes, as in the barcaroles, the market cries, and the simple prayers, they are accessible to the popular ear; in other places, where the rhythm and transparency of the idea are not aimed at, we have tremendous effect, harmonies of the largest, boldest character, and a frenzy of earnest accentuation not second to Der Freischütz. Indeed, between the heroic parts of this opera and that of Weber, many parallels can be found. The groupings and accents are of the same spirit.

It is hardly necessary to say that Auber's barcaroles are unequalled. After he produced the two, that of Masaniello and that of Pietro, as well as that worked into the finale of the second act—other composers set about writing barcaroles, but only to show their inferiority.

Compositions which we would indicate as of the highest order of merit in this work, are the entire pantomime; the bass and tenor duet, which is heroism and patriotism personified; the various choruses of the fishermen which are written as a man of genius should write such things—actualities, familiarities—not reveries or transcendentalisms; the simple religious music of the crowd; the masterly transitions due to the dramatic exigencies of a plot describing violent personal and political changes; the crazy scene of Masaniello, from which Bellini has largely copied in his Sonambula reveries—a scene as well treated in music as Shakspeare has drawn Ophelia or Poor Tom. There are certain parts of the Opera, however, of unequal merit; the solo of the heroine is cold; the concerted piece at the end of the first act is not effective in thought, though bold to the last degree in modulation. The fault too, of the instrumentation, at least for the orchestra in question, is an excessive use of the bass instruments and the percussive instruments.

The applause on Saturday night was great; there were some pointed encores; and after the ensemble fracas of the rebellion scene, the whole company was demanded by the audience and the curtain was again raised. It showed, by the way, good sense and feeling on the part of the principal singers, such as Marini, Rosi, etc., when not engaged in leading parts, to act occasionally in the choruses; their force on such occasions is indispensable.—N. Y. Tribune.

C. M. VON WEBER.—A grand solemnity in honor of Weber has just taken place at Eutin, in Germany, where he was born. The object was the inauguration of a tablet of black marble over the door of the house where he first saw the light. A procession, consisting of the municipalities of Eutin and Lubeck, the civil, military, and ecclesiastic authorities, deputations of the corporations of arts and trade, three philharmonic societies, the pupils of the public schools, the students of the Universities of Copenhagen, Kiel, and Göttingen, and a large number of German and foreign men of letters, crossed the lake in seventy-six boats, bearing the flag of the Germanic Confederation, and the National Republican flag, red, black, and gold. A salvo of cannon welcomed them at Eutin, and all the houses were dressed in flags and streamers. The marble bore the following inscription:

CHARLES MARIE DE WEBER,

Baptized at Eutin, 20th November, 1785,

Died at London, 5th of June, 1826.

The date of his birth being unknown, it could not be engraved upon the stone. The President of the Supreme Court made a speech, when the procession adjourned to a banquet. An illumination took place in the evening; the theatre performed Weber's "Robin des Bois," (Der Freyschütz) and the town gave a grand ball. The festivities concluded with a display of fireworks, the principal piece representing Weber's apotheosis.—Paris Correspondent New York Times.

SONNETS.

BY MARIA WHITE LOWELL.

The following sonnets, originally published in the Pioneer, will have a melancholy interest now for those (and they are not few) who can recognize in their earnest beauty of thought and delicate grace of expression the image of a fine intellect and a true womanly heart, now past from earth to bloom more divinely "in the groves of Paradise." D.

To ———.

I love thee—not because thy love for me
Like a great sunrise did o'ervault my day
With purple light, and wrought upon my way
The morning dew in fresh emblazonry;
Nor that thou seest all I fain would be
And thus dost call me by mine angel's name,
While still my woman's heart beats free of blame
Beneath the shelter of thy charity—
Oh! no, for wearily upon my soul
Would weigh thy golden crown of unbought praise,
Did I not look beyond the hour's control
To where those fruits of perfect virtue raise Their bloom—that thou erewhile with prophet eyes
Didst name mine own, in groves of Paradise!

II.

I love thee for thyself—thyself alone;
For that great soul, whose breath, most full and rare,
Shall to Humanity a message bear,
Flooding its dreary waste with organ tone;
The Truth that in thine eyes holds starry throne
And coils the words that issue from thy lips;
Heroic courage that meets no eclipse,
And humbler virtues on thy pathway strow;
These love I so, that if they swift uprise
To sure fulfilment in more perfect spheres,
Still will I listen underneath the skies
For thy new song,—with seldom dropping tears,
And midst my daily tasks of love will wait
The angel Death—guardian of Heaven's gate.

A Programme with Interludes.

[We find the following clever hit at modern virtuosity, (for so we would prefer to take it, rather than as a criticism upon Gottschalk individually,) in a late number of the Worcester Palladium.]

SEACORE HOUSE, OCT. 23. 1853.

Happening to take up a paper other than the Palladium, I saw that Gottschalk was coming, and that he would be assisted by Mlle Behrend, and by Mr. Aptommas on the harp. I had watched the reports of his progress, and had always wondered at the never-failing favor with which he had been received. Success in the outset is not always a sure sign of genius or of talent, and unbounded first praise is apt to prove fatal in the end. His reception in this city was not very flattering, if a large audience constitutes an important element, but those who attended departed with a sense of having been electrified, surprised and astonished. They were certainly not musically wiser. Here is the programme, with interludes "not in the bills."

"When the swallows homeward fly,".....Mlle Behrend.

"I thank thee, this shall be our daily song,
It cheers my heart, although these foolish tears Seem to disgrace its sweetness." Joanna Baillie.

"Jerusalem,".....Gottschalk.

"Due entrance he disdained, and in contempt
At one slight bound high overleap'd all bound
Of hills or highest wall, and sheer within Lights on his feet." Paradise Lost.

"Doctor, do you not think that I write too much for my constitution?"

"No, but you do for your reputation."

*Fantasia from "Moses in Egypt," for the harp,...*Aptommas.

"Ah me! what hand can touch the string so fine?
Now up the lofty diapason roll
Such sweet, such sad, such solemn airs divine,
Then let them down again into the soul." Thompson.

"Swiss Song,".....Mlle Behrend.

"Come, play me that simple air again." Moore.

Fantasia from "Lucia,".....Gottschalk.

"The music stirs in him like wind through the tree."
Wordsworth.

"La Danse," for the harp,.....Aptommas.

"There's something in
The shape of harps as though they had been made By music." Fiskus.

"Came with all his youth and unblown hopes
On the world's heart, and touched it into tears."
Alexander Smith.

"American Reminiscences,".....Gottschalk.

"I content myself with putting your worship in the way of becoming a famous composer; and that is, by following the opinion and judgment of meo rather than your own; for no fathers or mothers think their own children ugly; and this self-deceit is yet stronger with respect to the off-spring of the mind." Don Quixote.

"I like his music best, because I don't like any music, and his comes nearest to nothing of any I ever heard."

"How pitifully the virtuoso's art lies more in astonishing and making the idler portion of his audience clap their hands, than in expressing aught that music should express."

German Song: "Trab, trab,".....Mlle Behrend.

"Where 'tis smooth and where 'tis stony Trudge along, my pretty pony."

"Carnival of Venice,".....Gottschalk.

"And there are songs and quavers, roaring, humming, Guitars, and every other sort of strumming."
Byron's Beppo.

"Wanted. A heavy premium will be paid for a new tema of eight to sixteen bars, upon which to exhibit instrumental 'ground and lofty tumbling.' 'The Carnival of Venice' having been in constant use from Paganini down to the present day, has become threadbare, and the critics and the public will endure it no longer."

On the occasion I certainly received half a dollar's worth of brilliancy, dexterity, splendid magic, such as doubtless has never before been seen or heard of. It was an unequalled musical entertainment, minus the music; that is, as far as the piano-forte was concerned. We Yankees are said to be the most go-aheaditive, curious, ingenious people on earth, and so we must needs produce a pianist that can play the fastest, the most ingeniously, the most wonderfully of any that ever lived; who leaves a world of beauty and sublimity in the background, while he pinches, torments, and pulls the hair of the "Old Folks at Home," and plays "puss in the corner" with "Oh! Susanna." Perhaps I am wrong; the fault may have been in the programme for the evening.

STELLA.

THE ECHO DUET.—Cardan relates, that a certain man having set out on a journey, had a river to cross, and not knowing the ford, cried out, "Oh!" to which an echo answered in the octave, "Oh!" He imagining it to be a man, called out in Italian, "Onde devo passar?" It answered "Passa!" and, when he asked "Qui?" it replied "Qui?" But as the waters formed a deep whirlpool there, and made a great noise, he was terrified, and again asked, "Devo passar qui?" The echo returned, "Passar qui?" He repeated the same question often, and still had the same answer. Terrified with the idea of being obliged to swim in case he attempted to pass there, and it being a dark and tempestuous night, he concluded that his respondent was some evil spirit that wanted to entice him into the torrent; wherefore he returned, and relating the story to Cardan, was convinced by him that it was no demon, but merely the sport of nature.

Letter from Mr. Keyzer.

JULLIEN—the great Jullien—the "humbag" Jullien, the quadrille composer, who "does not understand how to lead classical music," who "mistakes the tempos," &c. &c. Fudge! Opinions given at random—some by design, some through ignorance. Now that the excitement pro and con is cooled down and Jullien gone, let me say a few words on the subject, in the way of "render unto Cæsar" &c. The concert of sacred music, given Sunday night last, shows not only that Jullien understands how to lead classical music, but also that he is more than a Quadrille composer.

Though during the past two weeks the classical pieces were admirably given, yet the display of his peculiar talent was shown in the performance of the lighter pieces, viz: his arrangements from other as well as his own compositions. For this he had the great advantage of having in his band many as accomplished artists, as Europe has hitherto known. For instance, I have heard Drouet, Tonlou, Fürstenau, father and son, and Nicholson, on the flute; Hermsstadt, Degroot, Iwan Müller, and Beerman on the clarinet; Voight, and Turner on the oboe; but none of these celebrated artists could be compared to Reichert, Wuille or Lavigne. Bottesini and Koenig are beyond any comparison. Even such a trifling instrument as the flageolet is made to tell charmingly by the artistlike treatment of Collinet. Consider also that such talented violinists as the brothers Mollenhauer are among the ripienti.

Jullien arranges his music, even waltz, quadrille, and polka, by giving bits of solo to the different instruments, each of which is listened to with delight and admiration, yet not long enough to satiate. A tutti from that excellent and well drilled orchestra breaks in upon it—a solo from another instrument is heard, and so on by a variety of changes from one to the other; all the while, the hearers wish for more from the last one, yet are newly delighted and their attention rivetted to the present one, and so on to the end. There in fact lies Jullien's superiority, in having first the good taste to secure (regardless of cost) the best artists, and secondly the tact to use the means at command to the greatest advantage and to the delight of his audiences.

In classical music, where it is not intended to show off any individual instrument, the silvery bell-like tones from Reichert's flute, the rich and mellow sounds from Wuille's clarinet, the legitimate, reedy, subdued tones from Lavigne's oboe, are heard in the ensemble, to be sure, with finer effect than any other flute, clarinet, or oboe; but beyond this, Jullien's orchestra is only on a level with any other well drilled orchestra of the same strength, and Jullien himself stands also only equal to any other efficient leader. That he is an able contrapuntist as well as conductor, appeared in his last performance:—his Canto Fermo and Fugue, though as a composition rather light, is as a whole faultless and pleasing throughout. The "Chaos" from the "Creation," and the overture to the "Messiah" were led and performed by that orchestra more effectively (at least within my recollection) than anything of the kind ever heard in Boston. The Prayer from Mose in Egitto, and the two chorusses from the "Messiah" were equally fine, and the members of the "Mendelssohn Choral Society" seemed to be inspired as well as admirably sustained by such an excellent band and efficient leader. I heard the remark made that the orchestra was too powerful, but this is quite an erroneous idea, founded upon the hearing of our usually insufficient orchestras, which are generally, I may say always, too weak in stringed instruments, and consequently not only not balanced, but in the forte passages not heard. What proportion is there in four first violins, two basses, &c., against two hundred voices or more? Consequently it follows that the singers, not being sufficiently sustained, are likely to go astray from perfect intonation.

A word more for the future. Those who have listened to Jullien's concerts will of course form their own opinion—but to those who on account of the price of admission (one dollar, which is after all no more than fifty cents each for two ordinary and often bad concerts)—to those I say, lay aside a ninepence a week, and when Jullien returns (as promised) in January next, go once and judge for yourselves.

WM. KEYZER.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXX.

NEW YORK, Oct. 31.—The Herald states this morning that the Italian Opera has fairly got a foothold among us, and follows up the statement by an account of Masaniello at Niblo's—an opera written in French style by a Frenchman and to a French Text!

Nov. 1.—One evening last week—moved thereto by what the venerable Doctor—he that paid for the oysters that night) calls “a high old specimen of a criticism,” in one of the Dailies, I stopped in at the Tabernacle to hear the Hutchinsons—Oh, Lordy!

I finally left one of them sinjin a song about “Bin-jin on the Rhine,” and went in to hear Wood's Ethiopians—to take the taste out of my mouth. Made money by the operation, for I could laugh at their comicalities.

Nov. 3.—Joined a small party last evening to visit Frankenstein's Panorama of Niagara. We were all familiar with the faces, and unanimously pronounced this representation of them excellent. In some of the views the water is better painted than I ever saw in a transparency. What added to our pleasure was, that Frankenstein does not employ a half-fledged pianist to drum out Yankee Doodle on a tuneless pianoforte, during the exhibition.

Nov. 5.—F. has been telling me a couple of anecdotes of Rossini—authentic ones:

Jullien had already to some extent become the rage in Paris, but the dictum of some musical denigod was necessary to fix him firmly in his position as the great conductor. This he received from Rossini, who happened to be present one evening when the “Tell” overture was on the programme. After the performance he said to Jullien, “You alone have played my overture as I conceived it.”

Berlioz is a man of great talent, very little genius, and a tremendous critic. One object of attack was Rossini's “Barber of Seville,” which he did his best to write down, in the Journal des Debats. The fine finale to the 1st Act he characterized as tapage—noise, racket. Rossini took it all good naturedly, and his only revenge was, on one occasion, after listening to a piece of Berlioz, to say with a shrug, “Mon Dieu! What bad music this man might produce—if he only knew how to compose!”

Nov. 6.—Looking over a volume of an old German musical periodical I came across a notice by Tobias Haslinger, the Music publisher of Vienna, which relates to the matter of Beethoven's musical relics. This is part of it. The date, by the way, is December 1827.

“In the auction of Beethoven's effects which took place on the 5th, 6th, and 7th of November, I purchased, together with many manuscripts of this Master's known and printed works—such as Symphonies, Concertos, Quartets, Sonatas, Songs—also the original manuscript of his well known Septet,—and many as yet unknown original compositions of this distinguished Master, some of less, some of greater, some of extraordinary importance. Among them, especially worthy of note, are five packages of Studies, in composition and counterpoint, written in Beethoven's own hand, when studying with his master Albrechtsberger. Farther: a pianoforte Trio, which he composed when organist at Cologne—a Sonatina for four hands—several Marches for military bands—several vocal pieces of importance, many songs, &c.”

The rest of the notice is devoted to the “Characteristic Overture,” which was afterward published as Opus 138, the “Glorious Moment,” published with a new text, “Praise of Music,” and the edition of Handel which Stumpf sent to Beethoven as a present, and which reached him on his death bed. This copy of Handel, in 40 vols., I recollect seeing in the Library of the “Society of Friends of Music,” at Vienna, whither it was finally transferred.

Nov. 7.—“Is not our good friend the Diarist mistaken in speaking of the Dead March in “Samson” being played in Boston?”

The “Diarist,” dear H. T., made merely a casual reference to the March which was played in Samson in Boston. In the only edition of that Oratorio with which I am familiar, “The March in Samson” is followed by the March in “Saul,”—both being printed. I have a strong impression of having read somewhere that Handel himself transferred the March from Saul to Samson, and had it so performed—am not sure of this. The oldest edition of the Oratorio which has come under my notice has them both. The Berlin Sing-Academie (which left out the part of Harapha) played the Saul March. I remember they took it up at a speed which changed its character almost to that of a quickstep; and I think that on turning to notices of the performance of Samson in England it will be found that there Saul has beaten Samson in the matter of the March.

BOSTON, NOV. 12, 1853.

Germania Musical Society.

The second subscription concert, coming as it did between the secular and the sacred farewell of Jullien, might naturally have suffered both in audience and in interest, without surprising anybody. It was like a quiet, choice old picture placed between two very much larger, brighter, freshly colored specimens of modern French art. But the result was, that we were agreeably disappointed,—not with the concert, but with the public. The hall was seldom fuller, the interest never greater,—of course excepting some great extra occasions, when there is a “Choral Symphony,” or something of that sort. And yet the programme, for a Germania programme, was hardly more than second-rate, containing for the classical amateur nothing new and nothing of positive interest besides the Gade symphony, the Tannhäuser overture, and the “Midsummer Night” Nocturno; and for the general public no such tempting baits as they kept dangling on their sunny waters all last season in the shapes of Alfred Jaell and Camille Urso.

But the pieces we have named would redeem any programme. It was truly a pleasure to recall once more the wild, dreamy, pensive, Northern, sea-shore mood and fancies of the C minor symphony of GADE. If it be true, what we have heard, that this first symphony, the Opus 5, of the young Danish composer, is better than its successors; that this Ossianic vein of his exhausts itself so soon, and grows monotonous, as do the poems called of “Ossian,” then we would return and cling to this tantalizing first promise, and “suck melancholy” music “out of this song,” as long as the charm will last. The spirit of Mendelssohn is felt in it, as has been always said of Gade's music; yet it is a fresh, original, true tone-poem. The impression this time of its several movements corresponded to the hasty notes in which we very briefly characterized them last year; to-wit:

The first movement, both in the contemplative, sea-shore mood of the slow introduction, and in the energy of the Allegro, reminded one repeatedly of Mendelssohn, and yet indicated plenty of a certain strong, rugged individuality besides. The Scherzo is altogether original, with the wild, tempestuous, mad glee with which it sets out, then the lull broken by the mysterious sobs and gusts of reeds, and then that quaintest little dream of fairy revelries, in running triplets (sextoles we should have said), with the strings muted. The slow movement (Andantino Grazioso) is sweetly, solemnly, religiously composing, and absorbs all distracted thoughts in the “feeling” which is “deeper than all thought;” and the finale, which perhaps is the least remarkable of the four movements, with an old Danish melody for subject, has a wild Vikingir fire and emphasis, which fitly terminates this strange musical poem of the North.

And next it is set down in the same record, how “the performers, severally and collectively, seemed perfectly to realize the beautiful and strange spell of the music, and rendered it in all its energy and all its beauty.” And if we could say this then, when the Germanians were only twenty-five, what should we say now that they are nearly fifty! In power and fulness it came out much better, while the fifty seemed as sympathetically imbued with the spirit of the music as the twenty last year. Indeed we have never listened to any performance of the Germanians with more satisfaction in the rendering. It took a little while at first, of course, to acclimate one's sense of hearing to the less salient, less brilliant, less voluminous sonority of such an orchestra, after the noonday blazing brightness of Jullien's tone-masses; but soon we were altogether at home in it again, so that it seemed as rich an element as ever, and filled the ear and mind quite satisfactorily. Spiced dishes cannot permanently persuade us that there is no flavor in the corn and fruits we liked in days of simpler habits.

Wagner's overture improves on acquaintance, and this time was both admirably played and received with general and deep attention and delight. Another opportunity was given to enter into deeper acquaintance with its beauties, as well as with those of the Gade symphony, at the last Wednesday afternoon rehearsal. The Nocturno of Mendelssohn was played in a more sympathetic tempo and with far more delicacy and purity of style, than it was at Jullien's “Mendelssohn night.”

The remainder of the selections, as we have said, were rather ordinary. The overture to Die Felsenmühle belongs rather to the noisily weak melodramatic school of German overtures, which bear about the same relation to the Fidelio's and Zauberflöten, that the Kotzebue dramas bear to “Tasso,” “Egmont,” or “Don Carlos.” In its loud Janissary beginning we could hear nothing but the drum; whether the fault lay in the instrumentation of the piece itself, or in the quality of the drum, (of course not in the drummer,) which seemed to us not quite so musical and true as sometimes, we know not. Of Jullien's whole army of drums, even in his loudest cannonadings, we never noticed that they covered up the other instruments.

Mr. SCHULTZE executed a very difficult, but not very interesting violin show-piece, composed by Bazzini, in a skilful and artist-like manner; but the imperative encore that followed plainly asked for something which that was not; namely, for some simple, genuine music like the “Sounds of Home,” which was applauded for its own sake, because it was enjoyed and actually did make music in the hearers' souls.

Miss PINTARD's principal selection was again

* It should be “when organist to the Elector of Cologne.” The Electoral Court was at Bonn.

unfortunate. Ah non giunge not only overtaken her powers of execution, but was another instance of the bad effect of transposing a melody, which has its home among the sunny, bright, soprano tones, down to the contralto register. Alboni did it, but Alboni is more than a contralto. The simple melody of Schubert, Les Adieux, or the "Last Greeting," was much more within her scope; but it was a great mistake to omit striking up to that single high note (high only relatively) by which alone the composer saves the song from monotony, making all the difference between a dull tune, as it was sung, and a most expressive and beautiful melody, as it is written. Why will not Miss Pintard, for her operatic selections, give us some of those beautiful arias and romanzas actually written for the contralto part?

Jullien's Sacred Concert.

On Sunday evening we had the last and the best of this remarkable series of orchestral performances. It was a solid, satisfying programme, exceptional as it must ever appear to represent oratorio music by an orchestra alone. The Hall was crowded, and all seemed to listen with peculiar relish to a more serious and quiet kind of music than the quadrilles and show-pieces of the week-day evenings.

The selections from "Elijah" were sung or recited by the instruments with a delightful force and positiveness of outline, and richness of contrasted color, to say nothing of the greater purity of intonation, which we so seldom hear in difficult vocal performances; yet of course there was wanting the breadth and massiveness of a great multitude of singers. These selections, short and taken at wide intervals in the oratorio, were dovetailed together into almost one continued piece, sometimes just touching a thing and leaving it in a tantalizing way to one who knows and loves the "Elijah." It began with the opening recitative of the prophet, which precedes the overture: "Thus saith the Lord: there shall not be dew nor rain these years," &c., quite imposingly rendered in those large and solid tones of the ophicleid. The overture itself we were denied, and there immediately followed the tenor recitative and air: "If with all your hearts." This seemed not very happily assigned to the dry and hawking tones of the bassoon, though it was beautifully played. Of course there were all the means and instrumentalities in this orchestra for the wild "Baal" choros. Again the mighty ophicleid, an exceptional or monster instrument for the most part, found its legitimate place in that exceptional cast iron song: "Is not his word like a fire and like a hammer that breaketh," &c.; a song for which no human bass is ponderous and hard enough. Another beautiful tenor song: "Then shall the righteous shine," expressively sung by KOENIG's cornet, was borrowed from the close of the oratorio, and made to lead into the finale of the first part, the great chorus of thanks for the coming of rain after drought. It was a capital study on this splendid composition to hear all its intermingling parts so boldly and distinctly brought out, and with such striking contrasts of coloring, by those instruments. How sublimely those strange chords and modulations, which seem like the cooling of the air, were brought out by the brass instruments!—Mlle. ANNA ZERR sang the lovely soprano melody, "Hear ye, Israel," with great purity and sweetness of voice, reminding one in the first phrases, by a certain color of her tones, of Mme. Goldschmidt; but for the bold, assuring, trumpet-like declamation of the following strain: "I, I am he that comforteth" she was as inadequate as the LIND was gloriously all-sufficient.

Jullien's "Canto Fermo and Fugue," from his Pietro il Grande, came next and made a much deeper impression on the audience, now in a more serious listening mood, than it did amid the noisier medley of his benefit night.

The pieces from Rossini's "Stabat Mater," including the introductory chorus, the Pro Peccatis (sung by the ophicleid), and the Cujus Animam (by the cornet), were as effective as mere instruments could make them;—the last piece more effective than most tenor voices make it. Herr Koenig threw a deal of expression into it, though he rather held back the movement in giving sentimental importance to each note.

Haydn's instrumental description of "Chaos" we have never heard made so graphic and so interesting. In the overture to the "Messiah," the violin took up the long figurative fugue theme with great power and gusto. The first chorus; "Glory to God," we should have been better pleased to have heard sung, inasmuch as the whole "Mendelssohn Choral Society" were there, who did sing, with much effectiveness, the "Wonderful" and "Hallelujah" choruses. The grand bursts on the words "Wonderful," "Counsellor," &c., would have been grander had both instruments and voices been subdued to something near a pianissimo in the preceding phrases. "Comfort ye, my people" was delivered in Herr KOENIG's tasteful style.

The new choral society also performed, earlier in the evening, the prayer from "Moses in Egypt." There were some 250 voices, apparently well balanced, which flowed in with a satisfying breadth and fulness in the subdued and sombre harmonies with which the prayer opens. The tenor voices sounded rich and true, and there was such a body of contralto as we have missed in almost all our choral societies. This society will let us hear the entire "Messiah" on Christmas evening.

NATIVE CLASSICAL COMPOSERS.—There is both sweet and bitter in the following, from the London Athenæum:

Having been led away from American essays on and at music, to notice a curiosity belonging to a different world and epoch, we must take a fresh paragraph to announce the publication at Leipsic of a Quartet by Mr. C. C. Perkins, the gentleman of whom the Athenæum has already spoken as the first American who has devoted himself to classical instrumental composition. So far as we can judge of this Quartet by examining its single parts, the themes appear pleasing—the working of them neat—and the taste of the whole laudable, as eschewing the modern defects calling themselves romanticisms, against which there is reason to warn American musical imagination. We fancy that this may be to apt to begin where other worlds have ended. The minor German composers and Kapellmeisters—who have emigrated in such profusion to the Land of Promise—are not (as the race now goes) calculated to exercise a favorable influence on Transatlantic invention. The executive means and modes brought into the country by the exodus of German instrumentalists will be purchased dearly, if they be conveyed thither by a class of enthusiasts who begin to teach their new pupils and publics from the last Quartets and Symphony of Beethoven, before his first are thoroughly comprehended.—On this ground, we shall look for further appearances of Mr. Perkins with more than common interest.

It is gratifying to find the labors of our townsman, in so high and classical a sphere of Art, appreciated in so high a quarter. But we suspect that Mr. Perkins is wholly innocent of any such intentional conservative propagandism as Mr. Chorley would attribute to him. When he had the good sense to follow older and maturer models in the composition of his first Quartet, we doubt if he did it to divert his countrymen away from, or to close their ears against, good new things different from said models. This critic's fling at the German enthusiasts who come here to teach us the beauties of the "Choral Symphony," &c., is uncalled for. Beethoven's eight first symphonies (every one of them) had been known and loved for years in Boston, before the ninth was offered us; and if we have begun to love that also, nay, and to find some charm in Robert Schumann and in the overture to Tannhäuser, why should the London critic feel unhappy?

But every one to his own taste. We are glad of a plea for drawing attention to the earnest ambition which begins to be evinced by quite a number of our young American students of music. Besides this Quartet of Mr. Perkins, we also hear of one by Mr. J. C. D. Parker, at Leipsic, and of still a third, by Mr. Francis Boott, who has for several years been studying under a learned Italian master at Rome,—all three Bostonians. It is but fair that these firstlings should meet some sort of recognition, at least have a hearing, here at home. Would not our "Mendelssohn Quintet Club" do well, in addition to their representations of the classical models, to devote an hour now and then, say at public afternoon rehearsals, to trials or readings of such new essays?

Music and Manners.

It is high time that some standard of good manners and good breeding should be recognized in concert rooms, as well as in parlors, legislative halls and churches; that some inward law of mutual respect and courtesy should manifest itself at feasts of artistic harmony no less than at dinner tables. But one with shame and sorrow must confess that many an one who prides himself on gentlemanly deportment elsewhere, displays the most ungentlemanly, boorish insolence and disregard of others' rights and of all obvious proprieties in musical assemblies. Propriety, with real gentlemen and ladies, is an ever present instinct, not a sheepish imitation, practiced only in those spheres where fashion takes their actions out of their own hands, and ceasing when they stray out of their wonted element into the sphere of a concert room or picture gallery. What instinct of propriety shines in the actions or the faces of many of the prominent young would-be "gentlemen" and "ladies," who go to concerts and rehearsals. Our "fast" young men must look to their dignity, and take care that they fling not too openly away the thing on which they most do pride themselves. "Young America" here sends us a confession; may it bear fruits of true repentance.

To the Editor:

Dear Sir,—I have experienced so much delight in attending the Germanians' rehearsals, that I am very anxious indeed to express it; I really am inclined to think that Wednesday afternoon is, to me, the pleasantest of the week—to go to the Music Hall, pay only twelve-and-a-half cents, and enjoy myself, I am confident to at least the amount of a dollar. In the first place they say the music is very fine.—I have no doubt of it; in fact I think it must be, but I fear I have very little taste for the art—

I never listen. Still, I always enjoy myself sufficiently. There are innumerable sources of pleasure, and, I assure you, I never fail to avail myself of them.—For instance—I like to discover a few vacant seats in the middle of the first balcony, and, accompanied by some friends, to rush noisily for them during the performance of some delicate pianissimo, thereby disturbing and incommencing every one. I seat myself, and gaze innocently round, apparently wondering why so many indignant glances are cast upon me. Then after remaining perhaps half-a-minute in the seat which I have gained by such incredible exertion, I spring up suddenly, and, followed by my friends, plunge towards the door, not forgetting to slam it violently after me, and make my exit. Oh! Sir, I assure you that all this is very exhilarating.

Again—I admire to get seated behind some middle-aged ladies who nonsensically profess a liking for the performance, and to make such a noise as to cause them to exclaim ironically—"Wonder what some people come here for!"—then to remark, casually, "Don't you think, Fred, that some of these old girls come here to show their fancy new bonnets?"—thereby causing Fred to explode, while I remain perfectly impassible. This also is decidedly rich.

Then again, it delights me beyond measure to wantonly keep a door open, and allow the cold air to rush in; I appear perfectly unconscious, while every body turns and twists as if they were on pins. And it is so charming to gaze at the pretty girls pertinaciously, through my eye-glass, (I carry an eye-glass, though Fred says, impudently, that there is no occasion for it.) If they turn up their noses, it is very funny; if they smile, it is delightful; I am only annoyed when a young lady appears not to notice me at all. However, that seldom happens.

Let no one dispute the attractions to a young man about town, of the rehearsals. Let any of your readers visit the Music Hall next Wednesday afternoon, and they may see for themselves how we enjoy ourselves.

Respectfully yours,
YOUNG AMERICA.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—There is no time to be lost in securing tickets for the eight classical evenings, which lie before us in inviting prospect. The subscription lists are filling up well at the music stores.

OTTO DRESEL, it will be seen, has modified somewhat the announcement of his Musical Soirées. All particulars, as to place, times, &c., may be learned at the music stores, where subscription lists will be found. Among the good things which he has in store for us are: the Concerto of Bach, for three pianos, the Septuor of Hummel, the Quintet of Schumann, Trios by Mendelssohn and Beethoven, Sonatas of Beethoven, for piano alone, or with violoncello, many compositions of Chopin, &c., &c. Those who got the taste of it last year, must certainly respond promptly to all this.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.—The concert generously given by Gottschalk, for the benefit of Mr. A. M. Leland, music-dealer (our excellent agent), and one of the most serious losers by the recent fire, was very successful and yielded a large sum.

PORTLAND, ME.—Our music season promises to open grandly. We are to be treated first to a concert from those unsurpassed musicians, the Germanians,—for we cannot doubt that our citizens will respond heartily to the call for subscriptions to their proposed series of concerts. Next comes Miss ANNA STONE, a vocalist of brilliant gifts, who with her assistants, Müller, Jungnickel, and Arthurson, cannot fail to call out a large audience, and to delight them all. Then we shall undoubtedly hear from Jungnickel's Band, the Sacred Music Society, Prof. Crouch, the Wheelocks, and others of our own musicians and vocalists, whose powers of pleasing are not behind any. Altogether, we think our people will be cared for, as respects musical matters.

CLASSICAL MATINÉES.

THE undersigned, resident artists of Boston, intend to give a Series of Classical Concerts during next winter, in which the best works of the great composers will be performed; such as Quartets, Quintets, Septets, Trios, Duos and Solos; by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Hummel, Weber, Cherubini, etc. The programme will be made more attractive by Vocal performances between the different pieces, as also Solos for Horn, Violoncello, Piano, Violin, etc., occasionally. Many greater compositions, as Quartets, Quintets, and Septets for Piano with String and Wind instruments, will be produced, which have never been publicly performed in Boston. To accommodate Ladies and others out of town, we propose to give our Concerts in the afternoon. The time and place will be announced hereafter. The subscription is $3 for the Series of Eight Concerts. Single tickets 50 cents each.

Subscription lists will be found at the different Music Stores.

IN THREE PARTS.

Part 1. Comprising the largest number of Choice Gleees, Quartettes, Trios, Songs, Opera Choruses, &c., ever published in one collection.

Part 2. Consisting of Sacred Anthems, Choruses, Quartettes, &c., for Select Societies and Concerts.

Part 3. Containing most of the old popular Continental Psalm Tunes, thus making the most complete collection in all its features ever published.

Extract from the Preface:—"Here may be found Gleees, Quartettes, Trios and Songs suited to all occasions. If merry, here are pieces that will add to merriment; if sad, harmonies that will soothe sadness; if longings for home fill the mind, the dear scenes that cluster there are painted in many a song."

The publishers believe that the COLUMBIAN GLEE BOOK will be the most popular of any of the works of Mr. Woodbury, whose celebrity as an author is best attested by the fact that upwards of a quarter of a million of copies of his different books have been sold within a few years.

FOREIGN AND AMERICAN MUSIC,

MR. RICHARDSON has resided in Europe for the last five years, during which time he availed himself of the instruction of the most distinguished Teachers of Composition and the Piano-Forte, for the purpose of acquiring a thorough practical knowledge of MUSIC. While there, he became personally acquainted with all of the most celebrated publishers, and dealers in Music, and learned their peculiar methods of transacting business, with a view of establishing a Music Store in this city. Profiting by the knowledge acquired by visiting the Music Stores on the continent of Europe, as well as those in England, Mr. RICHARDSON formed a plan, differing from that of every other, and which he flatters himself possesses decided improvements over all.

In fitting up his Store, his object has been to make it an attractive resort for the Ladies, and the musical profession generally, and no expense has been spared towards rendering it every way worthy the patronage of the public,—and he trusts it will be the means of encouraging and improving the taste for Music among all classes.

The stock of Music comprises the most complete collection, of both Foreign and American, ever offered to the public. It was selected by the proprietor himself, and he has endeavored to avoid that which is not of an instructive character,—seeking rather to elevate the taste to the highest standard of Musical excellence. A Catalogue of the Music is being prepared, and will soon be issued.

All publications of this Store will be of a superior order, and got up in fine style. No pieces will be published that are not fully worthy of it,—and no compositions accepted for publication that are not worth paying for.

The above Music Store comprises two departments—American and Foreign. Mr. J. M. FOYE, who has had many years' experience in the business, in this city, will take charge of the American department; and Mons. A. HILL, from the celebrated publishing house of Brandus & Co. of Paris, will have charge of the Foreign department. And the Proprietor trusts, by devoting his whole attention to business, to receive a liberal share of patronage. Being in constant correspondence with many eminent Professors and Publishers of Music abroad, he will at all times be happy to give any information with regard to musical matters that may be in his power.

Foreign and American PIANO-FORTES and ORGANS, from the most celebrated manufacturers, constantly on hand. Also, some of the best specimens of large sized SWISS MUSIC BOXES that have ever been imported, may be seen at the Store.

PIANO-FORTES, of the best German, French, and American manufacture, selected and sent to any part of the United States, at the lowest Cash prices. Mr. R. will WARRANT every instrument he recommends, and will assume the whole responsibility of a safe arrival at the residence of the purchaser.

The largest and richest variety of OPERA GLASSES and FANS, of entirely new styles, ever offered by any other house in the United States, are ready for inspection. Also, French UMBRELLAS and CANES; those in want would do well to examine, before purchasing elsewhere.

LITHOGRAPHS, BUSTS, MEDALLIONS, and PORTRAITS, of the most distinguished Musicians and Composers,—as Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Chopin, Dreychock, Liszt, &c., always on hand.

Those desiring the services of good Teachers, in any of the different branches of Music, may learn their addresses and terms of Mr. Richardson, who will interest himself in such matters, without any partiality.

Mr. R. is a subscriber for all the Musical Journals published in England, France, Germany, Italy, and America, and they may always be found in the Saloon connected with his Store.

Foreigners will find themselves quite at home in this Store, as French and German, as well as English, will be spoken.

Tickets for the first class concerts may always be found at the Musical Exchange. Also subscriptions taken for the leading Musical papers published in Europe and America.

WAGNER'S "TANNEHÄUSER."

I.

* This was first published in the Journal des Debats at Paris, in 1849.

There is a small capital, by no means populous or lively, but which piously treasures up the memories of the great intellects who made it their abode, as well as of several generations of distinguished princes. This little capital, in which you will easily recognize WEIMAR, always hospitable to the beautiful and the sublime, was the first to challenge the enthusiasm of Germany for this fine work. Here it was first performed on the birthday of her royal highness, the Grand Duchess, which every year is celebrated with the most sincere joy, in gratitude for her manifold beneficence, and her appreciating patronage of literature and Art. * * * *

The story of the opera is borrowed from one of the old traditions of the region. Collating and Tannhäuser, a knight and minstrel, had borne off a splendid victory in one of those contests for the palm of minstrelsy, and had won the secret love of the princess Elizabeth of Thuringia, although to him her admiration seemed but cold and condescending patronage. A short time after he had mysteriously disappeared, no one knew why or whither. When the landgrave was returning one day from the chase, surrounded by the singers who had been Tannhäuser's rivals, and who formed the clear-shining Pleiades of that epoch, they found him, not far from the castle, kneeling in the highway, and uniting his fervent prayer with the chant of pilgrims in procession through the valley towards Rome. Speedily recognized and questioned, he answers always shyly and mysteriously: "I come from afar," he says, "where I found neither peace nor rest." Sorrowful and downcast, he is about to continue his lonely way and will not follow his friends. Wolfram von Eschenbach, one of the most famous minstrels of that time, seeks eagerly to detain him and sings to him of Elizabeth:

Alas! when thou so proudly left us,
Her heart was closed to all our strains:

O turn thee back, thou valiant singer,
Keep not thy song from ours afar,—
Back to our tuneful banquets bring her,
Still o'er us shine her virgin star!

Tannhäuser repeats that name with the accent of unexpected joy, and finally, overcome in his strange resistance, he exclaims: "To her! to her! O lead me back to her!"

At Tannhäuser's unlooked for return the princess revives. In his tender love for his daughter, the landgrave conceives the idea of a new minstrels' contest, of which he proclaims her queen. Persuaded that Tannhäuser will again bear off the victory, he promises to refuse no prize to the victor of that day, and he chooses Love as the theme of their songs. Wolfram begins, himself an enthusiast for Elizabeth, but with that spiritual love that rejoices in self-sacrifice and seeks only the happiness of the beloved object, even at the expense of its own:—Wolfram, who leads the easily forgetting loved one back to her, from whom he can himself expect no other confession than the verse in Schiller's ballad:

Ritter, treue Schwesterliebe
Widmet euch dies Herz,
Fordert keine andre Liebe, &c.

But like the Ritter Toggenburg, while he knows himself not loved, he still loves on; and this self-renunciation, which bows the soul down in its excess of hidden energy, betrays itself in his song, full of mute adoration for the feeling, which finds its only satisfaction in its own self-mortifying persistency.

Tannhäuser rises and sings how he too, better than any one, knows that fountain of bliss and inspiration, of which Wolfram sang:

O evermore with ferv'ish yearning
The sparkling spring I see, and fain
Must cool this thirst within me burning,
Nor will the eager lips refrain.

Walther von der Vogelweide sings:

I tell thee this, O Henry, hear it:
The fountain, it is Virtue, sure,
And thou must fervently revere it,
And bow thee at a shrine so pure.
But if thy lips thereto thou touchest,
Thy wanton passion heat to quell;
Or but too near the brink approachest,
Thou dost dissolve the wondrous spell.

Tannhäuser resumes the strain more vehemently, of which the burthen is: All creatures are created for enjoyment, and only in enjoyment can true love be known. The unworthy strain excites the virtuous ire of Biterolf, who with a warlike impetuosity and in a contemptuous, perhaps jealous tone, challenges him to another contest:

For woman's honor, stainless treasure,
As knight I ever wield a sword,
But naught see I in aimless pleasure,
That's worth a blow, or worth a word.

A storm of applause interrupts Biterolf, as well as all the adversaries of Tannhäuser, who replies with bitterness:

Ha! foolish prattler, Biderolf!
Sing'st thou of love, thou angry wolf?
What joys well worth enjoying seem
To me, thou truly dost not dream.
What bliss hath wretch like thee e'er tasted?
Thy life is poor in love, I trow.
What golden joys on thee are wasted,
In sooth were hardly worth a blow!

Tumult ensues; the rattling of swords follows the accords of harps. Wolfram tries to restore the peace, to banish all disturbance from the hall, and from that hallowed presence; he apostrophizes

Love in a strain of the highest inspiration, striving to sing its praises worthily and purely; he prays that his song may win the prize of heavenly sanctification and that all sin may be banished out of that pure and noble circle. Tannhäuser, beside himself through the taunts and rage and malice of which he is the mark, scarcely hears him and attunes a song to the praise of the heaven goddess:

To thee, Love's Queen, be all my songs resounding!
Now shall thy praise be sung aloud by me!
Thy charm's the spring of beauty all abounding,
And all sweet miracles do spring from thee.
In eager arms who'er hath clasped thee glowing,
What Love is, he, he only may recount:—
Tame, shivering souls, such ecstasy ne'er knowing,
Away! and seek the mystic Venus mount!

A cry of horror escapes every breast. The noble ladies fly, affrighted by the name that so offends their chastity. The men all draw their swords at once and rush upon the desperate sinner, whose long absence is now at last explained. But Elizabeth, who at first had felt crushed down by this fearful revelation, throws herself instantly between their swords, and covers him with her virgin body, as with a shining shield:

Back! I care not for death!
What is the wound your swords can make, compared With the death-thrust I have received from him?

While all are astounded that she has the courage to defend the knight, who has betrayed her, she exclaims:

"Why think of me? But he,—his weal!
His hope of heaven will ye rob from him?"

She claims for him the right of repentance, the benefit of Christ's blood, the appeal to divine mercy, which can forgive more than man can sin:

"See me, the virgin; he hath blasted
All my young bloom by one fell stroke,—
In secret love my whole soul fasted
For him whose glee my heart-strings broke:—
I pray for him, his life, his hope of heaven;
His mournful steps to sure repentance guide!
The power of faith to him be newly given,
Whereas for him the dear Redeemer died!"

And the heroic virgin gains the life of her beloved. What divine or human sternness could have resisted virtue so persuasive and so eloquent in love? Touched and confounded, all draw back, and Tannhäuser, crushed to earth by such a love, whose pure glow bids hope spring again upon the very brink of sheer despair, rushes forth, to join the procession of pilgrims on their way to Rome, there to seek pardon for his fearful sins.

A Pilgrimage to Salisbury Cathedral.

BY A BOSTON ARCHITECT.

(Concluded from p. 43.)

"Still points the tower, and pleads the bell,
The solemn arches breathe in stone,
Window and wall have lips to tell
The mighty faith of days unknown:—
They filled these aisles with many a thought,
They bade each nook some truth recall,
The pillar'd arch its legend brought,
A doctrine came with roof and wall."

The vergers of the Cathedral, a respectful and intelligent, though somewhat corpulent official,—who informed me that he had once been the Bishop's head butler,—and who, I suppose, had been promoted to his present snug position in reward for his faithful services in that responsible capacity,—received me with a grave bow at the door of the north-western porch, and conducted me without delay over the whole interior of the building. It is not my present purpose, nor would it be interesting to the general reader, to enter into any minute or technical description of this portion of the edifice. Suffice it to say that the very injudicious restorations perpetrated by the barbarous Wyatt, at the latter end of the last century, have much disfigured its general appearance, and what the lapse of years had failed to effect, has thus been in part accomplished by his ignorant and tasteless alterations. The spectator, however, cannot fail to be deeply impressed by the noble breadth and simplicity of the original pile. The vaulting is plainly and boldly executed, rising to the height of about eighty feet from the pavement, and the arches are adorned with an effective series of deep mouldings, beneath which the slender columns look still more airy and elegant, from their divisions into many separate shafts of dark Purbeck marble. The altar was removed by Wyatt from its proper situation to the farther end of the Lady Chapel, throwing down at the same time the screen which divided the latter from the choir,—and many of the tombs and other ornaments seem to have been re-arranged by him in the most arbitrary manner, and without the least regard to ancient principles of propriety or the commonest dictates of sense and taste. These lamentable arrangements are continued to the present day,—and, together with the bare, cold windows, stripped of all their richly painted glass by the hand of puritan fanaticism, and shorn of all their former glory, remain as mute though eloquent witnesses to the height of ancient excellence, and the depth of modern degeneracy.

It is, however, a matter of much congratulation to every liberal lover of art, that a better and more reverent spirit is now abroad. The restorations now going on at Ely,* and which I subsequently visited with a feeling of the highest pleasure, show how fully the style of the best ages is now understood,—leaving us little to regret in the way of mediæval execution, or even of the long neglected principles of pointed design.

The fading twilight of the interior and the deepening shadows of the old tombs, at length reminded my guide that it was time for us to retire. As we recrossed the footworn threshold, the heavy oak door closed behind us with a solemn reverberation, and the profound stillness of six centuries seemed to resume its rightful sway over the vast structure. The vergers went away, leaving me alone on the green. But with not a movement in the air, nor a living thing near, the spot had a charm for me which I was not willing to break. I felt that I was left alone there, with the spirit of hoar antiquity,—and face to face with the very ages of chivalry, and "the mighty faith of days unknown." I sat on a chain-rail in the close till it was quite dark, watching the shadows darken in the recesses, and the last tints of light fade away on the spire, till the whole of the majestic pile assumed a sombre and gloomy indistinctness of outline, far more impressive to the mind than the sharpness and certainty of daylight. Its huge dimensions acquired a still more imposing grandeur, while its mystic quietude seemed to enshrine a haven of sweet security from the turmoil, the anxiety and the busy fears of the outward world. And I thought, as I at length turned to leave the spot, that the mind which could not see the deepest poetry in every line of its lengthening vista, would listen with cold indifference to the inspired harmonies of Beethoven, or turn with apathy from the golden pages of Paradise Lost. For myself, I can truly say that I came away impressed

* Under the direction of the accomplished Mr. Scott, of Spring Gardens, London, to whom also has been confided the rebuilding of the fine church of St. George, at Doucaster.

"Not only with the sense
Of present pleasure, but with pleasing thought
That in this moment there was life and food
For future years."

The next morning found me early at the gate, and eager to ascend to the upper portions of the building. A bright-eyed lively boy of thirteen presented himself as my guide,—piloting me up a winding stone staircase scooped out of one of the corner turrets, to the battlements at the top of the Tower, two hundred and twelve feet from the ground. Standing here, behind and above me rose the great spire, profusely crocketed, and sculptured with ornamented bands of stone, to the fearful height of two hundred feet more. Access to the very top is practicable,—but is not generally permitted to visitors, and as the view was already so extensive and so beautiful, I felt no inclination to attempt any infringement of the usual rule. Beneath lay the Cathedral Close,—its lofty elms looking from this height like bushes of foliage close to the ground,—the Cloisters, where walked and prayed the studious monks of old, and which had fallen into a partial decay, now beautifully repaired, and restored from the ravages of time and neglect by the munificence of the present Bishop,—the episcopal palace with its trim gardens, neat walks and fantastic clipped hedges,—and beyond these the curious old city, looking like the toy-box towns which children delight to arrange,—all spreading out like a gay map at the spectator's feet. Three miles away lay the noble domain of Wilton House, the seat of the Earl of Pembroke,—standing in a richly wooded park, in whose broad walks, and under whose quiet shade walked and mused "the flower of chivalry," Sir Philip Sydney, and here wrote his Arcadia, amid its secluded and congenial scenes. Still nearer, one might recognize the little hamlet of Bemerton, where lived and ministered George Herbert, the author of The Temple,—"one of those spirits scattered along the track of ages," says Bishop Doane, "to show us how nearly the human may, by grace, attain to the angelic nature." The sunny slopes and waving wheat fields of the Wiltshire Hills hemmed in, at a distance, the exquisite panorama, through which flowed the silver Avon, on its way to the sea. The pretty river gleamed and sparkled in the sunshine, and marked its passage through the landscape with a line of fertility, but there is nothing particularly remarkable about it in this part of its course, except its name. Though an entirely different stream, it still bears, singularly enough, the same title with that of the placid river, so consecrated through all the world by its association with the birth-place, the home and the grave of the immortal Shakspeare.

The site of the ruined and abandoned city of Old Sarum lies a little distance away, to the north,—its precise locality marked only by a clump of flourishing trees. The moats of the ancient fortifications are said to be still quite perfect, but at this distance they are not discernible to the eye. The history of this once populous and important place, the dead mother of the flourishing city which now overlooks its decay, presents a singular and interesting exception to the usual course of municipal chronicles. An important military post of the Romans, it was still further fortified and enlarged by the great king Alfred, and in the earlier part of the thirteenth century possessed a numerous, and for those days active population, with a Cathedral of considerable size and splendor. The local guide books assert that the extent of this now entirely demolished structure is still distinctly marked out, by the outline drawn by the sun in a dry summer day upon the rich cornfields which now occupy the site. The city indeed was of such importance as to retain in later days, and as a recognition of its ancient power, two members of Parliament, even down to the Reform Act of 1830. But quarrels continually arose between the military and the ecclesiastical magnates of the place,—there could not be two Cæsars in Rome,—and matters at last came to such a pass that the high-spirited Bishop resolved to remove the Cathedral. With the shrine went too, the worshippers,—the majority of the citizens followed the lead of the bold churchman and left the governor to lord it alone over their deserted homes. One generation thus witnessed the removal of the entire city, and the vast mound where Briton and Roman, Saxon, Dane, and Norman successively held their iron sway, now resounds only to the rustling leaves of trees that seem almost primeval in their growth,—to the bleating of sheep, or to the footfall of the tourist, as he explores the curious traces of its former glory.

It must not be supposed that my mercurial little guide left me entirely to the uninterrupted contemplation of the scene. As we were groping up the dark and narrow staircase together, he had confided to me that he combined this congenial branch of employment with the more arduous duty of tolling the great bell twice a day for service. In this double capacity, however, he appeared not unwilling to acknowledge that he acted only as subservient to the ex-butler, whose shortness of wind would, I fancy, prove an insuperable bar to his own frequent indulgence in these, or any similar exercises. But I cannot say that the substitution was in all respects an agreeable one to myself, since the staid gravity of the elder functionary certainly formed no part in the character or behavior of his youthful deputy. Among other eccentricities,—which in fairness I suppose must be set down only as the normal condition of his age and sex,—he had contracted an exciting though not particularly safe habit of lying horizontally across the parapet of the tower with his body projecting considerably beyond the line of the stone work, and his feet braced merely against one of the foliaged crockets of the spire,—and, while in this position, tilting with his cap at arm's length in an animated and somewhat dexterous manner at the swallows that were wheeling and darting in airy circles around the dizzy pinnacles above our heads. To my frequently expressed doubts as to the entire safety of these peculiar sports, I am sorry to say that he paid little attention, beyond the assurance, "Poh! sir, I aint a bit afraid,—I does it often,—I holds out my cap and they flies into it like bats. I've caught a' many this way, sir." Wearied at last with the amateur labor of humanity which I had felt it my duty to carry on, in holding him as fast as I could by the seat of his trowsers,—particularly as these garments were not in any such high state of repair as gave assurance of furnishing the firmest description of hold upon his person in case of accident,—I unequivocally offered him the bribe of a sixpence to desist. To my great relief, I found that the proposal was instantly accepted, and I think it no more than justice to record that, while on my side of the steeple at least, Tommy acted up to the very letter of his bargain, though in the face of constant and accumulated temptation.

In the afternoon, I attended for the first time at the Cathedral service. The music, led by the powerful organ, was sung, as usual by a choir of ten surpliced boys and eight men,—one half ranged on either side of the choir. The solemnity, propriety and beauty of the music, and the decorum of its performance, were, to me at least, highly impressive. I had heard much, it is true, of the heartlessness and formality of this service, and indeed I believe that to speak of it slightly is generally the fashion among our practical and utilitarian countrymen, abroad. But I must say that my own impressions of it were of a widely different character. As the pealing organ swelled forth with a majestic volume that seemed full of the very spirit of devotion, the soft, high notes of the boys' voices, shaped into decision by the rapid chaunt of the tenor, and supported everywhere by the rich and vigorous harmony of the bass, ran through the antiphonal responses with such a plaintive earnestness and beauty of tone, that it seemed to me impossible to lift a higher and holier song to the ear of Heaven. Nor could I find any force in the objection, which I have often heard made to the smallness of the congregation,—but rather, on the other hand, I thought that the solemnity of this high service was perhaps all the more striking, from the comparative absence and indifference of the outward world.

The anthem was over, and the congregation rose quietly to depart,—while the last notes of the Amen faded away in the distant recesses of the building,

"Lingering and wandering on, as loth to die,
Like thoughts, whose very sweetness yieldeth proof
That they were born for immortality."

I had paused for a parting glance at the lofty arches of the choir, and the rich carving of the ancient woodwork, when a curtained door opened, and two young girls came forth from a dark pew behind the prebendal stalls. One of them, it must be confessed, was not particularly noticeable either in feature or expression,—but seldom have I seen such an exquisite embodiment of youthful loveliness as was presented in the person of her taller companion. Erect, slender and graceful as a fawn, eighteen summers at most had tinged her cheek with their rosy blushes, and rounded her figure into the lithe symmetry of English country beauty. The delicate outline of her face was admirably set off by one of those picturesque and jaunty straw hats with which Sir Joshua so much delighted to invest the charming nymphs and high bred shepherdesses that, eighty years ago, inspired his glowing pencil. A profusion of rich, chestnut ringlets fell in a golden shower about her neck, and strayed in wanton luxuriance over her fair shoulders. She walked down the nave to the great, western door,—a coquettish scarf of black lace falling airily about her figure, and a jet cross at every step glancing and sparkling on her bosom.

As she stood for a moment in the doorway, with the sunlight falling full upon her, and bringing out her figure as a brilliant point against the sombre shadows, and time-stained columns of the antique portal, she seemed to me a not unfitting type of the living, breathing beauty of the present, contrasted with the dim incertitude and stony silence of the buried past. With a parting smile at her companion, and certainly not without some lingering remains of it in her face as she turned her head in a leisurely glance over her shoulder,—a kind of delicate acknowledgment, perhaps, of the evident admiration with which she had been regarded,—she tripped lightly down the gravel walk to an ivy covered gateway in the garden wall of one of the neighboring houses, and passing under its arch, disappeared from view. Beautiful vision!—little did you know, that among the listeners to that evening service there knelt one wanderer from a distant land, who had that day experienced so much of unwonted delight:—enough, at least, to leave him forever enamored of the charming scenes amid which your childhood had been reared,—of the velvet lawns which your pretty feet have trod,—of the grand old church in which your prayers have so often ascended,—and of yourself,—sweet pride of Salisbury!—an image whose impression, it may be, is not the least cherished and ineffaceable of all.

A. G.

Miss Bremer and Jenny Lind.

I ascertained that Jenny Lind was still at Havana, and would not yet leave for a couple of days. I wrote, therefore, a few lines to her, and despatched them by our young countryman, Horlin, who was glad to be the bearer of my letter. It was in the evening, and after that I took my light and went up stairs to my chamber to go to rest. But scarcely had I reached the top of the stairs when I heard a voice below mention my name. I looked round astonished, and there at the foot of the stairs, stood a lady holding by the balustrade and looking up to me with a kind and beaming countenance. It was Jenny Lind—Jenny Lind, and with that beaming fresh, joyous expression of countenance which, when once seen, can never be forgotten! There is the whole Swedish Spring in it. I was glad. All was forgotten in a moment, which had formerly come between her and me. I could not but instantly go down, bend over the balustrade, and kiss her. That agreeable young man, Max Hjortsberg, was with her. I shook hands with him, but I took Jenny Lind with me into my chamber. We had never met since that time at Stockholm, when I predicted for her an European reputation. She had now attained it in a higher degree than any other artist, because the praise and the laurels which she won everywhere, had not reference alone to her gifts as a singer.

I spent with her the greater part of the two days while she yet remained in Havana, partly with her in her own apartments, and partly in driving with her on the beautiful promenades around the city, and partly in my own room, where I sketched her portrait; and I could not help once more loving her intensely. Beneath the palm-trees of Cuba, we talked only of Sweden and our mutual friends there, and shed bitter tears together over the painful loss of others. We talked much about old friends and old connections in Sweden—nay, truly speaking, we talked of nothing else, because everything else—honor, reputation, wealth, all which she had obtained out of Sweden—did not seem to have struck the least root in her soul. I should have liked to have heard something about them, but she had neither inclination nor pleasure in speaking of them. Sweden alone, and those old friends, as well as religious subjects, lay uppermost in her soul, and of these merely, had she any wish to converse.

In certain respects I could not entirely agree with her; but she was always an unusual and superior character, and so fresh, so Swedish! Jenny Lind is kindred with Trollhatan and Niagara, and with every vigorous and decided power of nature, and the effects which she produces resemble theirs.

The Americans are enchanted with her beneficence. I cannot admire her for this; I can only congratulate her in being able to follow the impulse of her heart. But that Jenny Lind, with all the power she feels herself possessed of, with all the sway she exercises, amid all the praise and homage which is poured upon her, and the multitudes of people whom she sees at her feet, still looks up to something higher than all this, higher than herself and in comparison with which she esteems herself to be mean—that glance, that thirst after the holy and the highest which, during many changes, always again returns and shows itself to be dominant feature in Jenny Lind—this is, in my eyes, her most unusual and her noblest characteristic.

She was very amiable and affectionate to me; yes so much so that it affected me. Little did I expect, that beneath the palms of the tropics, we should come so near to each other!

I met at dinner at her house the whole of the travelling party—Belletti, Mademoiselle Aehstrom, Mr. Barnum and his daughter, and many others. The best understanding seems to prevail between her and them. She praised them all, and praised highly the behavior of Mr. Barnum to her. She was not now giving any concerts at Cuba, and was enjoying the repose, and the beautiful tropical scenery and air. She sang for me, unasked, (for I would not ask her to sing,) one of Lindblad's songs, and her voice seemed to me as fresh and youthful as ever.

One day she drove me to the bishop's Garden, which was "beautiful, beautiful!" she said; beautiful park-like grounds, near Havana, where she was anxious to show me the bread fruit tree, and many other tropical plants, which proves her fresh taste for nature. In the evening we drove along the magnificent promenade, el Paseo di Isabella segunda, which extends for certainly upward of three English miles, between broad avenues of palm and other tropical trees, beds of flowers, marble statues and fountains, and which is the finest promenade any one can imagine, to say nothing of its being under the clear heaven of Cuba. The moon was in her first quarter, and floated like a little boat above the western horizon. Jenny Lind made me observe its different position here to what it has with us, where the new moon is always upright or merely in a slanting direction to the earth. The entire circle of the moon appeared unusually clear.

The soft young moonlight above the verdant, billowy fields, with their groups of palm-trees, was indescribably beautiful.

I fancied that Jenny Lind was tired of her wandering life and her rôle of singer. She evidently wished for a life of quieter and profounder character. We talked of—marriage and domestic life.

Of a certainty, a change of this kind is approaching for Jenny Lind. But will it satisfy her soul, and be enough for her? I doubt.

She left that evening for New Orleans, out of spirits, and not happy in her own mind. The vessel by which she sailed was crowded with Californian adventurers, four hundred it was said, who were returning to New Orleans; and Jenny Lind had just heard a rumor that Captain West, who had brought her over from England to America, had perished in a disastrous voyage at sea. All this depressed her mind, and neither my encouragement—I went on board the vessel to take leave of her, to give her my good wishes and a bouquet of roses—nor the captain's offer of his cabin and saloon, where, above deck, she might have remained undisturbed by the Californians below, were able to cheer her.—She was pale, and said little. She scarcely looked at my poor roses, although they were the most beautiful I could get in Havana; when, however, I again was seated in my little gondola, and was already at some distance from the vessel, I saw Jenny Lind lean over the railing toward me.

And all the beautiful, regular countenances of the West paled below the beaming, living beauty of expression in the countenance which I then saw, bathed in tears, kissing the roses, kissing her hands to me, glancing, beaming, a whole summer of affluent, changing, enchanting, warm inward life.—She felt that she had been cold to me, and she would now make amends for it.

And if I should never again see Jenny Lind, I shall always henceforth see her thus as at this moment, always love her thus.—Frederika Bremer's "Homes of the New World."

How to Write an Overture.

Several years ago, a young composer had written an opera; nothing was wanting to complete it but the overture, which much embarrassed the youthful aspirant. His uncle, who was an excellent, but rather foolish old man, seeing the predicament in which he was placed, (for the rehearsals of the opera had already begun,) imagined a most extraordinary project. He secretly wrote to the illustrious Rossini the following letter:—

"MY DEAR SIR.—You have the reputation of being clever, obliging, and also of being an epicure. To the epicure then I send a paté de foie gras. I appeal to his goodness; and trust the clever composer will reply to my question, and come to the aid of one of his future rivals. My nephew does not know how to set about writing the overture to an opera he has composed. Would you be good enough, you who have written so many, to let me know your receipt for the same. When you had still some pretensions to renown, my demand might have appeared to you rather indiscreet, but since you have renounced all idea of glory, you cannot be now jealous of any one. Believe me, dear Sir, yours, &c."

Rossini hastened to write this highly amusing answer:—

"I am much flattered, Sir, at the preference that you have been kind enough to give my writings above those of my brother composers.

"First, I must tell you that I have never written anything except by the direst necessity. I could never understand what pleasure there could be in cudgelling one's brains, tiring one's fingers, and getting into a fever, to amuse a public, whose only pleasure in return is to get tired of those who have amused them. I am not at all a true partizan of industry; and think the finest and the most precious of the rights of man is to do nothing. That is, at least, what I have been doing since I have acquired, not by my works, however, but by some lucky speculations, the rights of idleness. If, then, I have a counsel to give your nephew, it is to imitate me in that. If, however, he should persist in his fantastic and incomprehensible idea of working, the following are the principal receipts which I have made use of during the miserable epoch of my existence when I was obliged to do something. Let him choose whichever appears to him the most convenient.

"1st Rule, general and invariable. Always wait for the night before the first performance of an opera to write the overture. There is nothing so inspiring as necessity, and the delightful propinquity of a copyist, who awaits your composition shred by shred; also the sinister appearance of a despairing manager, who is tearing his hair out by the roots. The real chefs-d'œuvre of overtures have never been composed otherwise. In Italy, in my time, all the managers were bald at thirty.

"2nd Receipt. I composed the overture to "Otello" in a small room at Barbaja's palace, where this most bald and ferocious of managers had locked me up, in company with some macaroni simply boiled in water, and a threat that I should never leave the room alive until I had composed the last note of the said overture.

"You could make use of this receipt very successfully with respect to your nephew; but mind, no patés de foie gras, they are only good for idlers like myself, and I thank you for the one you have honored me by sending.

"3d Receipt. I composed the overture to "La Gazza Ladra," not the night before, but on the same day of the performance of the opera, on the roof of the theatre of "La Scala," at Milan; where the manager—a counterpart of the ferocious Barbaja—had placed me under the guard of four machinists. The mission of these executioners, was to throw my work, page by page, to the copyists who were waiting below, who having copied it, sent it phrase by phrase to the conductor, who rehearsed it as it came. If I did not write, these barbarians had orders to throw me, instead of my music, to the copyists.

"If you should possess a loft in your house, Sir, you might make use of it in a similar way with your nephew.

"4th Receipt. I did much better for my overture to the "Barber of Seville." I didn't compose any at all; that is to say, that instead of the one I had written for this very comic opera, one was taken which I had written for "Elizabeth," a very serious one. The public was enchanted with the substitution.

"Your nephew, who has yet done nothing, might try this means, and borrow from himself another overture.

"5th Receipt. I composed the overture to "Count Ory," one day, fishing at Petit-bourg, with my feet in the water, and in company with M. Aguada, who never ceased all the time talking to me of Spanish finances, which teased me to death.

"I doubt not, Sir, that in a parallel case, your conversation might be of a nature to produce the same invigorating effect on your nephew's nerves.

"6th Receipt. I composed the overture to "Guillaume Tell" in the middle of an apartment which I occupied on the Boulevard Montmartre, which was the resort, night and day, of all that Paris contained of the most absurd and noisy people, who came daily to smoke, drink, yell, stamp about, and humbug me, while I worked with fury, so as to hear them as little as possible.

"Perhaps, notwithstanding the progress of wit in France, you might find fools enough to procure this stimulant for your nephew. You might yourself powerfully aid in this result, and merit the largest share of your nephew's gratitude.

"7th Receipt. I never composed the shadow of an overture for "Mosè in Egitto," which is by far the easiest plan. I doubt not that your good nephew may use with success the last-named receipt. It is the same that my excellent friend Meyerbeer has employed for "Robert le Diable" and the "Huguenots," and he appears to have perfectly succeeded. I am told that he has used it also for the "Prophète."

"Accept, Sir, my best wishes for your nephew's renown, and many thanks for your excellent pic, and believe me,

"Yours very obediently,
"ROSSINI, Ex-composer.

Chamber Concerts.

With the concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, next Tuesday evening, the season of Classical Chamber Concerts will be fairly opened. Mr. DRESEL's choice little piano-forte Soirées will soon follow; and also for some time have stood announced a series of Matinées of string Quartet and Piano music, by Messrs. ECKHARDT, KEYZER, PERABEAU and confrères. Nothing so proves the growing, deepening taste for music, as the demand that has sprung up in our community for this most pure and genuine kind of music. It is of more consequence to the cause of pure taste, aye, and of pure musical enjoyment, that such concerts should be well supported, season after season, the whole season through, than that a thousand Paganinis and De Meyers should come to dazzle and amuse us.

We are happy to know that the QUINTETTE CLUB open this their fifth season with a fuller subscription list than they have ever had before. Their programme is as admirably choice and inviting, as it is entirely new to this public. They justify their name by offering us for the first time a Quartet in E flat, of MENDELSSOHN, which we verily believe to be the most interesting of all his quartets. BEETHOVEN's violin Concerto is a great work. It will be played by Messrs. AUGUST FRIES and F. F. MÜLLER. (By the way, seeing the name of Mr. Müller in the bill, and remembering that there is a nice organ in that hall, we might make a suggestion.) MOZART, SCHUMANN, and a modern German amateur composer, VEIT, furnish the remainder of the feast.

"TANNHÄUSER."—We commence to-day a translation of LISZT's description and analysis of one of Richard Wagner's two most famous operas. It is from a little German volume of a hundred and fifty pages, translated from the French, in which Liszt usually writes. Half of it is devoted to the "Lohengrin," with an enthusiastic account of the Herder and Goethe festival at Weimar, on which occasion Liszt, as chapel-master to the Grand Duke, brought that opera out, in the presence of distinguished musical men from all parts of Germany. The second half is a reprint of an earlier article about the "Tannhäuser." The interest felt here in the overture, as played by the Germanians, naturally awakens a desire to know more of the plan and character of the opera itself; and no one can inform us so intelligently, and with such graphic force and fervor of style, as Wagner's best friend and expositor, LISZT.

The article includes, first an account of the plot and the old legend on which it is founded, with numerous citations from Wagner's poem, which we have only in part translated, and that hastily, with only enough truth to the original to keep the thread of the story unbroken: next a minute and glowing analysis of the overture,—much fuller than Wagner's own "programme" to it, which we have already published; next a vivid review of the music of the drama, scene by scene; and finally a critical appreciation of its significance and destined influence as the opening of a new era in musical dramatic Art. Certainly never had opera a more romantic, tunelessly suggestive theme and plan, or a more beautiful poem.

Gottschalk.

Is it not surprising that a pianist like Gottschalk should arrive, harbingered by what seemed extravagant eulogium; should prove fully worthy of all that could be said or written, and yet meet with so little enthusiasm in Boston? We had hoped more from the public taste, which has not lacked opportunity of cultivation; much good music has been played the last few years and apparently enjoyed by crowds. But this want of appreciation in the public has surprised us far less than the criticisms in the newspapers, particularly the one in the Journal of Music. The editor of a paper devoted avowedly to music, would, we should think, feel inclined to welcome so wonderful a proficient in his favorite art, by well deserved praise, and not let his appreciation of his powers as a performer, be entirely subservient to his hypercriticism of his compositions.

All pianists of any celebrity, compose; not satisfied with rendering the thoughts of others, they seek to give a form to the inspiration stirring within them.

It is the same feeling which leads a musical critic to write upon music instead of satisfying himself by reading what has been written; there is something agreeable in giving expression to our own individual thoughts, either in words or harmony.

We by no means intend placing Gottschalk in a high rank among composers, and think it would have been more judicious in him to have played more from the standard masters, at his first concert.

From his exquisite touch, the mere running of the scales becomes delightful, and his extremely modest manner, (for which we were not prepared) ought to disarm ill natured criticism.

It seems to us incumbent for an editor who claims to be the "explorer, observer and reporter of the eventful world of music," and who has conducted his journal with few exceptions, with great intelligence, independence and refinement, to be careful that his criticisms should be in good taste, and not use expressions which may be even more dangerously infectious to the young readers of his paper, than even the much objected to "Susanna!" "Melodich" ought not to be heard by "ears polite." To use such terms is a much greater mistake than giving utterance to any Poetic Caprices or graceful, though (we confess) unmeaning "Dances Ossianiques."

The admirable concert on Friday was not listened to by a large audience; the sad announcement at the commencement inclined every one to the utmost leniency; a cold, listless performance would not have surprised us. But admiration and not mercy was called for. The fine duet by Onslow was charmingly played. Mr. Pychowsky, who is a pianist of great merit, appeared to much advantage, and it was evident that Gottschalk had no wish to place him in a subordinate situation, a rare instance of self renunciation in a public performer.

All his brilliant passages told, and the treble often seemed almost an accompaniment to the bass.

Mr. Aptommas' music was wonderful and delightful. In Mlle Behrend's voice quality and quantity are not properly balanced. The gem of the evening was the scena from Lucia.

It was a union of all that makes music delightful,—pathos and power, sun and storm: infinite variety of expression and almost orchestral effects. If the comparison be not too fanciful, the finale seemed to express the action of a war horse madly rushing to the battle, amidst the booming of artillery and the sob of the dying. We sat near amateurs of acknowledged taste and wide experience in music, and we all agreed that as well in the old world as the new Gottschalk had claims to be considered at the head of his art, joint sovereign with Thalberg.

May we not fear that the American King of Music may feel no desire to occupy his throne in Boston and that his disloyal and unsympathising subjects may induce him to desert us for the more genial South?

A STRANGER TO GOTTSCHALK BUT A LOVER OF MUSIC AND JUSTICE.

The above appeared in the Traveller last week. We do not see but it admits all the gist of our criticism. In not placing Gottschalk "in a high rank among composers;" in regretting that his programme was chiefly made up of his own compositions; in applying the epithets "graceful though unmeaning" to his "Dances Ossianiques," the writer only sums up in brief the exceptions which we made more in full.

Wherein, then, has he found us so unjust, or, to use his own phrase, so "disloyal to the American King of Music"? Was it that we did not appreciate "his powers as a performer," his "exquisite touch," his "running scales," his "brilliant passages," in sentences as unqualified and hearty as his own? Certainly he has only to re-read our article to find that we gave the fullest credit for all that. None of the newspaper eulogists exceeded us on that theme, except it were in number and high-soundingness of words. So we are clear on that count; so far our "loyalty" stands unimpeachable.

What then? Why, we made our praise of the performer "subservient" to our "hypercriticism of the composer. By "subservient" is probably meant secondary. And yet there is a sense in which we are disposed to plead guilty to "subservient," and to own that we did make the acknowledged fact of Gottschalk's wonderful skill as a performer subserve the end of illustrating, for the thousandth time, in his case, the false direction into which this modern virtuosity, (or claim to admiration on the ground of brilliant mechanical execution), is misleading so many would-be composers. If we showed any lack of "welcome," it was not to Gottschalk individually, but to this virtuoso, or display school, in general, under which category the loud trumpetings beforehand, as well as that first concert, plainly seemed to place him. The question for us was, not whether Gottschalk was a great player, (which was granted),—but whether duty to the Art, duty to our readers, who would learn to love it, duty to our own sense of what appears true-taste, in a word, whether "loyalty" to MUSIC, would permit us to celebrate any amount of such wonderful virtuosity as a thing fit to go into ecstasies about, and rear "a throne" for, when artists of soul and sentiment and fine intellectual tone, who have not quite so great execution, but who earnestly dedicate such fine powers as they have to the interpretation of the true, the high, the genuine, in music, as found in the works of inspired masters, are to be thrown quite into the shade by this ephemeral brilliancy? Real, deep, soul-inspired music, the music which gives satisfaction in the long run, is a plant of that modest, delicate, refined nature, that it requires to be sheltered against the rough-shod, dashing, glittering gallop of the virtuoso knights, who have so overrun the world in these latter days. All the outward advantages are on the side of the virtuosos; they win the public all too easily, because effect can cover the ground faster than seeds of Art can take root. The weight of criticism therefore ought to be put into the least loaded end of the scales, that is to say, made to favor the side of real, serious Art rather than that of dazzling, ad captandum virtuosity. So we reasoned, so we acted:—was the spirit of the action unjust or ungenerous? was it not taking the part of the outwardly weakest against the outwardly strongest?

We made most account of Mr. Gottschalk's claims as a composer, because he gave us only his own compositions. For his improvement upon this proceeding in his second concert we have not withheld credit. We have found no fault with him for writing out "the inspirations stirring within him." Some of his little compositions we found pleasing, graceful and expressive. But we were challenged to measure him by very high standards. No concert-giver ever came more loudly heralded; he was declared a great artist, a peer with Thalberg, Liszt and even Chopin. Chopin wrote immortal tone-poems, too good, too true to be largely popular; what Gottschalk gave us we found showy, ad captandum, light and dazzling,—music to show off a player, rather than to task both soul and fingers of a fervent interpreter. Our critic seems to grant as much. We looked upon such a concert, therefore, however admirable in the performance, as not greatly tending to the elevation of musical taste; we thought it one of the proofs of "public taste" here, that such virtuoso music could not excite any great furor. For the very reason that "much good music has been enjoyed here," did the enjoyers thereof lack appetite for the brilliant pyrotechnics of a solo concert, perfect as that was in its kind. Such is the inevitable effect of musical cultivation. Solo-players, relying on the astonishing of the crowd by individual skill in execution, reap smaller and smaller harvests where such cultivation exists. It is to orchestral and chamber concerts, to oratorios or operas, that cultivated music-lovers turn with zest and hope of satisfaction. They seek not the pleasure of astonishment, which they had in the infancy of their musical experience, but a deeper kind of pleasure which the deeper kinds of music give. So, we are told, it is in Germany, and more or less all Europe. For several years the Paganini, virtuoso tribe, by dint of dazzling, superficial novelty, were all the rage; but already the fashion thereof passeth away; the great pianist or great violinist, to be heard in Germany, must put good music in his programme. Good music, not great playing, is what the real music-lovers ask for. And this is a fact which Gottschalk and his friends should take more into consideration, in estimating the reception that he met in Boston. They should bear in mind that no solo concerts can have great success in these days; that the chance for such things has gone by; that we go more and more to concerts to make ourselves familiar with good music, and less and less to gratify our hero-worship in the person of whatever artist. Orchestras (who should not be thankful?) carry the day, and Beethoven and Mendelssohn and Mozart are more to us than those who find their music not difficult or wonderful enough to display their execrable powers.—We would remind these complainants, too, that Mr. Gottschalk's concerts were quite as fully attended as any piano-forte concerts ever were in Boston.

We thank the writer in the Traveller for his complimentary allusions to our Journal. But why instead of fastening upon any errors in our estimate of Gottschalk, does he resort to literary criticism of our style, repeating (and with aggravating comment) a phrase of ours not fit, he thinks, "for ears polite." What had that phrase to do with our criticism upon Gottschalk? It was thrown in parenthetically, in passing, to characterize in as few words as possible one of the hack-nied, popular tunes ("Old folks at home"). We wished to say that such tunes, although whistled and sung by everybody, are erroneously supposed to have taken a deep hold of the popular mind; that the charm is only skin-deep; that they are hummed and whistled without musical emotion, whistled "for lack of thought;" that they persecute and haunt the morbidly sensitive nerves of deeply musical persons, so that they too hum and whistle them involuntarily, hating them even while they hum them; that such melodies become catching, idle habits, and are not popular in the sense of musically inspiring, but that such and such a melody breaks out every now and then, like a morbid irritation of the skin. We preferred to say it in one word,—indeed there was not room for more. We might have talked technically and said "cutaneous disease;" but the homely Saxon monosyllable seemed the most expressive and the least bald and prosaic. De gustibus, &c.

Some things in our complainant's remarks make us suspect that his admiration for the player must have dazzled his sober musical perceptions. Thus in speaking of the Onslow duet, he ascribes it all to Gottschalk's modest self-renunciation, that the composer has in some places done a very common thing, given the theme or principal melody to the bass, and made the treble "an accompaniment to the bass!"—Again, when he will tell us by what right that "madly rushing war horse" and all that "booming artillery" played such a part in the finale to Lucia, we will swallow our objection to Mr. Gottschalk's making Liszt's fantasia more difficult than Liszt had written it. Really it would seem, (to use the writer's own felicitous remark) as if "quality and quantity were not properly balanced" here!

Finally, we did have patriotism, or pride of country enough to wish to find Gottschalk all—no, not all he had been proclaimed to be—but something far better and higher. Great in his kind he may be; but we were disappointed that the kind 'should be no greater, seeing that it was the "American King of Music" who had come to honor Boston by erecting here his "throne."

The "HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION" have just received a most valuable addition to their library, in the shape of the first two volumes, (to be continued annually,) of the "Complete Works of JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH," now in course of publication by the Bach-Gesellschaft ("Bach Society") in Leipsic. It is a donation from our townsman, Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON, and is a work fit to form the corner stone of any musical library.

Bach died on the 28th of July, 1750. Two years ago the hundredth anniversary of that event was celebrated, and it was thought a fit time for the German nation to erect some worthy monument to his memory. A committee of the first professors, artists and amateurs decided that the noblest monument would be a complete critical edition, for the first time, of all his works, in a style at once elegant, substantial and simple; and for this end the Bach Society was organized. Every member, who contributes annually five thalers, is entitled to the volume issued for each year. Two volumes of 300 pages each are now published, in the best style of Breitkopf and Härtel. They are the most splendid musical volumes ever published, and contain his Church Cantatas, with full score, prefaced by a fine portrait, fac-similes of his manuscript, a history of the Society, and a list of members or subscribers. This last is headed by a long list of crowned and titled names, and then by amateurs and artists in all the musical cities of Europe. Under the head of United States, there are five names, all from Boston.

NEW YORK. A newly arrived pianiste, Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LA MOTTE, gave her first concert at Niblo's Saloon, on Thursday evening. She is announced as "the only artist who can number among her teachers those distinguished masters, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Prudent and Thalberg." She played a Trio of Mendelssohn and a Trio of Beethoven, with BURKE for violin, and BOUCHER, violoncello; also fantasias of Liszt and Prudent. There was singing by Mlle. EMMA ESMONDE and Sig. QUINTO, with Mr. TIMM for accompanist.

MARETZEK's "Masaniello," and ANNA THILLON's "Crown Diamonds," &c., reign alternately at Niblo's.

ACADEMIE IMPERIALE DE MUSIQUE.—The first representation of the new opera, in two acts, entitled le Maître Chanteur, took place on Monday last. The libretto is by M. Henry Trianon, and the music by M. Limnander. The libretto is anything but new. It is made up of patches from la Juive, Ernani, and Luisa Miller. M. Limnander is known as the composer of Les Monténégrins and Le Chateau de la Barbe Bleue, in which he showed himself possessed of some dramatic sentiment and the gift of expressive melody. In the music of le Maître Chanteur, these qualifications are found in the same degree as in his former productions, but they have not the advantage of being allied to such good librettos. The opera was followed, on Monday, by La Fille mal Gardée, in which Mlle. Besson played the principal part; and on Wednesday and Friday, it was repeated, with the new ballet, Elia et Mysis.—The rehearsals of La Nonne Sanglante commenced on Tuesday. Le Barbier de Séville and Betty are also in rehearsal, for the reentrée of Madame Bosio, as well as the ballet intended for the debut of Mlle. Rosati.—M. Bonnehée, the young singer, who gained the first prize at the ancours of the Conservatoire, is we understand, engaged at the Académie. Les Mosquetaires de la Reine was played on Monday last, for the rentrée of Herman Léon and Mlle. Lemercier. On making his appearance, Herman Léon was greatly applauded. The part of Captain Roland is one in which he excels, and he never performed it with more distinguished success. Mlle. Lemercier, who has just recovered from a serious indisposition, was charming in the part of Mlle. de Simiane; and Mlle. Caroline Duprez was never in better voice, or acted with greater naïveté and esprit. MM. Mocker and Puget were as usual excellent in their respective parts. Le Nabab was played on Saturday, Monday, and Wednesday, with increased success.

By a decree of the 19th inst. M. le Colonel Ragani was nominated director of the Theatre Italien for nine years. The arrangements with the proprietors of the theatre being now terminated, it is certain that the reopening will take place at the epoch originally fixed, viz., the 15th November. The following is a list of the artists engaged by the new director:—Tenors,—MM. Mario, Maccaferri, Perez; Basses,—MM. Tamburini, Rossi, Ferrari, Florenza, Guglielmi; Sopranis,—Mmes. Frezzolini, Walter, Albini, Cambardi, Grimaldi, Martini; Contraltis,—Mmes. Alboni, De Luigi, Ernesta Grisi. For the opening night, Cenerentola has been chosen with Mario, Tamburini, and Alboni. M. Ragani intends to produce Gli Arabi nelle Galle of Pacini, and Il Templaro by Nicola, during the season.

The Theatre Français has produced a piece in three acts, entitled Murillo (originally named La Corde de Pendu). It was for this work that Meyerbeer wrote the new morceau which Brindeau sings with so much expression. It is a kind of serenade, quite original in idea and form, in which the hand of a great master is recognised. We must also mention the entr'acte and melodramatic music composed for the same work by Offenbach.—Mme. Cabal and Le Bijou Perdu continue to draw crowds to the Theatre Lyrique.

M. Vincent, membre de l'Institut (Académie des inscriptions et belles lettres), lately exhibited an instrument, divided into quarter tones, upon which he produces the "genre harmonique" of the Greeks, which made a great sensation among the audience.—A report has been spread abroad that the director of the Opera will discontinue the bals masqués, but there is no foundation for it. On the contrary Musard has already prepared a formidable repertoire, consisting of an immense number of the prettiest and most popular quadrilles and other dance music; the two quadrilles on le Nabab and l'Epreuve Villageoise, which have obtained so deserved a success, are placed among the first on the list.

MR. RICHARDSON has resided in Europe for the last five years, during which time he availed himself of the instruction of the most distinguished Teachers of Composition and the Piano-Forte, for the purpose of acquiring a thorough practical knowledge of MUSIC. While there, he became personally acquainted with all of the most celebrated publishers, and dealers in Music, and learned their peculiar methods of transacting business, with a view of establishing a Music Store in this city. Profiting by the knowledge acquired by visiting the Music Stores on the continent of Europe, as well as those in England, Mr. RICHARDSON formed a plan, differing from that of every other, and which he flatters himself possesses decided improvements over all.

In fitting up his Store, his object has been to make it an attractive resort for the Ladies, and the musical profession generally, and no expense has been spared towards rendering it every way worthy the patronage of the public,—and he trusts it will be the means of encouraging and improving the taste for Music among all classes.

The stock of Music comprises the most complete collection, of both Foreign and American, ever offered to the public. It was selected by the proprietor himself, and he has endeavored to avoid that which is not of an instructive character,—seeking rather to elevate the taste to the highest standard of Musical excellence. A Catalogue of the Music is being prepared, and will soon be issued.

All publications of this Store will be of a superior order, and got up in fine style. No pieces will be published that are not fully worthy of it,—and no compositions accepted for publication that are not worth paying for.

The above Music Store comprises two departments—American and Foreign. Mr. J. M. FOYE, who has had many years' experience in the business, in this city, will take charge of the American department; and Mons. A. HILL, from the celebrated publishing house of Brandus & Co., of Paris, will have charge of the Foreign department. And the Proprietor trusts, by devoting his whole attention to business, to receive a liberal share of patronage. Being in constant correspondence with many eminent Professors and Publishers of Music abroad, he will at all times be happy to give any information with regard to musical matters that may be in his power.

Foreign and American PIANO-FORTES and ORGANS, from the most celebrated manufacturers, constantly on hand. Also, some of the best specimens of large sized SWISS MUSIC BOXES that have ever been imported, may be seen at the Store.

PIANO-FORTES, of the best German, French, and American manufacture, selected and sent to any part of the United States, at the lowest Cash prices. Mr. R. will WARRANT every instrument he recommends, and will assume the whole responsibility of a safe arrival at the residence of the purchaser.

The largest and richest variety of OPERA GLASSES and FANS, of entirely new styles, ever offered by any other house in the United States, are ready for inspection. Also, French UMBRELLAS and CANES; those in want would do well to examine, before purchasing elsewhere.

LITHOGRAPHS, BUSTS, MEDALLIONS, and PORTRAITS, of the most distinguished Musicians and Composers,—as Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Chopin, Dreyshock, Liszt, &c., always on hand.

Those desiring the services of good Teachers, in any of the different branches of Music, may learn their addresses and terms of Mr. Richardson, who will interest himself in such matters, without any partiality.

Mr. R. is a subscriber for all the Musical Journals published in England, France, Germany, Italy, and America, and they may always be found in the Saloon connected with his Store.

Foreigners will find themselves quite at home in this Store, as French and German, as well as English, will be spoken.

Tickets for the first class concerts may always be found at the Musical Exchange. Also subscriptions taken for the leading Musical papers published in Europe and America.

WAGNER'S "TANNHÄUSER."

BY FRANZ LISZT.

Through long days and still longer nights did the princess of Thuringia wait for his return, praying, weeping, hoping. One evening, as she was kneeling at the foot of an image of the Virgin, in the same valley where the landgrave had before recovered him, the pilgrims, with whom he had set out by the same road for Rome, came along on their way home. Transported with joy, she stands up to see whether Tannhäuser is among them. She finds him not. . . . She sinks down again before the holy virgin, the comforter of the afflicted, and in one of those prayers, which lift the soul up with it, she proceeds:

O blessed Virgin, hear my anguish!

To thee, exalted one, I pray!

O let me here no longer languish,

But call me from this earth away!

Grant, that I angel-pure may rise

To thy blest realm above the skies!—

If ever idle dream were turning

My foolish heart away from thee,—

If any germ of sinful yearning

Or worldly passion stirred in me,—

With thousand pangs I still have wrestled

To crush the sins that in me nestled.

But, if some would not leave me wholly,

Yet may I still thy mercy feel,

That I with spirit meek and lowly,

A worthy maid, to thee may kneel,

Thy mercy's richest boon to pray

For him; O, wipe his guilt away!—

As she rises, to walk up the hill of the castle, Wolfram desires in vain to accompany her. Alone upon the earth, she loves only solitude, since for her there blooms no consolation more.

In the meantime the unhappy, the renowned guilty one returns. But who under the tattered garments of this pilgrim, with forlorn look and tottering step, would recognize the splendid vanquisher of so many rivals! It is with difficulty that even Wolfram discerns his features under this sallow paleness. Eager to learn his history, he questions him. Tannhäuser answers him only by ironically asking the way to the accursed grotto. Thrilled with horror, Wolfram, however, does not give up the man whom Elizabeth loves; he does not allow himself to be discouraged, but continues to question him, and the debilitated pilgrim gives him, in the bitter remorse of his heart, a description of his pilgrimage:

With heart-felt zeal, such as no penitent
Had ever felt, I sought the way to Rome.
An Angel in me, ah! had stoutly wrestled
With my poor pride of sin, and shook it off!—

The weary way of the most down-bent pilgrim
Walking beside me, I found far too easy:—
If his foot pressed the tender grass of meadows,
My naked sole would seek sharp thorn or stone;—
Or drank he at cool rills 'neath bushy shadows,
I sucked the noonday sun's hot glow alone;—
If he sent up his pious prayers to heaven,

My blood would I to God's high glory shed;—
Slept he in hospitable inn at even,

My weary limbs made snow and ice their bed:—

All Italy's fair fields around me spreading,

Blindfold I went, the miracle unheeding:—

Such pains I sought, such rugged ways unheaten,

That I my inward Angel's tears might sweeten!

At Rome, I sought the holy place straightway,

And on the threshold low in prayer I lay;—

The morning broke:—then all the bells were ringing.

And hymns celestial thro' the air descended;

O then new hopes within my soul were springing,

For grace to all the welcome sounds portended.

God's minister I saw; around him pressing

Great multitudes were kneeling in the dust;

Thousands dismissed he with his holy blessing,

Pardon'd they rose, all filled with joy and trust.—

I too approached; with drooping head and lowly

Accused myself of every thought unholy,

Of evil lusts, in which my soul did languish,

Lusts, that defied all penance and all pains!

I called on him, in tones of wildest anguish,

To grant deliverance from those fiery chains.—

And he, whom thus I prayed, began:

"Hast thou such sinful passion felt?

Hath hell's own fire set thee aglow?

Hast in the mount of Venus dwelt?

Then thou art damn'd to endless woe!

For as this staff within my hand

Its leafy bloom can ne'er regain,

So ne'er can'st thou, a burning brand

Pluck'd forth from hell, find grace again!"

I sank annihilated; reeling

My senses left me. When I roused me there,

Cold night lay brooding o'er the gloomy square;

Far off I heard glad hymns of mercy pealing:—

O how I loathed their sickening sound!

Wildly I hurried from the treach'rous ground;

* * * * *

Again I seek th' enchanted spot,

Thee, Venus, and thy fairy grot!

The chronicles, which report the answer of the bishop, further add that, after the knight, rejected with such inexorable sternness, had returned to his fatherland, to give himself up again to the old dissipations, the unsympathizing priest one day found his staff of almond wood in bloom, proving, that even dead wood could, if need were, be re-animated, and that a repentant heart was not to be rejected.

Tannhäuser, by the inexorable sentence given over to desperation, since he could find no hearing in ears deaf to pity, seeks again the Venus grotto. He tries to discover the secret path. . . . and the song of the syrens, the voice of the goddess let themselves be heard again. With the despair of one burthened with the curse of ex-communication, he rushes towards them. Wolfram with all his strength holds him back, but cannot break the accursed charm, until he pronounces the name of Elizabeth. Again this pure name exercises its magical and saving power. Instantly the impure vision vanishes. The melodies so full of a seductive grace die away, and Tannhäuser, with the same love, the same hope, utters that name once more. At this moment a funeral procession is seen approaching; it bears to her last resting place her, whose sole desire had been to live and die for him. He sinks down on the coffin, wherein rests a victim, that had borne every sorrow to expiate his sins. He sinks to the ground, he dies. He is saved. . . .

II. THE OVERTURE.

The overture to this extraordinary opera is in itself a no less wonderful production. It sums up the ideas of the opera in brief. The chant of the pilgrims and the song of the syrens are introduced, like two members, which find their equation in the finale. The religious motive appears at first quiet, deep, with slow pulsations, like the instinct of the finest, the sublimest of our feelings; but gradually it is overflowed by the insinuating modulations of the voices, full of enervating languor, full of soul-lulling, although feverish and excited pleasures: seductive mingling of pleasure and unrest! The voices of Tannhäuser and of Venus rise above this hissing, foaming yeast of waves, which swells continually higher. The voices of the syrens and baccchantes grow continually louder and more imperative. The enchantment reaches its climax; it leaves no chord within us silent, but sets every fibre of our being in vibration. The quivering, spasmodic tones now groan, now command in lawless alternation, until the resistless yearning for the infinite, the religious thema, gradually comes in again, subdues to itself all these sounds, melts them together into a sublime harmony and unfolds the wings of a triumphal hymn to their fullest breadth.

This great overture forms a symphonic whole by itself, so that we may consider it as an independent composition, separate from the opera which precedes it. The two leading thoughts, which are developed in it, ere they blend in their tremendous confluence, clearly express their entire character, the one with fury, the other with an irresistible influence, absorbing all into itself. These motives are so characteristic that they contain in themselves all the striking sense demanded by the musical thoughts, entrusted purely to the instrumentation. So vividly do they depict the emotions, which they express, that one needs no explanatory text to recognize their nature; not once is it necessary to know the words which are adapted to them afterwards. To maintain that these were necessary to the understanding of this symphony, would be to imitate those of whom Shakspeare says, they "paint the lily and adorn the rose," &c., or at least to imitate certain Chinese writers, who, to make the purport of their style clear to their readers, see fit to write in the margin of their books: "Deep Thought"—"Metaphor"—"Allusion," &c., whenever such occur in their writings. In Europe writers and composers may presume more on the understanding of their public, on the eloquence of their art and the clearness of their diction. It would be to torment oneself with scruples, like the learned scholars of the Celestial Empire, to be unwilling to separate the overture to "Tannhäuser" from its opera, out of the fear that it might not be understood or might not prove interesting. Its glowing coloring depicts the passions, which animate it, too intelligibly, to give any room for such precaution.

Rhythmical and harmonic figures, distributed amongst violas, shrill violins (divided over several desks) and wind instruments (pianissimo), accented by slight drum beats, and cut off into broken periods; groups of notes, ascending in swift spirals, losing and finding themselves in inexplicable windings, detaching themselves from an almost unbroken web of tremolo and trills frequently and strikingly modulated, enable us, by an entirely novel effect of languishing and amorous euphony, to recognize the magic arts of the syrens. The rich repertory of the existing music of this kind offers, as it seems to us, no such bold image, no such striking reflex, no such exciting stimulus and entrainment of the senses, of their brain-whirling intoxication, their prismatic illusions. Now and then tones glide in, which pass before the ear, as certain phantoms glimmer before the eye . . . seductive, penetrating, unnerving—faithless! Under their artificial, silky softness one perceives despotic intonations, feels the quivering of rage. Here and there ring out sharp, cutting tones of the violins, like phosphorescent sparks. The entrance of the drums makes us tremble, like the far off echo of an insane orgy. Chords occur of a deafening intoxication, which remind us that the Messalinas found their festivities not unadorned with horrors; that they did not deny themselves the satisfaction of seeing the bloodiest spectacles combined with amorous dallies; that they knew how to unite barbarous pleasures with the dangerous emotions that are inspired by beauty. The presence of the Mænads and their tumultuous dances in the Venus-grotto soon confirm this impression; this distinguishes this most original development of the very acme of voluptuousness above all the musical compositions which have so frequently attempted to describe the same thing. Once borne away by these wildly exciting, ravishing effects, one oversteps the sphere of ordinary temptations. Wagner has by no means contented himself with the free and easy motives, used by most of those whose inspiration answers to the taste and tendencies expressed in the scenes of a Rubens, or a Teniers, when they wanted to portray the fascination and tyrannical seductions of the mother and the queen of love. His mental ear knew how to detect the indescribable subtlety of those graceful tones, which resound at the court of Cytherea, but to which only a small number consecrated by the Graces ever penetrate, ushered in by a smiling crew who offer them the cup of joy, in which a strange, mysterious, fateful, but by no means a coarse and brutal intoxication is to be found. A German genius needed something of a Shakspeare's universal intuition, to become so penetrated as it were with the blood of antiquity, and inspired with an effervescence so entirely foreign to the gloomy fermentations of the North.

Sensual passion is here represented with the tumultuous delights of a refined voluptuousness, which dull, cold, heavy natures cannot at all conceive of, but which energetic natures, that demand more than every day impressions, dream of and pursue exclusively: lofty and at the same time tender organizations, who give their superabundance of vitality a ready prey to every accident, and who let their stormy passions overflow without restraint, so long as they can find a channel broad and deep enough to contain their roaring, raging, and ungovernable waves. One must marvel how, in Wagner's production, the power of treatment is never destructive of tenderness. It was not easy for him to secure both these characters. * *

In the midst of this harmony, which overflowing, sparkling, looms forth like a more and more dazzling mirage, we are suddenly awakened by a dramatic interest, when the feeling, vague as it may be, becomes individualized in two melodic phrases, one of which sounds to us like a cry of triumph and delight, mingled with a challenging expression, while the other lulls us with seductive invitation.

To scale majestically these dazzling precipices of voluptuousness and pleasure, the composer had to raise himself to an unwonted pitch of exaltation. The religious thema, once already drowned by this multitudinous hum of tones, that brushed past the ear with glowing breath, tingling at the fingers' ends, bewildering the brain, exciting the nerves, like fabled promises and mystical enchantments;—the religious thema, emerging again from this wild delirium, from this voluptuous languor, ran great risk of seeming cold, dreary, dry and barren, a mere soulless denial of contentment. . . . But it is by no means so. This holy motive rises before us not at all like a stern master, silencing the shameless whispering that rustles through those caves of hidden joys. In their presence it stands not gloomy and apart. It flows clearly and softly, creeping over all the strings, that vibrated with such sweet allurements; it holds them down, one by one, although they struggle against it with a bitter desperation. But ever clear and tranquil, in spite of this resistance, it extends its empire, transforming and assimilating all the friendly elements. The masses of glowing tones crumble into fragments, which form more and more painful discords, till they grow positively repulsive, like essences just turning into staleness; and joyfully we see it rising into a grand spiritual song, and overflowing with its radiance all the tempting illusions that preceded, as it spreads along, like liquid sunshine, brighter and brighter, till it swells into a mighty stream, that bears our whole soul and being on with it to an ocean of glory!

Music in England.

In the nationalities of modern music—and by modern we mean the best, for the meridian of the great masters is but just past—we are aware that our own land does not take a distinguished part. But if, since the early death of Purcell, England has produced but few native composers of eminence, we may be satisfied in remembering that she has adopted more than any other country. It may be said without presumption that in no respect is the national pride and prejudice so utterly forgotten as in our taste for music: nowhere does the public ear embrace a wider range of musical enjoyment and knowledge; nowhere do the various professors of musical art find fairer hearing or better pay. We have been brought up, as Mr. Rogers says, "in the religion of Handel." Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven are household names among us. We have been learning to like the Italian Opera for the last 150 years at an insane cost. The English musical festivals have been the first in the world both in time and in excellence, and in them the finest achievements of Spohr and Mendelssohn have first found a hearing; while at the same time our solemn cathedral services have preserved the worship of the beautiful English anthem, and some faithful club in every provincial town has kept alive the practice of our native glee and madrigal. The English, it must be remembered, do that homage to the fire of Italy and the thought of Germany which neither does to the other. An Italian cannot appreciate the intellectual depths of a German symphony: a German cannot follow the impetuous declamation of an Italian recitative. Handel, in the mouths of most Italian singers, is clothed in a false costume; and as for a thorough-paced German female singer interpreting a solo of Rossini's, we would as soon make it over to an English oyster-woman.

We look with most pride on our national appreciation of Handel. We pensioned him as soon as he appeared, and kept him. The French starved poor Mozart, and dismissed him. Why should not the latter have become the same musical benefactor to them as Handel has been to us? Such encouragements are repaid a hundred fold into our bosoms. What adopted stranger ever deserved the gratitude of a whole people more than Handel does ours? What genius ever gave pleasure of a higher and purer kind to a larger number of our countrymen than that of the mighty master has done, and is ever doing?—for here alone his music is played as he intended it to be—here alone the tradition of his teaching has never been lost sight of—here alone, therefore, his power really tells. He lived long enough among us to become acquainted with the religious depths of genuine English feeling, and gave it a rich endowment and true echo. We feel, on returning from hearing the Messiah, as if we had shaken off some of our dirt and dross—as if the world were not so much with us. Our hearts are elevated, and yet subdued, as if the glow of some good action or the grace of some noble principle had passed over them. We are conscious of having indulged in an enthusiasm which cannot lead us astray—of having tasted a pleasure which is not of the forbidden tree, for it is the only one which is distinctly promised to be translated with us from earth to heaven. Who is there of any sound musical taste, or fair musical opportunities, with whom one or more of Handel's solemn sentences of mixed musical and religious emphasis is not laid by among the sacred treasures of his memory, to refresh himself with when weary? Milton's verse in the 'Christmas Hymn' seems a prophecy Handel was sent to fulfil—

"For if such holy song
Enwrap our fancy long,
Time will run back and fetch the age of gold,
And speckled vanity
Will sicken soon and die,
And leprosin will melt from earthly mould:
And hell itself will pass away,
And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day."

George III.'s enthusiastic love for Handel seems to us the second best example he set his people—his own righteous life being the first. We almost feel as if Handel's sacred music would have reprov'd the French of infidelity, and enticed the Scotch from Presbyterianism; though perhaps the French crusade would have proved the more successful of the two, for, of all the fancies of a fretful conscience which liberty of opinion has engendered, that which many excellent people entertain on the subject of sacred music seems to us the most perverse. It is useless arguing with those who mistake a total ignorance of the sacred things of art for a higher sense of the proprieties of religion, and who, if they consistently follow up their own line of argument, must class Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and indeed all those whose powers have been of that high order which only the highest themes could expand, as so many delegates of Satan mysteriously permitted to entrap man to his fall through his loftiest instincts of beauty and reverence—as if, alas! he had not enough to ruin him without that. For those who forge the temptation are the real foes. There is no reasoning with those who think it wrong to be edified except when in actual worship, and wicked to praise God in any music but such as is ordinary enough for the whole congregation to join in. Human nature is a strange thing—never a greater puzzle perhaps than when it conscientiously abjures one of the few pure pleasures with which the hands of virtue are strengthened here below.

Musical Sounds versus Noise.

It is a curious fact in the history of sound, that the loudest noises always perish on the spot where they are produced, whereas musical notes will be heard at a great distance. Thus, if we approach within a mile or two of a town or village, in which a fair is held, we may hear very faintly the clamor of the multitudes, but more distinctly the drums and other musical instruments which are played for their amusement. If a Cremona violin, a real Amati, be played by the side of a common fiddle, the latter will sound much the louder of the two; but the sweet, brilliant tone of the Amati will be heard at a distance the other cannot reach. Dr. Young, on the authority of Derham, states that at Gibraltar, the human voice may be heard at the distance of ten miles. It is a well known fact that the human voice can be heard at a greater distance than that of any other animal.

Thus, when the cottager in the woods, or in the open plain, wishes to call her husband, who is working at a distance, she does not shout, but pitches her voice to a musical key, and by that means reaches the ear. The roar of the largest lion could not penetrate so far. "This property of music in the human voice" says the author, "is strikingly shown in the cathedrals abroad. Here the mass is performed entirely by musical sounds, and becomes audible to every devotee, however placed in the remotest part of the church; whereas if the mass had been read, it would not have travelled beyond the precincts of the choir." Those orators who are heard in large assemblies, most distinctly, and at the greatest distance, are those who by moulding the voice, can render it most musical. Loud speakers are seldom heard to advantage.

Burke's voice is said to have been a lofty cry, which tended as much as the formality of his discourse, in the House of Commons, to send the members to their dinner. Chatham's lowest whisper was distinctly heard. His middle tones were sweet, rich, and beautifully varied. Says a writer describing the orator;—"when he raised his voice to a high pitch, the house was filled and the effect was awful, except when he wished to cheer or animate—and then he had spirit-stirring notes, which were perfectly irresistible."

St. George's Hall, Bradford.

The New Music Hall in Bradford has been inaugurated. It was commenced in September 1851, from the designs of Messrs. Lockwood and Mawson, and has cost, we understand, £13,000. The following official account of it has been forwarded to us. The external walls and columns are of Yorkshire stone:—

The front or western elevation is 75 feet in height from the ground to the apex of the pediment, and is composed of a rusticated basement, 27 feet high, surmounted with Corinthian columns and pilasters, which support the entablature. The principal entrance is by three arched doorways, with folding doors on the basement of this facade. On each side are niches containing bronze candelabra. The centres of the arches over the doorways are enriched with masks executed by Yorkshire artists. The lower parts of the intercolumniations are occupied by windows 14 feet high, and the upper with circular shields in stone, bordered with wreaths of oak leaves. The south side elevation consists of a rusticated basement story, with deeply recessed windows, between which are elaborately carved festoons of fruit and flowers. Above this story are Corinthian columns and pilasters, supporting an unbroken entablature the whole length of the building. The intercolumniations are filled with eight arched windows, 14 feet high. The entrance leads into a vestibule, 46 by 25 feet, and 22 feet in height. From the centre of the floor springs the grand staircase, branching off to the right and left, and terminating in the gallery on each side leading to the stalls and area. At the foot of the staircase on either side are bronzed candelabra, 12 feet high, with nine branches to each. The hall itself is 152 feet in length, 76 feet in breadth, and 54 feet high. It is divided into area, stalls, and gallery. The first is 96 by 45 feet, and will accommodate 1,000 persons with seats. The stalls are raised 12 feet above the area, and contain 550 seats. The front of the stalls is ornamented with foliated scroll work, executed in Carton Pierre: in the centre of each scroll are two emblematic figures in alto relievo. The gallery is carried round three sides of the building, and contains 1,800 seats. The hall is thus calculated to hold an audience of 3,350 persons. The eastern or orchestral end is semi-circular, with a diameter of 50 feet: on either side of the organ are Corinthian pilasters springing from the orchestra and supporting the entablature. A space of 6 feet from the cornice to the ceiling is coved and divided into panels enriched with a deep border of vine and ivy leaves, fruit, and flowers. Around the ceiling runs a border of the same character. The ceiling itself is divided into four compartments by an inner border of scroll work, with central ornaments of water leaves and flowers. The hall is lighted by sixteen arched windows, 14 feet high. The method of lighting it in the evening is by a continuous line of 1,800 gas-jets from pipes carried entirely round the hall on the upper surface of the cornice (as in the Liverpool-hall.) The ventilation is effected by circular apertures 7 inches in diameter, pierced through the exterior moulding of the outer border of the ceiling, continued entirely round the four sides of the latter, and giving a ventilating surface equal to a superficial area of 130 square feet. The heating is by the usual hot water apparatus. Separate entries are provided for each class of the audience. On a level with the stalls are refreshment and cloak-rooms—the former 45 by 25 feet, for the accommodation of the occupants of that portion of the hall; and a similar arrangement has been made for those of the area.—The Builder, (London.)

A LONDON EISTEDDVOD.—The Cambro-Londoners have been discussing the feasibility of holding a Grand National Eisteddvod in London, in the spring of 1855; such Eisteddvod to partake more of the character of a national exhibition than a mere bardic festival; its object being not only to cultivate the literature and music of the principality, but also to develop the energies of its inhabitants in improvements in agricultural husbandry, mechanical skill, and manufacturing productions, to foster a taste for artistic and scientific pursuits, and to encourage all efforts at mental and manual cultivation and progress, as well as to display before the public such specimens of ancient and modern sculpture carvings, paintings, implements, manufactures, and mineral productions as may be sent up for exhibition. Judges will decide on the merits of the different productions, and award prizes, &c., according to the plan adopted by the Council of the exhibition of 1851.

Mozart and Haydn.

The first representations of "Don Giovanni" were not very well received at Vienna. Its merits were one day discussed at a large assembly, where most of the connoisseurs of the capital were assembled, and amongst others, Haydn; Mozart not being himself present. Everybody agreed in considering it a work of great merit, brilliancy, and richness of imagination; but each found something to blame. All had given their opinion, with the exception of Haydn. At length they begged he would do so likewise. "I am not capable of judging in this dispute," he replied with his usual modesty; "all that I know is, that Mozart is certainly the greatest composer now in existence."

Mozart acted at all times with the same generosity towards Haydn. A composer of Vienna of some merit, but who could not in any way perceive or appreciate the beauties of Haydn, enjoyed a spiteful pleasure in discovering every trifling incorrectness which crept into the compositions of that great master. He perpetually came to Mozart with the greatest glee, to display any symphony or quatuor of Haydn, in which, after having put it into score, he had discovered some little negligence of style. Mozart always endeavored to change the subject of conversation; his patience at length being totally exhausted, "Sir," he replied one day in rather an abrupt manner, "if you and I were melted down together, we should not even then make one Haydn." Mozart also dedicated a work of quatuors to Haydn, which may be looked upon as the best he ever produced in this style. He observed, that this dedication was due to him, as it was from Haydn he first learnt this species of composition.

THE HEAVENLY SHEPHERD.

BY THE LATE MRS. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

When on my ear your loss was knelled,
And tender sympathy upburst,
A little rill from memory swelled,
Which once had soothed my bitter thirst.

And I was fain to bear to you
Some portion of its mild relief,
That it might be a healing dew
To steal some fever from your grief.

After our child's untroubled breath
Up to the Father took its way,
And on our house the shade of death,
Like a long twilight, haunting lay,

And friends came round with us to weep
Her little spirit's swift remove:
This story of the Alpine sheep
Was told to us by one we love.

They, in the valley's sheltered care,
Soon crop the meadow's tender prime,
And when the sod grows brown and bare,
The shepherd strives to make them climb

To airy shelves of pastures green,
That hang around the mountain's side,
Whose grass and flowers together lean,
And down through mists the sunbeams slide.

But naught can tempt the timid things
That steep and rugged path to try,
Though sweet the shepherd calls and sings,
And seared below the pastures lie.

Till in his arms their lambs he takes,
Along the dizzy verge to go;
Then, heedless of the rifts and breaks,
They follow on, o'er rock and snow.

And in those pastures lifted fair,
More dewy soft than lowland mead,
The shepherd drops his tender care,
And sheep and lambs together feed.

This parable, by nature breathed,
Blew on me, as the south-wind free,
O'er frozen brooks that float unheathed
From icy thralldom to the sea.

A blissful vision through the night
Would all my happy senses sway,
Of the good shepherd on the height,
Or climbing o'er the starry way,

Holding our little lamb asleep:
And like the burthen of the sea,
Sounded that voice along the deep,
Saying, "Arise and follow me!"

ROUSSEAU remarks, "How mortifying the reflection to a composer of genius, that all his skill in imparting animation to his work is useless, unless the fire that glows there be transmitted to the soul of the artist by whom it is executed. The singer, who sees nothing but the notes of his part, can be but ill prepared to catch the spirit of the composer, or impart a proper expression to what he sings, unless he is perfectly master of the sentiment and character of the piece he executes. We cannot convey to others the sense of what we read, unless we ourselves understand it; nor is it enough to have a general conception of the force of languages in which we speak; our feeling in this respect must be comprehensive, intelligent, and active. The true singer will act in the same manner as if he were, at one and the same time, poet, composer, and performer.

MR. EDITOR:—Some hastily written remarks upon your criticism of Gottschalk, in the Traveller, having been reprinted in your paper, allow me to correct a verbal error in them. Subordinate was the word intended instead of "subservient." The writer was perfectly aware that in the fine duet played at the second concert, the composer had given the principal part in some places to the bass, but was rather surprised that a pianist of such celebrity should have chosen a piece of music not particularly calculated to show his great power over the instrument, and that having chosen it, he should have rendered his part so truly and modestly; our preconceived ideas of Gottschalk being of one belonging entirely to the "display school," a dashing, bravura player.

We have, according to your advice, re-read the criticism and find that you gave very full and discriminating praise to Gottschalk's touch and execution; but why, after the young and petted artist had bowed so meekly to the decision of the Boston public, expressed in the Journal, that his compositions were not admired, had given Beethoven, Onslow and Liszt, had proved that he possessed the true Promethean spark, with which he could not only light his dazzling "pyrotechnics," but could warm into life a brilliant, steady flame, why not give him unqualified praise?

"King" and "throne" may not be republican terms; let the editor choose any others, but let him give him the chief place, and allow that he is the first pianist who has been amongst us. If the editor think his feeling for music and true expression as great as his execution, he cannot refuse it to him. He must no longer speak of his being "great of his kind," he must without reservation be called a—the great pianist.

We do not regret this passage of arms.

Candid editors cannot wield the thunderbolts of criticism and hope always to stand so high that no lightning shall ever scorch them. We are proud of our Boston Journal, and therefore desirous that good taste and justice should never be wanting—we admire its independent tone, and take great pleasure in expressing our unqualified approbation of an article published a short time since, entitled—"The relation of the Press to Artists and their Agents;" a subject which required the fearless handling it met with. And so in all courtesy we take our leave.

From my Diary. No. XXXI.

Nov. 17. [On board Steamer Connecticut.] Signal for supper!

Diarist loquitor.—Thank Heaven, that there is a rebellion in China!—hope the race will be exterminated—in fact two races ought to be—the Chinese for inventing gongs, and the Americans for introducing the abomination into their hotels and steamboats. If the Israelites had had them, they would have saved three days' time, at least, at Jericho.—So, here's hoping the immediate destruction of the makers of, and bangers upon, gongs! May the fate of the Kilkenny cats overtake Chinese manufacturers and Yankee landlords! [At this point of the soliloquy three good old ladies look shocked, and Diarist tacet.]

The only reasonable theory for the introduction of this horrid combination of all that is inharmonious and excruciating in the domain of sound into our hotels and steamboats, that I could ever form, is one founded upon the supposed rapacity of Bonifaces, as upon its first introduction it must have saved something like 70 odd per centum of the substances, flesh, fowl and vegetable in the larder. For how could—in days when gongs were a new thing, and the nerves had not yet become habituated to the infliction—how could a house full of boarders at Saratoga or Newport, or the cabin company of a Sound or North River boat, possess the power of eating, with every fibre on a tremble, the drums of the ear cracking, the very depths of the stomach stirred up, by the awful crash which had disturbed their morning slumbers, and which had announced the arrival of "feeding time,"—as if the company were composed of emigrants from the bears' and lions' dens in Regent's Park? The more I reflect upon it, the more I am convinced, that the use of gongs came in about the time when Bonifaces became rapacious, and limited feeding time to twenty minutes. Familiarity breeds contempt, I have heard. It has already proved so in this matter. For the effect of gongs now is entirely different. They have lost their terrors, and only beget a wolfish wrath and general stirring up of all the combativeness of man's nature, until the dinner table is no longer a place for the harmless gratification of a healthy appetite and for the pleasures of social intercourse, but an arena for vengeance. Not being able to take personal revenge upon the landlord or captain, the wrathful traveller sweeps the table as with the besom of destruction. It is a gratification to know that the gong is now discarded in many of our best hotels. The best hotel by all odds I found in three months' travel, last summer, was the National at Detroit. One could sink to rest there with no fears of being waked in the morning by the crack of doom and the crash of worlds shot madly from their spheres: and at dinner hour, though the gong was heard, it roared you gently, like a sucking dove.—Nevertheless, better, no gong.

By a careful generalization from the minute observations made during some thousands of miles of travel, I come to this result, and would record it for the benefit of generations yet unborn—also for the present. The louder and more obstreperous the gong, the worse the table—the two are invariably in an inverse ratio—when x (the gong) = infinity, a, b, c , (flesh, fowl and vegetables) = 0.

Out of Uncle-Sam-dom these horrors are unknown. In the "Art Chambers," a suite of apartments away up in the North-east corner of the royal palace at Berlin, where priceless treasures of art are kept, there is quite a museum of American, Indian, African and other curiosities. Among them a chamber is devoted to Chinese matters. And here the servant when showing parties about, as a climax to the whole exhibition, used to give a specimen of gong music. To the Germans it was truly a climax, but what horror was depicted upon the countenances of American visitors, as awful recollections of hotels at home came rushing upon their memories!

It has struck me that in the case of certain preachers, whose fundamental principle of action is "knowing the terrors of the Law, we persuade men," the services should begin with a band of about four gongs—human nature could hardly bear more.

As a musical instrument for our military bands, as at present constituted, I think the gong stands preëminent. It would make probably about as much noise as seven and a half drums, and that too with an application of not more than three donkey power. A hint to try it is given gratis.

Joking apart, when Samson had such a run in Boston (I refer to the oratorio, not to the man) seven or eight years ago, I always thought the introduction of the gong into the chorus "Weep, Israel, weep," a master stroke; it imparted an awful sublimity to the music, which affected me more and more with each repetition. I can never forget how its unearthly tones used to rise and swell, until they seemed to pervade chorus and orchestra, imparting to that saddest of all sad music, a wild and wierd grandeur almost awful in degree. Query—How would it sound to me now?

The same instrument used also to impart a certain kind of terror, when the temple of the Philistines was supposed to be tumbling about their ears, as was plainly evident to any one who watched the audience.

BOSTON, NOV. 26, 1853.

"Pupils of Liszt and Mendelssohn."

Formerly the virtuosos, who came over from Europe to astonish us and conjure the dollars out of our pockets and the souls out of our bodies, as we sat listening with open mouths, announced themselves with courtly titles. "Pianist to the Emperor of all the Russias;" "First Violinist to her Royal Highness, the Princess So-and-So;" "Flutist to the Grand Duke of Weiss-nicht-wo," &c., &c. That was the style of the flaming placards by which the magicians had it all their own way with us, before we knew such from artists. The latter naturally came after, as astronomers came after the astrologists. Now-a-days they try the virtue of artistic titles, and call themselves pupils of such and such great masters. We have many times felt moved to say a word in exposition of this sort of humbug, and we are glad at last to do it with authority, and in the words of one who personally knows the things whereof he here affirms. The following is sincere, well-meant and from a source perfectly well informed.

MR. EDITOR:—Many of the Piano-performers, recently arrived from Europe, and making their first appearance before the publics of New York and Boston, have announced themselves as "Pupils" of Liszt, Thalberg, or Mendelssohn. To prevent erroneous impressions in regard to such pupil-ship, we feel ourselves obliged to make some statements, which are based on personal knowledge.

Neither Mendelssohn nor Liszt ever gave private lessons on the piano, as professors generally do. Their time was too precious and their minds too much engrossed in their higher vocation in Art, to allow of their undertaking the common task of professors of the piano, who at certain hours, and during a fixed number of minutes, are condemned to undergo the pleasure of correcting wrong notes, bad fingering and unmusical phrasing; besides that their position in life spared them the necessity of this sort of business.

Mendelssohn, however, had taken charge of teaching the upper classes of the Leipzig Conservatoire. The institution contained in all about sixty pupils; and if everybody who received a share of his instruction, which was given only a few times a week, is entitled to call himself "pupil of Mendelssohn," we may have a chance of hearing some very inferior pupils of that great master. Mendelssohn was always ready to assist anybody in the development of his talent, by examining and correcting his compositions, as well as by listening to a piano-forte performance, provided that he took sufficient interest in the person, and that the latter proved himself industrious; but such advising and instructing never took place in the form of regular lessons.

If there are pupils of Mendelssohn, they are the following: STERDALE BENNETT, CHARLES HORSLEY, CARL ECKERT, and a less known one, KUFERATH. Their music bears (only too much!) the stamp of Mendelssohnian expression, and they worked under his immediate influence.

MR. GÖCKEL, who should properly announce himself a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatoire, instead of one of Mendelssohn, was, at the time referred to, one of the most promising scholars, who distinguished himself by his remarkable piano-forte execution, and a certain boldness at the instrument, which contrasted queerly with his juvenile form. Since then he surely has become not only a most clever, but a still more brilliant player. Yet we doubt very strongly whether his teacher, Mendelssohn, would have been pleased with his Polichinelle, as much as a portion of our Boston Music Hall public, who are always ready to encore some trash, provided that it is very bad, or that the big drum makes plenty of noise. We doubt, too, very seriously whether such a manner as Mr. Gockel exhibited at the instrument would have gained the approbation of his teachers in Leipzig. Striking chords from a distance of several feet from the keyboard, and whipping the air by the most audacious evolutions of the hands, are some of the astonishing tricks of Leopold de Meyer and of Gottschalk; and to cramp the hands in the most affected manner (representing sentiment or gracefulness), when lifting them, is a practice which the "pupil of Mendelssohn" never witnessed in his master.

In regard to Liszt, we think that among the many who choose to recommend themselves by proclaiming that they made their studies under him, (some of them having, perhaps, really played a piece or two to him,) there are not two whom Liszt would be particularly proud to claim as his pupils. Other "pupils" of his have never spoken, much less played, to him; yet as soon as they reach the American shore they become "pupils of Liszt." Exempla sunt odiosa. At this present moment there is another "pupil," giving concerts in New York, a lady, who announces herself as "the only artist who can number among her teachers those distinguished masters, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Prudent and Thalberg." That beats all previous self-recommendations of the kind.

If the public are imposed upon by such humbug, they are no less mistaken when they attach too much value to another favorite expression in musical advertisements. We mean: "Just arrived from Germany," and "Having studied in the high German School." As the good is always more scarce than the bad, Germany numbers also many more bad than good musicians; and, unfortunately, she likes to send the worst ones over to America and keep the best herself! Musical instruction in Germany is even cheaper than in Boston; everybody can obtain it in any quantity; but not everybody who has visited Germany, or been educated there, is for that reason an excellent musician. Beware of the "pupils," and do not wrong Germany and her "high school" by making them accountable, if those, recently arrived from there, should not prove worthy of her. o.

Third Germania Concert.

Saturday evening saw the Music Hall filled with the largest, and happiest audience of the season. And truly we may say, that never has any symphony performance more completely met our mood, and sunk into our soul so comfortingly, as that night's rendering of the fourth symphony (in B flat) of Beethoven. Allowing everything for subjective accident or predisposition, it was still clear that our pleasure was due, first to that lovely tone-creation itself, and secondly to the admirable manner in which the Germanians played it. The Adagio, introductory to the Allegro, so profoundly melancholy, so full of love-sick pensiveness and tenderness, was rendered with a delicacy and truth of expression that made one from the first note sure of a good symphony, and enlisted every feeling for a full appreciation of the whole. The promise was fully sustained in the impassioned outburst of the Allegro. What dreams of happiness! what eager clasping for them! crossed continually on the brightest verge of triumph by the cold shadow of Fate! But the same quenchless ardor of fidelity to a deep, ideal, spiritual sentiment, which pervades the song of "Adelaide," seems to inspire this whole Allegro. The glees and glooms, the heaven-climbing hopes and the heart-sinkings of an immortal love, are the lights and shades that checker this exquisitely woven, warmly colored web of harmony. The uncontrollable fire and restlessness of the Allegro, is subdued in the Adagio to the sweetest, and most resigned and spiritually sustained mood of melancholy. Over a ground-work of accompaniment, in which a little sobbing phrase is continually kept up, flows the loveliest and most consoling melody; but when this melody ceases upon the ear, and lingers only in the mind, the little accompanying phrase still throbs in drum beats, like the heart palpitating a few times yet with the old habit of a sorrow that has already yielded to higher thoughts and influences. There is something so human and so heavenly in this Adagio that all audiences appear to feel it. This, as also the resolute, finely imaginative minuet and trio, and the rejoicing finale, were equally well played. Indeed we know not when we have ever heard the beauty of any symphony so fully and admirably brought out. To have heard the whole immediately repeated, would have made the richest and most satisfying concert for us, and we doubt not for many more.

The Andantino, which forms the second part of Mendelssohn's Symphony Cantata, "Song of Praise," has long been a favorite with our public. How different its charm, and yet how finely unique! How Hebrew, and Psalms-of-David-like, from the first phrase! Simply, sweetly trusting, devout, penitential; and what an invigorating mountain air of purity and moral strength one feels in that spirited and crackling episode from the brass instruments!

The Scherzo, by Robert Schumann, belongs to a piece in rather a singular form, entitled "Overture, Scherzo and Finale,"—something between an overture and a symphony. It would have been more effective at some time when it could have been given in its connection with the other movements and have occupied a more prominent place in a programme. As it was, it was interesting to those who lent their minds and ears to it.

The Overture to "Rienzi," one of Wagner's early operas, would by no means have tended to remove any prepossessions against the bold innovator's style, if we had not first heard him under the more favorable and developed form of Tannhäuser. Opening with quiet, solemn beauty; starting some bold and interesting ideas, but soon leaving them; with now and then a fitful gleam of rare power and originality, and with much brilliant instrumentation, it degenerates in the last half into such mere common place, (the German word for mere is lauter, which means also loud!) that all the ear-splitting fortissimo of drums and trombones cannot save it. Jullien would certainly be delighted with it. Yet it is historically, or biographically interesting, (to one whose nerves are strong enough) as containing marks of power indicative of the Wagner that was to be. That noisy, firemen's parade sort of a finale, however, mightily stirred the clapping portion of the audience, as clap-trap usually does, and had to be repeated. It was strange, incredible, on recovering from the stunned state, to think that only an hour before, in that same place and company, we had been listening to the fourth Symphony! It was like remembering Keat's "Endymion" in the midst of a hoarse and savage political street shouting on the evening of an election.

The Romanza from Halevy's L'Eclair is a pretty piece of sweetness, just fitted to be popular with the youthful flirtation and confectonary age, and was nicely dialogized by the horn and flute of Messrs. KUESTENMACHER and ZERRAHN. Mlle. PINTARD sang the Brindisi from Lucrezia, and a bravura air from Roberto Devereux, with purity of tone and a style which only lacked a little inspiration and magnetism to save it from criticism. Rossini's overture to Semiramide, finely performed, made a brilliant and appetitive finale to the entertainment.

At the Germania Rehearsal last week, Mozart's great symphony in C, with the heavenly Adagio, and the quadruple-fugue finale, was so boldly and clearly brought out as to rivet the attention even of many of the lightest and youngest portion of the audience. At the Rehearsal this week, instead of a symphony, much of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music was given, with the overture to Leonore, a fine march by Franz Schubert, and a good assortment of those waltzes, polkas, &c., which many are so fond of hearing.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

The fifth season of these earnest and laudable attempts to create a permanent audience and supply of Classical Chamber music in our city, opened with an unusually large assembly of listeners on Tuesday evening, in the smaller hall, or chapel, of the new Tremont Temple. The programme, as a whole, we must confess, hardly realized our expectations. Much of it was of a very high order and deeply enjoyed; but some of the pieces failed to awaken any very positive sensation, which, considering their length, and the fact that these pieces formed the first half of the concert, and so left the mind weary and the nerves not strained up to the liveliest pitch for the really good things that came after, was unfortunate.

It is well sometimes to hear what quartet and quintet writers of the second or third rank, or what those, who by any sort of peculiarity have acquired fame abroad, have written, that by the comparison we may the more fully appreciate the standard works. With this view we could have had no objection to the "Fifth Quintet, in A, op. 29," by Veit, an official, we believe, at Prague, who has acquired some note by amateur attempts at composition in this kind. The Andante and Allegro seemed common-place, and feeble in ideas, lacking point and inspiration. The Adagio was interesting in passages, had more of contrast, and showed more of romantic sensibility than of real creative imagination; its thoughts did not seem to develop by a vital process out of one first germ, but rather to be added and pieced on. The Allegretto, which is styled Mährchen, or Fairy Tale, was captivating to most of the audience by its touch of romance and of nationality, and indeed was verily gracefully and prettily conceived; but after Mendelssohn, Schumann, and so many others, (Old School and New School) in Germany, who have cultivated that attractive vein, it would not be called remarkable. Yet it would be unjust to deny a pervading gracefulness of style, and many occasional passages of beauty, in this quintet; but the Quintette Club have taught us to measure such things by the highest standards.

This was followed by a Trio for piano, violin and cello, (in B flat, No. 3) of Mozart, played by F. F. MÜLLER, RHA and WULF FRIES. It is one of the more light, simple and level efforts of Mozart's always clear and graceful style; not striking enough to make impression immediately after that long Quintet. Mr. Müller gave an honest, straight-forward, musician-like reading of his part; but the habit of the organist was betrayed in his touch, which did not always give a graceful finish to running passages, and failed to bring out such tone as we have been wont to hear from that Chickering grand piano, the hero of last winter's concerts. Perhaps the instrument itself had been exposed to tone-benumbing influences. The string parts were unexceptionably rendered.

Part Second contained three pieces, all good. The violin Concerto of Beethoven, one of the splendid compositions of his second period, was performed (the first movement) with merely a quartet and piano accompaniment; but even this was full of fire and grandeur, stamping itself, as Beethoven's works always do, by the intrinsic might of their ideas. Mr. AUGUST FRIES achieved the very difficult task of the violinist with heroic hardihood. The number of violinists who could execute such a task with any sort of success must be indeed quite limited. Mr. Fries has gained greatly in the mastery of difficulties; but we cannot say that it always amounts quite to a graceful mastery: the hard places seem a little too anxiously anticipated and then carried by storm; and we are forced reluctantly to confess that the energy and bravery of the onset, in the forte passages, is sometimes at the expense of smooth and musical quality of tone,—a little "scratchy," as they say,—with now and then an overstraining of the pitch in very high notes. Habits of this sort seem to cling constitutionally, or else mysteriously, to certain artists, in spite of very great excellencies; and we are compelled to mention them to prove our general praise sincere; besides that it is our duty to the artist at all times to offer him as nearly as we can a faithful test of the present, by which he may calculate a future, trial. As it was, we should be happy if everybody enjoyed that Concerto as much as we did.

ROBERT SCHUMANN'S Romanza for clarinet and piano, (op. 94.), by Messrs. RYAN and MÜLLER, is a charming, characteristic little melody, as clear and readily appreciable as anything could be on the first hearing. It was expressively rendered by Mr. Ryan; and we thank him for selecting a simple melody, that has character and meaning, for his solo, instead of those elaborate but empty variation pieces, which show the ambition more than the good sense, of solo-players.

The greatest and finest of all the novelties of an evening, in which everything was new, was the fifth Quartet of Mendelssohn (no. 3 of op. 44, in E flat.) We shall not attempt to characterize it until we shall have heard it more; which we trust we shall do in a better relative position among other pieces in a programme; for, beautiful, original, profound in thought and feeling, lovely, as it was, it came to late too make the half of its true impression on the audience at large. In general it was well performed, with the exception of the light and rapid triple movement of the Scherzo, in which some of the parts hitched hard to keep a common pace. Some nervousness in the performers, at their first concert in a new place, in new music, and before an audience larger and more exacting, and perhaps more unreasonable in its expectations, than ever, was visible and very natural. By the next concert we shall have established easy and familiar relations again all round, and all, we doubt not, will go well and satisfactorily. The Quintette Club have earned the right to the largest sympathy and encouragement, as well as to the most frank and friendly plain speaking.

Camilla Urso.

The newspapers announce a second concert of this charming little violinist, at the Boston Music Hall, this afternoon. It is well timed, and if there be any gratitude in audiences, especially in the parents of thousands of children whom Camilla's violin made happy last year, or any constancy in sweet impressions, there will be a crowd this afternoon to make up for the painfully empty house at her evening concert last week. This time she will have the assistance of the same artists she had then.

We heard but the first half of that concert, including one of Camilla's very difficult solos, which she executed with all the largeness and purity of tone, and finished style of an accomplished artist.

Mr. GÖCKEL, a German pianist, who has made some mark during the past season in New York, exhibited a remarkable power of bravura execution, with great brilliancy of touch and neatness and clearness in all his passages, in the performance of the latter half of Weber's Concert-Stück, entirely unaccompanied. Of course the music could not tell for its full worth, without orchestra, but it displayed pianist and piano to great advantage. Signora CAROLINA VERTIPRACH, known in Havana Opera Company times as CAROLINA VIETTI, sang some operatic selections with that powerful contralto of hers, which seems almost preternaturally strong in its lowest tones, with a great deal of execution, but rather an overstrained pathos.

Signor RODOLFO, (which we take to be the Italian of Herr Rudolf), displayed a very rich baritone voice and considerable style in Vi ravviso from the "Somnambula."

HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY.—Our time-honored Oratorio Society commence their series of six performances to-morrow evening, with "Samson." HANDEL's music to MILTON's words! "Samson" has always been a favorite with Boston audiences; and this time it will have the advantage of our best local singers, with the GERMANIANS for orchestra, BERGMANN for conductor, and MÜLLER for organist. An oratorio of Handel in the Boston Music Hall is a delight and edification worth walking some miles for.

OTTO DRESEL'S First Soirée is fixed for next Wednesday evening. Musical enjoyment, more select and unalloyed is hardly to be found elsewhere. Mr. BERGMANN is to play with him a piano and violoncello Sonata of Beethoven. There will be a Trio of Mendelssohn, and the Piano Quartet of Schumann; also smaller piano pieces by Bach, Mendelssohn and Chopin. Mr. Dresel proposes Tuesday for his regular evening; but this time circumstances compelled a change.

The CLASSICAL MATINEES of Messrs. PERABEAU, ECKHARDT, KEYZER, SCHLIMPER and MAASS, will commence at 3½ P. M. The programme, it will be seen by the advertisement, is very rich, including a Quartet and a Horn Sonata by Beethoven, a Quintet by Hummel, a Chorale on the organ, &c., &c.

THE MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY have completed their arrangements for the Oratorio, "The Messiah," on Christmas night. The following combination of talent is secured:

Conductor, C. BERGMANN;—Organist, L. H. SOUTHARD;—Orchestra, The GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY;—Soli—Soprano, Miss ANNA STONE and Mrs. E. A. WENTWORTH;—Contralto—Miss SARAH HUMPHREY;—Tenor—Mr. S. B. BALL;—Bass—Mr. F. MEYER.

The novelties to be introduced are: the rendering of the Recitative, Comfort ye my people, and the Air, Every valley shall be exalted, by a Soprano voice (Miss STONE) instead of a tenor, as usual; and the first appearance here of Mr. F. MEYER, in the Bass rôle. The change from tenor to soprano is not without precedents of the highest authority in England. Mr. Meyer's standing as an artist gives promise that the exceedingly arduous bass rôle will be given in a style superior to any effort we have had in the part for many years in this city. *

We commend the attention of our readers to the card of Mr. ADOLPH KIELBLOCK, who offers his services as a teacher of music in our city. He has been a favorite pupil of the Berlin professor, MARX, and for the past two years has taught very successfully in New Bedford. A friend there, in whose judgment we have all confidence, writes us:

"In every respect he is a gentleman, of refined taste and manners—a polished musician and a good instructor. I can vouch for the excellence of his instruction in the case of a private musical club, to which he imparted the genuine German touch and flavor."

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The first Concert of the twelfth season takes place this evening at Metropolitan Hall. Conductor of Orchestra, Mr. T. Eisfeld. The increasing patronage for the Classical Concerts of this Society has obliged them to secure a larger room; and in accordance with the request of many members, they will in future produce two Symphonies at each Concert. The Orchestra is augmented to eighty performers. The principal orchestra pieces to be performed are as follows: Symphony, "The Seasons" by Spohr, (first time;) Overture, "King Lear," Berlioz; and "Vampyre," Marschner. The following eminent artists have volunteered their services: Mrs. Emma Gillingham Bostwick, Mr. Aptommas, Harpist, (late from London,) and Mr. Hahn, Violinist, (his first appearance.) Terms: Subscribing members, $10 per year, three tickets to each Concert; associate, $5; and professional members, $3 per year, one ticket to the public rehearsals and Concerts; members can procure extra tickets at $1 each; tickets to non-subscribers $1.50 each.

An arrangement has just been made between the New York Sacred Harmonic Society and M. Jullien and his company, by which Handel's Messiah will be performed by the entire vocal and instrumental force of both parties on Christmas night, December 26.

Madame Sontag will go immediately to Boston, and then come here to give a series of concerts with efficient coadjutors.

The Prophète is postponed until Friday, at Niblo's, to give extra rehearsals.

JULLIEN has succeeded at Philadelphia, and proceeded to Baltimore.

IN PRESS...WILL BE READY DECEMBER 1st,

CARHART'S MELODEON INSTRUCTOR:

Presenting, in a series of nearly Two Hundred Popular Studies, a complete and progressive method of practical instruction for the MELODEON, and REED INSTRUMENTS generally, together with a choice selection of the most admired Songs, Polkas, Marches, Waltzes, &c. &c. The above work, elegantly printed and bound, will take the lead of all Melodeon Instructors, being eminently adapted to the wants of the great mass of learners, and will be as universally popular as the instruments of the maker whose name it bears. Teachers and Scholars may depend upon this being just the book they want.

Dealers furnished on the most liberal terms. Copies sent by mail to any part of the United States or Canada upon the remittance of One Dollar to the publisher, OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington St.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,

ZUNDEL'S MELODEON INSTRUCTOR, IN SEVEN PARTS.

PART I.—Elements of Music. Part II.—Progressive Finger Exercises. Part III.—Airs, Marches, Waltzes, Variations, &c. Part IV.—Favorite Movements from Operas. Part V.—Voluntaries and Interludes. Part VI.—Selections from Oratorios. Part VII.—Modulations. By JOHN ZUNDEL, Organist of St. George's (Dr. Tyng's) Church, New York, Author of "Two Hundred and Fifty Voluntaries and Interludes," "The Amateur Organist," &c.

This is the most comprehensive, thorough and complete work of the kind ever issued, forming a very extensive collection of the choicest music, as well as a self-instructor for the instrument. Most of the Melodeon instructors heretofore published, have been mere compilations from Piano Books. This Work is emphatically a Melodeon book, every piece in it being arranged with especial adaptation to that instrument. It contains 144 pages folio, and is gotten up in elegant style, with cuts representing positions of the body, hands, &c. Any one realising us two dollars, can have a copy of the work sent him by mail, post-paid. It is better to order it through a dealer, however, as so large a book is liable to injury in going by mail. A NEW GLEE BOOK,

By I. B. WOODBURY, Author of the Dulcimer, etc

W. J. REYNOLDS & CO.

PUBLISH THIS DAY

THE COLUMBIAN GLEE BOOK, Or, MUSIC FOR THE MILLION, IN THREE PARTS.

Part 1. Comprising the largest number Of Choice Gleees, Quartettes, Trios, Songs, Opera Choruses, &c., ever published in one collection.

Part 2. Consisting of Sacred Anthems, Choruses, Quartettes, &c., for Select Societies and Concerts.

Part 3. Containing most of the old popular Continental Psalm Tunes, thus making the most complete collection in all its features ever published.

Extract from the Preface:—"Here may be found Gleees, Quartettes, Trios and Songs suited to all occasions. If merry, here are pieces that will add to merriment; if sad, harmonies that will soothe sadness; if longings for home fill the mind, the dear scenes that cluster there are painted in many a song."

The publishers believe that the COLUMBIAN GLEE BOOK will be the most popular of any of the works of Mr. Woodbury, whose celebrity as an author is best attested by the fact that upwards of a quarter of a million of copies of his different books have been sold within a few years.

HAVING removed from his former location in Washington Street, and fitted up Warerooms in the above named beautiful building, is now prepared to attend upon such of his friends and the public as may honor him with a call. His time for the past six months having been exclusively devoted in endeavors to render his manufacture more perfect than ever, he is confident of being able to fully satisfy all who are desirous of possessing a good instrument.

Residents in the vicinity and adjacent States will please notice particularly his address, as there is another person in this city bearing his name, and with whom he is frequently confounded.

Mr. C. flatters himself that his experience and reputation of thirty years, must convince all who anticipate purchasing, that this is the best testimonial that he can offer of the excellence of his Pianos, and of the satisfaction which has invariably been manifested with regard to all the qualities which constitute an unexceptionable instrument.

282 Washington Street, Boston.

MR. RICHARDSON has resided in Europe for the last five years, during which time he availed himself of the instruction of the most distinguished Teachers of Composition and the Piano-Forte, for the purpose of acquiring a thorough practical knowledge of MUSIC. While there, he became personally acquainted with all of the most celebrated publishers, and dealers in Music, and learned their peculiar methods of transacting business, with a view of establishing a Music Store in this city. Profiting by the knowledge acquired by visiting the Music Stores on the continent of Europe, as well as those in England, Mr. RICHARDSON formed a plan, differing from that of every other, and which he flatters himself possesses decided improvements over all.

In fitting up his Store, his object has been to make it an attractive resort for the Ladies, and the musical profession generally, and no expense has been spared towards rendering it every way worthy the patronage of the public,—and he trusts it will be the means of encouraging and improving the taste for Music among all classes.

The stock of Music comprises the most complete collection, of both Foreign and American, ever offered to the public. It was selected by the proprietor himself, and he has endeavored to avoid that which is not of an instructive character,—seeking rather to elevate the taste to the highest standard of Musical excellence. A Catalogue of the Music is being prepared, and will soon be issued.

All publications of this Store will be of a superior order, and got up in fine style. No pieces will be published that are not fully worthy of it,—and no compositions accepted for publication that are not worth paying for.

The above Music Store comprises two departments—American and Foreign. Mr. J. M. FOYE, who has had many years' experience in the business, in this city, will take charge of the American department; and Mons. A. HILL, from the celebrated publishing house of Brandus & Co., of Paris, will have charge of the Foreign department. And the Proprietor trusts, by devoting his whole attention to business, to receive a liberal share of patronage. Being in constant correspondence with many eminent Professors and Publishers of Music abroad, he will at all times be happy to give any information with regard to musical matters that may be in his power.

Foreign and American PIANO-FORTES and ORGANS, from the most celebrated manufacturers, constantly on hand. Also, some of the best specimens of large sized SWISS MUSIC BOXES that have ever been imported, may be seen at the Store.

PIANO-FORTES, of the best German, French, and American manufacture, selected and sent to any part of the United States, at the lowest Cash prices. Mr. R. will WARRANT every instrument he recommends, and will assume the whole responsibility of a safe arrival at the residence of the purchaser.

The largest and richest variety of OPERA GLASSES and FANS, of entirely new styles, ever offered by any other house in the United States, are ready for inspection. Also, French UMBRELLAS and CANES; those in want would do well to examine, before purchasing elsewhere.

LITHOGRAPHS, BUSTS, MEDALLIONS, and PORTRAITS, of the most distinguished Musicians and Composers,—as Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Chopin, Droyschok, Liszt, &c., always on hand.

Those desiring the services of good Teachers, in any of the different branches of Music, may learn their addresses and terms of Mr. Richardson, who will interest himself in such matters, without any partiality.

Mr. R. is a subscriber for all the Musical Journals published in England, France, Germany, Italy, and America, and they may always be found in the Saloon connected with his Store.

Foreigners will find themselves quite at home in this Store, as French and German, as well as English, will be spoken.

Tickets for the first class concerts may always be found at the Musical Exchange. Also subscriptions taken for the leading Musical papers published in Europe and America.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,

WAGNER'S "TANNHÄUSER."

BY FRANZ LISZT.

II. THE OVERTURE, (concluded.)

* * * * If we express ourselves at great length about this new opera of Wagner, it is because we cherish the conviction that this work carries in itself a principle of vitality and of glory, which will one day be universally recognized. The innovations which it contains, are drawn from the true powers of Art, and will justify themselves as acquisitions of genius.

Accordingly, in speaking of the overture, we may remark that one could not desire of a symphonic poem that it should be written more consistently with the rules of classical form, or that it should have a more perfect logic in the exposition, development and solution of its premises. Its arrangement is just as precise, at the same time that it is richer, than that of the best models in this kind.

The first sixteen bars lay the first half of the religious thema in E major, (See No. 1.) in the lowest register of the clarinets, horns and bassoons, making a cadence on the dominant. The second part is wonderfully modulated through the violoncello, to which the violins add themselves in the ninth measure, (See No. 2). The whole thema is then repeated fortissimo by the brass instruments in the same key, to a much more lively rhythm in eighth-triplets, continually accompanied by a descending diatonic figure in sixteenth-triplets. During the sixteen following bars the second half of the thema is modulated by the wind instruments to the same rhythm of triplets, mezzo forte, diminuendo and piano; but the figure in sixteenth-triplets, repeating itself only in every second measure, produces a decrease of the rhythm, corresponding to the decrease of power and fulness. The repetition of the whole, merely moderated in the first sixteen bars, forms the end of this introduction upon an inversion of the diminished seventh chord.

No. 1. ANDANTE MAESTOSO. ♩ = 50.

The Allegro begins with an indication of the alluring and voluptuous motive (a), immediately followed by a member of a rhythmical phrase (b) which serves it for an appendix, then develops itself completely in the overture, and only disappears in the religious thema again resumed as the finale. The motive, indicated at first, fully develops itself only some thirty bars later, with the figures which we have already mentioned, when we spoke of the character which Wagner has given to the temptation scene of the syrens.

This motive, underneath a tremolo of violins, is divided between the violas and clarinets, and turns off, after it has fully developed itself, into a transitional passage, whose crescendo serves as an electrical conductor to a bold melody upon the dominant (B major) and given out fortissimo by the whole orchestra:

It lasts through more than twenty bars and is crowned by an outburst of the little appendix phrase (b) gradually swelling up through three ascending chords, whose bacchic dissonance stuns both ear and mind. The foregoing figures are again resumed pianissimo until the appearance of a lovely melody in G major (afterwards in the opera itself assigned to Venus):

which is first given to the clarinet, is continued by one violin in the register of the highest harmonic tones, carried still farther through a fantastic arabesque of the voluptuous motive (traced out by the violas and thrown into half shadow, as it were, by a tremolo of the violins,) and then dies away in F sharp. It gives place to the transition phrase, which had introduced the melody in B, a plaintive scream, which, this time on the ground tone of F sharp, ends, through a chromatic progression, with the return of the same melody upon the tonic.

The Coda recalls the leading features of the commencement of the Allegro, and swells to a furious climax by a chromatic descent upon the ground-tone of B, which brings out the last repetition of the appendix phrase (b). At this moment, on the same dissonant chord which we have had before on the first entrance of the livelier tempo in 4 measure (E, G, A#, C#; but this time on the ground-tone of B), returns the well-known figure in sixteenths, with the religious theme again, which now with accelerating speed mounts through various inversions of this chord, without pause or intermission, and again descends de-crescendo through a chromatic scale, making a cadence on the tone of E. Thereupon the religious theme appears again in all its completeness through an accompanying figure (two 4 measures against one 3), and is borne along upon the tone-wave of this peculiarly impassioned figure, which rushes onward like a stream of fire. After sixty measures of this rhythm the theme begins again anew, anew increased (three 4 measures against one 3), with all the brass and other wind instruments setting in fortissimo. Thus the conclusion stands in perfect symmetrical relation with the introduction. This conclusion moreover centuples the effect of the introduction and reaches that sublime announcement of a thought and of the power of an art, by which masterpieces secure the admiration of centuries, by the rising of the theme in a form more gigantic than we have any example of in any analogous work, as well as by the altogether unusual hastening of the rhythm in the accompaniment.

Although we have already remarked that the composer of "Tannhäuser" has lent to the passions represented under the name of Venus a character in correspondence with that name so dear to the fair Grecian land, yet we repeat again that there is absolutely no necessity of knowing the opera, the adventures of the Ritter Tannhäuser and the myth of Dame Venus, so singularly transplanted into the Middle Age, in order to apprehend the musical drama in this overture. It is not merely a sort of gigantic prelude, to prepare the mind for the emotions of the play that is to follow; not a necessary introduction, a short and solemn prologue, limited to the office of enchainning the minds of the audience in the region of feelings, which are designed to occupy it. It is unlike those orchestral pieces, which, without containing a single motive of the opera, which they announce, or possibly repeating some few of them, always form a necessary complement to the whole, by transporting the feelings of the spectator into the scene and atmosphere of the play. . . . This overture is a poem upon the same subject with its opera, and quite as comprehensive as the opera. Out of the same thoughts Wagner has made two different works; and since each is intelligible, complete, and independent of the other, they may be taken separately without sacrificing any of the meaning of either. They are bound together by identity of feeling and expression, but for the very reason of this identity they do not need to be mutually explained. If we must quote fact and experience in confirmation of our assertion, we will only say, that we have had this overture brought out, and that it was received with the most enthusiastic admiration, without one of the musicians who performed, or of the public who applauded, having had the slightest knowledge either of the subject or the text of the opera. We cannot fear, therefore, that so much time will have to pass, as was necessary until Mozart's Quartets were no longer torn up by the musicians as unperformable, or until Beethoven's masterpieces were no longer treated as grotesque and absurd innovations, before this overture will belong to the repertoire of standard pieces, which will be long and repeatedly brought out by the great musical establishments.

We find a confirmation of our opinion that Wagner, in spite of his own theories, felt more impelled to create a symphonic work, than anxious to put a prologue to his drama, in his violation of the rules of acoustical perspective (if we may be pardoned the expression) by such an extended development of the motive, which is to be immediately resumed as the curtain rolls up. The laws of climax, so indispensable to scenic effects, would be utterly violated, (for what forzando is there left to be added to the crescendo already reached by the song of the syrens long before the play begins?) if the spectacle, the dance and the human voice did not conceal the difficulty; did not by their magic, their coöperation and their art lend a new stimulus to curiosity; did not enhance the stormy impetuosity of the orchestra; did not rescue the public from that need of repose, which those who are most excited feel the most, and revive again the well nigh exhausted interest, seeing that the last word of the tragedy, that is about to be represented, has already been so powerfully uttered.

In the next number we come to an analysis of the opera itself.

Sophie Cruvelli.

[The following, which we abridge from the London Musical World, shows how grave journalism in Paris watches the diplomacy of Grand Opera managers and prime donne, with almost as much gravity as that of the Metternichs, Palmerstons and Nesselrodes.]

Sophie Cruvelli has signed an engagement with the director of the Grand Opera in Paris for two years, on highly advantageous terms.

Fiorentino, in his feuilleton of the 8th inst. (Constitutionnel), the whole of which is devoted to the subject—twelve columns headed, "APPROPOS DE L'ENGAGEMENT DE M^{lle}. CRUVELLI,"—thus announces the important event:—

"M^{lle}. Sophie Cruvelli signed an engagement with the Opera at 5 o'clock P. M., on Saturday.

"As, in our opinion, the conditions of this engagement are equally honorable and advantageous to the theatre and to the artist, we see no reason why it should be made a mystery.

"M^{lle}. Cruvelli is engaged for two years at a salary of 100,000 francs (£4,000) yearly. She has the choice of parts, and four months leave of absence. She is to sing twice a week; and if, on any occasion, her services are demanded three times in the same week, 1,500 francs (£60) extra are guaranteed to her for this supplementary representation. The two first months of her leave of absence in the year 1855 (June and July, at the epoch of the intended Universal Exhibition) are bought up in advance by the management for 25,000 francs (£1,000) a month, which will give M^{lle}. Cruvelli, for the second year of her engagement, 150,000 francs (£6,000) besides two months for repose."

Fiorentino then enters into a long, ingenious, and eloquent defence of the very large terms which are granted now-a-days to the most celebrated singers.

Passing over seven columns, we can find room for the following:—

"The Opera has engaged M^{lle}. Cruvelli at very high terms, doubtless; but nobody denies that M^{lle}. Cruvelli was exactly the woman the Opera wanted.

"The young and beautiful artist unites to a voice of the utmost power and energy, and with the most extensive range of any now upon the stage, a rare dramatic talent, breadth of action, and dignified presence, nobleness in her attitudes, in fact, many of the qualities of Rachel. M^{lle}. Cruvelli will have two months of study to prepare for her début. She is sufficiently a musician to read at first sight the most difficult scores. Although born in Germany, she was at a very early age in one of the best schools at Paris; change of language, therefore, will not prove an obstacle to her. She will make her début in the month of January, most probably in Valentine. She will then sing in the Vestale, which, with such aid, can once more be put worthily on the stage. Alice, Rachel, Leonora, &c.—all the grand parts, in short, will follow, without prejudice to new ones which may be written for her. Imperishable masterpieces, which had worn out the admiration of the public, will thus be restored to youth; and at our first theatre we shall witness a series of brilliant soirées, and exceptional receipts.

"It is well known, that those who went last year to the Italian Theatre, went for Mdlle. Cruvelli only. In four months she sustained the whole burden of the repertoire, since Madame La Grange and M. Rossi only arrived at the end of the season. Surrounded by jealous mediocrities, who would hardly have been tolerated at a fair, exposed to annoyances, ill-temper, and extravagant pretensions of all kinds, she sang in rapid succession Desdemona, Norma, Semiramide, Louisa Miller, Linda, Elvira, Donna Anna, &c., &c., supporting to the best of her power the theatre which was going to its ruin, careless of warning and advice. This did not prevent some charitable people (there are more Basilios than Bartolos at the Italian Theatre,) to invent for poor Mdlle. Cruvelli—who never for one instant quitted the breach, or refused to carry on her own shoulders, unassisted, the whole weight of affairs—a reputation for wildness, eccentricity, and idleness.

"After the close of the Italian theatre, Mdlle. Cruvelli, broken down with fatigue, and satiated with the treatment she had received, returned to her native place. Bielfeld, for the sake of repose. Thence* she proceeded on a voyage of pleasure on the banks of the Rhine, stopping at Ems, Frankfort, and Baden, at each of which places she gave concerts. Subsequently she appeared at the theatre in Cologne as Norma and Amina, singing her part in Italian, while the rest of the company responded in German. It was here that she received at the same moment propositions on the part of the Opera and the Italian Theatre. M. Alarvy—all must be told, in order that the Italiens may not be accused of allowing itself lightly to be deprived of such puissant aid—persuaded that Mdlle. Cruvelli had already signed an engagement in blank, which had been forwarded to her from Rome, and that consequently she had only another month at her disposal, offered her, in the name of M. Ragani, for the few representations which she might be enabled to give, a very considerable sum. Mdlle. Cruvelli, however, wrote an account of all that passed to a friend in Paris, and that friend advised her to come and arrange her affairs herself—the shortest way, and the most simple.

"While negotiations were pending, we were careful in preserving the strictest silence. The least thing that a manager and an artist have a right to expect is the privilege of discussing their mutual interests as they may think proper, without the interference of the papers; and it appeared to us nothing more than proper to refrain from comment until the engagement was decided. Others, we say it without reproach, did not think it necessary to emulate our silence, and the morning after the day on which everything was settled there were still several journals reproaching Mdlle. Cruvelli for slowness and hesitation, and loudly calling upon her to come at once to a conclusion, as if she had any reckoning to make with them.

"The engagement of Mdlle. Cruvelli is a master-stroke, and could not arrive more apropos."

We must pass over three more columns, and come to the conclusion with the last paragraph of our excellent cotemporary.

"To recapitulate—we shall have a good winter season; Mdlle. Cruvelli at the Opera, an excellent troupe at the Italiens, but now enriched with the name of Mdlle. Parodi; a new work of Meyerbeer at the Opera Comique, and Madame Cabel at the other end of Paris. It will be a pleasure now to speak of our theatres, and the occupation of a critic will, for the future, be less disagreeable than that of a convict."

Madame de Coigny has a very bad voice. She said once, "Je n'ai qu'une voix contre moi; c'est la mienne." I have but one voice against me and that is my own.—Russell's Life of Moore.

[From the N. Y. Tribune of Nov. 26.]

Meyerbeer's "Prophet" in New York.

The first performance of THE PROPHET took place at Niblo's Theatre last night, and attracted, as might be expected, a very large and discriminating audience. The opera was an indisputable triumph.

To meet the taste of this public, which unlike that of Paris, could not probably be induced by any combination of poetry, music, painting and spectacle, to sit out an opera like The Prophet, requiring nearly five hours for performance in its integrity, many cuts had been made, and for the most part judiciously so. The opera thus condensed lasted three hours and a half.

Mr. Maretzek merits approbation for the style in which the work is produced. The cast is eminently strong, and in most details worthy of any theatre in Europe, including this array of artists: Steffanone, Bertucca-Maretzek, Salvi, Vietti, Quinto, Beneventano, Rosi and Marini. The orchestra is wanting in numbers, but has improved in quality. The choruses are good though not sufficiently powerful. The increased supernumeraries, the dancers, the military band on the stage, the singing boys, are all agreeable innovations on the stereotyped meagre mode of operatic representations. The costumes are new and generally appropriate and in some instances elegant. The scenery, too, is mostly new. Above all, the announcements in the advertisements were simple and truthful, not made up of lying appeals to public gullibility by statements of fabulous sums expended for costumes, scenery, &c. The manager who in these days does not practice this humbug is entitled to praise. The public will only respect and honor the dramatic profession when it shall cease to have a code of morals of its own, give over exaggeration and misrepresentation, and purge the theatre of all the incitements to vice which unhappily are still too frequently connected with it.

It is unfair to make comparisons between the mode of producing the Opera here and in Paris. There money is lavished really without stint, for every artistic and mechanical requirement.—Twenty thousand dollars are spent upon the dresses and properties of an opera, and the public mind is excited with the prospect of its production, in the same way that they are here with a coming election,—the opera house being considered a great national institution. The rehearsals are carried on for six months or more, with a view to the performance of the piece for an equal period—while here, three weeks are the extreme limit allowed for rehearsal, and three nights, or according to Madame Sontag's programme of her last season, "two nights" the extreme limit of the performance of any one opera. When The Prophet was in rehearsal and nearly ready for performance, it is said that Meyerbeer insisted on beginning the rehearsals de novo, to break in fourteen fresh additional violin-players, he having at that point discovered that the number of the orchestra was insufficient for his effects. Here, instead of fourteen additional violins, there are not fourteen in all. The orchestra is here thirty-five performers. In Paris it was a full hundred. The chorus here is thirty. There it was of equal force with the orchestra. For some effects, a great orchestra is absolutely needed, and a composer is sacrificed by the absence of numbers. While stating these facts, we have no wish to depreciate what is done at Niblo's Opera House, with regard to The Prophet, for M. Maretzek is entitled to great praise for the energy and skill which he has shown, and the risk which he has run.

The Prophet is the third of the three great works of Meyerbeer, the first being Robert le Diable, the second Les Huguenots. It was produced in Paris at the Grand French Opera in 1849. Instead of being the third, it might possibly have been the tenth of his great works, had the opportunity been afforded him in his youth of making himself known through the French Opera. But although previously to the production of Robert he was celebrated in Italy through the composition of Jephtha's Daughter, The Two Califs, Romada and Costanza, Emma de Resburg, The Gate of Brandenburg, Magaret of Anjou, The Exile of Grenada, Ahnazor, and The Crusaders, yet on coming to Paris to crown the object of his ambition by producing a work at the Grand French Opera, he found the obstacles so insuperable that, in disgust and despair, he gave up utterly musical composition, retired to Germany, and for six years did not put pen to paper. Then by chance a prima donna, who had achieved a success in one of his productions in Italy, happened to be engaged at the Italian opera in Paris and chose for her benefit that work. It pleased the public, and after immense efforts on the part of Meyerbeer's personal friends, procured for him a commission to write Robert le Diable for the French Opera. When the proposition came to him he declined at first to accept it, saying, I have ceased to write for so long a time, that I have no longer any ideas. After the work was completed and put into the manager's hands, the theatre changed masters. This new manager held the MSS. opera a year, refusing to produce it. Finally—as it is currently said, after Meyerbeer had guaranteed the expenses of the first ten representations—it was produced under the following circumstances. At the final rehearsal the manager was surrounded by friends who predicted a total failure, and he was then almost disposed to throw the work aside. It was produced, however, and its first run was 160 nights to nine thousand francs a night, and achieved the most brilliant success to the Académie. At that time Meyerbeer was thirty-seven years of age.

The Opera here, it will be remembered, is translated from the French, and thus subjected to certain technical drawbacks. The genius of each language moulds its vocal melody, which must be formed and accented according to the syllabification and versification proper to it. No matter how excellent the translation be, somewhat of the original force will be lost by the change. We were continually reminded of this last night. For example: The air of Fides, Ah mon fils,—is rendered Figlio mio—which is not strictly accurate, as we have a feminine rhyme for a masculine; and so throughout.

The cause of the past success of the works produced at the French Grand Opera is the alliance of sense and sound which they uniformly present. Before the music of an opera can be composed, the plot and situations must be accepted by the direction, and on these points there is a strict committee. Many Italian operas and the English operas, with hardly an exception, have plots which are stupid or uninteresting, and sufficient to spoil the work to public estimation. Hence the evanescent nature of so many Italian operas, which die with the season that produces them.

The libretto of The Prophet is the production of the great dramatist of the age—Scribe. It yields to the composer some splendid situations. The story is briefly this: It is founded on historical facts, additional dramatic incidents being given. The scene is laid in Holland and Germany. The time 1534. The characters are: Jean of Leyden, the pretended prophet, (Filius Dei,) SALVI; Bertha, his betrothed, BERTUCCA-MARETZEK; Fides, his mother, STEFFANONE; Count Oberthal, BENEVENTANO; the three Anabaptist leaders, Zacharias, MARINI; Jonas, VIETTI; Matthias, ROSI; principal soldier, QUINTO. The first scene is laid near Dordrecht, in the neighborhood of the chateau of Count Oberthal, lord of the manor. The peasants are engaged in a merry-making. Bertha and Fides enter. They are on their way to ask of the Count permission that Bertha's nuptials with John may take place—as there was a "peculiar institution" which prevented the girl leaving the estate—or in other words she was his born-thrall. The three Anabaptist leaders appear and preach their doctrines. The peasants are inclined toward such divine teaching of property divisions, and a political storm brews. At its height it is suddenly interrupted by the appearance of the Count well attended, and the peasants fall back into their accustomed servility—the Anabaptists being sent off. Fides and Bertha beg the Count to allow one of them—Bertha, of course—to marry Jean, Struck by Bertha's appearance, the Count flatly refuses, and takes her for himself. The second scene is the beer-shop of Jean at Leyden. The three Anabaptists arrive, and marking the resemblance of Jean to a portrait of King David in the cathedral of Munster—and learning of his religious enthusiasm and from him that he has had ecstatic visions of his becoming prophet and leader, they affirm that it will all come true, but he remains a fond lover. Bertha enters, having escaped from the Count's chateau, to conceal herself. Count Oberthal follows with his soldiers, and threatens to destroy Fides, who is with him, if Bertha be not delivered up. John saves his mother and surrenders his sweetheart. The Anabaptist leaders then work on his spirit of revenge, and he becomes their instrument. The third act discloses a forest scene in Westphalia, a frozen lake with skaters, and Munster in the distance. Jean, as Anabaptist leader, is besieging Munster, and the peasants on skates fetch provisions, and rejoice over their successes. The Count is taken prisoner—is recognized. Jean saves his life and learns that Bertha lives, and the act concludes with a scene of religious and martial enthusiasm, preparatory to taking the city by storm. Act fourth shows Munster taken by the insurgents. Fides, almost dying of hunger, arrives, and she meets Bertha disguised as a pilgrim, likewise visiting Munster, believing the Prophet to be the cause of Jean's death. The scene next reveals the interior of the cathedral, and the coronation of the Prophet Jean as temporal and spiritual sovereign, takes place with great pomp. Fides entering the cathedral recognizes her son, and confronts him with her claim as his mother. The mother, to save his life, then says she is not his mother, and the intelligent people pronounce it a miracle. The last act is the prison vault of the palace, where the three Anabaptists determine to betray Jean to save themselves, as the Emperor is approaching Munster with a besieging array. A duet between Jean and Fides follows, where he acknowledges her maternal power over him. Bertha enters, determining to revenge herself on the Prophet, and finds out that Jean is the Prophet. The last scene reveals Jean, Sardanapalus-like, in the midst of bacchanalian orgies—he perishes in the flames he had caused to be lighted.

The operatic stage of modern times is the most vital link that we have with the esthetic spirit of ancient Greece.

The Opera, though we have lost the music of the Grecian lyrical drama, lives, because it has progressed. When the father of Galileo revived what he considered the Grecian drama in Florence, by bringing out the first opera, he simply took music as it stood then, and secularized it on the stage, and it has flourished as a true expression, because it does not servilely ape the past, but affords an artistic outworking of passion and emotion—things which can never die while the human heart beats.

The study of the Opera, from the time when the elder Galileo took it in hand up to the present moment, is one of the most generous and suggestive themes.

Through the Opera alone, much other music has been rendered truly grand. The Church first learned by it that the expressions of the human heart, such as the musical tongue utters without formality, are piously acceptable. Declamation took the place of long drawn platitudes. The genius of melody triumphed over hard inconsequential forms, and music became a divinity worthy of worship. The singing-voice, too—that last ray of celestial sound—was brought under discipline through the Opera, and a Porpora taught a Haydn how to sing on musical instruments. The divine art having been transmuted from the original instrument, the voice, to instruments of man's fabrication, great was the clash of rival ingenuities to make perfect forms. The Cremona—the Stradivarius violins—had already been attained as a corner-stone, and the last one hundred years have shown us the vast increase of orchestral means, from the perfection of the clarinet to the saxtuba, and out of the orchestra to the grand piano-forte.

The man of genius, as a composer, avails himself of all these new instruments, and may even suggest additions and improvements. The author, in hand, does so eminently. He is never satisfied with what has been done in an orchestra. He knows that Haydn did much (more than any other man) to advance instrumentation; that Mozart did so too; so Rossini; so others less known to fame, but not less bold; but that only inspires him to work out fresh problems of instrumental combinations—each of his great works, Robert le Diable, Les Huguenots and Le Prophète, proving this assertion.

In regard to the style of the music in connection with the performance last night, a few words may be added, though we repeat that we cannot describe sounds with words.

There is no overture, but as substitute is a very short prelude with waving triplets on the violin, and time-marking on some of the wind instruments. After some twenty bars of this, in the key of D, we are led to the first piece, where the curtain is up, an Andante Pastorale in G. The symphony to this are some shepherd-like traits on a clarinet with an echo. Then commence the violoncellos in hurdy-gurdyish fifths—G D, the triangle and piccolo put in their quaint spokes, and the chorus commences. We give the French words, as our readers are more familiar with that language than with Italian. These words, then, are La brise est muette, le jour est serein. D'écho sonne la clochette de nos grais troupeaux. This work is written with mosaic-like care, but does not include a striking melody.

The whole effect of this introduction was tranquil; the peasants' dresses were picturesque, but the effect of the scene was sadly wanting in numbers and in the attention to the grouping and stage-business generally, which in so pungent a degree individuate the mode of putting operas on the French stage. Next follows a recitative, preceded by a symphony. This is between Bertha and Fides, the latter entering at the time. After this some sombre music in the orchestra between the horns, with pistons and the bassoons, introduces the three Anabaptist leaders, somberly clad, who begin to sing, from a neighboring hill, their politico-theological watchwords: Ad nos, ad salutarem undam, iterum venite, miseri, ad nos. These gentlemen in black—who, by the way, were made up to a charm—after their unison minor definition of their position, come down to the level of the peasants, who, believing in their divine mission, lend a willing ear. Zacharias, (Marini,) their chief spokesman, preaches to the crowd, his sermon set to music and ingeniously accompanied. The discourse is in C minor and has the merit of brevity. It suits admirably his heavy bass tones. He is assisted by his two friends, who throw in their Ad nos, ad salutarem, as above. In this orthodox sermon the peasants are informed of their low social status and the necessity of their dividing the spoils with their hereditary masters. In the Italian version, whose performance we are noticing, there are some pages cut, which paint musico-dramatically in an admirable manner the nascent and rising ideas of the crowd on the interesting subject—this, however, is a necessity of abbreviation, as we have stated beforehand in a general way. Having jumped into medias res, we have the Anabaptist hymn roared in unison, while a superior pedal note on the violins, and a varied bass, portray the agitation of the crowd, as they group round the footlights. Having armed themselves, the anabaptists first, and the people afterward with them, in an allegro moderato movement, in C major, declaim an enthusiastic hymn which was competently applauded. The introduction of old-fashioned flat sevenths is here a good touch of the composer's acumen; also the use of the side drum. The movement is quickened on a warlike cry coming from the multitude. Some bold, brief modulations here, which cannot be described in words, are notably good. In the midst of the revolutionary row, Count Frederic Oberthal, followed by several soldiers, appears through a portcullis, and the noisy crowd stop short on C major, while the orchestra modulates to A, and recitative follows. The Count cannot awe the trio of Anabaptists, who let us have a snatch of their old canticle to new words not complimentary to him, who thereupon drives them away. Our nobleman, perceiving Bertha, finds her better game than our murky friends. She, along with Fides, recounts in a duet how Jean had saved her life; and there is a mutual request to the Count that he will permit her, his vassal, to marry the said Jean. When this duet—which we do not consider inspiration—though exquisitely instrumented and so nicely played on the wooden wind instruments, with the exception of the accompaniment to the final cadenza—is done—the Count bluntly refuses to let so much innocence and beauty quit his domain; and at this the chorus with an appropriate change of key cry out their alarm, and then mutter among themselves their indignation. The Count insists on his determination, in an Italian-like melody, and the peasants crest-fallen withdraw slowly. The hymn of the three Anabaptist professors is now heard within; these gentlemen then present themselves again, the people kneel to them and look daggers at the Count.

The second act opened with a view of the interior of John's beer-shop. A smart, dashing waltz movement is heard. A corps de ballet figured about, and we noted among it several women looking hideously dressed as men. Let them stick to their petticoats. The chorus of peasants was brisk. Mr. Quinto was considerably drunk in character, and did it well. The three Anabaptists—the Maine Law not being in force—were seated at a larger beertable. Jean (Salvi) was helping the guests. We cannot compliment Mr. Salvi upon the manner in which his head and face were made up. If it was after that "picture of King David in the Cathedral at Munster"—as described by Mr. Marini—it was painted by a shocking bad artist. The three gentlemen in black have had a nice bit of black music. By the way, Macbeth was played in Paris in French at the time Scribe wrote this libretto—and the three witches at the Odéon were better done than ever they were with us; it is barely probable that this murky business of the three fatal Anabaptists may have been suggested on that occasion to the author.

Jean's solo, describing his dream, is an inspiration. It wanted, however, the two harps which the composer has properly introduced to paint the celestial character of the scene, and which were not properly replaced by pizzicati. Mr. Salvi sang like a great artist. He has a portamento which only belongs to a few. His large declamation is so often like that of Duprez, that it would almost seem that they studied in the same school. The melody of this piece is in the unbacknied time of 9-8, equivalent to three slow waltz bars grouped. It is delicious. Meyerbeer, though a man of great personal resources, has a sneaking kindness for the novelties of other people. In this he borrows the effect of Rossini, in the Guillaume Tell waltz, where the melody takes without modulation the major third above, and then back again. We were struck with several marked plagiarisms which we do not wish to condemn, except to say that, when we find any composer free from them, it will be time enough to select this or that new composer as sinning. For example: the air of the opera, the minor hymn, Ad nos salutarem, which is the back-bone of it, is an old hymn. The air Re del Cielo, Act III., finale, is nothing more than the standard old Stabat Hymn sung during the Tenebrae in Catholic Churches—and with hardly a note varied. We do not mean by this Stabat either that of Pergolesi or Rossini. In the solo of Salvi we were mentioning just now, the instrumentation is remarkable—the low note of the flute especially, playing the air while the violins with mutes accompany it, two octaves above. There are diminished-seventh passages in the frightful part of this dream solo which are too closely modeled after the Wolf-glen horrors of Der Freischütz. We cannot dwell on the music of this act further than to mention the quartet, where the large declamatory, weeping-like notes of Salvi are essentially great, and brought down the house with a tempest of applause.

The skating scene which, in Paris, through the mimicry of locality, and atmosphere, with the changes from day to night and night to day, with the haze of winter, and its snow flakes, was a complete artistic delusion, here, as our stage-arrangements are yet in their infancy, was poor, and the skating equally so. The ballet music of this scene, when given full and properly, is superlatively fine. Nothing Meyerbeer has composed exceeds it in novelty and the adaptation of means to ends.

We must push on to act IV. The fourth act was the best mise-en scene in the opera. The march was splendidly rendered; and the orchestra played better than ever we heard them. We would simply advise Mr. Maretzek to cause his trombones, out of the Coronation Scene, to play more softly, and to cut out the big drum part, except in this scene. The latter is too loud for his orchestra. The playing of the side drummer cannot be surpassed. The military band on the stage did well. The effect of the grand procession in this act—the number on the stage filling it up—the soldiers, priests, civic dignitaries, altar-boys, girls strewing flowers, peasant men and women, sombre devotees, cardinals, bishops, and so forth, was striking. The dresses seemed new and appropriate. The music of this act is magnificent. The organ-harmonies are worthy of Handel. The music sung by Steffanone is of the highest order, and her acting and singing of it were the best things she ever did. The scene where the Prophet causes his mother to disown him electrified the audience. At the curtain's falling the house resounded with cheers; it was again drawn up, but the people, not yet satisfied, called out before it Steffanone and Salvi, and then the same two artists afterwards with Maretzek, the manager.

Act V finished the Opera with complete success.

From my Diary. No. XXXII.

Nov. 29.—Well, this is a treasure!

"MESSIAH, an Oratorio in Score. As it was Originally Performed. Composed by Mr. Handel. To which are added his additional Alterations. London. Printed by Messrs. Randell and Abell, Successors to the late Mr. J. Walsh in Catherine Street in the Strand, of whom may be had the complete Scores of Samson, Alexander's Feast, and Acis and Galatea." [No Date.]

Such is the title of the original edition of the "Messiah," a large, handsome quarto, of 188 pages, finely engraved, on thick, excellent paper, with an Appendix of 35 pages of "additional alterations."

There is not a word of preface or introductory matter; the second and third leaves contain a list of subscribers and Index. Are there any familiar names on the list? The King (Old George II. of course), Queen, and a trio of Dukes, lead off. These titles were good in those days, even here, to make a book sell, but there are other subscribers' names of far more interest. Here are some names, which still live in our singing books, owing to the kindness of American editors in improving, arranging and adapting their anthems and tunes, so as to keep pace with the demands of an improved taste, and higher musical culture. (ahem!) Mr. Samuel Arnold, Mr. C. R. Burney, Mr. Cooke, "Organist of St. Peter's, Westminster, and Master of the Boys," Mr. Thomas Linley, of Bath, Dr. John Randall, Organist of King's College, and Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge (the author of the famous tune Cambridge), and finally John Smith, Esq.

Mr. William Cowper. What, the Poet? If so, as he was quite a young man then, he must have had a great taste for music.

Charles Jennens, Esq., 3 Books. Query.—Was this the man who prepared the text of the Messiah? It is now well established that Handel did not.

Mr. Samuel Johnson. The "Idler"? The "Rambler"? Who ever thought of music in connection with the author of the Dictionary!

"The Singers at Ossett" took a copy, and so did "the Madrigal Society, at the Queen's Arms, Newgate street." Mr. Wynne of Cambridge is down for "6 Books," and Mrs. Johnson of Cheapside for 12, and the Messrs.

Thompsons of St. Paul's churchyard for the same number. The whole number on the list amounts to 124 copies.

The overture is scored on four staves—first and second violins, violas, and violoncello, with a figured bass for the organ,—and looks curiously lean and hungry. The opening Recitative and Air is soprano, and the accompaniment is by the above instruments. The same score is continued through the chorus "And the Glory," with the addition of staves for "Canto," Alto and Tenor, with the old C clef, and for the Bass, with the usual F clef. The only changes in the score are in the Airs "O thou that tellest," which had apparently only first violins, 'cellos and organ, and "The people that walked in darkness," to which the violas are added, and in the Pastoral Symphony which has no organ,—no additional instrument even in the passage, "Wonderful, Counsellor," &c.,—until the chorus, "Glory to God," when two trumpets burst in with full power. At the close of this chorus they disappear, nor are they heard again until in the Hallelujah chorus, after the first occurrence of the phrase "For the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth." Handel swells the jubilant Hallelujahs with them, and adds to the climax by the introduction of the tympani. "The Trumpet shall sound"; here is the great trumpet solo for the great player of that day. Trumpets and drums accompany the "Worthy is the Lamb," and the final "Amen."

The "Additional Alterations," or the "Songs . . . set after the original performance a second time," are interesting. They are:

1. "But who may abide." Air taken from a baritone and given to a mezzo-soprano. In its first form it is an Andante Larghetto throughout, 12-8 time, with an accompaniment, which borrows its form from the melody of the air; in the second form, a Larghetto, 3-8, alternates with a prestissimo in common time, the prestissimo having an accompaniment of chords in sixteenth notes.

2. A short soprano air, Andante "Lo, the Angel of the Lord," becomes the beautiful recitative, so well known.

3. "Rejoice greatly," changed into a still more florid bravura soprano air, and curtailed.

4. "Thou art gone up on high," mezzo-soprano. Two new forms, the first, not much changed, a little longer and more of the bravura, the second, set for a baritone or bass.

5. "How beautiful are the feet" loses its second part in the new setting, which is amplified into the chorus, "Their sound is gone out," and two haunts added to the accompaniment.

6. Duet, "How beautiful are the feet," and chorus "Break forth into Joy," are entirely new.

7. Another setting of "Their Sound is gone out," soprano, Andante Larghetto.

8. Duet, "O Death where is thy sting," in which no very marked changes appear.

Interesting as I have found this volume, if it but had a date upon the title page it would be far more so, for it would possess a historical value, which all who have pursued historical researches will understand. When will our music publishers begin to put a date to whatever they publish? I fear it would be useless to urge our old houses to change their habits, but will not our friend Richardson set the example?

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 3, 1853.

Handel and Haydn Society.

The first oratorio of the season brought together a very large audience in the Music Hall last Sunday evening. Indeed the announcement of an oratorio of Handel is a signal always widely and eagerly responded to by Boston music-lovers; especially when it is to be performed by our most ancient society, whose name and fame have been for almost half a century identified with these things.

We had not the good fortune to hear the whole of "Samson,"—only the first half—and therefore cannot report of some of the most imposing pieces, such as the chorus: Weep, Israel, and the Dead March; Anna Stone's trumpet-toned delivery of Let the bright Seraphim; and the final chorus (in a work where choruses are few and far between for Handel), on the grand Miltonic words:

Let their Celestial Concerts all unite, Ever to sound his praise in endless blaze of light.

"Samson" contains much of Handel's finest music; yet we have to own that the general effect of the first part failed to overcome the dull mood of hearing into which we sank soon after the overture was finished, and which (in our dulness) we knew not whether to ascribe mostly to the thing we were listening to, or to the listener. But whenever a full chorus came, we were awake and on our feet (spiritually, not literally), only to relapse again. This proves to us that the secret of said dulness lay partly in the plan and structure of the oratorio itself. As we have said, it contains a smaller proportion of chorus to solo, than most of the peculiarly Handelian works; and after any chorus the long stretches of recitative and aria, well as many of them were sung, seemed tame. The more so, since these solos are all sung in character, suggesting a dramatic representation, while it in fact lacks so much of being one. Two persons singing at one another, in an oratorio, on a plain stage, without costume, or any background of illusion, can never satisfy any artistic ideal. It is neither one thing nor the other; neither purely lyric, nor so much as half way toward becoming dramatic. It is a mongrel product, what is called the "dramatic oratorio." True the original oratorio, historically speaking, was a rude, grotesque and threadbare sort of sacred drama; but it is also true that that movement followed its natural tendency and ended in the secular Opera. It began as an attempt to secularize somewhat the scientific sacred music, and render it amusing, so as to keep the people more on the qui vive in church. Shrewd priests, not artists, invented it. Of course it was an ambiguous, transition form, contained no distinct vital principle of form in itself, and kept on changing till it reached a real form, which was the Opera. The dramatic oratorio, then, as conformed to that historical first meaning of the term, is not a true form of Art. When you have dialogues between Samson and Delilah, or Samson and the warrior of Gath, when you come so near to opera, why tantalize us with such mischievous, unsatisfying little soupcou of something that is not, rather than go the whole length and give us musical drama, give us opera itself?

But oratorios (so called) have been written on a different plan, without the forced introduction of the dramatic element, and which occupy a distinct, sublime eminence, remote enough, in form as well as spirit, from other large species of musical combinations. Of these Handel has given to the ages the sublimest type in his "Messiah." There are songs enough there, and of the greatest of his songs; but they are not sung in character; there are no impersonations, no soprano, nor tenor, nor bass rôles, no dialogue and awkward singing at each other between plain, nineteenth century citizen singers, whom it is ludicrous to fancy the scriptural personages that we read of. The solos in the "Messiah" are all impersonal; if the words of an angel or a "voice crying in the wilderness," are sung, it is in the way of narrative of something supposed to be heard,—no angel appears and sings in propria personâ. Works like the "Messiah," and like the "Israel in Egypt" (Handel's) all great choruses, with connecting links of simple and impersonal recitative, are far more unique and positive in kind, and more sublime in their effect, than the more dramatic oratorios of the same and other great composers. Rossini was wise in making an opera of his "Moses"; and our Handel and Haydn Society, with all due deference, is not wise in fixing it over into an oratorio, as if scripture characters were all that is required for sacred music. Beethoven repented that he made his "Mount of Olives" so dramatic.

For this reason we suppose it was, that "Samson," what we heard of it, seemed dull to us (for a Handelian work) on Sunday night. Some twelve years ago, the intrinsic beauty of the music, taken in its separate pieces, (especially after seasons of such unsatisfying manna in the wilderness as Neukomm's "David"), and certain felicitous combinations of talent for the performance, gave it a run of popularity in Boston. But in the long run, in a community more and more musically cultivated, we doubt if "Samson," as a whole, can ever maintain its ground like the "Messiah," the "Creation," or even "Judas Maccabeus," which last is not so much dramatic as it is lyric.

Nevertheless, (why need we repeat it,) there is much admirable music in "Samson," and much of it was finely rendered. Yet there were drawbacks there too, incidental to a first performance, and the fatality of colds that afflicted several of the principal singers. The choruses were clearly, grandly given by at least two hundred and fifty voices, well balanced and distinct in the four parts. The overture, with its variety of quaint Handelian movements, was played with distinctness and point: but on the whole the accompaniment was by no means so creditable to the Germania orchestra as their accompaniment in the "Messiah" and "Creation"; somehow the spirit of the music seemed not to possess all the instruments in the same degree. The trumpet stammered; but Handel's trumpet passages demand a speciality of practice, as well as resumption of an (alas!) almost obsolete form of instrument, which lies out of the course of modern trumpet-playing. Mr. Low rendered the song parts in the character of Samson, especially where the song rises into the region of decided tenor, with purity and pleasing effect; but the recitative, much of the time in lower notes, was tame and lacked declamatory force. His cantilena is better than his recitativo. Mr. AIKEN's rich bass voice and clear, distinct delivery told well in Honor and arms, and in the strongly pronounced music of the part of Harapha generally. Miss ANNA STONE's pieces in the first part ranged in the lower and least favorable regions of her voice, so that the melody dragged heavily—partly the effect, possibly, of cold. Yet it was a pleasure to hear that song so full of the deep Handelian feeling: Return, O God of Hosts. Mrs. WENTWORTH had to ask indulgence on account of a cold; yet she sang the cooing turtle-dove strain of Delilah with a fine little bird-like purity of voice and style, omitting the duet with "Samson." There is certainly a rich list of most beautiful and deeply characteristic songs in "Samson," considered by themselves, apart from their dramatic connection; and one who learns this oratorio, lays up treasures of the best music.

Otto Dresel's First Soiree.

In the pleasantest of places for sweet, quiet, cozy musical communion, (the tastefully elegant saloon of our friend Chickering, in his new Masonic Temple ware-rooms); in a company (large for such an occasion) of the most select and appreciating that Boston could assemble; and with a programme of the best of music, endorsed by appetitive lingerings of last winter's taste of the same sort of fruit, we sank into our respective arm chair, Wednesday evening, with happiest assurance of one of the genuine "noctes." Nor were we disappointed. We felt the sympathetic pleasure of our friends all around us as distinctly as we felt the music. We could not sit there as a critic; the very sphere of the place and charmed circle naturally excluded such poor sinister Philisterei. Too willingly we let the music "lap us in Elysium," dismissing from the soul's doors those jealous satellites, the uncomfortable analytic faculties;—they could vanish to their own place, they belonged not here!—We were too full of music to have much to say about it. So it will sometimes happen: that when we have received most, we have the most beggarly account to render. Seldom have we owed more to Cecilia; but she tied our tongue as she bestowed the favor. In plain words, we have little power or room to specify, beyond saying that it was throughout a satisfying concert, even by the high standard which Otto Dresel had already set.

Yet as pleasant memoranda we jot down the full-filled order of the programme. Beethoven's Sonata for piano and cello (op. 69, in A), set the tone for the evening. It was wholly new to us, full of his bold peculiar thoughts, his fire and depth and genial mastery of form, and was finely interpreted by DRESEL and BERGMANN. Next came piano solos: a Lied ohne Worte (the "Duet") of Mendelssohn, the Valse in A flat (op. 42), with its flickering, aural play of soft light, and the sweetly lulling "Berceuse," of Chopin. No one plays the "Songs without Words," as Dresel plays them; he makes them speak straight to your soul as if without all intervention of keys and fingers; and Chopin, too, seems reborn in his touch. Mendelssohn's first Trio (D minor) the well-known, revealed new paths and springs of beauty in the happy rendering of DRESEL, SCHULTZE and BERGMANN. That delicate little flowery arabesque-themed Fugue of Bach (in C sharp major) with the Funeral March of Chopin, and another Mendelssohn Lied ("Spring Song"), all played by Mr. Dresel, ended the first part.

Part second was filled out by Robert Schumann's wonderful Quintet for piano and strings. This was at least the fourth time that it has been heard in Boston, but never to such advantage as now. It is a work that grows upon us immensely; as masterly in form and treatment, as it is crowded with well-contrasted ideas, and charged from the first burning note with the true electricity of genius. O, Mr. Athenæum Choerly, do you call this "ugly music!" If it were not that the whole spake so clearly, we might have wondered that these artists took the Allegro times so very fast.—One observation, made by those especially who sat in the back part of the room, we will mention: namely, that in the concerted music the sound of the piano sometimes dwarfed that of the other instruments. The room was carpeted. Could not the latter have been placed up or forward, so as to remedy that? But—forgive us, O Cecilia! We forgot our tongue was tied.

Concerts at Hand.

The GERMANIANS to-night make a bold stroke. The programme is all Richard Wagner, with inter-sprinklings of the common staple of concert song-pieces and a Paganini solo. Verily here is a deliberate attempt to Wagnerize us. Will not the London Athenæum and Music World hold up their hands in holy horror, when they hear of it! But why shall we not test the new sometimes, by the old? We have no fear that our friends will lay Beethoven and Mozart on the shelf. We give on our first page some of the themes of the Tannhäuser overture, which is to open the array of specimens. But why among the rest, not give that "finale to Tannhäuser," which went so well at Wednesday's rehearsal?

After the above bold prelude, SONTAG (Sunday) begins the week. The sweet singer returns to us, after a long absence, and joins our HANDEL and HAYDN friends in a miscellaneous concert of Oratorio music. Madame SONTAG is to sing "I know that my Redeemer liveth," "Let the bright Seraphim," and Rossini's "Inflammatus est"; also in a duet with Miss STONE. Mrs. WENTWORTH, too, takes part, and Sig. ROCCO. The GERMANIA Orchestra, of course.

Next Tuesday evening the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB offer their second programme. Mr. GÖCKEL, the pianist, is a new attraction. He will play the "Kreutzer Sonata" with AUGUST FRIES; and his own Hommage à Mendelssohn. For novelty in the quartet line, we are to hear a composition (the op. 8) of our townsman, Mr. C. C. PERKINS. Mendelssohn's Second Quintet, and a violoncello solo with the suggestive title of Himmelsthräne, (tears from Heaven,) by WULF FRIES, complete the bill, which seems to us composed with more tact than the last one.

Wednesday afternoon a GERMANIA REHEARSAL again! and the Music Hall turned into a crowded flowery parterre of gaily bonneted women and children, with hanging plants too from the balconies. Would that we were not obliged also to mention a nondescript class, between children and grown-up gentlemen and ladies, of altogether too respectably dressed rowdies and hoydens of both sexes, who enact the "Champagne Gallop" bodily, in the most noisy and insolent manner in the corridors, and even carry their rude breeding inside of the hall. Where are the police? The influence of music we still hold to be refining; good music is sure to win more and more lovers; but really, we fear, "Champagne Gallops" have much that is not good to answer for.

Wednesday Evening. Still they come! signals of new forces and new movements echo across the already crowded musical field. Mme. SONTAG announces the first of her Farewell Concerts. It will be both sad and sweet; sad, because farewell, but sweet to anticipate some first-rate singing once more. Singing has been at a discount with us too long. Two other prime favorites, JAELE and PAUL JULIEN come with her. And Mme. Sontag knew our tastes too well, and had too much of the artist pride about her, not to secure an orchestra, and that orchestra the GERMANIA, in its fullest force, for these most promising entertainments. Read the manager's "Card." Seats will be reserved without extra charge. Welcome again to Sontag!

CHRISTMAS EVE.—The MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY will perform the "Messiah," on Saturday, Dec. 24th, with Miss STONE and Miss DOANE among the solo singers, Mr. KREISSMANN for conductor, and the GERMANIA orchestra. The arrangements are not yet all completed. Thus, with the Mendelssohn Choral Society's announcement, we may look forward to the "Messiah" on two successive nights at Christmas time!

A Good Suggestion.

Editor of Dwight's Journal, of Music.

MR. EDITOR.—Allow me through the columns of your paper to express a wish which is probably felt by a great many of the lovers of music in Boston and its vicinity,—namely, that the Germania Society would give another set of concerts on the alternate Saturday Evenings unoccupied by their present series. To many of us these concerts have assumed an importance much greater than that of ordinary entertainments of the kind. We look forward to them, during the intervening two weeks, with pleasure and eagerness, not only as occasions of the keenest enjoyment, but as affording valuable opportunities for true and refined intellectual culture. As they are orchestral concerts, and deal with the larger and more elaborate works of the great composers, they fill a vacancy which the other concerts of the week,—the Quintette club,—the Piano-forte Soirées, &c.—excellent as they are,—do not supply. Besides, while Saturday evening is to almost every one a time of leisure, the remaining evenings of the week—on which these other concerts fall—are apt to be just the contrary.

There are then, I think, many who would be glad if the concerts of the Germanians came once a week. I have also heard the wish expressed that we might have from them concerts more entirely of classical music, which should present, too, not only the best works of the best masters, but should produce them consecutively, and in some kind of system; a series of "Mozart nights" and "Beethoven nights" for instance, or something of the kind.

If any of your readers feel with me, I hope they will make their wishes known through the columns of this or other Journals; such an expression of opinion will be most likely to effect the object delivered. Whether the hour for such good things has yet come, I do not know,—but the MAN is assured by Mr. Carl Bergmann. Will not our friends, the Germanians, start a new subscription list,—they might at least make the attempt,—and if successful give us a series of concerts something after the plan I have mentioned, containing as large a proportion of the much abused "classical music" as the taste of the public—and consequently their pockets—will endure and remunerate? MUSOPHILUS.

MADAME SONTAG'S

FAREWELL CONCERTS IN BOSTON.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7.

The public are respectfully informed that Madame SONTAG will give a short Series of FAREWELL CONCERTS, in which she will positively make her last appearance in Boston, prior to her departure from America, and for which the services of

PAUL JULLIEN,

ALFRED JAEHL,

SIGNOR ROCCO, and

THE FULL AND COMPLETE ORCHESTRA OF THE

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY,

(including the additional performers engaged for their regular subscription concerts,) have been secured.

CARD. The Manager begs to allude to the brilliancy that has distinguished the Concerts given by Madame SONTAG in Boston last year, and confidently expects that the FAREWELL Series will meet with no less approbation. Great care has been bestowed on the composition of the Programme, and the "Scheme" of each Concert will be found to present a selection of unrivalled musical superiority. The part allotted to Madame SONTAG is one of unusual interest, as besides the standard pieces of the Italian and principally the Rossinian school, it embraces a number of Gems from the works of Meyerbeer, Mozart, Paer, Auber, &c, the "Lieder" of Schubert, and popular English, Scotch, and Irish Ballads, never sung by her in her Boston Concerts.

PAUL JULLIEN, ALFRED JAEHL and SIGNOR ROCCO, will not less contribute their share towards the evening's entertainment, by a judicious selection of mostly new and effective morceaux.

Last, not least, the magnificent and greatly increased orchestra of the GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY will occupy a prominent place in the programme, and not be merely confined to the accompaniments, as formerly.

The price of admission has been fixed at ONE DOLLAR to all parts of the Hall.

Seats secured without extra charge

The Ticket Office is at Mr. WADE'S Music Store, 197 Washington Street; and the sale of seats for the will commence on Monday morning, Dec 5, at 9 o'clock, and continue daily.

IN PRESS...WILL BE READY DECEMBER 1st,

CARHART'S MELODEON INSTRUCTOR:

Presenting, in a series of nearly Two Hundred Popular Studies, a complete and progressive method of practical instruction for the MELODEON, and REED INSTRUMENTS generally, together with a choice selection of the most admired Songs, Polkas, Marches, Waltzes, &c &c. The above work, elegantly printed and bound, will take the lead of all Melodeon Instructors, being eminently adapted to the wants of the great mass of learners, and will be as universally popular as the instruments of the maker whose name it bears. Teachers and Scholars may depend upon this being just the book they want.

By JOHN ZUNDEL, Organist of St. George's (Dr. Tyng's) Church, New York, Author of "Two Hundred and Fifty Voluntaries and Interludes," "The Amateur Organist," &c.

This is the most comprehensive, thorough and complete work of the kind ever issued, forming a very extensive collection of the choicest music, as well as a self-instructor for the instrument. Most of the Melodeon instructors heretofore published, have been mere compilations from Piano Books. This Work is emphatically a Melodeon book, every piece in it being arranged with special adaptation to that instrument. It contains 144 pages folio, and is gotten up in elegant style, with cuts representing positions of the body, hands, &c. Any one remitting us two dollars, can have a copy of the work sent him by mail, post-paid. It is better to order it through a dealer, however, as so large a book is liable to injury in going by mail. THE SONATA FORM.

THOMAS RYAN, respectfully begs leave to inform those who are in the habit of hearing Symphonies, Quartets, Quintets, Sonatas, or any works of that class, that he is prepared to explain or analyze them, either in small classes or to single pupils. His long experience in the performance and in the composition of such works, added to his being in possession of the scores of almost every work of that class presented in Boston, gives him peculiar advantages. The knowledge of the form is almost indispensable towards the understanding in the slightest manner, and will infinitely enhance the pleasure derived in the hearing of them. It is a subject which amateurs of the slightest pretensions ought to feel interested in, as new and old compositions are brought forward daily. The subscriber would be happy to receive pupils for this alone, or in connection with Thorough Bass.

JONAS CHICKERING,

PIANO-FORTE MANUFACTURER,

MASONIC TEMPLE, Tremont Street,

HAVING removed from his former location in Washington Street, and fitted up Warerooms in the above named beautiful building, is now prepared to attend upon such of his friends and the public as may honor him with a call. His time for the past six months having been exclusively devoted in endeavors to render his manufacture more perfect than ever, he is confident of being able to fully satisfy all who are desirous of possessing a good instrument.

Residents in the vicinity and adjacent States will please notice particularly his address, as there is another person in this city bearing his name, and with whom he is frequently confounded.

Mr. C. batters himself that his experience and reputation of thirty years, must convince all who anticipate purchasing, that this is the best testimonial that he can offer of the excellence of his Pianos, and of the satisfaction which has invariably been manifested with regard to all the qualities which constitute an unexceptionable instrument.

FOR THE

PIANO-FORTE,

Admitted by the most distinguished European and American Pianists to be

BY FAR THE BEST INSTRUCTION BOOK EVER PRESENTED TO THE PUBLIC.

BY NATHAN RICHARDSON,

Pupil of ALEXANDER DREYSCHOCK and other distinguished European Teachers.

The author completed his work a year ago; but wishing to render it as perfect as possible, he went to Europe for the express purpose of submitting the manuscript of his Instruction Book to the examination of his former teachers—the most eminent professors of the Piano-Forte in the world—who expressed themselves much pleased with the simplicity and ingenious arrangement of the Scales, as well as the general progressive character which characterizes the whole work; and they were unanimous in their opinion as to the high estimation in which it should be held, as an Instruction Book for the Piano. The recommendations of the work, given by the first and most distinguished teachers, are of the highest order.

This Instruction Book is founded upon an entirely new principle, wonderfully progressive and simple in its character, and the pieces and exercises are fingered after the most approved and modern method, such as has NEVER APPEARED IN ANY OTHER WORK WHATEVER. It contains all necessary explanations, which are given in a manner so simple and perspicuous as immediately to commend itself to young persons and piano novices. Many works are written in such a technical and obscure style that no one but a professor can comprehend their meaning: but in the MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE PIANO-FORTE, these serious difficulties in other works are obliterated.

It is also illustrated by a series of Plates, prepared expressly for the work by one of the most celebrated anatomists of Europe, showing the anatomical construction of the HANDS, besides valuable information in regard to Practice—its influence upon the muscles of the hand, &c.

This Instruction Book contains all the useful exercises found in other works, besides a vast number of new and modern ones; also, many modern and classical pieces from the most celebrated composers, and directions not only informing one how they should be played, but showing how they can be played with ease. The work commences with the simplest exercise, and progresses regularly to the classical compositions of the immortal BEETHOVEN.

The author, in order to render his work superior, in every respect, to all other Instruction Books, went to the great expense of having each page Electrotyped. Consequently, it presents by far the most elegant specimen of Music Printing that has ever appeared. The Plates were engraved by the best artists of the country, and are beautifully colored to render them perfectly life-like. The paper is of superior quality; the binding is in embossed cloth, full gilt edges, back and sides. It also contains an original lithographic portrait of ALEXANDER DREYSCHOCK, the celebrated Pianist, for frontispiece. The book is not only an attractive ornament for the Piano, but it contains the most brilliant concert pieces of eminent Pianists, and simple melodies within the scope of ordinary young performers.

NO. 10.

Instead of the grotto, we see the outside of the mountain, in whose interior all this is located by tradition, and the rural scenery about the Wartburg. In an instant the knight is transported from the depths, where in the intoxicating mist of sweet perfumes the lamps with their colored sheen illumined a night of pleasures without end, into the freshness of a pure Spring morning. To the bewildering tumult of the last scene succeeds total silence of the orchestra, and the soft, dreamy tune of a shepherd, seated on a neighboring rock; the refrain of his reed pipe, happily imitated by the English horn, creates a beneficial contrast.

Presently you hear a chorus of pilgrims in the distance; during the pauses the voice of the shepherd, commending himself to their prayers, forms a new contrast; his pastoral melody winds like a flowering field vine about the stern outlines of the pious hymn, which rises like the arching of a Gothic vault.

The pilgrims approach, appear and pass before us, and their song, in which the second half of the religious theme of the overture is inwoven, wears a calm and serenely pious character. In this repose there vibrates, however, a certain exaltation and enthusiasm, and you can distinguish in it an enduring ecstasy, a secret uncountable delight. They stop before an image of the Madonna; Tannhäuser at their chant falls upon his knees. As much overwhelmed by the miracle of mercy, that has rescued him, as he is surprised to see his bold wish so suddenly heard, his deliverance so unexpectedly fulfilled, he repeats the words of the pilgrims:

Ah, heavy weigh my sins on me,
No longer can I bear the trial;
All rest and comfort now I'll flee,
And choose but pain and self-denial.

The bells of the distant churches summon the faithful to morning prayer, and at the same time hunting-horn signals, from different distances (alternating between F major and E flat minor), complete the impression of this hour of rural repose and woodland solitude. Presently the landgrave with his hunting party comes along, and perceiving a knight who takes no part in the chase, he approaches him and recognizes Tannhäuser. We have already said, that Wolfram von Eschenbach, his rival in minstrelsy as in love for the princess Elizabeth, who loves him, has finally persuaded him, in speaking of her, to resume his old rank among the minstrels, whom he has so often vanquished, and who nevertheless have mourned his absence. This cantilena of a lovely melodic motive, breathing a tender and inward emotion, is resumed again in its first eight measures and dialogued in the andante of a Sextet, composed of the five singers and the landgrave, who entreat Tannhäuser to return to them. At the name of Elizabeth his face lights up as with a quickening beam, and he exclaims:

Again I know thee, ah! and love thee,
O beautiful world, so long withdrawn!
Again the heavens smile sweet above me,
And flowers are fresh with dewy morn.
The Spring with thousand friendly greetings
Like music in my soul doth stir;
In tender and tumultuous beatings
My heart cries out: To her! to her!

As soon as his voice unites with the others, the Septuor sets into a joyful and rapturous Allegro, whose finale, interrupted by the fanfare of the chase, forms the conclusion of the first act. The different voices are grouped in such a masterly manner, and their parts in this ensemble piece are marked with such select and noble fineness, that there is no mistaking therein the calling of the minstrel, the challenge of noble rivals to a noble contest. This finale takes an irresistible hold upon the public, and universal admiration and applause resound through the hall.

Nothing can be more natural, more chaste and piously tender, than the cheerfulness, the joy, so frank and free from jealous feeling, with which Elizabeth receives her knight, whom Wolfram himself leads to her. With lightsome step, and with the happy smile of first youth, which has not yet lost the demeanor of childhood, she hastens into the hall, where she had heard the songs so deeply buried in her heart, and whose threshold, since the disappearance of her minstrel, she had never crossed. With outspread arms, as if she would spread over all surrounding things the clear light of her happiness, the radiance of her sympathizing and high-hearted bliss, she trips in, already dressed for the approaching festival, not doubting that her knight and singer will bear off the victory and win her for the prize. A simple rim of gold, more like a halo than a diadem, encircles her blond head; her long tresses fall under a light veil down over the drapery of white satin, whose embroidery marks the picturesque boddice of the female costume of that epoch. A mantle of blue satin fastened on the shoulders seems, like heaven's azure, to float around this vision of embodied innocence.

If the goddess,—crowning with roses her dark hair, fastened by a Grecian net over her voluptuously curved neck, and crossing the purple ribands of her sandals over her alabaster feet,—exercising all her might, revealing all the charms concealed under her half-closed eyelids, and in her girdle, which now brightly gleams and now vanishes from sight, has presented to the pleasure-drunk minstrel Beauty itself, Beauty absolute and incomparable:—so on the other hand the princess Elizabeth must transport his soul by a lofty and surprising beauty, which descends to him as it were from the empyrean heights, to dispute the other, that came up out of the briny waves to the abode of mortals.

The duet between Tannhäuser and Elizabeth might, for feeling and musical beauty, be compared to that between Achilles and Iphigenia by Gluck. The same enthusiasm in the joy of the present, the same chaste abandon, the same simple and full confession of a deep passion, the same renewal of an always varied and yet always identical theme,—a theme, so full of pure and happy love, that one might believe it an echo of celestial bliss, never to be interrupted or disturbed. . . It ends with an Allegro, in which the loud jubilee of the joy-intoxicated soul breaks out, and which breathes an impassioned ecstasy, that rings like a high hosanna sung to Love.

The minstrel contest, although a little abstract and metaphysical, yet intimately involved in the knot of the drama, is an episode which controls it and whose musical part is treated with a great expenditure of power and thought. It is preceded by a march [the "Finale," played by the Germans], during which, with all the ceremonial etiquette of those times, the distinguished guests of the landgrave pass across the stage, to seat themselves according to their rank in seats arranged in semi-circles, the centre being reserved for the minstrels. The high barons appear, their mantles embroidered with their coats of arms. The noble ladies, dressed in the colors of their houses, let their trains be borne by pages. The march has a felicitous rhythm, neither too much accented, nor too characterless. It admirably indicates the composed, proud bearing of these noble gentlemen, for whom it is an equal glory to handle the harp or the sword. This march, in B major, is followed by a second in G, marking the entrance of the minstrels; in a more solemn measure, it has a more earnest, elegant and noble character than the first; this is one of those well thought-out details, which make Wagner's compositions so rich and full of study.

When the numerous guests have arranged themselves in their places, and the minstrels have appeared one by one, a deep silence ensues. Wolfram is the first who rises, for Elizabeth has drawn his name from the urn. Like the rest, he bears his harp in his hand; this instrument accompanies all their songs, and plays, not only in this act, but throughout the whole score, a great part, which requires a skilful artist to execute the complicated passages, which are too prominent to admit of being shortened. Wolfram's recitative is executed in a rich style. It is the song of a contemplative soul, shaken by no inward passion, and prompted by no outward spur. As Tannhäuser prepares to answer him, the orchestra resumes the first notes of that voluptuous motive in the overture, which also formed the rhythm of the bacchantes' dance when he, begging of Venus his "Freedom!" still promised to continue to praise her charms. As if this slight band of a promise, which he flung behind at parting, were enough to draw him down into perdition, the spectator, the moment he is reminded of it, is seized with an instinctive terror, which increases moment by moment, like the awe preceding a catastrophe. As the strife grows more exciting, and more and more vehement rejoinders end with embittering the guilty knight, the tones become clearer and higher; every time that fatal reminiscence strikes the ear, till finally Tannhäuser, desperate and beside himself, takes up entire the strophe of the first act, and sings the same praises of the Goddess of Love, without reservation or disguise.

The amazement, terror and confusion of the tragic situation which now follows, are spontaneously checked by the gestures of Elizabeth, who throws herself between him and danger. She espouses and defends in the most touching manner the cause of her faithless knight. She does not hide the tears which swell her breast. Presently her voice dies out in long-drawn tones, as if her physical powers had forsaken her in this painful task; presently her spiritual strength re-animates her, and, with more and more touching and penetrating tones, she calls heaven and earth to witness that obstinacy here were sacrilege; she is inspired to disarm their wild fury and commands them, in the name of the Saviour himself, to refrain from hasty condemnation. At the first answer, which Tannhäuser had made to Wolfram, she had felt her heart beat with passionate sympathy; in confession of this, she had given him a sign, which he however had not noticed, since in all other quarters he had found no favor; she knew that, even if sin had seduced the bridegroom of her soul, it must have been through treachery, for she neither doubted of his inborn high-heartedness, nor of the means of his salvation. When they have sheathed their swords, Tannhäuser's bold bearing yields to helpless exhaustion, and he sinks down at her feet. Elizabeth concludes her prayer of highest love and sorrow with an exhausted, dying voice. Filled with wonder and amazement, all exclaim: "An angel came down from the etherial light, to announce to us God's holy counsel!" and these words are conveyed by a melody which, cheerfully and mildly, rises and floats through several measures, during which this angelic being seems to become visible to our eyes. The compassionate, persuasive song of her, who has succeeded in inspiring gentleness in the infuriated souls of the rude knights, is very long, and written in a manner which cannot be better characterized than by saying that it approximates to the church style. In it appears that extraordinary rhythm, which in the following ensemble pieces (when the by-standers, smitten by this sublime interposition, dare not resist so heavenly a manifestation of love), seems to return the beating of those agitated, inspired, awe-stricken hearts. This grand finale repeats also the principal theme of the aria of the princess and ends with a resumption of the melody: "An angel came down," &c. Wagner has seen fit here to carry the melodic development of this chaos to the extremest limits of musical effect. Composed merely of men's voices, borne along by a single soprano, like a silver censer, whence ascend dark clouds of smoky incense, this chorus expresses a deep-felt earnestness and spreads abroad that pious, devout feeling, which one is only wont to find in holy temples. The act closes with Tannhäuser's call to repentance. He joins the pilgrims, who are just then passing by the castle, and repeating the first fragment of their morning song, upon their way to Rome.

A NICE DISTINCTION.—A musician having occasion to pay a visit to a solicitor on business, was asked in the course of conversation, what was his trade or calling? A professor of music, was the reply. A what, sir?—A professor of music.—A professor of fiddle-sticks? I suppose you mean a teacher of music.—Sir, said the indignant dissector of semibreves, I profess to teach the art and mystery of music; and however contemptible such a vocation may appear in your eyes, let me tell you, that whereas three years are found sufficient to perfect any dull descendant of Adam in your profession,—it will require three times three to enable a bright genius to become a teacher of music.

CONSUELO.—The London Leader has a highly favorable review of Mr. Henry T. Tuckerman's "Mental Portraits," but corrects the author on a single point. "Mr. Tuckerman," says the Leader, "amid his rapture on Jenny Lind, reports that 'Consuelo' is said to have been founded on her character and history. Unfortunately 'Consuelo' was written before Jenny Lind was heard of; moreover the artist who did furnish George Sand with that exquisite type was Viardot, one of George Sand's dear friends. And the reader who follows 'Consuelo' with this clue will soon detect the original suggestions of Corilla and Azoletto, in Grisi and Mario; but we warn him that in all three instances, they are but suggestions, not portraits."

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Adolph Bernhard Marx.

MR. EDITOR:—Your Journal for Nov. 5 contains a sketch of the life of A. B. Marx. But methinks it does not at all suffice to give a just image of the genius and character of this eminent professor of music, as several of his best works are not mentioned, and nothing is said of the most important reforms which he has caused in the theory of music, nor anything of his success as a music teacher. Permit me, therefore, to add a few lines to that sketch, since even the biography of Marx in Schilling's musical lexicon (of which the sketch in question seems to be an extract) must be called imperfect now, considering that Marx is most remarkable for his never tiring industry, the products of which are works either in words or in tones, and considering again that a space of twelve and more years, since this biography was written, must have produced considerable change in such an active life.

Marx is not yet so much known in America as he ought to be; but the American edition of the first volume of his Art of Musical Composition, leads us to hope that more of his valuable works will be published, accommodated to the wants of American students of music.

In speaking of some of Marx's compositions which the sketch does not mention, I shall begin with his "Evangelical Choral and Organ Book," expressly composed by command of the king of Prussia. This elaborate work proves the mastery which Marx possesses in the most difficult part of musical composition. It is very large, containing a great number of Chorals, introduced by organ voluntaries, the forms of which are Fugues, Canons, &c. They are partly written in the so called Greek or ecclesiastical modes. Although some of these pieces are made merely by the understanding and, accordingly, have not much music in them, yet the work altogether commands the highest respect for its author. They who know how difficult those forms of musical composition are, will certainly appreciate the skill, labor and perseverance which it must have required.

Another work, entirely different from the former, is "Omar and Nabid." It consist of a number of poems alluding to the fabulous Orient, so connected with each other as to form a whole, like a little opera. The composer has enveloped them in the most charming music of airs, duets, etc. The accompaniment being merely by the piano-forte, very successfully imitates the orchestra, so that one fancies he distinctly hears the violins, flutes, horns, etc. This work is well fitted for a parlor concert, and amateurs will be delighted in performing it.

Equally charming is "Frühlingsspiel, in dreimal drei Gedichten von Heine," which comprises nine songs for a single voice, dedicated to the composer's wife, who, by the way, is a pretty good singer. If these beautiful little pieces are not so widely known as they deserve, we can only ascribe it to that indifference to simple and true songs altogether which prevails in Germany as well as everywhere else. Finally I will mention "Grand Sonata for the Piano-forte"; a characteristic and very difficult piece, both in its technical and spiritual part, fitted only for first-rate pianists.

As it was not my intention to give a list of all of Marx's published compositions, I have only mentioned these few; the more so because they were, besides the Oratorio, "Moses," communicated to me by the author himself. Long before he had obtained his present fame, Marx had written a great number of different pieces, both for singing and orchestra. It appears, however, that criticism found much fault with them, and that it is mainly since the publication of "Moses" that he is appreciated as a composer. The critics reproached him especially with his constant striving to write original or peculiar; the consequence of which was that his music sounded so "gesucht" (far-fetched) as the Germans say. I recollect however, that he once said: "I am frequently told my compositions contain much originality, but I declare I never aim at it, I write as it comes." And he constantly warns his pupils from nothing more than from striving to appear original in their style; of course striving after originality is the surest way to spoil it.

Although Marx holds an honorable position as a composer, still, his proper field is the theory of music, and here he has been more successful than any one before him. In alluding to the great services he has rendered to this branch of music, I am reminded first of his long struggle with G. Fink, editor of the "Leipziger allgemeine musikalische Zeitung." It proves that Marx is the man who understands how to defend his principles. Besides, the courteous manner in which the affair was conducted on his part, while his opponent treated him very impolitely, has won him the estimation of all who impartially witnessed this combat.

Fink, as is known, was a very learned musician, and his love for the old classics is manifested on every page of the Zeitung. But this love for the old made him indifferent to the new, and caused him to grow very angry when another learned musician, who had equally manifested his enthusiasm for the old, undertook to write a pamphlet with the title: "The Old School of Music in its struggle with Our Time." Fink, being really provoked, asked Marx what man he was that could venture to attack that very music school in which a Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and others were taught; to which Marx politely replied he was the man that could prove at any time that those men owed their greatness not to the school in which they were taught; nay, they had attained it in spite of that school. The dispute between these erudite men was, as every body may imagine, highly interesting and profitable to the musical public. Which was right? If we may judge from the result it was Marx. His works, the products of the principles he defended against his opponent, appear in one edition after another, while Fink was more and more forgotten, notwithstanding every good musician duly appreciates the services he has done to music.

Before Marx wrote his "Art of Musical Composition," there was a vast number of works of that kind; yet what a sensation it made! Properly to show the difference between his teaching and the old, would require an essay; suffice it here to say that the old school constantly commands, "thou shalt," and "thou shalt not,"—"in the severe or sacred style, thou shalt do this; in the light or secular style, thou shalt not do it." As for these commandments, Marx says, he never found, in studying the compositions of the best masters, that they cared for them; they evidently wrote contrary to them. Consecutive fifths, octaves, and other things, which the old school so peremptorily forbids, are to be found everywhere, and sometimes how effectively they are employed, being exactly the right means in their place to express the composer's sentiment? To be sure, in another place they might be wrong, that is to say, they might not be the right terms for what the composer intends to express, and then, of course, they are forbidden. Music is not to tickle the ear; it should express sentiments, passions, and express them in truth. But truth knows of no regards; it speaks, if need be, in the bitterest language; and it is and remains the same truth everywhere, whether it be in the sacred or secular style.

It is characteristic with Marx's school, that when he gives a rule, he gives the reason why we must observe it, or rather, why it has become a rule in the very nature of the case. It is a superiority in his method, and one which makes his personal instruction so attractive, that everything that is to be done or not to be done is so naturally presented, that one sees it cannot but be so.

Marx may surely be called the chief of the music teachers. Every virtue which this profession requires, he is possessed of in a high degree. His untiring industry is already mentioned. At the time when the undersigned enjoyed his instruction, he used to rise at 5 o'clock, beginning to pursue any literary object he was about. At ten, the first scholar came to call him from the writing-table into the music-room; at eleven, another stepped in; and so on till one o'clock. After dinner he went to the University, to lecture until four. Then he generally took a walk, from which he went home either to preside at a musical party, or to begin writing again till midnight. His recreation consisted mostly in reading novels, poems, newspapers, etc., as he takes a lively interest in all that happens in the literary, social, or political world. Thus he is acquainted with every book of importance, and with every important event; in short, he knows of everything. It is easy to conceive what a power such profound and universal knowing, connected with a fervent love for his profession, must give him over his pupils; the more so as he speaks in quite a flowery and pleasing language, frequently using illustrations taken from the sphere in which the scholar moves.

His long experience enables him quickly to find out what kind of character he has before him, and how it must be treated to make the lesson as useful and pleasant as possible. Besides, as he has risen to his present position only by his own exertions, he can give so many good hints, so many bits of valuable advice. Especially to those whose love for the divine art is as great as the means of satisfying it are small, as was actually the case with Marx himself, he is an inestimable model. Hence his scholars look on him with great reverence; and this is no small thing; for they are by no means children; his pupils generally consist of experienced musicians, music teachers, and even composers of reputation. (If I speak of Marx's scholars, I mean those who have enjoyed his private instruction; not those who have merely attended his lectures at the University or any other public institute.)

It is interesting and touching to hear him tell how, no longer able to resist his strong desire to devote himself entirely to music, he left an office with a good salary and went to Berlin, with only $30 in his pocket. This small sum was soon spent for concerts and operas. So he commenced giving lessons. The recollection of his first scholar, who happened to be a rather old lady with stiff fingers and no talent at all, is after so many years still fresh in his mind. As he had had no experience in the profession of music teaching, he had only seen the sunny side of it; he had dreamed how delightful it would be to impart to an open, susceptible scholar the beauties of the great masters; but now he found his business was merely to direct the hands and fingers of his scholar. At first he sighed; but he soon found out that even the instruction in the mechanics could be elevated so as to become artistic; that one of the finest attainments of a music teacher must be, in order to make the lesson agreeable to himself as well as to the scholar, to infuse spirit into the mechanical part of his instruction. (I recollect with great pleasure when he once showed me how he had taught the rudiments of pianoforte playing.) Thus his spirited instruction on the Pianoforte, in Singing and Thorough Bass could not long be concealed; in a short time he had as many scholars as he could attend to.

Besides, he felt the power within him to serve the art also with his pen. Giving lessons in the day-time, he composed at night, or wrote musical essays for the papers. It is the fate of every talented man, who with energy begins his course from below, that he is attacked by ill-tempered men, trying to stop him, or, at least to make his way as troublesome as possible. Marx's success as a music teacher and musical writer called forth the jealousy of many of the other professors, who, feeling his superiority to them, were bad enough to mortify him where they could. But in spite of this, he went right on, hoping that the final victory would be his. And so it came. Years ago the hatred of his opponents was converted into the highest respect, and his rank, honor and fortune are such that, in reference to himself, he can say with great satisfaction to his discouraged scholars: "You see what is to be obtained by perseverance."—

Marx has for many years been employed upon a work which treats of the Science of Music. It will be no doubt a very valuable contribution to the musical literature. Whether it is already published or not, I cannot say; it was expected more than a year ago.

It frequently occurs to me to associate the name of Marx with those of Richard Wagner and Franz Liszt. Like these men, he is of liberal principles, and a man of progress. Of the same energetic and enterprising character, he undertakes, like them, gigantic works, and has the power and perseverance to complete them.

Finally, I would allude to Marx's services with regard to Bach. His fervent efforts to make this master of all masters popular, seem sometimes to be forgotten; it is necessary therefore to remind the critics of "Young Germany" once to give honor to whom honor is due.—For those students of music who long to study Bach, I cite the following work as the best to commence with. "Auswahl aus Johann Sebastian Bach's Werken, zur ersten Bekanntschaft mit dem Meister am Clavier, herausgegeben von Adolph Bernhard Marx."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 10, 1853.

JONAS CHICKERING IS DEAD!—This sad news comes to us to darken this bright Friday morning, as we sit down to complete our weekly task. Sad news indeed to every musical circle here, or in our whole wide land. For no man was so much and so beneficently identified with music in America. So he was with all things kindly, harmonious and sweet! A man universally beloved! The most successful of his craft, and yet without an enemy! A mechanic of enterprising genius, a public-spirited citizen, a charitable, warm-hearted, open-handed neighbor,—his death is a blow not only to those nearest and dearest to him, but to this whole community. He was taken away suddenly at 11 o'clock last night, having been overtaken by a stroke of apoplexy at a friend's house, where he was visiting, apparently in usual health. Yet his friends for some time have not been without apprehension, knowing that he has had a series of such attacks, which he has scarcely allowed to interfere for a day with his unwearied exercise of hand and brain.

Symphony Concerts—A New Plan.

With no ordinary pleasure we call attention to the new announcement, in another column, of the Germania Musical Society. We had almost said, with pride, that our city should be so far complimented on the score of musical taste, as to be selected for the first trial place in this country of a series of concerts entirely instrumental and ENTIRELY CLASSICAL, in the best sense of the word:—but we reserve the pride, until we see how nobly the lovers of such music will come forward to support an enterprise and grasp an opportunity so boldly and squarely levelled at their long-repeated high professions and demands.

The conflict of tastes; the rival show of hands for "popular" and for what, for want of a better name, is called "classical" music:—or rather, the conflict between taste and mere frivolous pursuit of amusement, through music, has always greatly embarrassed the work of programme-making in our larger kinds of concerts. Some go to concerts for inspiration, for satisfaction and nourishment of their deeper nature, of their inmost soul, and some for pleasant pastime. Some seek an intellectual and spiritual, others a physical and sensual excitement. To some music is a matter of earnest Art, to others but a rhythmical pretext and accompaniment for idle dalliance and superficial social gossip. Concert-going has as many motives as church-going:—according to the spirit of the goer, is it a serious or an idle occupation. Those who dance through life, wonder why an orchestra should bore them with anything less jolly than the waltzes and polkas of their darling Strauss and Jullien and Gungl. Those who suck soul's sustenance out of sentimental magazines, yellow-colored novels, and lackadaisical preaching, call for much singing of hacknied songs, or everlasting changes on the monotonous staple of modern Italian opera melody, nearly all cadenza, and stereotyped false pathos made to order for the tears and passion-feigning prima donna or tenore. Those whose little bodies almost burst with patriotism, and who love to strut in public streets with guns and plumes, go in for Yankee Doodle, with much brass and drums. While those to whom life is earnest, and yet generous and genial withal, and whose souls yearn for harmony and unity, and love all the types and prophecies thereof in Nature, Art, or Revelation, are of course more interested in a deep symphony or overture, and are distracted and ennuyés by the miscellaneous jumble of frivolous and feeble things in the same programme. For artistic contrast of light and shade, of grave and gay, is one thing: and a heterogeneous medley for all tastes, such as we more often get, is quite another.

Hitherto, in our years of musical infancy, mixed programmes have been the true policy. But have we not reached the point when a large audience exists among us for music in the purest and most earnest sense, who relish concerts most, when they are most free from clap-trap and mere "sops to Cerberus"? Are there not a good thousand among us who wish to enjoy music intelligently; to make acquaintance with the best masters through their best works as a matter of intellectual culture; and even who have curiosity enough to wish to understand the historical development of modern instrumental Art in its highest inspired forms? We cannot doubt it. Such should willingly and eagerly make some sacrifice, and find their economy in going to a little extra expense to render possible such concerts as they continually sigh for. The proposal of a distinct series by the Germanians precisely meets the case. Give them a subscription barely large enough to cover the required outlay; guaranty the enterprise against loss, and you shall secure to yourselves large orchestral concerts, where the programmes shall be as select and the audience as sympathetic as they have been at the pleasant evenings of Otto Dresel or the Quintette Club.

It is a perplexing task to cater to the many tastes of that many-headed monster, called the public. The Germanians have found it so. By pursuing in the main a high course, rather leading than descending to the taste of the majority, they have demonstrated that the best is in the long run the favorite with the largest number. Even now, and very naturally, they are beset and bored with letters and requests from all sorts of "fast" young men, and irresistible young misses, to the effect that they would play more polkas, or tell the singer to repeat Vi ravviso, or lay those solemn symphonies and "Leonoras" and "Egmonts" on the shelf, and take down "Zampa" and "Zanetta":—perhaps too from music-publishers, who look to the Germanians to shed new lustre on their more saleable than classical sort of copyrights. But they know well enough that should they give concert after concert with no symphony, the prestige of their concerts would be gone, and they would lose the appreciative, constant few, with a so much the more doubtful chance of retaining the irresponsible and fickle many. Hence a mixed programme, always with a large half of the classical and solid, has become their settled and best-working policy; while for every extra venture of faith in the popular power to recognize a good thing, as in the giving of the Ninth Symphony, the Wagner programme, &c., they have pretty uniformly found their reward,—if not in the one night's receipts, yet in the greater prestige and profitableness of the whole campaign.

We have made progress. Formerly the case stood thus with us: 1. A large audience for music of the lightest and most miscellaneous kind, relieved by plenty of clap-trap appeals to other senses than the purely musical; 2. A considerable audience for miscellaneous concerts, with two grains of symphony to two of Italian opera, three of light French overtures, and three of Yankee Doodle and flute solos; 3. A very small "close communion" circle for secret worship of the classics in an upper chamber.

Now how stands it? There is no great mass audience, such as fills the Boston Music Hall, for merely light music; what there is of it is absorbed out of sight by specialties like "Negro Minstrelsy" and "Ossian's Bards." The masses go for the mixed programme, with a plenty of the light, but a more and more solid nucleus of Beethoven, Mozart, and the like. While the second class, that was, has almost risen to the point of coalescing and making common cause with the close-communers, and is ready and crying out for feasts of genius pure and unalloyed in music.

There remain then two large classes of concert-

goers (for observe, we do not speak of opera or oratorio, which win their exclusive admirers by charms not purely musical.) The largest is for miscellaneous music, averaging high; and the next largest is for music purely high and intellectual; while of these last many will often feel in the mood to mingle with the other. By the proposed arrangement, the Germanians will provide most perfectly for both. Those who want the classical alone, will pay of course a little higher than mass prices, since they are fewer in number, and hear each night two symphonies and two overtures with nothing to disturb the charm. Mark too the instructively historical progression in their scheme of programmes. The series begins with Haydn and ends with Wagner, the first and the last word of all that can fairly be called great orchestral music. It gives us, successively, the old classical, of the Augustan age of Haydn and Mozart, with the shadow of Beethoven coming; then the romantic, developed in Beethoven and his followers, Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn; and finally the purely modern, in a programme of Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Schumann and Wagner. Perhaps close criticism might improve it in a few details; perhaps it might make richer variety, without any lowering of tone, to add once or twice the piano-forte Concerto;—but here is probably as good a set of programmes as any large committee ever could agree upon. And shall we not make an earnest effort, friends, to have realized to our ears, what looks so captivating upon paper? The musical honor of Boston depends on it.

Meanwhile the miscellaneous cheap mass concerts of the Germanians will go on as usual; and few are there even of the most exacting classicists, who will not also yield to their attraction many a time. We have no fear that the two-fold and and separate provision will cause the miscellaneous programmes to sink down to the level of the merely frivolous. The mass of a Boston concert audience relish and demand a symphony, good overtures, &c., as truly as Lyceum publics put up only with the first-rate intellects for lecturers. There is frivolity about the outskirts of every audience, but the mass are serious and high in their requirements, and their silence carries with it a greater weight of consent than the hand-clappings and bravos of the others.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXXIII.

Boston, Nov. 28.—Was it not Beethoven who said of Handel, "He is the unequalled master of us all?"

I have seldom felt the justice of this more than last evening, all the way through the performance of "Samson" by the Handel and Haydn Society. The old Society, for save one association in Germany, I know of no voluntary amateur Choral Society in the world which numbers so many years as this Boston institution. It is certainly one of Boston's "peculiar institutions."

But, "Samson!" What a wealth of melody! What profound grief, sorrow, pathos! What majesty and grandeur! In nice discrimination of character I know hardly any work which surpasses it. Beethoven said, as he read the score of Der Freyschütz—he could never hear it—"That Max is the fellow—he stands out like a house!" So does the loud, boastful Harapha stand out prominent and clearly defined, as some huge building in a landscape. But this character is no better wrought out than the others. The dramatic force of the music is as visible in the manner in which the rousing of the hero from a state of hopeless despair—first to a desire for vengeance, and finally to that strong religious feeling, which makes him do and dare all to "make Jehovah's glory known," —in the seductive strains of Delilah—in the majesty of Micah, who seems to fill the place of the old Greek chorus in carrying on the action—and in every note of the heart-broken Manosh,—as in the more easily comprehended tones of the vain-glorious boaster. I can recall no one song, the music of which could be transferred to another without shocking our feelings of propriety. From the first note to the last, Samson sustains our friend H. T.'s theory of the definiteness of music. The same nice discrimination marks the choruses. Those of the Philistines are pervaded by a spirit totally different from that which gives life to every bar sung by the Jews. The contrast in Milton's text in these choruses is no better marked than in Handel's music to them. No matter in what this difference consists, Handel felt it, expressed it, and it is enough for me that I can feel and enjoy it. What if the forms in which the ideas are expressed be antiquated? in substance they are as fresh and new, as perennial in their beauty, as the Madonnas of Raphael.

Why has nobody done justice to the overture? Laugh who will, I place it among the great overtures. With what imposing "pomp and circumstance" it opens—"all the lords of the Philistines," their priests and mighty men, and the multitudes of spectators of the festivity—who filled all the house and "three thousand of whom, men and women, were upon the roof"—are gathering together, marching in solemn procession, with great shoutings and rejoicings to the vast temple of Dagon, there "to offer a great sacrifice." Henry says that the second movement always transports him in imagination into the midst of the hurry, bustle and confusion—the booths, tents and shows—of some great fair in Europe, the descriptions of which used to excite his fancy powerfully when a boy. Had not the composer something of the kind in view; to this day "a solemn feast" on the Rhine or in South Germany is pretty sure to have all these accompaniments, and a fair in Frankfurt or Leipsic, though shorn of its glory, which it had in Handel's time, still furnishes material enough for musical description.

How gloriously came forth those choruses last night in that beautiful hall! Not all, for here and there was something to be desired—and the hall made no secret of it—when the gold is not pure that touchstone reveals it—but generally they came to the ear as clear and distinct as a quartet. I have nowhere heard anything like it—not in Exeter Hall, London, not in the Sing-Akademie of Berlin, in no old cathedral, nor modern church constructed with express reference to the music of the Mass. Heretofore wherever I have attended grand choral performances, it has been necessary to secure some particular seat in order to hear well. In the Melodeon, for instance, there were certain points where the heaviest chorus would sound as if a huge curtain intervened, while your neighbor a few feet off would be almost deafened. Here every whisper on the stage came distinctly on the ear; there echo on echo brought but a confused jargon of sounds—chaos came again. It is precisely so at Niblo's in New York—be careful where you sit if you would not lose your sense of hearing. From the nature and laws of sound there must be a difference in power according to the position and distance of the hearer. When a room is large it must be judged accordingly. If any gentleman know how to construct a hall with 3000 seats, which the chirp of a cricket shall fill as it fills our little sitting room, he had better build it with all speed—for then we could have chamber concerts cheap. If the Quintette Club could play to 3000 persons, 12½ cents admittance would be no bad speculation.

Some things I wanted last night. The Organ was one—sadly wanted—the music was written to be performed with that instrument, and nothing can supply its place. John Bartlett's trumpet accompaniment, to Anna Stone's magnificent tones—especially in the ad libitum passages in the Seraphim song, was another want. The quivering, unearthly sound of the gong, swelling by little and little as Israel "weeps a louder and louder strain," was a third. The "Glorious Hero" chorons and air a fourth.

The Dead March was not quite so satisfactory as it used to be. Was there not a different selection of instruments? Was it not taken a particle too fast?

However, blessings on the old Handel and Haydn Society, and on the Germania Orchestra. May their shadows never be less!

Concerts of the Past Week.

THE "WAGNER NIGHT." We could not call the last Germania programme entirely a judicious one; although it had the charm of novelty, and much that was as excellent as new. Hearing only Wagner, and so much of it, was fatiguing and monotonous, considering the preponderance of brazen fortissimo in half of it. Had the concert both begun and ended with the overture to Tannhäuser, the one only complete and fair representation of Wagner; and (to make room for it) had the noisy Rienzi pieces, which only represent his early, undeveloped style, been omitted altogether, it would have answered two good ends. For the Tannhäuser overture is so admirable a whole in itself, and is so strikingly imaginative and beautiful, and so wonderfully popular withal, that the impression of one hearing would make every one eager to hear it more intelligently a second time; while the Rienzi overture, (which this time, as if on wiser second thought, was not applauded), not only added nothing to our appreciation of its author, but disturbed the charm of what preceded and what followed, and was oppressive by the noisy common-places of its latter half. The Tannhäuser was played with the utmost spirit, delicacy and precision; and the Germanians were more fully manned for it, having added to their number the long wanting second bassoon, and a new double bass. The "Ensemble and Chorus" (finale) from the same, was also very beautiful, and will receive new interest from the knowledge which Liszt gives us, in our translation to-day, of its position in the drama.

The selections from his last opera, Lohengrin, had a unique and spiritual beauty, which must, however, have been partly lost upon most hearers, since these were merely instrumental arrangements taken out of their dramatic connection. Thus who did not marvel at the solemn, mystical, contemplative, and almost sombre character of the "Procession of Bride and Bridesmaids?" Had we known, by reading the play, that the bride was a princess saint of the middle ages, that she was to wed a mysterious bridegroom, a knight of the Holy Graal, whom she had only known in a vision and in his sudden appearance to defend her in judicial combat from a frightful and malicious charge; that she was forbidden to inquire his name or history; and that the enemy, in this very marriage procession, was whispering into her ear the stimulants to anxious curiosity on the forbidden subject, we should have felt and understood the spirituality and mystery and sadness of the music. As it was we were without its motives.—The "Reception at the Emperor's," with its fine alternation of opposite parties of silvery trumpets, was full of chivalry and romance.

MME. SONTAG AND THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—The miscellaneous Sacred Concert last Sunday evening, was one of the most satisfactory ever listened to by a Boston audience. We were astonished by the power and freshness, as well as by the never-failing beauty, the ever more and more interesting and unique quality and color of Madame SONTAG's voice. We were agreeably disappointed in her rendering of selections which we feared would overtask her strength. "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was given with much more vital emphasis and feeling, much more sustained loftiness of style, than as she sang it last year. There was, to be sure, too much of trilling and of ornament, but the exquisitely beautiful manner in which the last strain died away upon her lips we shall not soon forget. Rossini's Infammatus was superbly rendered, eliciting an imperative encore. "Let the bright Seraphim," from "Samson," saving some curtailment and much marring by the trumpet obligato (which quite imperfectly fulfilled said obligation), electrified and delighted the audience in her spirited, bright, elegant delivery. Never before in Boston have we heard Sontag in such voice.

In the duet: Quis est homo, she was of course all that its fine, flowery divisions called for, and she was effectively seconded by Miss ANNA STONE, allowing for the too great contrast of the latter's low tones with the silvery soprano of the former. Miss Stone sang also, "There were Shepherds," and Fac ut portem, in her best manner. Also with Mrs. WENTWORTH, the Handel duet: "O lovely Peace," whose melody flowed very smoothly and sweetly from both voices. "Come unto me," was sung with feeling and great purity of intonation, but a little too slowly, by the latter lady. Sig. Rocco's bass was loud and vigorous in his Romanza and in Pro Peccatis; but the pathos thereof was not much unlike the pathos in his buffo parts.

The Handel and Haydn chorus was in great force and never told, to our ear, so effectively. The "Hallelujah" rang sublimely in that hall. So did the other choruses from the "Messiah," and the concluding one from "Samson": Let their celestial concerts all unite. The GERMANIA orchestra opened the concert with an overture, (Spohr's, to Jessonda)—one of Handel's had been better—and played the Pastoral Symphony from the "Messiah," and the accompaniments delightfully.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The programme of the second Concert proved, as we anticipated, much more stimulating and digestible, than the first one. It is a bad plan to give all new pieces. The new Quartet (op. 8) of our friend and townsman, C. C. PERKINS, was followed through its four elaborate movements with eager interest, and on the whole with very general pleasure. It is certainly a great advance upon his earlier efforts, his two symphonies, for instance. It has much more unity and continuity of thought, and much more clear, persistent working through of themes. The allegro was less striking than the other movements, consisting of a rather common theme and counter theme, of a cheerful, simple character, worked up without much episode; yet clear, agreeable, and graceful. The Andante is much more elaborate and rich in treatment; revealing sometimes a depth of feeling and traces of a Mendelssohnian learning. The Scherzo is marked by a charming originality of rhythm, with long, flowing phrases; but excited an expectation which was not answered in the Trio. The Finale is an Allegro vivace of a good deal of spirit. But we dare not affirm much in detail after a single hearing. Graceful it was throughout, and clear, and seldom heavy, if its ideas, sometimes felicitous, were not inspired.

Beethoven's "Krentzer" Sonata was admirably selected for the next piece. It was played with great spirit by Mr. GÖCKEL and AUGUST FRIES. The latter, especially, in one of those beautiful variations of the Andante, which was unanimously encored, showed that he could play with perfect purity of intonation and of style. Mr. Gockel showed a masterly execution, somewhat hard and from the wrist, and sometimes a little careless; but his playing won much applause, particularly in his own brilliant Concertini: Hommage à Mendelssohn. Mendelssohn's second Quintet (in B flat, op. 87), is full of spirit and imagination. Mr. WULF FRIES with his violoncello discoursed exquisitely upon a rather sentimental theme, by Stern, which did not seem to lead to much.

Of Mme. SONTAG's Farewell Concerts we must speak next week.

Fruits of American Musical Studies in Europe.

With pleasure we give place to the two following communications. The earnest aspirations of our young countrymen in the higher fields of composition are certainly worthy of all praise and encouragement.

I.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

"QUARTET IN A, op. 8, (dedicated to Mr. James C. D. Parker,) first time, C. C. PERKINS."—Programme of the Second Concert of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

A new offering has been laid before our musical public. It comes from one of our own number, one whose earnest efforts not only to cultivate his gifts, but to make them serviceable to those around him, deserve an earnest recognition. Mr. Charles C. Perkins sends us from Leipsic a Quartet of his composition.

It is not the work of a mere beginner. The inscription, "Op. 8," proves that the powers producing it have been already tried. It needs not, therefore, to be received either with the overwrought enthusiasm or with the intensified coldness frequently attending the earliest productions of a composer. Not that this composition is to be taken as the limit of the development to which its author is to attain. He is still a young man. Even were he old, he would be striving onward. But here we have a work of his manhood, a work not only of promise, but of performance, not only of aspiration, but of experience.

Yet we cannot pretend to give a proper account of the Quartet. A single hearing entitles no one to praise or to blame without reservation. What struck us as the chief characteristic of the composition was the neatness with which it is worked up. There are few or no rough places over which the performers or the hearers are obliged to vault precipitately. All goes smoothly, almost uninterruptedly. The themes, however, though treated with equal carefulness, are of unequal force. Some are of a common character, while others rise to much more than ordinary tastefulness and originality. The Andante gave us, as it apparently gave the entire audience, the most general gratification. It contains passages of real solemnity. Next to this movement, we preferred the Finale, in which there is perhaps more of creative skill than in the Andante. We are not sure that a few bars of the Scherzo are not the most original of the whole composition. But after all, we revert to the Andante as to the movement in which the composer did himself the greatest credit. The Andante movements of all his compositions have always appeared to us the most successful. They bear a mark of their own. It is that of a spirit devoted to Art in its purest, loftiest forms.

Welcome, in fine, to this new production of our townsman! Thanks to him for his thoughts of home as he labors beyond the sea! Thanks, likewise, to his brother musicians who embrace his work and bring it to our knowledge! Theirs is an office of friendship and of honor.

II.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

We learn through a private letter from Florence, that at the annual meeting of the "Accademia delle Belle Arti" of that city, the last month, M. Fétis of Paris received the degree of Maestro di Capella; and that of "il Professore Onorario" was conferred on two others; one of whom is our townsman, Mr. F. BOOTH, in compliment to his Quartets for stringed instruments and other compositions. Of the former a writer from Italy remarks, "Although prepared for excellent music, I was both surprised and charmed by the originality, unity and finish of the harmony,—I wish it might be performed before an audience capable of appreciating it; and a German artist, himself a composer, pronounced it as ranking with the best style of Quartet Music." As the Academy has the reputation of being rather choice in its favors, this consideration is quite a gratification to us as Bostonians; and particularly as evincing readiness on the part of the Italians to recognize and admit American talent; in contradistinction to the spirit shown just now in other quarters.

We have been so long accustomed to hear American knowledge or taste in the Fine Arts decry, that it is with some surprise that we find that, besides the resident sculptors abroad, past and present, whose fame is a prominent feature in the national pride—Boston alone has sent forth in the last few years a dozen or more virtuosi and students, who are diligently pursuing their studies in France, Italy and Germany; and to whose successful future we look forward with certainty.

Gottschalk, with his unassuming and gentlemanly bearing, who, we consider by far the greatest pianist yet heard in this country, if we may judge by the electrical effect produced by his rendering of the great Sestette in Lucia, has proved himself a worthy pioneer for his musical and returning countrymen.

P.

Mr. RYAN's advertisement deserves the attention of our lady amateurs. After so many Symphony and Chamber Concerts, there should be a curiosity to understand the technical structure not only of Sonatas, but of Symphonies, Quartets, Trios, &c., which are all written in the Sonata form. Few have had Mr. Ryan's advantages for the elucidation and analysis of such works.

He is esteemed an excellent harmonist, is familiar with all the best scores in this kind, and has himself produced some good Quartets and Quintets. We wish him success in a task as needed, as it is new.

Gleason's Pictorial.

THE NEW YEAR. 1854.

On the first of January next, "GLEASON'S PICTORIAL" will commence its sixth volume, and will appear vastly improved in all respects, with a superb new heading, new type and dress throughout, and will be printed upon the finest paper. As the proprietor of the "Pictorial" has purchased the entire good-will of Barnum's "New York Illustrated News," and has merged that journal in the "Pictorial," the public will reap the advantage of this concentration of the strength of the two papers upon one, both in the artistic and literary departments. The same brilliant host of contributors and artists will be engaged on "Gleason's Pictorial" as heretofore, and a large addition is also made to the corps, both in talent and number. The most liberal arrangements have been completed, and such as will enable the proprietor to produce by far the finest illustrated journal yet published, and much superior to the present issue of the paper. The columns of the "Pictorial" will constantly be beautified by all that can please and instruct in art and science, and its literary department will fully sustain the high reputation it has so long enjoyed.

The pages of "Gleason's Pictorial" will contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female. Sketches of beautiful scenery, taken from life, will also be given, with numerous specimens from the animal kingdom, the birds of the air, and the fish of the sea, and it will present in its mechanical execution an elegant specimen of art. It will contain fifteen hundred and sixty-four square inches, giving a great amount of reading matter and illustrations—and forming a mammoth weekly paper of sixteen octavo pages.

The terms of "GLEASON'S PICTORIAL" for the year 1854 will remain as heretofore, viz:—1 subscriber, one year, $9.00; 2 subscribers, one year, $5.00; 4 subscribers, one year, $9.00; 8 subscribers, one year, $16.

THE SONATA FORM.

THOMAS RYAN, respectfully begs leave to inform those who are in the habit of hearing Symphonies, Quartets, Quintets, Sonatas, or any works of that class, that he is prepared to explain or analyze them, either in small classes or to single pupils. His long experience in the performance and in the composition of such works, added to his being in possession of the scores of almost every work of that class presented in Boston, gives him peculiar advantages. The knowledge of the form is almost indispensable towards the understanding in the slightest manner, and will infinitely enhance the pleasure derived in the hearing of them. It is a subject which amateurs of the slightest pretensions ought to feel interested in, as new and old compositions are brought forward daily. The subscriber would be happy to receive pupils for this alone, or in connection with Thorough Bass.

Piano, Violin, Flute, or Clarinet lessons given. Communications left at GEO. P. REED'S Music Store, or at his residence, 5 Franklin Street, immediately attended to. Dec. 3.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED, ZUNDEL'S MELODEON INSTRUCTOR, IN SEVEN PARTS.

PART I.—Elements of Music. Part II.—Progressive Finger Exercises. Part III.—Airs, Marches, Waltzes, Variations, &c. Part IV.—Favorite Movements from Operas. Part V.—Voluntaries and Interludes. Part VI.—Selections from Oratorios. Part VII.—Modulations. By JOHN ZUNDEL, Organist of St. George's (Dr. Tyng's) Church, New York, Author of "Two Hundred and Fifty Voluntaries and Interludes," "The Amateur Organist," &c.

This is the most comprehensive, thorough and complete work of the kind ever issued, forming a very extensive collection of the choicest music, as well as a self-instructor for the instrument. Most of the Melodeon instructors heretofore published, have been mere compilations from Piano Books. This Work is emphatically a Melodeon book, every piece in it being arranged with especial adaptation to that instrument. It contains 144 pages folio, and is gotten up in elegant style, with cuts representing positions of the body, hands, &c. Any one remitting us two dollars, can have a copy of the work sent him by mail, post-paid. It is better to order it through a dealer, however, as so large a book is liable to injury in going by mail. THE GREATEST METHOD OF THE AGE:

FOR THE

PIANO-FORTE,

Is an Instruction Book which will enable one to Become a Great Pianist
IN THE SHORTEST TIME!

THIS Work is admitted by the most celebrated Pianists and Teachers, both in Europe and America, to be BY FAR THE MOST INGENUOUS, SIMPLE, PROGRESSIVE AND COMPREHENSIVE METHOD FOR THE PIANO THAT HAS EVER BEEN PRESENTED TO THE PUBLIC,—embracing a complete system, from the very outset to the highest classical music.

The anatomy of the hands is shown by beautifully colored plates. The entire work surpasses all previous musical publications, as regards mechanical appearance and elegance.

The author, NATHAN RICHARDSON, has spent the last five years in Europe for the sole purpose of getting up an Instruction Book, which would embrace the styles and effective Exercises of ALL distinguished Pianists and Teachers. To accomplish that object, he was assisted by

EIGHTEEN EMINENT EUROPEAN PIANISTS.

The result has been, an Instruction Book so comprehensive and ingenious, that a pupil will acquire the styles and mechanical difficulties of all celebrated Pianists, and that, too, with far less labor and practice than is usually required to learn an ordinary composition, under the old methods.

All who are interested in Music, are invited to call at the

and examine the work for themselves, and they will be surprised that a work which appears so simple should guarantee such wonderful results.

It is beautifully got up, in embossed cloth, gilt edges, sides, and back, 330 pages, and sold at $4 00 per single copy.

A very acceptable Present for Christmas and New Year.

Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON, Winthrop House, Boston.

Dear Sir—I have made a thorough practical examination of your "Modern School for the Piano-Forte" and hereby certify that I was much pleased with the progressive and ingenious exercises it contains. You have certainly shown the pupil a way of overcoming the great difficulties of the Piano, which is in many respects far superior to any other I have ever seen. The Book embraces the styles of so many different authors, and you have given so many excellent examples, that a pupil cannot fail to become a good player (if gifted with the least musical talent) through this Method.

I heartily recommend it to every one that studies the Piano-Forte. I remain yours truly

ALFRED JAEHL.

CAUTION TO THE PUBLIC.

[Translated by the Editor.]

WAGNER'S "TANNHÄUSER."

BY FRANZ LISZT.

III.

[Concluded.]

At the beginning of the third Act, after the return of the pilgrims, who this time, as they cross the stage, take up the entire religious thema of the overture, Elizabeth kneels before the image of the Madonna, which we saw in the first act, and offers up her last prayer, in which she seems to breathe forth her last sighs for him, whom she has loved so patiently and so forgivingly. The long holding notes of the wind instruments, rendered sombre by the half stifled groaning of the corno di bassetto, help us to feel her deadly exhaustion. One might almost say that Wagner was unwilling to forget a single stage in this agony of hope, so careful is he to gather up each cry of anguish that escapes from every recollection hovering about her; reviving in the orchestra, as things that must come back in the consciousness of the dying maiden, fragmentary reminiscences of the past, of her intercourse with Tannhäuser, her duet with him in the second act, the prayer that saved his life, the song of Wolfram, when he tried to restore unity among the minstrels, and to rescue Tannhäuser from his illusions, &c. * *

Wolfram alone, after she has withdrawn, turns to the evening star and commissions it to pour out its balm of consolation upon the maiden who will not be comforted. This romanza for baritone is one of the most melancholy outbursts of love, and affords one of those moments of repose in which the attention, overstrained and distracted by the action of the drama, can surrender itself entirely to a purely lyrical emotion. But this resting point was indispensably necessary before the finale of the opera, which may be counted among the most astonishing of Wagner's creations. We allude to the scene in which Tannhäuser is recognized by Wolfram and tells him the story of his pilgrimage.

The verses of this narrative are exceedingly fine; but Wagner has found the secret of uniting them with song with such an admirable correspondence, of so completely blending words and music, that it is impossible on the one hand to let the words pass unobserved, so greatly is their clear and intelligible declamation brought out by the musical intonations, or on the other hand to err so far as to consider the music merely a subordinate matter, simply used to make the words more prominent. Wagner is very far from exposing himself to such a calumny, as that which accuses Gluck of a blasphemous speech; to-wit that the great master was heard to exclaim, before sitting down to compose: "Great God, grant me grace to forget that I am a musician!" Great musician as he is, Wagner still remains no less distinguished as a poet and prose writer; but however much he may be of a poet, he finds only in music the perfect expression of his feeling, and indeed so perfect, that he alone can tell us, whether he suits his words to his melodies, or whether he seeks melodies for his words. The bitter and cutting narrative, which flows with painful sarcasms from the compressed lips of the desperate excommunicated man, is so heart-rending, that there were some persons who could not endure it to the close. In this multiform confession, wrenched from the most fearful anguish, there is a succession of recitative, speech, exclamation, shriek, sardonic laughter, all mingled with such pathetic truth and such variety of passionate, inconsolable and frantic emotions,—hopes realized or deceived, pity refused to gnawing wounds of conscience, pardon forever impossible to sin repented of in bitterest tears, the most pressing entreaties rejected, the most glowing remorse spurned, and finally extreme terror at the thought of unavoidable perdition,—that this moment seems itself to form a drama within a drama. By its sombre coloring, by its terrible death-anguish, it is sharply discriminated from what precedes and what follows.

The terrors of this fearful night, whose gloom continually deepens with Tannhäuser's narrative, reach their climax at the recollection of Dame Venus's habitation in the mountain, which opens, to swallow up its prey, while the Goddess shows herself and calls to her victim to draw him back to her. These suggestions of voluptuous pleasures, fanning an unextinguishable flame, while they add their thrilling vibrations to the convulsive aspects of the unhappy man, raise the awful aspect of this moment to the intensest pitch, and impress upon it the most preternatural torments, which the human imagination has embodied in its conception of hell. During this interlude, which offers to the senses only alluring forms, and yet excites our utter horror, since it lends a more poetic truth to the infernal sabbath, where mortals hold intercourse with demons, than the hideous, grotesque and repulsive representations thereof given with equally bad taste by the most different arts,—you hear the Allegro of the overture behind the scenes, as if it sounded from the bowels of the mountain. Tannhäuser, in the extremity of his despair, seeking Venus, with a mournful shriek takes up again the passage in the overture, which there led in the dominant melody, and which now prolongs itself in the orchestra by a shuddering tremolo of violins. This confounding and electric out-gush of voluptuousness is interrupted by deep silence, as Wolfram pronounces the name of Elizabeth, which Tannhäuser in a stupor of amazement repeats. The parti-colored twilight disappears.

The mountain closes, and the spectator says to himself: "The earth has him again!"

Just as the funeral procession appears, bearing Elizabeth upon a bier, and the wretched sinner sinks down by the side of her pale corpse with the words: "Holy Elizabeth, pray for me!" and dying there is finally united with the object of his love; just as the long funeral train, headed by the landgrave, and attended by a crowd of priests, knights and noble ladies, fills the whole scene with a dense mass, making it resound with dirges, accompanied by the muffled toll of bells,—just then the sun comes up over the sorrow-clouded valley. At this very instant all, as at a visible sign that the eternal light has glorified the two lovers, strike up a tremendous chorus to the first eight bars of the religious theme of the overture, a "Hallelujah! he is redeemed! Hallelujah!", with which a group of pilgrims, who have just come from Rome, bearing the news of the miracle of salvation, announced to the implacable bishop by the blooming of his staff, unite their voices. This Hallelujah, by its holy unction, by its glory-radiating splendor of joy, gives us confidence and hope again and lets us revel as it were in heavenly refreshment.

The two lovers, whose fate we have followed with such intense anxiety, have ceased to live. Excess of suffering has killed them both. Yet, no sooner has this great drama ended, passed before our eyes, and become an image in our memory, a shudder in our heart, than our soul is comforted and again cheered up; the wounds it gave us are healed, the pains it occasioned us are quieted. We believe that the noble and long-suffering bridal pair have arrived in a safe haven. We believe them happy. We believe them surrounded by an incorruptible, unfading and immortal bliss. He who has heard the last prayer of Elizabeth, so full of humility and love, could he not in this hearing find for her the triumph and beatitude? At the sight of this soiled destiny, trailed like a broken reed upon the earth, but blooming again, like a radiant lily, in the skies, we clearly feel how the erring may be saved, so mighty is the power of religious exaltation contained in the finale, which forms the epilogue to the opera. To lead the minds of a frivolous public thus, by means of the commanding power of Art, beyond its ordinary bounds of fancy:—to make it thus experience the feeling of true joy springing out of actual sorrow, through the transporting power of spirituality and of the highest longing of our nature:—is not this one of the most beautiful and glorious victories for which poets and artists are privileged to strive!

[NOTE.—We have now completed our imperfect translation of Liszt's description of the Tannhäuser. He adds still a fourth chapter, of general critical appreciation of the work; but as the article has already reached a greater length than we anticipated, and as so much has been said concerning Richard Wagner in these columns, we here suspend our task, at least for the present. We hope ere long to find room for some part of Liszt's account of Lohengrin.—ED.]

New Opera by Mr. Joseph Duggan.

Mr. Joseph Duggan, a former resident of Philadelphia, has written an operetta which was lately produced at the St. James Theatre, London. It contains only two characters, one of which was sustained by Mr. Drayton, also a Philadelphian.—The daily journals of London speak well of it, and it was highly applauded by the audience. The critic of the Athenæum, however, who is always hard to please, speaks of the work as follows:

"Mr. Duggan's first dramatic trial took place on Saturday last,—when "Pierre," a musical sketch by him, was brought forward. A more difficult task to musical aspirants can hardly be proposed than that of writing a serious one-act opera containing only two characters, and those soprano and basso, were the book ever so good. A more lugubrious look, however, than that of "Pierre" could hardly have been contrived; since it is the tale of a melancholy-mad youth cured by a village maiden who sings "the songs of happier days,"—which tale is told in prose and in rhyme not always moving the emotions intended by the author. To counterbalance such auspicious conditions as the visible affection with which the dreary part of the maniac is embraced by Mr. Drayton, and the nicely finished singing of Miss Lowe,—the orchestra in King Street is weak and ill-compounded—the brass instruments being all the evening predominant over the stringed quartet.

"The above are chances seriously hazarding for a composer untried on the stage; and it increases our opinion of the inherent power of Mr. Duggan that, despite of them all, his music contrived to succeed so well with his audience. The reason of such success is told in the facts,—that he commands a simple, easy, and elegant vein of melody,—and that though he is timid and hampered in construction, he evinces that true feeling for the stage which is a natural gift rather than an acquisition. He shows, however, far too ambitious notions of instrumentation in this little work: displaying an unwise love for trumpets, trombones, cornets, and all those other blatant orchestral creatures which fall fitly enough into the ranks when a Cæsar enters Rome, but are tyrannically out of place in a tale where Frenzy plays with forget-me-nots and violets, where Constancy warbles concerning heather-bells, and where the whole tone of color should be tender, delicate, and pastoral. More veteran caterers, however, than Mr. Duggan cannot present their draught of milk and honey without putting pepper and brandy into the mixture; and he is, therefore, hereby warned—rather than blamed for an offence which is not of his originating. With a book less exacting in form, less dismal in subject, and less unlucky in text, he might, with the experience which "Pierre" should give him, write a fresh, and pretty, and lasting comic opera.

It appears that the "run" which "Pierre" might have had was brought to an abrupt close.—The speculators who took the theatre had promised the band that they should get their pay, due for some time back, at the end of the piece. The promise was not kept and the performers refused to return to the orchestra. A scene of uproar ensued; Mr. Drayton as stage manager, appeared and made a speech about "an accident behind the scenes," which increased the fun and tumult. At length a dozen or so of performers were induced to go into the orchestra, and the last act of the Sonnambula was given. The theatre was not reopened.—Phil. Bulletin.

TAGLIONI AND PASTA.—These two celebrated artistes—the one long regarded as the Queen of the Dance, the other the Queen of Song—are now residing in romantic villas on the shores of the Lake of Como, surrounded by all the comforts and luxuries which taste can devise and wealth procure. A lady who lately travelled through that part of Italy gives the following interesting description of these two famous women:

"I know it will delight you to have a letter from me, written on the banks of Lake Como, surrounded by such scenery as the eye never beholds elsewhere. Fancy me seated at a small table of a window overlooking this lovely scene, more lovely far than all the descriptions of tourists, pictures of artists, or romances of the poets. To traverse the placid waters, we took a row boat, the most pleasant vehicle imaginable. I had a little table in the middle, on which I wrote impressions of the scenery in my journal. Our two oarsmen were as talkative as Creoles, and gave me copious descriptions of all the remarkable places.

We passed the villa of Taglioni, within a few yards of the window, at which was seated that world-renowned danseuse herself. We glided so slowly and so closely that I could see her almost as plainly as if in the room. She looked faded, wrinkled, pallid and old. Oh! who could believe her so recently the graceful and lovely embodiment of La Sylphide? It is scarcely seven years since she retired. Taglioni is very rich, and owns quite a number of villas on the Lake, now rented out. By her side sat a fair and lovely young woman, her married daughter, the Princess Traskoe, and the flag of Russia floated over the pretty villa.

The next we came to was that of the renowned Pasta, the friend and preceptress of Parodi. Only think of two such celebrities—the fairy of the dance and the queen of song—side by side in early fame, and next door neighbors in their old age. We landed at Pasta's villa, and proceeded to pay a visit to its famous mistress. Unfortunately, she was on a visit in Genoa; unfortunate for us, but happily for her only child, a resident there. Still, her waiting maid (French) showed us all over the house, even to the bedroom of the great cantatrice; the floor of which is of pure marble, laid out in mosaic of the most exquisite workmanship. Busts and pictures of her, in all her great characters, were abundantly displayed.—Boston Jour.

A Monster Organ.

A gentleman writing from Hull, England, under date of Nov. 7, to a gentleman in Philadelphia, gives the following description of an organ about to be built in London for the new Crystal Palace, at Sydenham:—

I have just seen the scheme of the monster organ to be built for the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. Its contemplated erection has not, as yet, been made public. So that you will doubtless be apprized of its dimensions before any one in America at least. It will be a prodigious instrument—at least three times as large as any ever constructed. It is to occupy a position at the east end of the transept. It will contain, in all, one hundred and thirty nine stops, and ten thousand one hundred and eighteen pipes:—

The Great Organ	40 stops and 3132 pipes.
The Choir Organ	20 " 1682 "
The Swell Organ	22 " 1624 "
The Solo Organ	27 " 2030 "
The Pedal Organ	30 " 3650 "

It will be one hundred and twenty feet high, fifty feet deep, with a breadth of ninety five feet, and will have four rows of keys.

The cost of this mammoth instrument is to be £25,000, or $125,000! The bellows will be worked by steam.

Mr. Hill, of London, has the contract for its construction, and three years are allowed him for its completion. The largest pipe will be sixty-four feet long, which is double the length of any now in use. It will be built in stories, like a house, with staircases, &c. The sides of the case to be of glass, and the 64 feet pipe to stand in front.

Our German Correspondence.

LEIPSIC, Nov. 11, 1853.

J. S. DWIGHT, Esq.—Dear Sir:—On my way from Frankfort to this city, I made a little trip into Bavaria, and perhaps a short account of it may not be without interest to you and your readers.

In Frankfort the concert season was just commencing when I left, so that I have nothing of especial interest to report. In July, Johanna Wagner favored us with several representations. I saw her in "Romeo and Juliet," "The Prophet," and "Fidelio." With her rendering of the "Fidelio" I was especially pleased. She has a contralto voice, to which she is now trying to add a mezzo soprano; I fear for the result of her experiment, for she runs the risk of ruining her voice entirely. Indeed I have heard that it already shows the effects of her efforts. With reference to her ability as a mere vocalist, I am inclined to think that she hardly comes up to the very first rank. Her execution is sometimes heavy, and the different registers seem not to be so thoroughly united as is possible. But as the friends of Richard Wagner say that we must not criticise his music except in connection with the words, so perhaps we ought to hear the Wagner in her character as a dramatic vocalist. Here she shows herself indeed an artist of great powers. I have never seen anything in operatic representation to surpass the "prison scene" in Fidelio for dramatic effect.

Hector Berlioz has also recently given two concerts in Frankfurt. I attended the first, in the Theatre, to "a most beggarly account of empty boxes." I hardly feel competent to pass any opinion upon the merits of his works. I can only say that he seemed to find but little favor with the musicians. Ferdinand Hiller invited the musical people to a soirée, in which the programme was entirely made of his own compositions. He seems to have great versatility of talent. He is, in the first place, a very fine pianist, an excellent conductor, and as a composer his various Symphonies, Concertos, &c., together with a great variety of smaller works, have established him among the best musicians in Germany. But I am quite forgetting about my journey. Passing the first night at Stuttgart, the capital of Wurtemberg, I was disappointed in not being able to hear an opera, for the company have a high reputation. The only thing in the shape of a concert was a performance by a men's singing society, in connection with poetical improvisations on a great variety of subjects. The performances of the men were only tolerable. But I was really interested in the improvisations. The affair was managed in this way: The improviser requested the audience to suggest a number of historical subjects. A large number were given, such as Cherubini, the Reformation, Cromwell, Washington (received with great applause by the American delegation), and without a moment's hesitation he commenced and with great fluency recited a poem, or at least a rhyme, which occupied perhaps ten minutes. Afterwards followed similar recitations, styled comic, didactic, &c. The performers certainly showed a wonderful familiarity with words, and seemed to be highly appreciated by the audience.

A day's journey from Stuttgart, just giving time to look into the great Cathedral at Ulm, brought me to Munich. My short stay here convinced me this is a very musical city. Probably nowhere in Europe can finer church music be heard than here. The churches have generally organs of the largest class. Masses can be heard in all varieties, with orchestral accompaniment, with organ accompaniment, and also without any accompaniment. The choir at the King's Chapel is one of the most celebrated in Germany. With the exception of a short introduction on the organ, the mass was sung entirely without accompaniment. Such a blending of voices I have never heard in a chorus; and such perfect intonation throughout. I am inclined to think that voices unaccompanied would be found to produce a fine effect in some of our church services. I was fortunate enough during my stay in Munich to have an opportunity of hearing the great Mass in D major, by Beethoven. This work, on account of its great difficulties, both orchestral and choral, has never been performed but a few times. Prof. Schindler, Beethoven's biographer, in speaking to me with reference to this Mass, expressed the opinion that it was one of his greatest works. The Mass was certainly in the highest degree effective. The "Sanctus" in particular seemed to me especially clear—not to intimate that it is not all so, for one must hear such a work many times to comprehend the design of the author. The orchestra was very large, directed by Franz Lachner. The choir was formed from the King's Chapel with some additions. The "Münicheners" seem to be very proud of their orchestra, and even claim for it the highest rank. Certainly the performance of this Mass indicated a high state of perfection.

Having been favored with an introduction to Franz Hauser, the Director of the Royal Conservatory, I was invited to attend one of the rehearsals of the pupils and also visited the entire establishment. As far as appliances are concerned, this institution is one of the best furnished in Europe. In the first place, the rooms are very conveniently located in a large building called the Royal Odeon. In the centre is the great Music Hall, which almost rivals our's in Boston in beauty and adaptation to its object. The rest of this building is occupied for the Conservatory. I passed through the various rooms and found a large musical library for study and reference, and in addition to a number of rooms appropriated to the different branches of instruction, quite a large hall for the public performances of the pupils, furnished with a fine organ. Those who have tried to study this instrument in Germany will appreciate the advantages of this arrangement. In many places it is almost impossible to have conveniences for practicing the organ at any price. And what think you is the expense of instruction in the Royal Conservatory at Munich for one year, in as many branches of the science as one wishes to take? Forty florins, or eighteen dollars in our currency! So that if we take two lessons a week in three different departments, each lesson will cost the enormous sum of six cents. This institution is in part supported by the government, which fact accounts for the low price of instruction. The Director also informed me that it was a special request of the king that particular attention should be paid to the department of singing. Although this is the case, yet I have no doubt that good instruction is afforded the pupils in every department. On the whole I should place the musical advantages of Munich next to those of Leipzig. For, as in Leipzig, there is an excellent series of classical concerts during the winter. I have been thus minute in my description of this institution, because I have supposed it was not as well known as some of the others. Munich as an Art-city in general has of course a great advantage over Leipzig, and as a place of residence is in some respects to be preferred. But with all the advantages afforded one for studying in Germany, both in reference to the superior facilities and the extremely low price of tuition, it seems to be quite questionable to the friends of the "American School of Music," whether young men had better not, after all, stay at home. I saw by one of the late numbers of your journal, that the editor of a "Musical Advertiser" had opened quite a warfare upon us poor "students in a foreign land." He thinks that it is quite possible that we "may learn something," but that we shall be quite unfit to teach the "masses" with our "imported systems." Now it is really very cruel in Mr. Bird, and withal almost discouraging to us, to hear such an opinion expressed from so high an authority. But I cannot quite make up my mind entirely to give up the "old fogies" yet, and am really expecting to derive some little benefit from studying the "worn out and dilapidated systems," worked out by the long labors and experiences of the great masters in the Art. And I, for one, shall persevere in trying to improve myself in general musical culture, hoping thereby to do something in an humble way toward helping on the good cause.

Let the editor of the "Singing School Companion" wrap himself up in the American flag and lie down waiting for the day-dawn of the "American School" of Music; but it becomes all who have a real love for the Art, for what is good and true in music, to be "up and doing."

During the few days that I have already spent in Leipzig there has been the usual rush of concerts. Last Thursday evening at the Gewandhaus we had, in the second part, Symphony No. 7 of Beethoven, and in the first part a variety of Songs and Piano Forte pieces, including a Concerto of Chopin played by Fraulein Marie Wieck, of Dresden. There are at present a great number of persons studying music in Leipzig, several from America, from England, Holland, &c. Indeed it is almost impossible to get lessons from the best teachers. The Conservatory has at present more pupils than ever before. I think one hundred and twenty, in all.

G. W. P.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXXIV.

Nov. 29.—A friend has been describing to me a private concert at Northampton, Thanksgiving evening, at the Mansion House. The company numbered some sixty or seventy, and closed the evening after music with collation and social dance. The main attraction was Beethoven's C minor Symphony, performed, as it used to be in presence of the composer, at Czerny's house in Vienna, by four young ladies, amateurs, upon two pianos. My friend describes the effect as being far better than he had conceived possible. The music had been thoroughly rehearsed, and was given with great feeling. The rest of the programme consisted of a selection of fine old English Glees, a class of music worthy far more attention than it receives now-a-days. This is progress in the right direction.

Dec. 11. (At "the Den.") The conversation turned upon Dwight's Journal and its contents, among other matters upon the articles in the early numbers upon American voices. W. was kind enough to say, "I was much pleased at your defence of our people as being naturally behind none in natural musical gifts. The musical capabilities of our people are good enough in all respects, and as to the mere question of voices, I am willing to go to the extent of putting our New England people at the head. I agree heartily with what you said upon them."

D.—Thank you for the compliment. I could only compare our people with the Germans and English, except in so far as the choruses of Italian Operas would enable me to judge.

W.—As to Italy, I passed many months there; and of all unmusical, ear-splitting, nerve-destroying noises, a company of Italian peasants, singing the praises of the Madonna, with a bagpipe accompaniment, is the worst. They have no conception of harmony, apparently.

D.—I remember, in one of Mozart's letters from Italy, he speaks of hearing a pair of street singers interpret a piece of music, singing the same melody in perfect fifths from the first note to the last. I can imagine nothing worse. It is hard enough to hear a German drinking song, sung by a company of students, where bass, tenor, and the treble of boys, sing the same notes, only octaves apart.

W.—Valery says there seems to be no appreciation of music among the Neapolitans; that they hissed Haydn's "Creation" some years ago, and that the managers dare not produce Mozart in the theatres. I agree with Valery. I have heard the most boisterous applause bestowed there upon trash in which I could discern no spark of merit of any kind whatsoever. As to the voices of the choruses there, or even anywhere upon the Italian stages, or in their church choirs, they are, so far as my observation extends, bad—very bad. As to the spoken language, though in the mouths of the educated classes Italian is the most mellifluous of European tongues, there can hardly be anything more barbarous, harsh and discordant, than it is when spoken by the peasantry, especially in the neighborhood of Florence.

As to singing in the churches, my observation is that it improves as one goes North. The famous Sistine Chapel choir, when I heard it, had no very good voices, and its peculiarities were owing principally to an artificial voice now nowhere else heard—and perhaps no longer there. I heard no mass in Italy equal to those of St. Stephen's, or St. Mathew's in Vienna, of the Royal Chapel at Dresden, or at the Cologne Cathedral. The volume and quality of tone from the choir is as much better in these places than in Italy, as the music they sing—Mozart, Haydn, Cherubini, &c.—is better than the pot pourris from operas, which are now so often heard there. The finest voices I ever heard in church services were at the Imperial Chapel in St. Petersburg, and in the Monasteries about Moscow. At one of these, a few miles from the city, I went one evening to hear a choir of men sing the Greek service—by all odds the most effective church music I ever heard—at all events, I did not go home till morning. The services consisted mostly of chants, generally sung pianissimo. I cannot recall the music, as some years have passed, but distinctly remember the effect—like enchantment—which it had upon me.

D.—Something, I suppose, like my recollections of vespers in the cathedral at Strasburg. I came up there from Basle one Sunday morning, expecting to be in season for high mass, but was delayed on the way. In the afternoon, however, I entered the great doors and made my way in the solemn twilight, caused by the uncommonly dark glass in the windows near to the grand altar, where a chorus of nuns and other women were chanting one of the old antiphonal chants of the eighth century. I have no remembrance of the tune—so to speak—but the delightful soothing effect of that music is not forgotten. The voices were delicious, but not more so than I hear at home.

By the way, what a curious effect is produced in some parts of Central Europe by the sing-like tone of the people in conversation.

W.—Yes, and this is so marked in Sweden, that they really seem to sing their language rather than speak it. They make little account there, however, of church music.

D.—I think the songs of a people—Die Volkslieder—are somewhat of a criterion of the general range and quality of voice among them, as well as of their musical taste.

W.—Yes. I have a collection of Italian popular songs, which seem almost wanting in expression—poor stuff enough. You know how much there is in the same class of compositions, farther north.

D.—Yes, I was at one time familiar with a set of Bohemian songs, which were very pleasing. Of all popular melodies—I mean such only as have actually grown up, as it were, in the cottages of the laboring classes—I place those of Scotland and Ireland decidedly at the head. The true German Volkslieder—not the works of great composers, which have become popular, as Rossini's airs have in Italy—seem to me more like rhythmical story-telling than music—while the Scotch songs are among the most delicious of melodies—melodies, too, which require voices of good quality and no small compass.

W.—Another passage in Valéry* occurs to me. He is speaking of the pseudo miracle of St. Januarius's blood at Naples, and of the old women, who place themselves at the altar, on the day of the ceremony, and go by the name of "St. Januarius's relations." "They pretend to be of his family, and when the Saint delays the liquefaction too long, they even think themselves privileged to wave all show of respect and to abuse him. They repeat in a hoarse voice Paternosters, Aves, and Credo; were it not in a chapel, no one would have imagined their horrid clamor to be prayers, and for a moment, I thought the scolding had begun; it was another femineo ululatu far less pathetic than Virgil's."

People who think Italy the place to hear music are most sadly mistaken. If you find an opera popular at Milan, you must expect to hear the same opera in every other city during that season. The wonder is, considering the enormous number of singers required for the stage in the peninsula, not that so many should finally establish an European reputation, but that the number is so small. Now that a market is growing up in this country for singers in our oratorios and churches, every day develops new voices of fine quality. What might not Anna Stone have been, with Sontag's musical education! How very fine, too, the Handel and Haydn chorus—especially the bass and alto!

D.—True, and the accounts of our countrywomen studying abroad, making due allowance for the partiality of those who write us about them, are very cheering. I have more indulgence for our amateur singers at the Handel and Haydn Society than formerly, since I now know by experience that they sing parts more than respectably, which are only taken by professional singers abroad. Ball's "Elijah" is still good after hearing Formes at Exeter Hall and the Primo Basso of the Berlin Royal Opera, in the part. I have no fear for the future in the matter of American singers.

W.—Nor I. The success of the Hutchinsons in Europe arose from the quality of their voices, voices which I by no means consider remarkable in this country. Many wandering bands of singers of trash here, exhibit capabilities of something far higher and better.

D.—And that is one reason that it pains me to hear any new, high-flown name added to the list. Would they but learn to sing—learn to use the powers God has given them—how much they might do towards the elevation of public taste to a better standard! If these people would master Calcott's and Webb's Glees, and not confine themselves entirely to false sentiment and mimic pathos, I could forgive them.

W.—Come, let's go in and hear "Handel's grand Oratorio of the Creation," as the papers have it.

D.—Agreed.

THE GREGORIAN CHANTS.—Under the title of Introduction to the Comparative Study of the Tones, and chiefly of the Gregorian Chants and Modern Music, M. Joseph d'Ortigue has just published two of the fundamental articles of his "Liturgy, Historic, and Theoretic Dictionary of the Gregorian Chants and Church Music," which is shortly to appear. In "The Philosophy of Music," M. D'Ortigue explains the principles of the musical art, as well as the laws from whence they derive their affinity to the other arts; but in the article "Tonality," he makes a direct attack on the "Liturgy" question so much in dispute, viz., the return to the Roman chant. Whilst admitting the possibility of discovering the pure text of the Gregorian melodies, M. D'Ortigue, under the form of a pre-judicial question, starts an important query—whether the human ear, tutored these last two hundred years to the modern tonality, could again fashion itself to the condition of the ancient tonality?

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 17, 1853.

Jonas Chickering.

The grave has closed over what was mortal of that good man. The funeral was from Trinity Church, on Monday morning. Long before the appointed hour, the galleries, porches and pulpits of the church were thronged with persons of all classes, eager to join in this last sad tribute of respect, and many a tear told how sincere the general sorrow. All met on common ground, for all had lost a friend. For Jonas Chickering was a representative man; he stood for the general tie of friendship, so far as this entered as a living element into the multifarious life of this large community. The terms friend, neighbor, fellow citizen, meant more to us when we met his face and took his hand.

The funeral cortège was very large, consisting, besides the immediate family and friends of the deceased, of the members of the Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies, the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, several Masonic bodies, the workmen of his factory, to the number of some two hundred, and other bodies of piano-forte manufacturers and their employées. These, with nearly all the resident musical professors and principal amateurs, and many of our most distinguished citizens, occupied the body of the church. There were crowds who could not find entrance. The solemnities consisted of the Episcopal service read by Bishop Eastburn and assistant, and of solemn music by the organist and choir of the church. The societies above-named escorted the procession to Cambridge bridge, where carriages were provided for the many who wished to follow his remains to their last resting-place at Mount Auburn.

Beautiful, as well as sad, has been this unanimous expression of feeling called forth by the sudden departure of a plain and unpretending good man. It is safe to say that no man's loss in this community would have been felt so universally. Yet he was not a public man nor one possessed of brilliant, outwardly commanding qualities. In person and in manner he was meekness and simplicity itself. Of humble origin, remembered without shame, he was humble always, humble in prosperity,—but in the true, Christian, positive sense of the word humble. He was emphatically one of the people, meeting all persons, his own workmen, and the objects of his thousand nameless acts of charity, as equals. By his own mechanical genius and industry, and by his integrity and social sincerity and kindness, which is the best part of social tact, he had risen to the place he occupied, as the head of the great business of piano-forte making in this country. Industry, sincerity and kindness were the only credentials that he asked in others. In matters of church and state he had taken his place, and with the more "conservative" so called; but always it seemed that friend, and neighbor, and fellow citizen, and fellow being, were of much more account to him than follower of the same creed or party. He had his opinions, and perhaps his prejudices, but a refreshing liberality told in his conversation and his conduct. He loved to talk—of music best, to be sure,—but heartily of all things interesting the attention of the community; and he judged thoughts and statements by the two tests of a sound intuitive common-sense and a good heart, rather than by traditions and prevailing ways of thinking. This, we believe, will be the universal testimony of the friends, old and young, who used to "drop in at Chickering's," of an afternoon, after the day's business was done, to have a little neighborly, refreshing chat with the mild and genial proprietor.

Mr. Chickering's superior intelligence and really great moral force of purpose, almost suffered, in the general impression, from the remarkable development of all the kind and generous and gentle traits in him. Yet those who knew him well know that, without what is called an education, and with no claim to extensive general information, he was really a most intelligent, if not precisely an intellectual man, and that with the most willing and habitual deference to other's thoughts and wishes, he through all his gentleness maintained a clear and steadfast purpose of his own. But it was his goodness of heart, his never-ceasing acts of charity, his uniform cordiality and sweetness, that endeared him to all who came within his reach. In the musical world, especially, he was the best and largest representative of all our hospitality. Every artist came to him, sure of hearty welcome and disinterested advice, and if need were, of active aid in time and money in the furtherance of his artistic success or the lightening of his failure. Many have been the cases of young and struggling talent, where he has furnished the means of education, and where he has since been looked up to almost as a father. To none that needed and deserved was his hand closed; and if his good nature was sometimes imposed upon, was not the loss a thousand times made good to him in such a sentiment as his death shows to have long existed towards him in this whole community?

The whole cause of music in this city owes much to Mr. Chickering. Every worthy enterprise for the promotion of musical taste and culture has numbered him among its most efficient friends and patrons. He was for many years president of the Handel and Haydn Society, and always exercised an important voice in its affairs. He was one of the readiest and largest venturers in the Boston Music Hall enterprise. His pianos and his rooms for rehearsal have been freely at the service of all concert-giving societies or individuals, amateur clubs, &c. He was chairman of the music committee in Trinity Church, and sang himself there in the choir on the last Sunday of his life, volunteering to fill the vacancy occasioned by some difficulty among the regular singers. Our own little journalizing enterprise, too, owes some of its earliest and best encouragement to him.

This public spirited activity of his was by no means limited to musical matters. He contributed his part largely and in all ways to the industrial, moral and charitable prestige of our city. He had been three years president of the Mechanic Association, when he died: and it was his unwearied personal devotion to the business of its last autumnal Fair, which added, perhaps, the grain too much to the weight of care upon his brain, already overtaken by the large and complicated plans for re-arranging and improving his own business, after the destruction of his factory by fire, and brought on the first of the series of paralytic attacks that resulted in his death. He was a member of the Legislature one or two years. He was eminently a Society man, and an active member of many charitable and fraternal institutions. Death found him in the midst of these good works, too heartily and unselfishly engaged in them to heed his sudden coming, for which, however, he was at any time prepared. He was at the house of a neighbor, assisting in a meeting of the government or council of a new college for female medical education, and was expressing his views, when his head sank upon his breast, and earthly consciousness returned no more.

If we have been repeating facts and impressions which for the week past have been the fond themes of every newspaper and private circle, it is because we are not willing that this Journal of Music should be without some record of a life so purely spent and so affectionately esteemed throughout this whole community of music-lovers, —some monument, however humble, to his memory. We can say nothing that has not been better said, nothing that is not known to all in this vicinity, and certainly not the hundredth part of what is felt by all who knew him.

Were we to state what always impressed us most in Mr. Chickering, we should say it was the sweet, harmonious, gentle sphere he carried with him. It would seem as if Music, which he so dearly loved and so truly appreciated in its highest forms of Art, had so harmonized and tempered the whole inner man, as gradually to mould the naturally plain features of the outward man into a permanent expression of positive beauty. His face and presence in all pleasant companies contributed a certain ideal charm. The glow of heart and goodness made the air mild and genial about him. Such beautiful simplicity seldom meets us in mature years. Our friend was not a highly cultivated man; his education had been plain and practical; yet goodness of heart so shone through him with ever ripener, milder, purer light, and music, which he not only heard and loved, but re-enacted daily in good deeds, had wrought such genuine refinement in the whole man, that he was fit society for the best.

The life of Jonas Chickering was what is called an uneventful one. His father was a farmer and blacksmith in the village of New Ipswich, N. H., where he was born in April, 1797, and brought up with a good common school education. At the age of 17 he was apprenticed for three years to a cabinet-maker in his native town. He had a natural love for music, and spent much of his leisure in learning to sing by notes, and to play on such instruments as were most in use. There was one solitary piano in the village, and one maiden that could play; and we have heard how the bashful lad, eager to drink in the dulcet sounds, would go and linger by the gate, but could not be prevailed upon to enter the house of his musical fair school-mate. Was she not a sort of St. Cecilia to him? and was not that piano, discoursing simple and old-fashioned music, a rarer revelation and delight to that boy's wondering soul, than many a most artistic concert to the satiated ears of amateurs in cities? In course of time the piano got out of tune, and "out of kilter," and the ingenious Jonas must be called upon to try his hand at putting it in order. He succeeded, after much experimenting, in restoring the wondrous machine to usefulness. He was then 19, and this was the germ of the great piano-making business which now bears his name. He came to Boston on the 15th of February, 1818, and sought and found employment that very day, where he continued at work for one year. He then entered the employment of Mr. Osborn, the only pianoforte manufacturer in Boston. In 1823 he commenced the business for himself in partnership with Mr. Stewart: he had introduced many improvements in the piano, and had acquired some fame. His old associates tell how the "green youth from the country" soon put himself en rapport with the musical doings of the town; how he has been seen playing a clarinet in the streets, to the accompaniment of bass-drum, &c., the old-fashioned military music of the day; and how he sang alto in the choirs of various churches. Such were the plain, New England beginnings of the man, who afterwards became the centre of musical art and artists in this city. On the twelfth anniversary of his arrival in Boston he became associated with the late Mr. Mackay, a thorough business man, and capitalist, with whom he continued ten years. The business has since rapidly and steadily expanded to its present magnitude, well known to all. It will still go on, together with the vast improvements which Mr. Chickering was completing, under his three sons, who have all had practical experience in the establishment.

The funeral of Mr. Chickering was a very solemn and imposing occasion, in itself a tribute of the whole community. But we believe it is a very general feeling among our music-loving citizens, that some public musical solemnity in the Music Hall ought soon to take place in token of our respect and sorrow. Not, as we have seen suggested, a concert, to raise money and erect a monument; but an artistic solemnity, an expression of the general feeling by music, and perhaps by fit words spoken. Let the oldest musical society, the Handel and Haydn, of which he had been president, take the initiative; let all the musical societies, resident professors and artists, music-dealers, and music-lovers generally, raise a committee and contribute their energies to make it all it should be. Some of Handel's solemn choruses and lofty songs of faith, one of the orchestral dirges of Beethoven, &c., readily suggest themselves as fit expressions. And why may not one of our choral societies master some portions of Mozart's "Requiem," the grandest funeral music ever written, which is performed once a year in every considerable town in Germany?

Concerts and Rehearsals.

[ERRATA. A portion of our paper last week was put in type at a late hour, and in great haste. Several misprints occurred. Among others, speaking of Mr. Perkins's Quartet, we were made to detect traces of Mendelssohnian learning." We wrote leaning.]

MME. HENRIETTA SONTAG's two "Farewell Concerts," on Wednesday and Saturday of last week, (which happily have not proved her last), were eminently successful. The Music Hall was not crowded, but well filled on both evenings. The programmes, or "schemes" (to use the manager's characteristic word) were concocted with great taste, so that while very miscellaneous, the concerts could not grow fatiguing. Mme. SONTAG was in fresher, stronger, richer voice than ever in her previous visits. In her rendering, the much abused Robert, toi que j'aime was refreshingly lifted up and restored to all the original charm of its musical beauty and dramatic force. Mozart's Vedrai Carino and Schubert's "Serenade" were sung with exquisite purity of tone and feeling. Handel's "Let the bright Seraphim" made a brilliant feature in the second concert, and this time escaped marring by the trumpet, which resigned to the violins the passages in which it was not certain. Quite a novelty in an American concert room was the famous ballad of the "Erl King," which first sealed the fame of Schubert as one of the most inspired of song composers. It was sung with thrilling effect, and the alternating voices, the cries of the alarmed child, the calm, assuring voice of the father, and the soft, insinuating whisper of the spirit, were beautifully contrasted. We cannot own to the same liking of Mme. Sontag's English ballads. They lacked the genuine sunshine and out-gush of fresh feeling which they had in Jenny Lind; there was something too much of stereotyped sentimentality in her "Sweet Home," and of finical over-niceness and over-action in her "Comin' thro' the Rye." We remember with much more pleasure her singing last year of "Within a mile of Edinboro'," which this time she has not given us. Her variation warblings in duets with violin or flute, had the same music-box precision and delicacy as ever; and her comic impersonations in two duets with Sig. Rocco, one the well known "Music Lesson" by Fioravanti, and the other a piece with similar subject, but new to us, "The Rehearsal," by Paër, were charmingly humorous and graceful.

Sig. Rocco failed to galvanize Vi ravviso into any new life, though he brought out the opera singer's whole armory of espressivo means and appliances. In Rossini's gay and whirling "Tarantella," in "Non piu andrai," &c., he was quite at home and musically funny. It was refreshing once more to hear the tones of the piano leap and sparkle at the touch of ALFRED JAELL, who, though not particularly fortunate one time in the selection of his instrument, proved by his brilliant fantasia on La Fille du Regiment that he had lost none of his wonderful execution, and by the latter half of Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto, that he is still one of the most clear and elegant interpreters of classic music.

Little PAUL JULIEN is a master with his violin. He plays with his whole heart, with an earnest thoughtfulness, and yet with a triumphant joy, as if his very soul resided in his instrument. There can be no question of musical genius there. He played Eckert's duet with Sontag; Ma Celine, a fantasia by Hauman; Alard's fantasia on La Favorita; and Paganini's "Witches' Dance." His tone is not quite so broad as Urso's, but of the most pure and fine quality, and faultless in intonation, and there is the most finished, chaste expression in his passages. The GERMANIA orchestra, besides their admirable accompaniments, contributed the overtures to Semiramide, to Oberon, to Les Huguenots, and Lütolf's Robespierre; that beautiful "Procession of Bride and Bridesmaids" from Wagner's Lohengrin, and a march at each conclusion.

SONTAG IN ORATORIO. Haydn's "Creation" was performed last Sunday evening by the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY with this eminent assistance. In no music have we been so entirely pleased with Sontag as in that of the part of Eve, all of which was sung by her. Its sunny, sweet, and flowing melody lay in the best region of her voice, and required just her smooth and even finish, and command of all the little melodic graces, to render to the ear all the beauty that was in Haydn's mind. In the earlier parts of the oratorio, she only sang "On mighty pens," which she did with wonderful beauty, but hardly with that majesty soaring in the first figure, nor that gushing fulness of new life and gladness throughout, with which we once heard it!

Miss ANNA STONE achieved a rare success in "With verdure clad," rising with ease and beauty to the C in alt. In the trios, too, and on the top of the grand choruses, her clarion tones told gloriously as of old. Mr. AIKEN's bass recitatives and solos were tasteful, and correct, and true, sometimes needing a little more of life and elasticity, but often quite effective. Mr. FRAZER was not equal to the tenor, his voice flattening a good deal in the first part, and betraying too much effort; though it seemed to come out easier and truer as he went on, and there were evidences enough that he was no stranger to the music. Mr. HOWARD took several of the latter pieces for the tenor. The choruses were generally effective, though not given with such triumphant unity and clearness as those in the "Messiah;" and the descriptive, and exquisitely ornate accompaniments received all justice from the Germanians.

REHEARSALS. Under this head we can but enumerate the daylight performances of the past ten days. Mme. SONTAG, here as in Philadelphia and Baltimore, gave a free feast of melody one morning to the children of the public schools. Imagine the bright and beautiful scene, —over 3,000 of them assembled in the Music Hall! and how vigorously they clapped their hands at each new delight imparted by the tuneful countess, and by JAELE, and by the elfin virtuosity of master PAUL JULIEN! — Little CAMILLE URSO had a benefit rehearsal Saturday afternoon, when, we are told, she played wonderfully well. OTTO DRESEL kindly played her piano accompaniments, and she had the aid also of the Germanians, who played Beethoven's first symphony. —At the last two GERMANIA REHEARSALS we had the Pastorale, and the first Symphony of Beethoven. One hearing the latter for the first time, would have taken it for a work of Haydn. Its ideas and themes, especially in the rondo finale, seemed like Haydn; the coloring was Mozart; but there were passages ever and anon, of which you said to yourself, that's Beethoven! For instance, those impatient, energetic reiterations, five or six times over, of some little attacking phrase, like the repeated short runs of a strong swimmer before plunging into the wave. —The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB commenced its weekly afternoon rehearsals last week Friday, with a pretty numerous and deeply interested audience. A solemn, sad Adagio from a Quintet of Mendelssohn, which saluted us as we entered, touched the right cords after the melancholy news of that Friday. They played finely.

CONCERTS AT HAND. —MME. SONTAG sings "positively for the last time in Boston" this afternoon. —The fifth subscription concert of the GERMANIANS is to-night. The symphony is Mendelssohn's in A major (the "Italian Symphony.") They have secured a decided attraction in Mr. APTOMMAS, the harpist. —The next Chamber Concerts of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB will be on Tuesday evening, and it will make us rich in Mozart and Beethoven (see advertisement.) Do not forget the Rehearsals of the Club Friday afternoons. —The next Classical Matinée of MESSRS. PERABEAU, ECKERT, &c., postponed last Thursday afternoon, on account of Mme. Sontag's concert, will be given next Thursday.

Mr. OTTO DRESEL's second Soirée, which was to have been given this week, was necessarily prevented by the death of Mr. Chickering. The continual engagements of the Germanians, some of whom are essential to his programmes, make it doubtful whether the concert can take place this month. But it will be given, and in the same place, on the very first available evening.

Germania Symphony Concerts.

A SUGGESTION.

MR. EDITOR: —I am glad, and sorry, to see your announcement of the "Classical Concerts" of the Germania Society. Glad, because this is just the music which I should like to hear, and which ought undoubtedly to be played in Boston, both to gratify the large number of persons qualified by nature and education to enjoy it, and to cultivate the taste of others to the same point. Sorry, because I am not able to pay the price, and with many others, whose poverty, but not their will, consents, must lose that very high gratification for want of means.

Far be it from me to say that the terms demanded are too high. Such music, performed in such a manner, is worth any money people have to pay for it. It gratifies my ear and soul more than even the highest order of vocal performances we have had here, saving only those of Jenny Lind. A dollar is by no means an exorbitant price for the concerts proposed; and it is perfectly reasonable for the members of the Germania Society to think and say that their concerts are worth as much as those of Sontag and Jullien.

It is also reasonable, however, for a friend to suggest, and for them to ponder the following consideration. They would get probably as much money, possibly more, by putting the tickets at half a dollar to subscribers for the course, with the gratification and stimulus of large audiences instead of a mediocre, or a small one. I know not why, with the inducement of such a musical treat, at such a price, the noble Music Hall may not be as well filled for the proposed concerts as for the present ones.

If a large audience is obtained at the subscription price just advertised, I can rejoice with the Germanians, despite my individual loss of their best music; but if the result be otherwise, I protest against the inference on their part that the style of music in question forms the objection. To form a fair judgement of the relative attractiveness of symphonies and waltzes to a New England audience, both should be offered at the same price, or nearly so.

Finally, I would add to yours, Mr. Editor, my protest against the relative popularity of the pieces played by the Germanians, at concerts or rehearsals, being estimated by the amount of noise, with hands, feet, and canes, following them. It may be natural enough for the polka people to proclaim their pleasure by preposterous pounding; but Schubert's "Ave Maria," and "Praise of tears," and the finest passages of Beethoven and Mozart, do not incline those who most enjoy them to such boisterous demonstrations of applause. C. K. W.

[The above suggestions are reasonable. Owing to the hurry of many engagements, the Germanians have not yet had time fully and definitively to settle their announcement, except so far as the general plan and programme are concerned. As to price, they only ask subscriptions enough to cover the actual cost of such a series, which is estimated at $1,500, at least. But we are happy to say that they will make the price conditional upon the number of subscribers. Subscription lists will be found at Wade's, and all the music stores. Will not the lovers of such music exert themselves individually to bring in subscribers enough to warrant the half-dollar price?]

Musical Intelligence.

Foreign.

The London season of serious music began Nov. 11 by the 298th performance of the Sacred Harmonic Society. The concert included Handel's "Coronation Anthem" and "Dettingen Te Deum," Mozart's Twelfth Mass. The next oratorio will be "Samson," in which Madame Viardot will sing. A printed document or programme which is in circulation promises for the ensuing season, Beethoven's Mass in D, —a revival of Handel's "Deborah," —and a performance of Anthems and Cathedral Music.

Foreign journals announce, without any hesitation, the death at Rome, on the 30th of October, of Mastro Pietro Raimondi, —the same whose triple Oratorio, executed at Rome in August, 1852, excited so much interest and curiosity. Signor Raimondi was in his 67th year; and to judge from a catalogue of his compositions, not many months ago laid before us, he seems to have devoted a considerable portion of his life and energy to grave, and intricate, and solemn musical tasks. Possibly the circumstances of his decease, in conjunction with the sensation last year excited, may lead to the disinterment of some of the little-known fruits of his studious leisure. Signor Raimondi was Chapel-Master at the Vatican; —the composer, too, of many operas in both styles. None of these appear to have been successful in Italy. —Athenæum.

PARIS. —To replace the musical vacancy left in the Académie des Beaux Arts by the death of Mr. Onslow, M. Réber has been elected.

M. Levasseur, the celebrated bass of the Grand Opera, the creator of Bertram, in Robert; of the Cardinal, in the Juive, of the chief of the Anabaptists, in the Prophète —after a professional career of forty-two years, bade adieu to public life a few nights ago; the receipts reached the unusual sum of 15,000 francs.

M. Döhler has written from Rome a pleasant note to the Gazette Musicale, denying the report of his death, which had recently been circulated in Paris. M. Döhler has been compelled to withdraw from professional life, for some years past, by a malady enjoining what he styles, with humorous sadness, the "amaro far niente;" but he adds, that hopes of restoration are held out to him by his physicians.

COLOGNE. —The London Musical World gives the following extract from a Cologne paper describing a concert given there last month under the direction of Ferdinand Hilder.

"SECOND SOCIETY'S" CONCERT. A new symphony (No. 4 in D minor), by Robert Schumann, opened the concert. Of the high merits of this work, which, however, has been written about eight or ten years, we have already spoken in our notice of its production at the Lower Rhine Musical Festival in Dusseldorf last May. The performance of last evening, far more than the former one, served to place the work in its proper light; the orchestra was throughout the evening especially excellent. The symphony was received with loud applause.

"After the 98th Psalm, 'O sing unto the Lord a new song,'" of Mendelssohn, the performance of which proved the certainty and power of our chorus in an imposing manner, followed Beethoven's concerto in E flat for piano-forte and orchestra, played by Madame Clara Schumann. Once again was plainly shown what an effect upon the multitude is made by a great, truly beautiful composition, when executed with mastery, in its true spirit, notwithstanding the length of the movements and the loftiness of the thoughts; because it stimulates that noble feeling, which is never wholly extinct in the human breast. The audience listened in solemn silence to the execution of the genial artist and the admirably accompanying orchestra, which especially in the adagio, blended so exquisitely with the piano-forte that we scarcely ever remember so perfect a performance of a piano-forte concerto as this was in every respect. At the termination, Mme. Schumann was recalled by the loud acclamations of the enraptured public. In the second part she played three of the Lieder ohne Worte of Mendelssohn, and a Romanza of R. Schumann. However distinguished was the masterly playing of these pieces, yet the rendering of Beethoven's concerto, which united every thing that could be exacted of a great artist, was the crown of the evening.

"The second part introduced an overture to the opera of Don Quixote by G. A. Macfarren. Macfarren is acknowledged in the English musical circles as the best national composer. He is a cultivated man, and a thoroughly cultivated musician. Several of his operas (for instance Charles II.) and a secular oratorio (The Sleeper Awakened) have had great success; his Symphony in C sharp minor, several songs and pieces of chamber music, are compositions that would be worth more extensive and more general acquaintance. He feels not only the spirit of German music, but also of the German language, evinced in his setting of Burger's Lenore, in the original text, for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra. He has also distinguished himself as a writer upon music. The overture to the opera of Don Quixote, performed here, is fresh and not without excitement; it betrays, however, here and there, too plainly, the Weberish model. It was played with fire and precision.

"Handel's hymn, or psalm for the coronation of George II, in 1727, is a glorious piece, and was brilliantly played. The Cologne Concert-Institute has the merit of having been first to perform in Germany this composition of Handel, on the 21st December, 1852. F. Hiller has added modern instruments to the score, and translated the text into German."

THE SONATA FORM.

THOMAS RYAN, respectfully begs leave to inform those who are in the habit of hearing Symphonies, Quartets, Quintets, Sonatas, or any works of that class, that he is prepared to explain or analyze them, either in small classes or to single pupils. His long experience in the performance and in the composition of such works, added to his being in possession of the scores of almost every work of that class presented in Boston, gives him peculiar advantages. The knowledge of the form is almost indispensable towards the understanding in the slightest manner, and will infinitely enhance the pleasure derived in the hearing of them. It is a subject which amateurs of the slightest pretensions ought to feel interested in, as new and old compositions are brought forward daily. The subscriber would be happy to receive pupils for this alone, or in connection with Thorough Bass.

Piano, Violin, Flute, or Clarinet lessons given. Communications left at Geo. P. Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, 5 Franklin Street, immediately attended to. Dec. 3.

PIANO-FORTE MANUFACTURER,

MASONIC TEMPLE, Tremont Street,

HAVING removed from his former location in Washington Street, and fitted up Warerooms in the above named beautiful building, is now prepared to attend upon such of his friends and the public as may honor him with a call. His time for the past six months having been exclusively devoted in endeavors to render his manufacture more perfect than ever, he is confident of being able to fully satisfy all who are desirous of possessing a good instrument.

Residents in the vicinity and adjacent States will please notice particularly his address, as there is another person in this city bearing his name, and with whom he is frequently confounded.

Mr. C. flatters himself that his experience and reputation of thirty years, must convince all who anticipate purchasing, that this is the best testimonial that he can offer of the excellence of his Pianos, and of the satisfaction which has invariably been manifested with regard to all the qualities which constitute an unexceptionable instrument.

—Edward L. Balch,

THE GREATEST METHOD OF THE AGE!

THE MODERN SCHOOL

FOR THE

PIANO-FORTE,

Is an Instruction Book which will enable one to Become a Great Pianist

IN THE SHORTEST TIME!

THIS Work is admitted by the most celebrated Pianists and Teachers, both in Europe and America, to be BY FAR THE MOST INGENUOUS, SIMPLE, PROGRESSIVE AND COMPREHENSIVE METHOD FOR THE PIANO THAT HAS EVER BEEN PRESENTED TO THE PUBLIC,—embracing a complete system, from the very outset to the highest classical music.

The anatomy of the hands is shown by beautifully colored plates. The entire work surpasses all previous musical publications, as regards mechanical appearance and elegance.

The author, NATHAN RICHARDSON, has spent the last five years in Europe for the sole purpose of getting up an Instruction Book, which would embrace the styles and effective Exercises of ALL distinguished Pianists and Teachers. To accomplish that object, he was assisted by

EIGHTEEN EMINENT EUROPEAN PIANISTS.

The result has been, an Instruction Book so comprehensive and ingenious, that a pupil will acquire the styles and mechanical difficulties of all celebrated Pianists, and that, too, with far less labor and practice than is usually required to learn an ordinary composition, under the old methods.

All who are interested in Music, are invited to call at the

and examine the work for themselves, and they will be surprised that a work which appears so simple should guarantee such wonderful results.

It is beautifully got up, in embossed cloth, gilt edges, sides, and back, 330 pages, and sold at $4 00 per single copy.

A very acceptable Present for Christmas and New Year.

Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON, Winthrop House, Boston.

Dear Sir:—I have made a thorough practical examination of your "Modern School for the Piano-Forte" and hereby certify that I was much pleased with the progressive and ingenious exercises it contains. You have certainly shown the pupil a way of overcoming the great difficulties of the Piano, which is in many respects far superior to any other I have ever seen. The Book embraces the styles of so many different authors, and you have given so many excellent examples, that a pupil cannot fail to become a good player (if gifted with the least musical talent) through this Method.

I heartily recommend it to every one that studies the Piano-Forte. I remain yours truly

ALFRED JAEHL.

CAUTION TO THE PUBLIC.

Owing to the great success of the Modern School for the Piano-Forte, a work, entitled the MODEL School for the Piano-Forte, is about to be presented by another publisher. Do not be deceived, but be sure to call for the MODERN School for the Piano-Forte by NATHAN RICHARDSON.

* Symphony No. 4 in A major for full orchestra, arranged for two performers on the pianoforte, composed by Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Op. 90; Posthumous Work. No. 19. Ewer & Co.

be awakened in witnessing the new life springing from the old decay, the perennial flowers and verdure, ever young, mocking while they decorate the falling ruins that have seen them bloom, and seen them fade, and seen them bloom and fade again through a long, long race of centuries, typifying the eternal identity of the spirit of good and beauty, the soul of poetry, amid the temporal variations of its manifestation which, while they seem to pass away, are born anew in the new forms they suggest by the new powers they stimulate in the mind of man.

Let us suppose that the ceaselessly flowing and exquisitely melodious Scherzo or Minuet may have been conceived upon the silent shore of a sunny sea, when the luxurious light of the still moon hung like a garment of glory on the boundless bosom of the deep, whose gentle heaving was so constant and so uniform that in watching the unbroken rhythm of its motion, one might cease to know it moved; and in the Trio, let us think of some vagrant sunbeam sporting in fairy dance upon the gently rippling undulation, and glancing like the sparkle of the eye you love when it looks the look that all surpasses speech, and in the language, than which but music can be more intense, it says, I love you.

The Saltarello tells its own tale. It is no stretch of the imagination to suppose the Carnival, with the vivacity that here is known but as a traveler's tale of the quick-hearted Italian, the ubiquitous life, the perpetual motion, the sunshine all through and through one's feelings, and one's thoughts and its reflection on our actions, and our influence on others; the romp, the rhapsody, the roystering revelry, the rattling riot, the rustling, rolling, ridiculous, restless, ranting roar of the rollicking holiday, when unrule and nonsense are the law and intelligence that will and direct what is utterly beyond control. The bustling, bustling, jostling of everlasting intricacies of the interminable labyrinth of the never-ending, never-beginning, universal and omniversal dance. Good spirits, indeed! Why, the whole world is, above proof, and very far beyond probability; and Mother Nature is truly unmasked when her sons—yes, and her daughters too, the most modest, and the meekest—put the mask on that hides them from the restraint and the restrictions, the formalities and the rigidities of the imposing world and its impositions, yes, and its impostures, too; and nobody is ashamed to be themselves, because everybody may be supposed to be anybody else. Fortune favor us! what think you of the place where the seemingly ceaseless motion of the dance is broken by the accent of twoes that comes tumbling in upon us like one who is so utterly intoxicated with the mere sense of animal excitement, so perfectly delirious with the exuberance of his own delight, that the only account to be made of him or his doings is, that they are wholly unaccountable? Well, it is no stretch of the imagination to suppose all this, and to be assured of its existence by the Finale of the Symphony in A major.

Such may be called the secondary interest which this truly poetical work may excite in a sensitive hearer; of the primary interest, that which lies in the intrinsic technical beauty of the musical phrases, and of their admirable development, one can scarcely give an account because of the impossibility to define it. Let it here suffice to call attention to some of the most striking points in the several movements.

In the Allegro Vivace, who is not struck with the spontaneous freshness of the opening subject? What a remarkable and very reflective point is there (page 6 of the printed copy), when, after several responsive alternations of the choirs of wind and of string instruments, represented in the arrangement by the separate primo and secondo parts, the figure of the chief subject is given in the bass against the constantly changing harmony carried on in the continuation of the preceding passage. The lengthened dominant passage which introduces the second subject, is so prominent in its effect from the eminence of its beauty, that one is disappointed to find it turned to so little account as it is in the sequel of the movement, even though this disappointment arise from the redundancy of ideas which spring up luxuriantly as life and thought in the sanguine climate by which we are told the composition was inspired. The second subject fulfils in its graceful phrases and transparent instrumentation, all that is requisite for this important feature of the movement. A lengthened crescendo upon the last inversion of a dominant seventh (commencing at the bottom of page 8), has an admirable effect, and gives the greatest brightness to the inverted tonic harmony upon which the full force of the orchestra is finally introduced. Next in order let us notice the digression into C sharp minor, with an augmentation of the principal subject, which has a truly magical effect, introduced as it is by a passage of long notes without harmony; and then the return to E major, with the brief recurrence to the subject in its original rhythm, which concludes the first part of the movement brilliantly and most effectively.

After some short development of the passage already cited that leads to the second subject, the Second Part is remarkable for the introduction of an entirely new idea in D minor, of a character wholly different from, and admirably opposed to every phrase that has preceded it, and upon it the elaborations of this portion of the movement are principally founded. It is treated at first as a free fugato, which is continued for some length at the extreme pianissimo of the orchestra, and the gradual climax of a long protracted crescendo from this brings in at the forte a fragment of the first subject, which is from hence worked together, or in close alternation with the new, episodic subject. There is a very remarkable passage of diminuendo, passing from the key of F sharp minor to D major, the repose of which most beautifully relieves the continual motion that has for long prevailed; and the passage that grows out of this, commencing with the semitonic ascent of the bass, which brings about the return to the subject in the original key of the movement, upon a second inversion of the tonic harmony, is most novel, and pre-eminently effective.

The Andante con moto is remarkable for the exceeding beauty of its principal melody, and the pure simplicity of the counterpoint of quavers with which it is accompanied. Next for the additional very great interest that is given to this same theme and counterpoint in the filling up of the harmony by wind instruments, the exquisite effect of which is new as it is admirable. Then comes the most lovely episodic melody in A major, in which is to be noticed a curious caprice in the rhythmical arrangement—namely, that the accent of the whole is against the measure; in explanation of this may be adduced the subsequent repetition of the same melody in the key of D major, when the barring is according to accepted rule, with the natural rhythmical division of the phrases. The introduction of some fragments of the original theme at the close of this episode, presents many points of eminent artistry, and the brief but beautiful Coda closes impressively one of the most exquisite slow movements in the whole range of orchestral music.

The next movement, Con Moto Moderato, may better be described as a Minuet than a Scherzo, but it scarcely fulfils the prevailing notion of this class of movement, for it is in the tempo and in the construction only, and by no means in the character, that it resembles the Minuets of the Symphonies of Mozart and Haydn. It has been said to be like the music of Mozart—in the greatness of its beauty it certainly is, but in its phraseology I can trace no similitude. Mozart has very often, and most successfully embodied the feeling which this movement conveys, but, to my appreciation, with wholly different expression. A beautiful melody is not subject to verbal description, so this movement, which is all melody, must be dismissed to the effect of its own impressions. One point alone may be separately cited in which the art and the genius of the composer are most happily blended; this is the return to the subject in the second part of the Minuet, where the partial anticipation of the phrase has an effect that can never fail.

The final Presto is certainly the most entirely individual portion of the work, albeit not one of the movements has a prototype in the writings of any other master. It is an imitation of the Saltarello, a national dance of the South of Italy, which differs from its twin sister the Tarantella in having a crotchet at the beginning of each bar of six-eight measure (instead of six quavers in the bar, as in the dance more familiar in this country), the marked accent of which accommodates a jumping step in the dance itself, whence it derives its name. The ceaseless continuity of the motion, and with it the excitement of this movement, is beyond praise. The plan of the whole is somewhat singular, and admits of longer discussion than our present space will admit. Suffice it to state briefly that the first part is regular, like that of a first movement; that at the close of this the subject re-commences in the original key, after the manner of many of the last movements of Mozart and Beethoven, which very shortly diverges into the elaborations of the second part; that these are enriched, as in the first movement of the present work, by the introduction of a new episodic subject, which appears first in the key of G minor; and finally, that the composer is so carried away by the development of this idea, in conjunction with the chief subject of the movement, that he foregoes the formality of the recapitulation of the first part, and makes no recurrence to the many admirable points which, in the key of E minor, constitute the second subject, but instead, prolongs the working of the second part into a most exciting and highly wrought Coda.

Allusion has already been made to the prodigious effect produced by the breaking off from the long-continued accent of the Saltarello with the fortissimo passage of even quavers in twoes instead of threees (page 54). There is next to notice the quaint perversity of the opening phrase of the second subject (page 57), and the streaming beauty of the sustained notes that descend by semi-tones against the continued motion of the theme they accompany.

The brightness of the transient digression into C, heightened as it is by the brilliant tone of the horns and trumpets, cannot escape notice; and the immediate return to E minor is no less a point for admiration. The whole of this passage is well worthy to be repeated, but Mendelssohn, whose invention seems unlimited, is not satisfied to give it again without imparting to it a new interest, by adding to the instrumentation, and slightly modifying the harmony; and then he prolongs it with a skill peculiar to himself, and an effect equal to the means. The breaking away from the subject, in the key of A minor, by the semitonic descent of the bass, which is assigned to the violins against the wind instruments, which have the theme (page 60), is a comparatively unimportant point, but of striking prominence. The mazy winding character of the episode, here introduced in G minor, is eminently picturesque. A merely mechanical contrivance, namely, the repetition of the four-bar phrase of the second violins, in response from the opposite side of the orchestra by the first violins, gives wonderful life to the general effect. Perhaps the most striking point of the whole movement is the abrupt and decidedly irregular introduction of a chord of C, in the second repetition of a phrase that has twice before closed on the chord of E major, (page 66); the harmonic propriety of this progression is open to considerable discussion; but, the jesuitical principle, if anywhere, is decidedly applicable here, for such an effect surely justified any means that are employed to attain it. We have then a very lengthened crescendo upon a protracted dominant pedal, the climax of which leads to a chromatic seventh upon an A bass (page 68), which is brilliant as a shower of fireworks, and exciting as an unexpected joy. From hence to the end one's admiration is more and more stimulated, and we cannot rise from an adequate performance of the whole, but in a rapture of enthusiasm.

WILLIAM GARDINER, the well-known author of "Gardiner's Music of Nature," died at Leicester, England, on the 16th of November. Dr. R. W. BENFIELD, composer of the oratorio Israel Restored, is also just deceased.

Bertini—Ferdinand Hiller—Chopin—Liszt.

Modern Romantic School of Piano-forte Playing.—Bertini is no improvisatore on the piano-forte, who compresses the bold thoughts of his mind within narrow limits; he is a powerful and energetic artist, who develops an idea, and by degrees brings it out like a seriously and long considered work. It is not the surface but the inmost recesses of our hearts, which he affects; and while gracefulness is a characteristic feature, strength and energy are no less predominant. The ode is more peculiarly his forte than the elegy.

Hiller is the nursling of German harmony, jealous of his own originality, deep, reflecting, but with a conception brightened by a southern ray. His playing and composition may frequently be likened to a northern dream, related by a dramatic poet, with all the purity of attic elegance. He acquires celebrity by his chiaroscuro, like Rubens; he is thrifty to a fault; his lights are unbroken, and he introduces no false lights or forced contrasts. In the fanciful and mystic he cannot compete with Mendelssohn Bartholdy, but he may in matter of fact reality. He will be the little Beethoven, as the poet Heine has already designated him.

Chopin's expressive play, his harmony, ardent and often obscure, though invariably genuine, as if what should have preceded had been omitted,—how are these to be depicted? The causes of his joy and sorrow remain veiled; nothing but individual originality; superficial organizations only can be insensible to his magnetic influence. His talent is not a mere instinct without experience and tuition, but embraces at once the mysteries of music and of the heart. His style and his playing are equally great.

With Liszt, his play is all in all; he is the genius of performance. All expedients to put on a semblance of inspiration are spurned by him. His inspiration can proceed only from the innate existence of his own creative powers, which are equal to those of composition. The universal stirring of the age has with its other emancipations produced him. Even railery has in vain been directed against him; and envy he will overcome, even as he has overcome his instrument. Whence does this arise? He has turned his attention to all the arts and sciences, trodden their path for the benefit of his art, to load her with all the riches of the intellectual world. If he reflects Beethoven so admirably, it is because he no less thoroughly fathoms Shakspeare, Goethe, Schiller and Victor Hugo; because he comprehends the composer of "Fidelio" more even in his genius than in his works. Liszt is Beethoven's hands. The softest emotions of Beethoven's soul he expresses with his fingers. This he has only attained by the powerful wings of poetry, which elevate the arts, and which henceforth will be the line of distinction between the musical artisan and the real artist.

[From R. S. Willis's Musical World and Times.]

A True Story.

Many years since, a boy, who thought and dreamed of nothing but music, wandered into a certain large establishment in Boston, where his favorite instruments were manufactured. Passing into the extensive saloons where these instruments were displayed, he sought out a quiet corner, and seating himself at one of those magnificent pianos, he first looked around, to be sure that no one was listening, and then began to play some of those beautiful waltzes of Beethoven, which at that time so suited his capacity, and suited his heart. Borne away in a delicious musical reverie, he did not for some time observe, that a figure had stolen up to him and was listening as he played. A benevolent face was over him, and a kind voice addressed words of commendation and praise, which, being the first the boy had received, sent the blood tingling to his cheeks. The proprietor of the establishment, for it was he, then asked the boy if he would like to come and live among those pianos, discoursing just such music to purchasers: thus forming, in a word, a connection with his establishment. But books and college were before the boy; and wondering at the proposition, he timidly thanked the proprietor and declined.

Years passed away. School and college were done with, and the books thrown aside. The boy had reached manhood; but still the spirit of music haunted him, and again he found himself in those spacious saloons. He had just ceased playing upon one of those magnificent instruments again, stood looking dreamily out of the window, and down upon the crowded "Washington street" below. Again a quiet figure stole up to him, and a most musical and pleasant voice began to speak. The person before him was of small stature, had the manners and garb of a gentleman, was dressed in black, with a single magnificent diamond pin in his bosom: the only contrast in his appearance was the clean white apron of a workman, which he wore. It was the proprietor of the establishment again: who, wealthy as he was, had his own little working cabinet, with an exquisite set of tools, and there put the finishing touch he entrusted to no one else. The proprietor enquired kindly of the young man as to his plans for life. These alas, were undetermined. The voice of music was more fascinating than ever: but a learned profession of some kind seemed to be the wishes and expectations of his friends. Music, however, was his first and strongest love, and he had sometimes thought, if he could but go abroad to study, he would decide for that. But he was poor. His father had given him his college education and his blessing as capital for life. A harsh struggle with the world was before him; music, therefore, was hardly to be thought of.

In the quietest tone of that low, pleasant voice, the proprietor, as though making an ordinary remark, rejoined, "Well, but then, if the sum of five hundred dollars a year for a period of four years would suit your purpose, I could easily supply you with that."

The world grew dim before him, and the young man almost staggered with surprise; but when he recovered himself, there was the same quiet gentleman standing beside him, and looking pleasantly out of the window.

Two months afterward the young man sailed for Europe, where he passed the allotted time, and longer, from means with which his own compositions in the mean time furnished him. And whatever of knowledge, and whatever of artistic culture, and whatever of success in life, as connected with Art, have since been his, he ascribes entirely to that most generous and noble-hearted Mæcenas of Art. And to the latest day of his life will he never cease to cherish the memory of his first and best friend.

That noble friend was JONAS CHICKERING of Boston, now lying cold in death, and that boy is the present Editor of the N. Y. Musical World—the writer of this article:—and nothing would have prevented a grateful declaration of this noble deed, but the unwilling condition absolutely imposed—of silence: that the circumstance should be revealed to none but to parents. But such a condition is surely canceled by death: and a long-repressed gratitude must, at length, proclaim itself to the world.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXXV.

NEW YORK, Dec. 17.—I see by the Boston Post that Sontag was to sing last night an Aria by Ernani and another by Vedrai Carino. Where can I obtain biographical notices of these two composers?

Dec. 18.—Heard portions of Jullien's concerts last night and night before in the Metropolitan nuisance. On Friday evening I was reminded of the story of the nobleman in Handel's time, who left an Oratorio on the ground of an unwillingness to invade the king's privacy; and of Handel's remark about his empty houses, "No matter, de moosic will sound to petter." Jullien no longer being the rage, the reserved seats were at an awful discount. The select few scattered about in them had ample scope and verge. Yet, as ever, the performances were faultless. The exquisite tact of the leader and the marvellous powers of his soloists grow upon me, and to one of "old fogy" notions, it is painful to see all this excellence expended without ample remuneration. I am convinced that no orchestra can live without there be an audience cultivated to the extent of enjoying music for music's sake. To hear Sontag or Jenny Lind sing—for the sake of knowing how they sing—I would willingly pay well two or three times. Beyond that I would not go. But to hear great vocal works in which they sang—to hear the songs in the Messiah, Samson, Creation, Mount of Olives, Don Juan, Magic Flute, &c., I would go regularly a whole season. It would be a cheap mode of musical education. So in the case of Jullien. Real lovers of music go a few times to see him and hear his orchestra; and so do those who go merely because it is fashionable. But the novelty wears off; the latter class desert him and the former see nothing worth their time and money in the programmes. So finally betwixt the two stools down he tumbles. I am sorry. I never heard such playing, and moreover do like his rendering of classical works; the themes are always brought out clearly, and if at times they seem to be given a little coldly, there are effects produced by such perfect mechanical execution, which are ordinarily lost. Whether "old foggy" programmes would call out the public, or so large a portion of it as to make it pay, is perhaps a matter of doubt. Why not try it? Repeat Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn nights. Give entire symphonies instead of single movements only. He could not lose by the operation, judging from Friday evening. On Saturday evening the house was well filled, the proceeds having been devoted to the fireman's charity.

On these two evenings there was opportunity to give a careful hearing to some of Fry's music. An Adagio pleased me much. There is certainly something very novel in his methods of instrumentation, and some new effects were striking—for instance, an oboe solo with a sort of obligato arpeggio (if that be a proper term) accompaniment by a flute running up and down through some three octaves. I do not, however, pay much attention to forms of music,—choose rather to sit and allow the masses of tones to effect me as they will. A deep, delicious melancholy seemed rather the character of the piece, than the powerful anguish and struggle indicated by its title, The Breaking Heart. If, however, Fry's Broken Heart be that of her, whom Viola describes,

—She never told her love,
But let concealment, like a worm i' the bud,
Feed on her damask cheek. She pined in thought,
And, with a green and yellow melancholy,
She sat like patience on a monument
Smiling at grief.

I am by no means certain that the movement is not finely descriptive. One hearing is not enough for a decision.

I liked the "Day in the Country." There is country air in it. The finale—the rattle-tyang of a recruiting party—is hardly American, though. I wish Fry could go up to Lake Superior and spend a summer in those all glorious solitudes of woods and waters, often for hours together enlivened only by the cawing of a crow and that most solitary of all sounds, the cry of the loon. There would be something to sink into his quiet musings, and 'twould be pleasant to hear his transcript of it.

Many thanks to Jullien for a glimpse of Dr. Arne—the ugly man. His music is not ugly. "Where the bee sucks there suck I," was sung by the Zerr. What delicious music it is! Why do we never hear good old English music, and we, descendants of Englishmen? How refreshing the change from the threadbare pieces, which have been given us ad nauseam. But what outside barbarian changed "suck" to "lurk," and so destroyed the fine fancy of Shakspeare, in making the fairy feed with the honey-bee and then sink to rest in the hell of a cows-dip?

As God Pleases.

Under a portrait of Carl Maria von Weber, published at Weimar, is a fac simile of his hand writing, in these words.

"As God Pleases!"

CARL MARIA VON WEBER."

An enthusiastic admirer of Rossini, on noticing this inscription, wittily took occasion to remark, that "Weber composed as 'God pleases,' but that Rossini composed as pleased the public," thus unwittingly paying the highest possible compliment to Weber, and stating the true distinction as to the relative merits of the two composers.

CHRISTMAS HYMN.

BY ALFRED DONNETT.

It was the calm and silent night!

Seven hundred years and fifty-three
 Had Rome been growing up to might,
 And now was queen of land and sea!
 No sound was heard of clashing wars,—
 Peace brooded o'er the hushed domain;
 Apollo, Pallas, Jove, and Mars
 Held undisturbed their ancient reign,
 In the solemn midnight,
 Centuries ago.

'T was in the calm and silent night,
 The Senator of haughty Rome
 Impatient urged his chariot's flight,
 From lordly revel rolling home;
 Triumphal arches gleaming swell
 His breast with thoughts of boundless sway;
 What recked the Roman what befell
 A paltry province far away,
 In the solemn midnight,
 Centuries ago?

Within that province far away
 Went plodding home a weary hoar;
 A streak of light before him lay,
 Fallen through a half-shut stable-door,
 Across his path. He passed,—for naught
 Told what was going on within;
 How keen the stars, his only thought,—
 The air how calm, and cold, and thin,
 In the solemn midnight,
 Centuries ago!

O strange indifference! low and high
 Drowns over common joys and cares;
 The earth was still,—but knew not why;
 The world was listening,—unawares.
 How calm a moment may precede
 One that shall thrill the world forever!
 To that still moment, none would heed,
 Man's doom was linked no more to sever,
 In the solemn midnight,
 Centuries ago!

It is the calm and solemn night!
 A thousand bells ring out, and throw
 Their joyous peals abroad, and smite
 The darkness,—charmed and holy now!
 The night that erst no shame had worn,
 To it a happy name is given;
 For in that stable lay, new-born,
 The peaceful Prince of earth and heaven,
 In the solemn midnight,
 Centuries ago!

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 24, 1853.

Christmas!—Handel's "Messiah."

The great festival of Christendom comes round once more. In its spirit, truly considered, it is no less than the great festival of Humanity. The morning of Christ's birth was ushered in with angel's songs, proclaiming unity and peace and good will among men. For the rejoicings of this anniversary can we conceive of any language more appropriate and true than Music! Music which gives voice to the spiritual part of us, that so refuses to be moulded into forms of thought and speech! Music, which is the natural language of the religious sentiment, a principle so human and yet so divine! Music which in all its diversity forever hints of Unity and seeks the One! and under whose influence we forget our differences and feel that in our inmost, deepest aspirations, we and all earnest souls are kindred!

It seems as if the man had providentially appeared, who could embody in one great masterpiece of musical Art, the sentiments and topics of this holy season. Handel, in his "Messiah," seems to have expressed the latent music of these texts. No fitter Christmas observance, no pleasanter and truer way of communing together in the feeling of our spiritual relationship and of Humanity's great destiny, can well be found, than that of listening together to this sublime oratorio.

Fortunately two opportunities of hearing it are offered us; so that those who may have home engagements for either "Christmas Eve" or for the "evening of Christmas," still have an evening left for "the Messiah." Many, too, will like to hear it twice, and fix a clearer impression of it in their memory, to say nothing of the curiosity which some will have to compare the renderings of the two Societies. In their rivalries we have no concern; and if the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY will only make us feel again the power of Handel's "Messiah" as they have made us feel it, and if the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY will only sing it as we have no doubt they can sing,—if either or both of them will only lift us to its lofty mood, we shall not be likely to care much whether it be old society or new, or whether the night be Saturday or Sunday;—for in the light of such sublime and holy thought the old is ever new, and the new is from eternity, while, as to times and seasons, all are sacred.

The choruses in both cases will be large and efficient. Both announce, upon another page, their solo singers, orchestra and leaders; all well-known names, and guaranties that Handel's music shall have justice done it.

Fifth Germania Concert.

Mendelssohn's Symphony in A major, (properly his second, though usually numbered fourth, and said to embody the composer's reminiscences of Italy), was followed with eager interest by one of the largest audiences of the season. Of the symphony itself we have placed on our first page an analysis by one of the most enthusiastic of the English Mendelssohnians, himself a composer of no mean celebrity. In spite of the somewhat involved and intricate structure of its sentences, and its rhapsodical exuberance in speaking of the Saltarello, it will be found quite an agreeable reminder and interpreter of musical charms too apt to prove evanescent to the general mind, however fascinated in the hearing. The Symphony was beautifully played, with a distinctness and purity of outline, and a warmth and vividness of coloring, that brought it home to every one of ordinary musical feeling and perception. Though not so elaborate or great a work, perhaps, as the Symphony in A minor, we are not sure that we do not enjoy it even more than that. Its several movements are admirably contrasted. After the fresh, sunshiny, buoyant Allegro, so full of green fields and blue sky, (only brought more vividly about us by the pensive Mendelssohnian subjectivity of that low running accompaniment of violins, which sets in soon after the announcement of the first theme), how impressive is the sombre, solemn, antique-sounding chant of reed instruments in the Andante, with the stately staccato of the figural bass beneath, and the soft, warm gush of mingling flute passages above! It is like passing from the genial Italian daylight, into the rich gloom of some old church, where the light of olden days is stealing through the twilight of deeply stained Gothic windows, and the religious hymns of early Christian centuries haunt and hang about the place. The tranquil, happy melody of the Minuet flowed on in clear, undisturbed beauty, and the mellow horn Trio made a delicious episode. In the Saltarello presto you have, indeed, the rush and whirl of a Carnival; but not without a dash of Mendelssohnian melancholy, which Mr. Macfarren seems not to have noticed in his analysis. Feverish merriment, joy which tyrannically possesses every sense and nerve is apt to make the spirit sad in its own secret depths. The passage from the Saltarello into the yet wilder Tarantella is quite striking. The latter, with its whirling 6-8 triplet rhythm, indicates the perfect abandon and delirium of excitement; while the former by the hitch in every other triplet denotes a dance in which the dancer still keeps some control and check upon himself; its temperature is one degree lower, and very naturally, before the movement is through, it boils over into the ungovernable Tarantella. This symphony was repeated to the admiration of a still larger audience at last Wednesday's Rehearsal.

There were two other pieces by Mendelssohn. One, a "war march of priests" from "Athalia," is constructed very much after the model of his first happy suggestion in the "Wedding March," both being in the minor key, despite the difference of subject. The imitation cannot be called an improvement on the first thought. The other was an orchestral arrangement of one of the "Songs without Words," a very pleasing one, but not one of the most effective for orchestral purposes. Why will not Mr. Bergmann arrange one of those holder themes, such as that entitled "Volkstied," or that brilliant six-eight movement, in A major, from the first set?

Beethoven's Leonora overture, No. 2, played now for the first time, seemed to unsuspecting hearers the same No. 3, which we have often heard; identical in its ideas, identical almost in treatment throughout the first half; and then they wondered that the trumpet passage sounded so inferior, and that the whole last half so feebly corresponded with their recollections. But we were listening to one of the master's first sketches of what afterwards came out so grand and perfect in the No. 3. The comparison is most interesting and instructive. It is well known that the overture finally adopted to go with the opera, and called overture to Fidelio, was a total abandonment of the ideas contained in the three first, and altogether a new work. We trust the Germanians will some time make the lesson complete by letting us hear the four in one concert.

The harp-playing of Mr. APTOMMAS proves a most refreshing novelty in these concerts. He was listened to with intense delight, applauded to the echo, and compelled to return and play a third time, after giving two long elaborate and difficult pieces by Parish Alvars, one of them a fantasia on Mose in Egitto (either the original or the copy of Thalberg's) with such masterly execution, grace and true expression as we have never yet heard from this poetic instrument. Its pure and mellow tones floated deliciously about the Music Hall. Mr. APTOMMAS commends himself by his look of youthful, fresh enthusiasm, and his simple, unaffected manner. But the sweet sounds of the harp must not tempt us to demand too much of it at once; else, like all simple sweet, it will begin to pall upon the musical palate and unnerve the appetite for stronger meats.—Miss CAROLINE PINTARD sang a sweet little "Lebe wohl," with horn obligato, by Proeh, a very popular German song composer, all in the homesick, Tyrolean style. It was sweetly and tastefully sung.—Herr RUDOLPH did not treat us to the air from La Favorita, nor even to the everlasting Vi ravviso, illness preventing his appearance.

New Publications.

The Modern School for the Piano-Forte. By NATHAN RICHARDSON. pp. 240, 4to. Boston: published by Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington Street.

Mr. Richardson has been among the most enterprising of our young American students of music in Germany, where for nearly two years he enjoyed the instruction of Alexander Dreyschock, one of the most brilliant pianists and successful teachers of our time. His book bears Dreyschock's stamp of approval, and it embodies the principal features of his method and his fingering of the scales. Mr. Richardson has also made himself familiar with the styles and teaching of all the foremost living European masters of the piano. Hence the fitness of his title, "Modern School"; for piano playing has received a great expansion in these days of Kalkbrenner, Thalberg, Chopin, Liszt, and Dreyschock; by the hundred-handed execution of these modern Briareuses the piano is made to speak from all its six or seven octaves like an orchestra, and the sphere of possibilities in execution is enlarged beyond all previous imaginings, although it must to any one seem no mean thing to do the half of what old Bach did in his day. For new requirements there must be new methods.

Doubtless the new school virtuoso players have often cultivated fingers at the expense of heart and brains; some of them seem to have run into fingers altogether, those digital extremities absorbing every other faculty. Mere execution dazzles us out of the true mood for music. But this is only the natural tendency to extremes which always to some extent accompanies and prejudices all good movements. This modern expansion of piano-playing came as a necessity of the age; it grew out of the inward necessity of expression; musical thoughts and feelings longed to utter themselves more largely, and the limits of the instrument and of the finger mechanism had to give way before the inspired, heroic ardor of the player. Many of these wonderful writers and players of hitherto unheard-of difficulties for the piano are genuine tone-poets also, and not mere "finger-knights," as Bach expressed it. It is worth the incredible hours of finger exercise, to become able to play music such as Chopin's. And the facility so acquired by no means comes amiss when one would render the greater thoughts (albeit with fewer finger difficulties) of Beethoven, as they should be rendered, that is, with such abundance of reserved power as is always necessary to the expressive, graceful, eloquent exercise of the power actually put forth. The true idea of a modern pianist is of one who feels and has great music in his soul, and also feels and has it in his fingers. Mechanically, he wants the modern finger practice, and spiritually he wants the musical culture, the Art-truths of both old and new times. The Liszts and Chopins of our day have built their dazzling superstructures upon the good old solid foundations. Bach and Mozart and Beethoven have passed into them, and mingling with their native inspiration, have helped them to be what they are; and with true filial gratitude has Liszt lent his new power to the interpretation of those grander masters.

Mr. Richardson's method, therefore, is not "modern" in the sense of excluding all that goes before. It is eclectic, and incorporates into itself all the well established points of other methods, new and old. In committing yourself to this new guide, you do not forsake the old landmarks, or learn to look for the pole star in a new place. You only take the right steps to qualify yourself to walk on the new heights to which the old Art has attained. You cannot hold back the tempo of the age, you must learn to go with it without giddiness.

But practically to come back to the book and note its contents.

It really seems to us to contain more that is useful in the formation of a good hand and a good style, than any piano-forte school we have ever seen. The first elementary matter about notes and keys is at least as simple and complete as any to be found. Then come important hints as to the true economy of practice, and the part which mind and muscles play, with cautions against blind beetle obstinacy of practice, after both mind and muscles are fatigued. This part is enriched with anatomical drawings of the bones and cartilages of the hand, giving us a peep inside of the curious, the reluctant and yet capable machine, which we would learn to regulate and make obedient to the lightning movements of the brain. This is one new feature.

Then come five-finger exercises, in the greatest possible variety, and in every order, for the loosening and equalizing of the fingers; and we cannot run them over, without sighing for old early days of leisure, wherein we might have the benefit of such uncompromising gymnastics. Equally rich in number and admirable in order are the scale exercises, in all the keys; especially the early introduction and continual renewal of scale exercise in thirds and sixths, fingered upon a uniform and very convenient method, and thus forcing the scholar to begin to overcome in the outset difficulties which turn so many back after a little progress. Here is another new and very useful feature. We may name, too, as a third improvement (on other American and English publications of the kind), the introduction of the German designations of the fingers, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, instead of 1, 2, 3, 4, X.

The left hand is as well cared for as the right, and the octave passages, for strengthening the wrists, are excellent and frequent. The various graces, extensions, arpeggios, &c., &c., are all carefully defined, and progressively incorporated into practice. The whole course of practice is admirably progressive, and sums itself up artistically and inspiringly at last in an entire Sonata of Beethoven (in F minor, dedicated to Haydn), which involves every point of mechanical method, while it is also a fitting finale to the choice ascending series of artistic pieces scattered through the book. Here is another feature which lends peculiar attraction to the book and speaks well for the taste of its author. The "pieces" are none of them hacknied or commonplace; they are all from the selectest, and many of them from the newest authors: for instance, little preludes and etudes of Stephen Heller, Henselt, Schumann, Dreyschock; a song without words of Mendelssohn, a waltz of Chopin, and other genuine little musical poems which refine and elevate the tuneful aspirations of the scholar, and lead towards the true shrine of Art.

Possibly some of the little paragraphs of verbal explanation and direction may provoke a smile by their simplicity, and repetition of the plainest cautions; and the solemn injunctions of reverence at the commencement of some of the finer pieces (such as: "This beautiful composition must not be attempted without a determination to accomplish it in a very finished and chaste style") may strike an artist as superfluous and droll. But it must be

"line upon line and precept upon precept" with young beginners; besides, these things do not touch the essential matter of the book, which resides in the exercises and their order.

We congratulate Mr. Richardson on the warmth with which this product of his five year's work is welcomed. In his advertisement will be found the testimonials of nearly all our resident piano teachers and artists, couched in characteristic terms; we doubt if two more interesting columns of reading matter can be found in our paper. These are the true judges of such a work, and the best evidence of their sincerity is that so many of them are making the "Modern School" the text book in their own teaching.

We had nearly forgotten to allude to the beautiful type and whole exterior of the book, and to the fact that it is published and for sale at Mr. Richardson's new "Musical Exchange," a favorite and beautiful resort of artists and art-lovers.

Three Waltzes, by CHOPIN. Op. 64. Boston: Geo. P. Reed & Co.

Here is a publication to be hailed with delight by players of the piano, who have souls in them. The waltzes of Chopin embody as much of his rare spiritual grace and tenderness, as any of his larger works. They are among his happiest inspirations, his most original and dainty fancies. They are not waltzes for the ball room. Music here is not a slave to ends and occupations lower than itself; not, like the Muse of Strauss, or Lanner, a nimble tiring-maid who merely adds a grace to the odaliskes and fairies of the dance. There is none of this drudging time-keeping, no humdrum about the music of these "waltzes." They have the waltz measure and the waltz grace; but only the dreamy and delicious wanderings of ideal thoughts and fancies, like circling and dissolving wreaths of mist, could waltz away to music of such fine and evanescent outline. They are tone poems and not dances, and they are as redolent of the fine aroma and the spiritual reveries of Chopin, as those so-called waltzes of Beethoven are surcharged with the electricity of his grand and massive genius.

Chopin (who would believe it) is really quite in vogue now among our young amateurs. If you ask an accomplished lady pianist to play to you, it is rather more than an equal chance that you shall hear something of Chopin. Two years ago, that would have been the rarest sort of God-send. It certainly shows that our musical aspirations are turned somewhat into a worthier direction than in the days when Herz and Thalberg were the all in all of the young amateur's ambition. Chopin's compositions, in the foreign editions, owing to monopoly of copyrights, are costly. We trust therefore that Messrs. Reed & Co., will go on in the good work of multiplying copies here.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

The third Chamber Concert, which took place on Tuesday evening, was the most satisfactory of the series thus far. Mr. AUGUST GÖCKEL, the pianist, had been wisely re-engaged. We were first put into a lively, cheerful, appetitive humor by one of the happy, sunny quartets of Haydn (No. 78, in B flat). We do not recall much to individualize it among the other eighty and odd quartets of the ever fertile and obliging master, who would jot down a fresh quartet at a moment's warning almost for a friend. Of course some among the eighty are of comparatively small account in themselves, except as they reflect the cheerful piety and equanimity of Haydn, or show us his benign features clearly mirrored always in his Addisonian elegance of style. Some one wittily said of one of his feeble works, alluding to his pious habits in composing: "Father Haydn must have forgotten to say his prayers that time!" We should not say this of the Quartet played for us that evening; it seemed to us well worthy of "father Haydn," if not one of his finest specimens; it was played con amore, and gave a capital relish to the entire programme.

After this graceful prelude we were well prepared for the substance of Part First, which followed in the shape of Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata," repeated by Messrs. GÖCKEL and A. FRIES. Some of the Germans call this the Teufels-Sonate, pretending that its three movements typify the three worlds to which man is related; the first Presto the infernal, the Andante the celestial, and the Finale Presto the terrestrial actual. We certainly have no objection to the middle branch of the comparison. The heavenly theme of that Andante justifies all the fond variations with which Beethoven prolonged and followed out its dear inspiration. The Sonata was on the whole satisfactorily played by both artists, and one could not but exclaim with wonder, as if it were the first instead of the thousandth time, at the fire and depth and originality of Beethoven!

In Part Second, Mozart's Quintet in D, (No. 4) formed the piece de resistance, a lovely creation, which charmed our thoughts away with it beyond the possibility of reporting, even were we in the humor of analysis and detail. Mr. RYAN played again that charming, simple little Romanza for the clarinet, by Schumann, (op. 94) with Mr. GÖCKEL at the piano. It was rendered with the chaste expression it required, neither sentimentally nor coldly. For a concluding piece a Capriccio of Mendelssohn stood announced; but the non-arrival of some of the parts obliged Mr. GÖCKEL to substitute the march and finale from Weber's Concert-Stück, which he executed with mere quartet accompaniment, but with wonderful fire and precision.

Read "A True Story" on another page. It is as beautifully told, as it is true, and while it hangs another wreath, forever green, upon the monument of JONAS CHICKERING, is honorable to the author of the tribute. Mr. RICHARD STORRS WILLIS, we are happy to see, is now sole proprietor and editor of the New York Musical World and Times, a journal very widely circulated, and deservingly, so far as it has received or shall receive its tone from one of so much true musical and intellectual culture and refinement.

THE ORCHESTRAL PIANO.—We find in the Paris correspondence of the National Intelligencer the following description of a new piano constructed for Liszt:

"The orgue melodium is attached to the body of Erard's grand piano, filling up the space between the body and the floor, but so adapted to the form as not to increase at all the space which that instrument alone would occupy. The instrument, however, which realizes this new and powerful combination, would seem to be destined for the use of robust men only. Performance upon it will require an amount and kind of physical exertion inconsistent with lady-like grace and dignity of deportment, if not actually beyond female muscular capacity. Feet, knees, hands, and voice of the performer are all employed to produce separately or simultaneously the effects of vocal music, of the piano and of the full orchestra. The bellows attached to this apparatus are so easily and perfectly managed as to produce the force, decision, and instantaneous distinctness of expression hitherto capable of being rendered only by first-rate artists with the bow on stringed instruments. With those advantages the new instrument combines the perfect sostenuto of the organ, with the subdued effect of a number of muted violins, oboes, (hautboys,) &c., composing a full orchestra. Mme. Deyfres will, it is said, dare to play in public upon this formidable instrument, which at present promises to open a new, large and attractive field, both to musical composition and performance."

GRACE CHURCH, NEW YORK.—We have received a programme of the music to be performed at this "first class" sanctuary, on Christmas Day, which we subjoin below. The music is undoubtedly the best that the great Metropolis can give, but we cannot but feel that these programmes of the music to be given by the choir of a church savor a little too much of the world, and seem in keeping only in such a church as the one described in a late number of the Home Journal, where, in answer to a stranger asking for a seat, a member of the Society replies, with a drawl, "Well, weally, I'm not the sexton," and where, when he finally found a place where he might kneel, the well-dressed occupant of the pew carefully withdrew from the stranger's vicinity the gilt-edged, velvet-bound prayer books, intended only for "private use." But we are glad to see that the congregation are to hear old Haydn and Hummel, and not the latest born anthem of the "American School of Music."

ORDER OF THE MUSIC

AT GRACE CHURCH, FOR CHRISTMAS DAY, 1853.

Venite exultemus Domino.
Gloria Patri, composed by.....Hummel.
Te Deum laudamus, composed by.....Haydn.
Benedictus,.....Arranged from Dietsch, by King.
Psalm 105th, composed by.....W. A. King.
Christmas Hymn, the 45th, Arranged from Mozart, by King.

After the Sermon, will be sung by the Choir, (Mrs. Julia L. Bodstein, [late Miss Northall,] Miss Dressler, Messrs. A. Schnyder, and Philip Mayer):—"Thy seat, O God, endureth forever; the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre." Ps. xlv. 7. The music by Joseph Haydn.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

MR. DRESEL's friends, and they are all the friends of pure chamber music, will be glad to see that his second concert is announced for next Tuesday evening.

The GERMANIANS give this afternoon some merry Christmas music for the children. The "Kinder-Sinfonie," a drollery of "father Haydn," is to be performed, in which the composer, with a true German sympathy with childhood, has introduced all sorts of musical toys collected by him in the town where he wrote it, which was famous in the toy trade.

MR. CHICKERING'S ESTATE.—The interest manifest in the welfare of the firm of Jonas Chickering & Sons, has induced many to ask of the future of a concern so identified with this city. We learn that Mr. Chickering's affairs are left in such a state, that it will require very little time, to close them up, and that it is the intention of the family to continue the business as heretofore. Mr. Thomas E. Chickering, is himself a most accomplished and ingenious mechanic, who is every way qualified to assume a position which the loss of his father imposes upon him. He will be assisted by his brothers, Messrs. Francis & George Chickering, and with the aid of Mr. Stephen Clapp, for many years the foreman, and of Mr. G. H. Child, the clerk, we anticipate for them many years of prosperity. The new building on Tremont Road will be speedily finished.—Eve. Gazette.

NEW YORK.—The "Messiah" is to be performed on Monday evening, by the "HARMONIC SOCIETY," with Jullien's full orchestra, and JULLIEN for Conductor. BADIALI is among the solo singers.

THE SONATA FORM.

THOMAS RYAN, respectfully begs leave to inform those who are in the habit of hearing Symphonies, Quartets, Quintets, Sonatas, or any works of that class, that he is prepared to explain or analyze them, either in small classes or to single pupils. His long experience in the performance and in the composition of such works, added to his being in possession of the scores of almost every work of that class presented in Boston, gives him peculiar advantages. The knowledge of the form is almost indispensable towards the understanding in the slightest manner, and will infinitely enhance the pleasure derived in the hearing of them. It is a subject which amateurs of the slightest pretensions ought to feel interested in, as new and old compositions are brought forward daily. The subscriber would be happy to receive pupils for this alone, or in connection with Thorough Bass.

Piano, Violin, Flute, or Clarinet lessons given. Communications left at Geo. P. Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, 5 Franklin Street, immediately attended to. Dec. 3.

IN PRESS... WILL BE READY DECEMBER 1st,

CARHART'S MELODEON INSTRUCTOR:

Presenting, in a series of nearly Two Hundred Popular Studies, a complete and progressive method of practical instruction for the MELODEON, and REED INSTRUMENTS generally, together with a choice selection of the most admired Songs, Polkas, Marches, Waltzes, &c. &c. The above work, elegantly printed and bound, will take the lead of all Melodeon Instructors, being eminently adapted to the wants of the great mass of learners, and will be as universally popular as the instruments of the maker whose name it bears. Teachers and Scholars may depend upon this being just the book they want.

THE GREATEST METHOD OF THE AGE!

FOR THE
PIANO-FORTE,

Is an Instruction Book which will enable one to Become a Great Pianist
IN THE SHORTEST TIME!

THIS Work is admitted by the most celebrated Pianists and Teachers, both in Europe and America, to be BY FAR THE MOST INGENUOUS, SIMPLE, PROGRESSIVE AND COMPREHENSIVE METHOD FOR THE PIANO THAT HAS EVER BEEN PRESENTED TO THE PUBLIC,—embracing a complete system, from the very outset to the highest classical music.

The anatomy of the hands is shown by beautifully colored plates. The entire work surpasses all previous musical publications, as regards mechanical appearance and elegance.

The author, NATHAN RICHARDSON, has spent the last five years in Europe for the sole purpose of getting up an Instruction Book, which would embrace the styles and effective Exercises of ALL distinguished Pianists and Teachers. To accomplish that object, he was assisted by

EIGHTEEN EMINENT EUROPEAN PIANISTS.

The result has been, an Instruction Book so comprehensive and ingenious, that a pupil will acquire the styles and mechanical difficulties of all celebrated Pianists, and that, too, with far less labor and practice than is usually required to learn an ordinary composition, under the old methods.

All who are interested in Music, are invited to call at the

and examine the work for themselves, and they will be surprised that a work which appears so simple should guarantee such wonderful results.

It is beautifully got up, in embossed cloth, gilt edges, sides, and back, 320 pages, and sold at $4 00 per single copy.

A very acceptable Present for Christmas and New Year.

Twenty Testimonials.

The following Testimonials from nearly all our resident Teachers and Professors, arranged in alphabetical order, show the estimation in which the work is held by those best qualified to judge.

Babcock, William R.

MR. NATHAN RICHARDSON,

Dear Sir:—After a thorough examination of the "Modern School for the Piano Forte," permit me to express my humble opinion of your work, which I am fully convinced possesses superior advantages over any other of the kind with which I am acquainted; inasmuch as the copious selection of progressive exercises, from the simplest yet indispensable five-finger practice, to the most complicated forms of the scale and arpeggios, octaves, chords &c.; together with those beautiful illustrations from the great modern authors, cannot fail to carry the pupil through all those mechanical difficulties with which the modern art of piano-forte playing abounds; thereby rendering him a most thorough and accomplished pianist.

I regard the numerous plates explaining the anatomical construction of the hand, as being an important feature of your work; since he who practices from a knowledge of the anatomy of the hand, practices intelligently; and, the advantage of such a pupil over one who practices mechanically, must be obvious. The "Modern School" must ultimately take the precedence of all other works of the kind known in this country. Yours &c.,

WM. R. BABCOCK.

Baumbach, A.

Boston, Dec. 14, 1853.

Dear Sir:—Your "Modern School for the Piano-Forte," is certainly a great improvement upon all other instruction books, and an inducement for all to learn to play the piano. It is simple, progressive, and instructive, and will undoubtedly be adopted by all good teachers.

With a hope you will meet with success, I remain

Sincerely yours, A. BAUMBACH.

Bergmann, Carl.

Boston, Dec. 1853.

Dear Sir:—Allow me to return my thanks for a copy of the "Modern School for the Piano-forte;" and if my testimony in its favor will be of any assistance to you, please make use of it. There is no doubt of your Instruction Book being a decided improvement upon all others; and, if a person can become a pianist through any method, he certainly can through yours, the simplicity of which must make it popular; and as it really is superior to all others, it is the duty of teachers to adopt it and recommend it. Sincerely Yours,

CARL BERGMANN,
Leader of the Germania Musical Society.

Dresel, Otto.

Dear Sir:—I had great pleasure in examining your new Piano-forte School, and to those who may place any value upon my opinion, I gladly recommend this work as a speedy method for becoming thoroughly acquainted with the elementary parts of musical execution, and as enabling the student, in a simple and progressive manner, soon to overcome all difficulties which meet him in the study of the modern art of piano playing. I should give it the preference over all other methods published in this country, were it only that in it you have introduced the German fingering; an enterprise which should find encouragement and be received with the greatest approbation on the part of every piano teacher. May your work find the success it deserves, and compensate your labor! This is the sincere wish of Yours, very truly,

OTTO DRESEL.

Boston, Dec. 16, 1853.

Dear Sir:—Having carefully examined your new work entitled the "Modern School for the Piano-forte," it gives me much pleasure to offer you my sincere recommendation. The strictly progressive character of the work, the judicious selection of the most useful mechanical exercises at each stage of the pupil's progress, and above all, the excellent arrangement of the exercises on the scales, seem to me worthy of the highest praise, and place it in these respects far above any method yet published in this country.

JAMES FLINT.

Frenzel, A. W.

Boston, Dec. 9, 1853.

Dear Sir:—I have carefully examined your excellent new work, the "Modern School for the Piano-forte," and am confident that the want so long experienced by many teachers is now supplied. I was peculiarly pleased with the arrangement of the finger exercises, scales &c., also the judicious selections, which will be as interesting to the teacher as to the scholar. But where the merits of the work are so evident, it is not necessary to particularize. I consider it the best work of the kind extant, as through the study of it the pupil will be enabled to overcome the difficulties so often met with in the compositions of the modern masters, viz. Liszt, Thalberg, Drey-schock, etc., etc. I sincerely recommend it to the musical public; the success of such a work is certain, and I have already introduced it in my teaching.

I am, yours very truly,

A. W. FRENZEL.

Glynn, W. C.

Boston, Dec. 10, 1853.

Dear Sir:—I have made an examination of your "Modern School for the Piano-forte" and feel confident that it is an improvement upon all other Instruction Books, and is destined to be the standard method throughout the country. Accept my best wishes and believe me sincerely yours,

W. C. GLYNN.

Hill, Francis G.

Boston, Dec. 14, 1853.

Dear Sir:—Having played the "Modern School for the Piano-forte" through, I have decided it to be the only complete Instruction Book which embraces the styles of the distinguished pianists. It is truly an improvement upon all other Methods as regards simplicity and the ingenious arrangement of the scales and other passages. The fingering of the scales, particularly in thirds and sixths, as fingered by Alexandre Drey-schock, is admirably adapted. Having been a pupil of his, I can testify to its correctness. May you have the success that you deserve, is the wish of

Yours truly,

FRANCIS G. HILL.

Howard, Frank H.

Dear Sir:—I have made a thorough perusal of your "Modern School for the Piano-forte," and I think the arrangement of it excellent. The Introduction of the German Method of fingering is a great addition, and has long been needed. I shall use, and commend it to my friends, teachers and scholars. Trusting your labors may not be in vain, in bringing before the musical world so valuable an assistant, as the "Modern School," I remain, dear Sir,

Yours, with much respect,

FRANK H. HOWARD,
Organist at King's Chapel.

Boston, 11 West Street, Dec. 17th, 1853.

Jaell, Alfred.

Dear Sir:—I have made a thorough practical examination of your "Modern School for the Piano-Forte" and hereby certify that I was much pleased with the progressive and ingenious exercises it contains. You have certainly shown the pupil a way of overcoming the great difficulties of the Piano, which is in many respects far superior to any other I have ever seen. The Book embraces the styles of so many different authors, and you have given so many excellent examples, that a pupil cannot fail to become a good player (if gifted with the least musical talent) through this Method.

I heartily recommend it to every one that studies the Piano-Forte. I remain yours truly

ALFRED JAEEL.

Kielblock, Adolph.

Dear Sir:—I feel greatly indebted to you for sending me a copy of your "Modern School for the Piano-Forte." The examination of it afforded me much pleasure, as I found it in many respects far superior to any other Piano-School now in vogue in this country. The great care and diligence which you have evidently bestowed upon the five-finger exercises, scales and chord passages, the most important parts of piano instruction, must gain you the regard of every one who knows that without a perfect mastery over the mechanical, the spirit can never be educated;—in other words, that, in order to play with soul and spirit, the mechanical means, by which these agencies manifest themselves, must be at the entire command of the player. Besides, the pieces which you have selected, as it were, to reward the student for the industry devoted to his task, are both pleasant and useful, being composed by the best writers for the piano. That you have adopted the German fingering, will, I hope, make no great difference to those who are only familiar with the English one. It can only be profitable to the public as well as to the teachers and publishers, when throughout the musical world one kind of fingerlog is established. I remain, with sincere regards,

Yours,

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK.

Kreissmann, A.

Boston, Dec. 1853.

Dear Sir:—Your Modern School for the Piano-forte embraces the styles of the most celebrated pianists and the best leading features of all other instruction books now in use, and to all who wish to be in possession of a complete method I strongly recommend yours.

Most respectfully yours,

Professor of Music, Boston.

Leavens, B. F.

Boston, Dec. 15, 1853.

Dear Sir:—The perusal of the "Modern School for the Piano-forte" has afforded me much pleasure, and I can honestly recommend it to both pupils and teachers of the Piano, as a speedy method of becoming a thorough performer on that instrument. May you be successful in your enterprise, is the wish of yours, &c.

Muller, F. F.

Boston, Dec. 9, 1853.

Dear Sir:—The examination of your "Modern School for the Piano-Forte" has given me great satisfaction, and it is with pleasure I inform you of it. I am truly rejoiced you have given to the musical world the desideratum so long needed. The rudimentary portion of your book is certainly the best I have seen in any instruction book extant in the English language; the anatomical portion is an entire new feature, and greatly enhances the benefit which those who may possess your Modern School will derive. In fact, it is such an instruction book as has been much needed in this go-ahead country. Even in music 'Young America' leaves 'Old Fogyism' behind, and you have the honor of being the pioneer. I recommend your book to my scholars, and shall do so whenever I can. Accept my warmest wishes for the success you so richly deserve.

Yours truly,
F. F. MÜLLER, Organist at the Old South Church and of the Handel and Haydn Society, &c.

Perabeau, H.

Dear Sir:—I am very much pleased with your "Modern School for the Piano-Forte." It is a very complete and systematic work. I hope that scholars will as carefully study it as you have taken pains in selecting and arranging its contents.

Yours respectfully,

H. PERABEAU.

Southard, L. H.

265 Washington St. Boston, Dec. 1853.

After a careful examination of the "Modern School for the Piano-Forte," by N. Richardson, I am fully convinced that the high praise it has received from so many excellent teachers, is amply merited; yet, had I been the first to see the work, I think I should not have hesitated to express the opinion that, on the whole, it is far superior to any method now in use. I am persuaded that its general adoption by teachers would much improve both the mechanism and taste of most pupils, whatever method, if any, they might have previously studied.

L. H. SOUTHARD.

Thorup, A. T.

Boston, Dec. 19, 1853.

Dear Sir:—Please accept my thanks for the copy you sent me of your "Modern School for the Piano-Forte." I have had much satisfaction in examining this work, but have only time to speak of one of the new features in it. The practice of the scales in double-thirds and double sixths, has usually been thought to belong to a much later period in the student's progress, and the introduction of them in so early a part in this work may to some appear too bold, and inconsistent with a gradual progress in mastering the mechanical difficulties of the piano; but after careful reflection on this subject, I am persuaded that this practice must very rapidly advance the student, when faithfully and perseveringly continued with the new, consistent and systematic fingering here introduced, and which will so much facilitate their study. The practice of the sixths should of course not be attempted, unless the hand is sufficiently extended to reach them without much effort. Wishing you much success in bringing this work largely into circulation, I remain, with sincere regards, yours,

ANDREAS T. THORUP.

Trenkle, J.

Boston, Dec. 20, 1853.

Sir:—I can conscientiously recommend "The Modern School for the Piano-Forte," as an instruction book, to all interested in music. The present time demands a Method which combines the ideas, peculiarities, and styles of different celebrated pianists and teachers, which may be only found in your book. It contains a large number of new, useful and exceedingly valuable exercises, which are arranged in the most progressive manner, followed by pieces of a superior character, which have been carefully selected; they are interesting and instructive, and serve to encourage the pupil, and at the same time cultivate a good classical taste. I sincerely recommend your method, particularly to those who commence late in life to study or play the Piano, and I am fully convinced that no other work published in this country is so thoroughly adapted to the general wants and to render the fingers flexible as "The Modern School for the Piano-Forte." Truly yours,

J. TRENKLE.

Webb, Geo. J.

Boston, Dec. 20, 1853.

Dear Sir:—Having examined with considerable care your "Modern School for the Piano-Forte," I feel prepared to add my humble testimony to its intrinsic merit. I regard it as a work of great value to the piano-forte student. Its numerous exercises, (many of which are new, and most ingeniously contrived,) for strengthening and securing an independent action of the fingers, together with its extensive provision for scale practice, are superior to any book of a similar nature that has fallen under my notice. It seems to me also, to embrace all the qualities necessary to enable any one possessing the requisite musical talent, to surmount the greatest difficulties met with in the works of the most distinguished composers.

Yours truly,

GEO. J. WEBB.

Wheaton, J. B.

Dear Sir:—I hasten to bear testimony to the merits of your excellent method for the Piano. Aitherto the playing community have been obliged to depend upon dry and uninteresting methods, almost entirely without progression. Your "Modern School" supplies the want long felt, viz.: a work that should combine the most desirable exercises, together with pieces of the most unexceptionable character. Judging from my own experience, I do not hesitate to say, that your compilation of exercises and choice pieces is the very best for developing all necessary qualities for becoming a finished pianist.

Yours truly,

J. B. WHEATON.

Handel's Hallelujah Chorus.

[From Surman's Oratorio Hand-Book.]

The Messiah is much too wide a field to expatiate upon within the limits of a mere prefix; but perhaps a popular analysis of the "Hallelujah Chorus" will throw some light upon Handel's greatness as a choral writer, and also assist the reader to appreciate the excellences of some other parts of the oratorio. Handel seems to have thought less of himself, and even of his art, than of his poem and of his audience. He considered himself as appealing less to musicians than to mankind, through a medium which was part and parcel of his nature. This appears from his reply to Lord Kinnoul, who had complimented him, soon after the first performance of the Messiah, on the entertainment he had just given the town. "My lord," said Handel, "I should be sorry if I only entertained them,—I wish to make them better." But it appears even more clearly from the evidence afforded by his works, as we proceed to instance in the case of the "Hallelujah."

After an announcement of the subject in three bars for the stringed instruments, it is taken up by the voices, iterating the word "Hallelujah." Nothing can be more simple than the melody. He who hears it for the first time is conscious that he has never heard anything like it, and that it can form no part of any other composition without being instantly recognized and restored to its rightful owner. Having no resemblances, no associations, it is necessarily exempt from the slightest taint of vulgarity. It is withal so easy of execution, and lies so well for the voices, that the youngest singers in the chorus can throw their hearts and souls into it. The harmony is equally simple, glowing with the common chord. When the audience have been wrought into a state of excitement by this jubilant outbreak, it is suddenly arrested that they may hear the reason for it, and feel the solemnity of it: "For the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." This forms a new musical subject, given out in unisons and octaves. So startling is the effect, that (we are told on the authority of Lord Kinnoul), at the first performance of the Messiah, the King, who happened to be present, and the whole company, rose as one man, and remained standing till the end of the chorus. Then the "Hallelujah" returns, accompanied, however, with drums and trumpets in addition to the strings, and invested, by the chastened feeling of the audience, with a kind of religious awe. After this the second subject is repeated, followed as before by the "Hallelujah." By this alternation the two subjects are indelibly stamped upon the mind, so that even the common hearer is prepared to feel and understand them when taken in conjunction. The second subject, "For the Lord God omnipotent reigneth," is then led off by the trebles, the other parts, beginning with the tenors, consecutively taking the subject of the "Hallelujah" under it. Here again we see the consummate tact of the composer, in addressing himself to the people. The uneducated ear generally recognizes only the highest melody; had the lead been given to an inner part, its effect upon the general audience had been lost; but Handel well knew that the "Hallelujahs" might be safely left to take care of themselves; that by making them subordinate, the audience would feel the two subjects simultaneously, endowed, as it were, by art, with more ears than nature gave them; and that, when the lead afterwards fell to the tenors and basses, it would be distinctly felt as an independent melody, even below the ringing of the "Hallelujahs," the thunder of drums, and the fanfare of trumpets.

By way of contrast, we have next a picture of this beneficent reign in a strain of heavenly sweetness. The turbulent rule of the Prince of the Air has been overthrown, and "the kingdom of this world is become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ." At the words, "of this world," a charming effect is produced by a progression known to musicians as the hypodiatonic cadence of Mercadier de Belest.* A new subject then announces the eternal durability of the Saviour's throne. "And He shall reign for ever and ever." It is a plain and noble fugue lead, delivered by the basses in what is technically called the plagal mode, and answered in the authentic mode by the tenors. The free accompaniment to the words "for ever and ever," having the character of the "Hallelujah" melody, not only preserves uniformity in the composition, but tells upon the audience, because they have been prepared to follow and to feel it. And now we have a proclamation of the titles of the Almighty King, heralded, trumpet-tongued, by the trebles and altos, "King of kings and Lord of lords." All this is done by the iteration of a single note. The titles are thrice proclaimed, the voices rising a fourth the second time, and then ascending gradually to like notes upon the trumpet, and accompanied by "Hallelujahs." Observe, too, that Handel has here, for the first time, taken advantage of the modulation. We say taken advantage,—he does not seek it, but falls naturally into that train which the melody suggests. It does not drag you away, but it forces you along; you are chained to the flaming car of Elijah. The remainder of the chorus is one bright effulgence of glory. He who could stand it with an equal pulse and an unmoistened eye, may be both a wise and a good man, but assuredly has no sensibility for music.

It might have been thought that one such effort as this would have exhausted the mightiest human genius, had not he who wrote the "Hallelujah Chorus" afterwards equalled if not transcended it, in the same oratorio, by "Worthy is the Lamb." It is instructive to compare the grandeur of Handel's effects with the poverty of his means; to contrast his meagre bands with the appliances of the modern orchestra, and then to reflect upon what he has done. The secret lies in a nutshell. He made the profoundest musical learning subservient to the higher beauties of expression. He never suffered petty details to interfere with the breadth of his coloring or the severe majesty of his outline. He knew that forced consecutions, abrupt modulations, close intervals, and chromatic progressions, can never kindle popular enthusiasm. Hence his greatest works are still as fresh as when the ink first dried from his pen. But the dignity of Handel is twofold; he has dignity of treatment, and dignity of subject. The former may be profitably studied and rationally explained; the latter can only be regarded with that mute reverence which is due to the creations of genius.

[* Why load a very common cadence with all this superfluity of learned phrase?—ED.]

M. Zimmerman, the Composer.

A few days ago, (says a late Paris letter to the Boston Atlas), all the artists, all the musicians, all the literary men of Paris, were assembled at Notre Dame de Lorette, to pay the last outward honors friends can bestow, to M. Zimmerman. The service was imposing and severe. M. Aymes sang admirably an unpublished composition of the deceased, his Pie Jesu, at the elevation, and after the service in the church all his friends followed his body to his favorite village, Autenil, where Baron Taylor bade him adieu in a touching discourse. M. Zimmerman was a striking example of the absolute truth of the old remark that men may make themselves what they please. By his unvarying punctuality, by his laborious and patient life, by his indefatigable activity, by his uprightness of character, he had raised himself from the humblest position to a considerable fame, to an ample fortune, to universal consideration by all classes of society.

M. Zimmerman was born in Paris, March 17, 1785. He entered the Conservatoire while quite young; Boieldieu was his piano master, and Rey, and afterwards Catel, were his masters of harmony. While only fourteen he gained his first prize as pianist, while Kalkbrenner, who was his competitor, obtained only the second prize. In 1816 he was appointed a professor of the piano, and then began that long and noble career which has given the musical world some of the best contemporary pianists: Gorla, Prudent, Lacombe, Ravina, Alkan, Marmontel, Josephine Martin, Anatole Petit, Jules Cohen, are all his pupils; and among the composers who had him for master I may mention Ambrose Thomas, Henri Potier, Victor Masse, &c. His principal works are: a mass which was executed last year on St. Cecilia's day; an Heroical Requiem, written by command in 1846, for the inauguration of the Emperor's tomb; Ulysse a Corcyre, a grand opera in three acts; L'Enlèvement, an opera comique in three acts, (played in 1830, and with success;) Le Mur Mitoyen, in one act; a symphony for a grand orchestra; two overtures; an Encyclopedie Musicale, thought here very valuable; treatises on harmony, on fugue and counterpoint, on composition—all of which have been adopted by the Conservatoire—and fifty pieces of instrumental music. M. Zimmerman's generosity and beneficence were boundless. How many times, when he was satisfied with the application and the progress of his poorer pupils, did he pay them for it! Let me relate to you one of his first escapades—for he did not wait until he was a man of fortune before he unclasped his purse. He had a friend of about his own age, a painter of a good deal of talent, M. Gaillot, a pupil of David. After saying they were young, I need not mention what castles in the air they builded, all glittering in the blaze of glory. M. Zimmerman had just commenced giving some lessons, and his lessons brought him in a very little money, nay, as you will presently see, sometimes cost him money. His friend managed to lay up something—enough to purchase a large canvas; the canvas was no sooner in his studio than he ran to Zimmerman—

"Embrace me, mon cher," said he, "I have just purchased a magnificent canvas, one of my friends has lent me his studio during a visit he pays to Italy, and I am going to make a splendid painting."

"Have you selected the subject of it?"

"Yes, indeed, a Roman theme, a subject worthy of being treated by a man—Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi."

"Tres bien! work hard and give a chef d'œuvre."

"Now see here, old fellow, send your lessons to old Nick, and write me an opera in five acts. I have the subject for you—Regulus in his iron cage—and we'll get some one to hush up a 'book' for you. O! how happy I should be, if the day I exhibit my picture, a great opera by you is played."

"Nothing would make me happier," said Zimmerman; "but your vision is impossible. Prepare your painting, and let me continue to give my lessons; for see here, mon cher; three of my pupils would starve to death, if I did not lend them the money the other two pay me."

M. Gaillot set to work, and in six weeks his painting was finished; he wanted a frame for it, a gilder sold him one on credit; his picture was received, and occupied a prominent place in the Exhibition. Gaillot and Zimmerman fell into each other's arms, and hugged each other, and wept for joy; they deemed themselves masters of the world. The Exhibition wore on, but no purchaser for the great chef d'œuvre appeared; the Exhibition closed; still no purchaser knocked at the door of the borrowed studio; a notice appeared, requesting all artists to remove their paintings; still no purchaser—poor Gaillot was in the predicament of the Vicar of Wakefield, after his family were planted in Arcadia. He told Zimmerman he would be obliged to burn his chef d'œuvre. Zimmerman said nothing, but the next day, his face radiant with joy, asked Gaillot what he would take for his painting.

"Why, at first, I thought I would get 500 francs for it; but now I would willingly take 200 francs."

"Here are 500 francs for you," said Zimmerman; "a rich amateur of my acquaintance has been very much struck with your painting, and instructed me to purchase it for him."

This "rich amateur" was Zimmerman, who, to encourage his friend, had sold his notes to raise the money, and which he met at maturity, thanks to his untiring labor. His life ended as it began—one of his last acts in this world was to provide by his will a bequest of government securities, representing an annual income of 1000 or 1200 frs., to the Society of Musicians. What a loss his house is to Paris! It was one of the most popular and the most hospitable here; he had lived for more than twenty-five years in the Cité d'Orleans—that city of artists—and every artist of European celebrity (even Jenny Lind sang there!) has sung there, and every composer has published there some composition which afterwards perhaps made the tour of the world. MM. Meyerbeer, Auber, Halevy, were his most familiar guests. He leaves a son and three daughters—the eldest is married to M. Dubuffe, the painter; the second to a wealthy merchant of Fecamp; the third to M. Charles Gounod, the author of Sapho, of the choruses of Ulysse, and the Manager of the Orpheon. I need scarcely tell you what M. Zimmerman died of—for I have long since told you, that all our literary men and artists die of a hardened heart or a softened brain. M. Zimmerman died of a disease of the heart.

The Portamento di Voce.

The Portamento di voce is very generally used in speaking of singing, and in teaching it: and it forms, most certainly, one of the most important parts of instruction; and, if perfectly executed, one of the greatest, most expressive, and touching beauties in the art of singing. Yet the portamento is very generally misunderstood, even by the teachers of music; and in fact, it can better be perceived by the ear than explained by words.

Hæser, a very eminent professor of singing, gives the best explanation of it, which is as follows: "Portamento is not only the sustaining of the voice in its full metal (timbre in French,) through all its possible shades of high or low, and forte or piano, but also, and this latter in particular, the blending and melting of one tone into another; which is most perfect, when every tone, in perfect equality of strength, fulness and roundness, flows on, as it were, into the next; thus being most intimately combined with it."

The human voice alone is capable of producing the portamento perfectly; and to this circumstance it owes greatly the superiority of expression which it enjoys over instruments. Next to the human voice stand the wind instruments in this preëminence, the tone being produced from them by breathing. Stringed instruments are still less capable of producing the portamento, and keyed instruments not at all.

The portamento must be well distinguished from the disgustingly ill-toned drawing of one tone into another; which is like the sound produced on stringed instruments by slowly running down the finger on the same string. This is no portamento, although it is by many singers practised as such, and called so. It is, on the contrary, a fault, producing a disagreeable drawing and howling (urlare, or delicately termed maniera affettata, smorfiosa, by the Italian.) It might be permitted in piano and soft parts, between two tones of only half a tone's distance; and then only by soprano voices. In lower voices the effect is under all circumstances disagreeable.

To study the portamento will only be of use, after the singer has his head and chest registers of the voice, in their equality and union, completely in his power. Good exercises for it are scales in A and E major; first in long notes, and only gradually in shorter ones: and after that, pieces which are suitable for it by their time, (largo, adagio, cantabile, &c.) and by their character, (more properly song than declamation.) The upward scale gives a better exercise than the downward scale, experience showing that most voices go easier downwards than upwards, and the downward scale also tending to create the fault of drawing the tones into one another.

A good portamento gives an inexpressible charm to singing; but it would produce monotony and effeminacy, if constantly used. The singer would therefore do well to practice alternately uniting and sustaining the notes in the portamento, and then to take them up fresh without binding them thus closely.

The greatest art in the portamento is, to make the transition of the tones into each other so imperceptible, that they appear to be bound together, and yet so plain and distinct, that they appear at the same time to be staccato.

A CONCERT PROGRAMME!—We clip the following from a German and English paper published in St. Louis.

German Beerhall,

No. 16, North 3d Street, between Market and Chesnut Street.

Monday, the 5th December, and every following Monday,

Grand Concert,

In two parts, executed by Mr. A. DERLETH and his renowned Band.

The newest and best compositions of German, French and Italian Music are executed, and the Programme is changed every week.

Admission: Free of charge.

Doors open at 6 o'clock, the Concert begins at 7.

The BAVARIAN BEER from the SALVATOR-BREWERY will be served; also:

RUSSIAN CAVIAR,
SWISS CHEESE,
LIMBURG CHEESE,
SMOKED SAUSAGES, PICKLED DUTCH HERRINGS, and other Eatables.

Every lover of pleasure and jovial amusement is politely invited.

MISS ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. A writer in the Transcript communicates the following gratifying intelligence of the progress of our young Boston cantatrice. Can the "Vestal," in which she is said to have made her debut, be Spontini's Vestale? Then indeed does her beginning indicate a worthier artistic aim than is commonly evinced by Italian opera debutantes!

In "Il Buon Gusto," of the 30th Oct., published in Florence, is the following notice: "Miss Adelaide Phillips has been engaged for the Fall season at Brescia, and for the Carnival at Crema, through the agency of Signor Magotti. Miss Phillips possesses a magnificent and powerful voice, and has all the requisites of a distinguished Prima Donna."

A private letter under date of Nov. 6th, to a gentleman in this city, states: "Every one is delighted with her, and anticipates for her the most brilliant success. She leaves this place to-morrow for Brescia, where she makes her debut on the 25th inst. in the opera of the 'Vestul.' She is very happy in the idea of appearing in public. There are here, at present, 250 singers waiting for an engagement, who generally are obliged to pay 200 to 300 dollars for an opportunity to come out. She therefore considers herself very fortunate to have secured so early an offer of an engagement."

THE NIGHTINGALE.

A day of fuller joy arose for me
When the young Spring-tide came, and dark-eyed boys
Bound violets and anemones to sell.
The later light gave scope to long delight,
And I might stray, unhaunted by the fear
Of fever, or the chill of evening air,
While happiest companionship enriched
The ways whose very dust was gold before.
Then the enchantment of an orange grove
First overcame me, entering thy lone walks
Cloistered in twilight, Villa Massimo!
Where the stern cypresses stand up to guard
A thousand memories of blessedness.
There seemed a worship in the concentrate Deep-breathing sweetness of those virgin flowers,
Fervid as worship is in passionate souls
That have not found their vent in earthly life,
And soar too wild untaught, and sink unaided.
They filled the air with incense gathered up
For the pale vesper of the evening star.
Nor failed the rite of meet antiphony—
I felt the silence holy, till a note
Fell, as a sound of ravishment from heaven—
Fell, as a star falls, trailing sound for light;
And, ere its thread of melody was broken,
From the serene sprang other sounds, its fellows,
That fluttered back celestial welcoming.
Astonished, penetrate, too past myself
To know I sinned in speaking, where a breath
Less exquisite was sacrilege, my lips
Gave passage to one cry: God! what is that?
(Oh! not to know what has no peer on earth!)
And one, not distant, stooped to me and said:
'If ever thou recall thy friend afar,
Let him but be commemorate with this hour,
The first in which thou heard'st our Nightingale.'

Mozart's Opinion of Handel.

Mozart regarded Handel as the highest among all composers. He was as intimate with the chief compositions of this master, so unsurpassed in his particular field, as if he had long been the director of the London Academy for the preservation of ancient music.

When the Abbé Stadler, after Mozart's death, arranged his musical manuscripts, he found many proofs of his constant study of Handel's works.

Mozart said,—"Handel knows best what produces effect. Where he wants it, he strikes like a thunderbolt."

Mozart's predilection went so far, that he composed a great deal in Handel's manner; of which, however, little has ever been printed. According to Stadler, he used also subjects from Handel's works in his famous Requiem: thus the theme to the Requiem and to the Kyrie are taken from him.

He went farther than most of our present amateurs: he valued and cherished not only Handel's Choruses, but many of his Airs and Solos. He says, "Although Handel sometimes suffers himself in them to go on in the manner of his times, yet they are never without meaning."

Even in the Opera of Don Giovanni, Mozart wrote an air in Handel's manner, marking it thus in the score: this air, however, is always omitted in the performance.

Handel's greatest cotemporary, John Sebastian Bach, said of him, "He is the only one, whom I should like to see before my death, and who I should like to be, if I was not Bach!" When this was told to the greatest composer after him, Mozart, he exclaimed, "Truly, I would say the same, if I could have a voice where they are heard."

Mozart's own Account of his Method of Composing.

"You say you should like to know my way of composing, and what method I follow in writing works of some extent. I can really say no more upon this subject than the following,—for I myself know no more about it, and cannot account for it. When I am, as it were, completely myself, entirely alone, and of good cheer,—say travelling in a carriage, or walking after a good meal, or during the night when I cannot sleep,—it is on such occasions that my ideas flow best and most abundantly. Whence and how they come, I know not, nor can I force them. Those ideas that please me, I retain in memory, and am accustomed, as I have been told, to hum them to myself. If I continue in this way, it soon occurs to me how I may turn this or that morsel to account, so as to make a good dish of it,—that is to say, agreeably to the rules of counterpoint, the peculiarities of the different instruments, &c. All this fires my soul; and, provided I am not disturbed, my subject enlarges itself, becomes methodized and defined, and the whole, though it be long, stands almost finished and complete in my mind, so that I can survey it like a fine picture or a beautiful statue, at a glance. Nor do I hear in my imagination the parts successively, but I hear them, as it were, all at once. The delight this gives me I cannot express. All this inventing, this producing, takes place as it were, in a pleasing lively dream; still the actual hearing of the tout ensemble (whole together) is, after all, the best. What has been thus produced I do not easily forget; and this is, perhaps, the best gift I have my Divine Maker to thank for.

"When I proceed to write down my ideas, I take out of the bag of my memory, if I may use that phrase, what has previously been collected into it in the way I have mentioned: for this reason the committing to paper is done quickly enough; for every thing, as I said before, is already finished; and it rarely differs on paper from what it was in my imagination. At this occupation I can, therefore, suffer myself to be disturbed; for, whatever may be going on around me, still I write, and even talk on trifling matters. But why productions take from my hand that particular form and style which makes them Mozartish, and different from the works of other composers, is probably owing to the same cause which renders my nose so-and-so, large, or aquiline, or, in short, makes it Mozart's, and different from those of other people; for I really do not study to aim at any originality. I should, in fact, not be able to describe in what mine consists; though I think it quite natural, that persons who have really an individual appearance of their own, are differently organized from others, both externally and internally. Let this suffice, and never, my best friend, never trouble me again with such subjects."

Piano-Fortes.

Very few people out of the city of Boston, or even within it, have any just conception of the amount of business done here in the manufacture of Pianos. The following are some of the results we have been able to gather respecting the number manufactured at the present time, while preparations are being made for a great increase in the supply. The number made per week by the different persons and companies engaged in the business is, as nearly as we can learn, as follows:

Chickering & Sons make thirty per week. The demand at the present time at the establishment of the Chickering's, whose sale room is at the Masonic Temple, in Tremont street, is fully double the supply, and in order to meet the demand, these gentlemen are now completing on the Neck a new building of an enormous size, covering an area of 46,000 feet, five stories in height in front and six in the rear. This establishment will cost something more than $100,000. The work will be done as far as practicable by steam machinery, but will also employ as many as four hundred hands. When completed and in full operation, it is expected that sixty pianos per week, will be turned out at this establishment alone, which will be only just sufficient to meet the present demand. Of the character of the pianos made by Mr. Chickering the world has already formed its opinion, and the facts above given are a sufficient evidence of the estimation in which they are held. The highest number reached by them at the present time is 13,960, soon to be increased at the rate of 3000 annually.

The recent sudden death of the head of this firm, though a grievous loss to the establishment and to the whole community, will not interfere with the progress of the business; everything will go on as before.

The establishment next in importance is that of Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co; but as their manufactory is undergoing material additions, we must wait for its entire completion, before giving any account of their operations.

Messrs. Hallett & Cumston, whose sale room is at 339 Washington st., make about fifteen per week, and employ at present one hundred hands. Mr. Russell Hallet of this firm, is one of the oldest manufacturers of pianos in the city of Boston. He commenced his apprenticeship at the business in 1821, with John Osborn. Messrs. Jonas Chickering and Timothy Gilbert commenced business at about the same time with Mr. Hallet, so that those three gentlemen have been engaged in the business longer than any other persons in the city.

T. Gilbert & Co., 484 Washington street, make twelve or fourteen pianos per week, and employ more than a hundred hands. This firm is the only one which makes the pianos with the Æolian attachment, for the patent of which they paid $10,000. They have applied the attachment to 1900 pianos. They find it impossible to meet the demand for their work.

Mr. Lemuel Gilbert, 514 Washington street, is making about fourteen per week and employs about one hundred hands. He makes about an equal number of bondoir and square pianos.

A. W. Ladd & Co., 269 Washington street, make eight pianos per week, and employ about fifty hands. They have recently adopted what they consider an improvement in the manufacture of pianos, which they term "a grand diagonal scale." They are also extending their preparations for a more enlarged business, so as to make ten or twelve pianos per week.

Wm. P. Emerson, 395 Washington street, makes six per week and is enlarging his business also so as to make nine per week. He now employs something over thirty hands. For superior workmanship Mr. E's pianos will compare favorably with any manufactured in Boston.

Woodward & Brown, 387 Washington street, make six per week and employ over thirty hands. They are increasing their facilities for business also. They took the first premium for square pianos at the late Mechanics' Fair.

Mr. Geo. Hewes makes about five per week and employs nearly forty men. His ware-room is adorned with diplomas and medals which he has received from different institutions.

Messrs. Brown & Allen make six per week, and employ about forty hands. They are erecting a new building at the corner of Hayward Place and Washington streets, with the expectation of doubling the amount of their business soon.

Mr. Jacob Chickering, 300 Washington street, makes four per week, and employs twenty-five or thirty hands.

Messrs. E. Harper, L. Matt, R. F. Gray & Co., and Brown & Munro, each make about fifty pianos per year, and employ some eight or ten men each.

There are other establishments, whose numbers we could not learn. But on the supposition that they make about four per week, which we are inclined to believe is about correct, there are made in the city of Boston,—or finished here, much of the heavier work being done in the country—one hundred and thirty-six pianos per week, giving employment to nearly one thousand men.

There are only two establishments where Grand Pianos are made, those of Chickering & Sons and Hallett, Davis & Co. We have endeavored to state the simple facts with regard to this very important branch of business in this city, and have obtained our information in all cases directly from the manufacturers themselves, or those in their employ, competent to give it. The object in bringing these facts before the public is only to enable the community to form something of an idea of the extent of this branch of business.

From the above statistics it appears that 136 pianos are made in the city of Boston every week, or 7,072 every year. It is perhaps impossible to tell what is the precise value of the whole, but on the supposition that they will sell upon an average for $300 each—many of the Grand Pianos sell for from $600 to $1000—the whole amount is $2,121,600. When the improvements now begun for increasing this species of manufacture are completed, the number made annually will increase to 10,000, and amount in value to $3,000,000.

THE JOY OF POESY.

Voices of care and pleasure, cease—
Harp! thou and I have room at length;
Incline thy sweetness to my skill,
And give back melody for strength.

Oh! not amiss the Master Bard
Is pictured to the vulgar mind
Possessed of inner sight alone;
The poet at his song is blind.

He sees nor circumstance, nor friend,
His listeners press not in on him;
Cloud-rapt in possibility,
His thoughts and ways are far and dim.

Led by the wonder of his theme,
He writes his word in doubt and shade;
Its glory scarcely shows to him—
Do stars look bright to God that made?

He leaves, and follows on for more,
By winged steed or Stygian boat;
Men see the letters all in light,
And bless the unconscious hand that wrote.

For sure, among all arts is none
So far transcending sense as this,
That follows its own painful way,
And cannot rest in bane or bliss;

That moulds, to more than face or form,
That paints, to more than Nature's hue,
And from th' intense of passion brings
The deeply, passionlessly true;

That, in unlettered ages, read
The thoughts that in God's heavens are;
Divined the Orient speech of Day,
And told the tale of star to star.

Oh! tremblingly I sit to sing,
And take the lyre upon my knee;
Like child divine to mortal maid,
My gift is full of awe to me.

To sing for praise, to sing for gold,
Or ev'n for mere delight of singing,
Were as if empty joy of smell
Should prompt the censor's fragrant swinging.

Dear Soul of bliss, and bliss of song,
Be thou and song insphered with me;
Thus may I hold the sacred gift,
Possessing, but posset in thee.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXXVI.

NEW YORK, Dec. 24.—For the first time this season at one of our Philharmonic rehearsals—might almost as well have stayed away, so far as pleasure was concerned; for, of all Babels, the Apollo rooms, considering the occasion, rank nearly with the worst. The first and last movements of Beethoven's Symphony in D major (the 2d) and an overture by Spohr (as I understood, it was new to me) were played, and some two hundred people were collected ostensibly to hear them. Much good may what they heard do them! How it is possible for poor Eisfeld to perform the duties of a conductor amid the noise, confusion, gabble, chattering, talking, laughing, coming in and going out, bean-ing and belle-ing, and so on through the whole catalogue of anti-music, I cannot see. Certain sharp articles have appeared in the Boston papers lately, about the outrageous conduct exhibited by the thousands who assemble at the Germania rehearsals there; I would risk a small sum on a wager that the hundreds, who go to the Apollo rooms, "can bate thim out of sight intirely." As a matter of curiosity—just to see what musical (!) young ladies and their beaux can do, it is worth while to attend once. Those who desire to do this, must come soon, for as things now go on, it cannot be possible much longer for the Society to attempt rehearsals in public. Here is an anecdote of Beethoven—by what association of ideas can it have popped into my mind just now, I wonder?

Ferdinand Ries says that on one occasion, while he was Beethoven's pupil, he and his master were playing some four-hand marches at the house of Count Browne, in Vienna, and that a certain nobleman, prince, or something of the kind, instead of listening to the music, continued a conversation in an audible voice with a fashionable lady. Beethoven bore it a few moments, but as there was no cessation, he suddenly sprang up from the instrument, snatched Ries's hands also from the keys, and cried out:

"I do not play for such swine!"

Oh, it is "nuts" to me to "phancy that couple's phelinks."

Good, for old Beethoven!

Dec. 27.—I am getting to be almost as great an admirer of Jullien as the Tribune critic himself. Make a distinction between descriptive and imitative music—as between historic and dramatic writing—and I dare put Jullien at the head of those, who have given the world compositions of the latter class. In this class I include Beethoven's "Victory of Wellington,"—not his Pastoral Symphony. This belongs to the former class, and so do Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture, his "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, Gade's "In the Highlands," and so on. Now, on Friday and Saturday evenings, we had at the Metropolitan, among other things, the following specimens of imitative composition, which seem to me truly extraordinary:

The "Katydid Polka," which can only be truly appreciated by those who know what a concert at Castle Garden in Summer is; but to such—while it is delicious to all—it is inimitable. A true poet is discoursing of the moonlight, the gentle murmurs of the waters of the harbor, of the sighing of the evening breeze in the trees of the Battery, of the sudden shower and of the pleasant "voices of the night" from the sonorous wings of insects, from the throat of the tree frog, and so on. Each hearing makes this polka better, and the last time I joined heartily in the demand for a repetition.

The Finale of the "Great Exhibition Quadrille," where Jullien represents the multitudes coming up, amid all sorts of London sounds and to the music of their own National Marches, to the Crystal Palace. Such a rush, hurry, bustle, confusion!

Thirdly and lastly, the orchestral arrangements from the opera of the "Last Days of Pompeii," in which I became so wrought up that I found myself catching my breath and clenching my hands, as the orchestra marched onward to the gigantic climax. The audience seemed awed by the tremendous tumult on the stage, increased and strengthened and deepened by the rolling of thunder and crash of falling edifices represented in an adjoining apartment.

A greater contrast cannot well be imagined than that between the first and the other two of these three pieces. The first alone gives me any great satisfaction; but I can no more deny the genius which has produced them, than that which gave us the exquisite finale, Carlo Magno, in "Ernani."

But to me, the greatest wonder after all is that he, Jullien, should throw off all that is Jullien-ish and prove himself the best interpreter of Handel I ever saw, at home or abroad. I was greatly amused at one of the rehearsals of the "Messiah," to see him stop everything and call attention to a passage in which the strings persisted in sharpening a note. It was explained that the note in question must be given natural, it was the "what you call ancient, antique style—nobody writes so now—that is what they call sacred"—and this with the funniest shrug of the shoulders. In another place he made a change in the tempo, for which the orchestra was not prepared. "You do not find it so marked," said he. "No," was the reply. "But this is the tradition," returned Jullien, and in accordance with the tradition the passage was played. This will give some idea how carefully he has studied his author.

Well, last night there was an opportunity to see the result of these rehearsals. Metropolitan Hall was a jam. The Orchestra and the Sacred Harmonic Society filled not only the stage but a temporary addition extending quite across the end of the room—and the conductor had the good sense to put the chorus in front—the only proper arrangement, and one by which the chorus gets some benefit from the instruments.

Fry had adapted Italian words to some of the fine bass songs and recitatives, so that we had Badiali's magnificent tones among the sol. The principal soprano was a Miss Brainard, whose voice, not very powerful, is delicious; Mme. Pico Vietti, alto; our old Handel and Haydn singer, Colburn, was the tenor, and there were two other soloists, not known to me.

So at seven o'clock, punctum, Jullien raised his bâton, and that army, so used to producing "effects," moved onward through the sombre, lugubrious strains of the overture of Handel's "Messiah," as if they knew no other style. Now, how this, that, or the other number went, how this, that, or the other singer performed, no matter; everything was respectable, much was good, and the greater part was very fine. The orchestration was—save a defective trumpet in one or two places (Koenig did not play, I believe)—superb, and truly Handelian throughout. The choral singing—considering that the Harmonic Society is only in its second year—was generally very good, and some of the choruses were most grandly given—truly a triumph for Bristow, who is conductor of the Society. It has long been a reproach to this city, that it cannot, or will not, sustain choral associations. If it does not sustain the one which sang last night, people had better stop prating about musical taste, refinement and appreciation. Of course it will not do to compare it with some three or four old societies, whose excellence is the growth of many years of hard and constant practice; but its success was such that during its singing I "rejoiced greatly."

But to go back to Jullien. What I admire in him is his thorough study of a work, be it a symphony by either of the giants, an arrangement from whatever opera, a resuscitation of the music of two centuries ago, a descriptive sketch of our own Fry, or the lofty, religious music of last night;—and then his infusion of his own interpretation of it into every performance, so that the most beautiful unity and completeness marks the entire performance. It was beautiful to notice his success in making the various numbers follow each other without hesitation, and with no such perceptible break as oftentimes makes such a work seem disjointed and incoherent; and to see how by a slight increase in the tempos towards the close, he avoided the rock of dullness and heaviness on which performances of the "Messiah" do sometimes split.

In a word, the oratorio last night was a great success for Jullien, his orchestra, and for the Sacred Harmonic Society.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 31, 1853.

Handel's "Messiah" Twice.

The musical event of our week,—and none more fitting for the happy Christmas holy-days,—has been the performance on two successive evenings of an oratorio, whose every note is dear as Christmas to those who know it with the ear and in the spirit. We cannot say that the two renderings were equally complete and satisfying; and we are not aware of any partiality towards either Society which could have predisposed us to enjoy less in the one case than in the other; to us, at such a time, the singers were nothing, the music and the meaning of the oratorio were all; or if we had any feeling towards the performing bodies, it was as to those who were a part and parcel of ourselves, engaged with us and for us in a common work, of whose successes or shortcomings we might speak as freely as if we ourselves had borne a part in them. If we had sung, a zealous member, in both choirs, or if we had had the organizing of both efforts, we doubt not we should have jotted down our honest private impressions of the success of the two experiments essentially as follows. We take them one at a time and in their order.

I. ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

Under all the circumstances, which it is not for us to particularize, and which perhaps we do not fully understand,—of a society weakened by a large secession, and eked out by volunteers, and as it seemed to us, not filled with unanimity of courage—we were surprised that the EDUCATION SOCIETY made out so well. The performance was not without its points of excellence; and if as a whole the oratorio did not fill our soul and lift us up as it has done before, and since, it was partly, no doubt, because we happened to carry to it a greater amount of physical weariness and pain than the sublimest music could entirely overcome. Yet the perceptive and reasoning faculties convinced us that there was something wanting in the way the music was addressed to us, as well as in our own accidental deadness of feeling. The overture was played well by the Germania Orchestra, without Mr. BERGMANN for conductor and the opening recitative and air were well sung. Indeed we never listened with more satisfaction to Mr. ARTHURSON, whose sweet but not robust tenor appeared this time perfectly at his command. In Handelian recitative he has been truly schooled, which can hardly be said of most of our native professionals or amateurs. He renders you the style and spirit of it, and makes it interesting where it is commonly voted dull and monotonous. He indulged less in fancy embellishment than formerly, but we would say with Hamlet: "O reform it altogether!"—for how can a single extra cadenza add to, or fail to weaken, the expression of anything so chaste and perfect in its every note as Comfort ye, my people? In rendering the exquisite pathos of Thy rebuke hath broken his heart, with the air: Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto his sorrow, Mr. Arthurson was highly successful; but it is no disparagement to him to say that Thou shalt break them, &c., demands the most gigantic and tremendous sort of tenor; and we must be content to have that music merely hinted to us by the singer, until we can find another Braham's voice to realize it.

Mr. AIKEN gave a correct, firm rendering of the bass recitatives and airs, all excepting the trumpet song, which belongs to the portions curtailed. We were pleased with the warm and clear contralto of Miss AGNES STONE in Behold! a virgin, and O thou that tellest; but we felt that the melody was held back in tempo and not allowed the natural elasticity and freedom of the six-eight measure; the tune would fain sing itself a little faster.

The great soprano solos were entrusted to Miss ANNA STONE, by right of all the past: namely, the recitatives: There were shepherds, And lo! the Angel, &c.; and the airs: Rejoice greatly, He was despised, and I know that my Redeemer:—

truly a wide and vastly various range of song for one to compass! The lady seemed not in her best voice or spirits, suffering from a cold apparently, and yet (with the exception of He was despised, which lies in those lower regions of the voice where the peculiar virtue of her singing does not lie at all,) these pieces had quite creditable treatment. Miss DOANE, with her clear, reedy, telling voice, was welcome back after too long absence from public performances of this kind. She sang Come unto him, But thou didst not leave, and How beautiful, with such simplicity and purity of style, and so much feeling, that one could forgive the sharpening of a note in one or two instances.

Taken all together, therefore, the solo singing was rather above the average of what we have been accustomed to in such performances. But we did miss the traditional and glorious effect of many of those mighty choruses. The chorus seats were filled, even up into the corners of the side galleries; there must have been near 250 voices; and several, indeed most of the choruses appeared to be correctly sung. Yet was there a lack of vitality, of glorious resonance, of satisfying fulness and roundness. The four parts were not balanced; the female voices sounded thin and insufficient; and frequently it seemed as if most of the sopranos hesitated from timidity, while the attack was made by a few loud voices that stood out in too hard and sharp a prominence. Some choruses were hurried; we had heard them in rehearsal taken much too slow, as if by way of drill, and it now seemed as if they were actuated by an anxious avoidance of that first extreme. In the "Hallelujah," especially, we felt this; and that noble chorus also suffered from the effect of a notice on the programme exhorting the audience to stand up during its performance. Taking advantage of the fact that the "Hallelujah" was here set down for the concluding piece, many stood up and began to go, leaving great empty spaces (to say nothing of the bustle) for a commentary on that effort to enforce a spontaneous manifestation of reverence and enthusiasm.

Then this curtailment of the "Messiah,"—granting that some omissions are almost unavoidable in a work so long,—was far from well considered. The "Hallelujah" chorus is not the proper ending of the oratorio, and, in order to make it so, it had to be transposed from its place before I know that my Redeemer. Although a separable and perfect whole in itself, this chorus, taken in the progress of the oratorio, leaves a sense of incompleteness. Handel's own division of the oratorio into three parts is the true one, not at all arbitrary, but based on unities of subject. The first part is all promise and annunciation. The second is all suffering (Passion) and yearning for deliverance, beginning fitly with Behold the Lamb, that deep and solemn vocal overture, if we may so speak, and ending triumphantly with Hallelujah! And the great song of faith, I know that my Redeemer, opens the third part, which is all of faith and spiritual foretaste of immortality, and which comes to a sort of double close of choruses (like the double bar in music), grander than all before, namely: Worthy is the Lamb, and as a conclusion to that conclusion, the Amen fugue! It will be seen that there is meaning in this arrangement; and to cut off all the third part, except the song of faith, interpolating that before the Hallelujah in the second part, is to sacrifice all the unity of this great work.

We have no doubt that unavoidable untoward circumstances dictated much of this omission, and not the judgment of so excellent a musician and admirer of Handel as the conductor, Mr. KREISSMANN; that, with regard to the Society itself, it was only that the "flesh was weak while the spirit was willing." Is it not possible that they were hurried into attempting more than they were quite ready for by the vigorous movements of their seceding rivals? No matter, let them be of good courage, for a plenty of other chances yet remain for the (old, we must now say) Education Society to do its possible.

II. ON THE EVENING OF CHRISTMAS.

The elements were more propitious. Objectively and subjectively, the conditions for realizing Handel's "Messiah" were unusually complete. We were better seated: not as the first time, on the floor (which perhaps had somewhat to do with the less vitality and resonance of sound), but in that gloriously deep end gallery, which confronts and inclines us all to the music, with a feeling as of eager plants exposed to the sunshine; the hall was full to crowding, even the walls lined with "standee" tickets (as the facetious agent of Sonntag used to advertise it), which gave a better aspect to the hall, relieving somewhat the clumsy, dough-face whiteness of the ornamentation;—the stage too, gracefully curved in to the gallery corners, and overflowing forward, like a horn of plenty, with so many singers as to let the orchestra down upon a temporary platform, showed up the performers in fine shape, and even mitigated the senseless fantasticality of the screen before what is to be the organ, and which screen we heard wittily compared to the frames of those great pieces of fireworks which stand out in the sunshine of the common on the "Glorious Fourth";—then too our head-ache demon had vanished, leaving the mind free, and there was pleasant sphere and company about; and then—rarest and best thing of all—we never knew an audience so well behaved! They were obedient to every request of the providers of the feast. Requested (on the programme) to abstain from all applause, they did so, and let the music sink the deeper into their souls, instead of making foolish noise; Handel could speak to us without senseless interruption from the partial friends of any singer, and the childish tyrants who enforce encores. Requested to do their cloaking and bustling and retiring—those who wished not to stay—in the pause assigned before the Amen chorus, they did so, and for the first time in an oratorio we were allowed to hear the final chorus. There is honor due for these arrangements, and we commend them as examples for all future oratorios.

Leaving the draw-backs to be named last, we revert at once to the field musical, its forces and victorious manœuvres. The chorus-singers of the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY numbered not far from three hundred, and were admirably balanced and effective in the four parts. Particularly rich and mellow, amid the other coloring, were the masses of contralto. The orchestra had a few more violins than on the evening before, and told often more effectively. The whole was under the baton of CARL BERGMANN, who entered into it with his whole heart apparently, having drilled his forces thoroughly beforehand, and gave us one of his most masterly specimens of conductorship.

The solo-singing was perhaps, taken as a whole, some shades less satisfactory than that of the Education Society, but in some parts much better. A novel experiment (though said to be according to the old books) of assigning the opening Recitative and Air to Miss STONE, instead of to a tenor, resulted quite well, at least in the Recitative; indeed this lady is always good where anything like a proclamation or annunciation is to be made. In Every Valley we did not fancy it so much, although she was in excellent voice, and far more spirited and effective than the evening before, in all her pieces: viz. the Shepherds, Rejoice greatly, and I know that my Redeemer liveth. Only there is still the old need of a more distinct and clear enunciation.

Mrs. WENTWORTH won golden opinions by her chaste, elegant and fervent rendering of Come unto him, and But thou didst not leave. Her voice, in spite of a certain childlike quality, is exquisitely pure and fine and penetrating; it goes out from her with a quiet earnestness that steals into one's heart; and she is one of the very few among our solo singers whose song grows better and better as it goes on, instead of beginning pretty well and gradually fading out. Miss HUMPHREY's contralto was rich and warm in quality as ever, but drooped rather lifelessly in O thou that tellest, so as sometimes to fall a shade below the level of firm, true pitch; the "glad tidings" were not glad enough, nor was the voice "lifted up with strength." He was despised was sung by her with great beauty, not omitting the exquisite last half of the song, He gave his back to the smiters, &c., which is too beautiful ever to be left out. The Recitative and Duet, between her and Mr. BALL, we do not remember ever to have heard before; it is singularly fine, with all its antiquity of style.

The tenor solos were given by Mr. S. B. BALL, considering evident hoarseness, very creditably. Herr F. MEYER has a powerful bass voice and seems to be a good musician; there was fire and positiveness in his solos; yet they were much marred by a certain fierce bravado sort of tremolo, which sounded like the attempt to browbeat one's own terror, and fitter for the part of Fra Diavolo or one of Schiller's Robbers, than for oratorio; also by a peculiar sudden shout, as if to scare one, in his crescendo terminations, as well as by the difficulty of enunciating in a foreign language.

But the grand triumph of the performance was in the choruses, which rolled out with superb volume, elasticity and steadiness, every subject being taken up with promptness, confidence and firmness by the whole mass of voices in each part, so that there was never anything obscure, or dull, or feeble. One listened with awe and yet exultingly, as one does to the roar of waves upon the beach. The "Wonderful" chorus was never in our memory more effective; so clearly and cheerfully were the little fragmentary themes, fraught with the good news, flung about and answered from voice to voice, and so well were the grand unisono exclamations of the titles "Wonderful! Counsellor!" &c., prepared and fulfilled to the ear and soul. The chorus, All we like sheep, was equally bold and graphic in the rendering; and the sublimely solemn Adagio with which it ends, The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all, was rendered doubly impressive by one of the finest effects of pianissimo and crescendo on the last notes, that we ever heard produced; the audience were breathless. The "Hallelujah" told as it was meant to tell, most grandly; and grander still was the finale, Worthy is the Lamb, with the Amen fugue, which never before in Boston, we suspect, was uttered with such clearness and positiveness of outline, such satisfying and sonorous fullness, and such deep interest and attention on the part of every hearer (the impatient ones having all fairly made their exit in the pause allotted, by the excellent arrangement above mentioned). The choruses throughout were finely stimulated and seconded, with unflinching precision and yet delicate adaptation, by the instruments. As a choral performance we do not remember the equal of this. As a real, living, ear and soul-satisfying presentation of the "Messiah," as a whole, too, we think it must take precedence of all the attempts that hitherto have come under our notice. There was so much of the true thing realized, that individual defects had small power to defeat or mar the glorious general intent.

The only drawbacks were: first, the lack of the great organ, which is not completed, and the substitution of a very ineffectual little reed organ, which told not half so well as the Grand Piano that was used in Saturday's performance. Secondly, the heat and close air of the crowded room. Finally the necessity of omitting many pieces, involving the further necessity of departing from the true divisions of the three parts, as we have said above. But the omissions were fewer and the division better than on Saturday. The audience had a chance to feel how essential to the great whole is the music of the proper Part Third, opening with the song of faith, and ending with the Amen chorus. Among the missing choruses which we most regretted were the lively one: And he shall purify; His yoke is easy; and most especially, the profoundly beautiful and touching: Surely he hath borne our griefs, and And with his stripes; one of the finest parts of the whole oratorio. All of these have often been heard in Boston, but were omitted both on Saturday and Sunday evenings this time. It is a pity that any omissions should be required in a work where all left out is loss. But if there must be any, can we not, with a few exceptions, spare the solos better than we can the choruses? Are the interests of the solo singers always to be considered before Handel and the entire effect of his great oratorio? When the choruses can be had in their full potency, and the solos in the nature of the case only indifferently, which should be preferred?

We congratulate the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY upon the great success that has crowned this their first public effort; and we congratulate our readers on the second chance they offer us to hear the oratorio this evening.

OTTO DRESEL'S SECOND SOIREE was one of the most delightful that he has yet given. The sensitive and fine-strung artist showed less of that nervous anxiety which is apt to attend his conscientious preparation for a concert, and looked free and radiant and happy. Perhaps it was well for him that the concert had to be given at short notice, and so caught one of his best moods by surprise. It was encouraging, too, to see the beautiful Chickering rooms full, in spite of the formidable diversion threatened by one of the great fashionable parties. Such music teaches us what to like best, and that there be some pleasures which are "sweet in the mouth" and not "bitter in the stomach." We never sat in a happier seeming company; only one shadow must have fallen ever and anon across each mind's satisfaction; who did not look round involuntarily sometimes, after a fine passage, for sympathy in the bland smile of an old friend, the genius of the place, and suddenly remember—! But his younger representatives were there with kind and manly courtesy.

The original Quartet for piano with strings, performed by Messrs. DRESEL (the composer), SCHULTZE, MEYER and BERGMANN, made a decided impression. The first Allegro was not quite so successfully presented (a poet sometimes stumbles in reciting his own best poem, which he knows by heart) as the rest, so that its very original ideas did not speak for quite all their worth. Yet its fine fire of high, unflagging aspiration must have made itself felt. The Andante was a most lovely movement, delicate and individual in thought, and wrought out and varied most effectively. The Intermezzo proved to be that quaint, piquant and graceful little fancy, which Mr. Dresel makes a pet of in his chance sittings at the piano, much to the satisfaction of chance listeners,—but greatly enriched by the string accompaniments. The Finale also won us to its mood, a mood strangely fascinating, so that we felt reluctant to be charmed back from it, and would fain have heard the whole quartet over, or more music of the same complexion. But it is Beethoven that comes next! Yes, we are aware the king awaits us: but why may we not linger a moment with this young minstrel knight!

Beethoven did come! Never was the C sharp minor Sonata—the "Moonlight Sonata," so called—played with such grace and power and depth of feeling, or brought so vividly before us as this time. Mr. SCHULTZE played a series of three characteristic little violin solos, by Ferdinand David, the Leipzig concert master, entitled "Gondoliera," "Hungarian Air" and "Tarentella." They were feelingly played, and we liked them better than the usual elaborate violin solos, as we like Schumann's little Album pieces better than Herz variations and fantasias.

Mr. DRESEL finished out the first part with two exquisite Nottornos (in E, op. 62, and in B, op. 12), and the Valse in A flat, op. 34, of Chopin. The mild heat-lightning of the composer's dreamy, spiritual fancy seemed to descend and flicker over the keyboard of the instrument.

Part Second consisted solely of Mendelssohn's second Trio (in C minor;) but as the programme seemed too short, Mr. Dresel was induced to prelude with a few familiar piano solos, such as the Chopin waltz in A minor, a Lied ohne Worte, &c. The Trio went grandly; Bergmann's violoncello, Schultze's violin, and the full-wave harmonies of the piano swelling up from behind, claimed equal attention and blended in an admirable whole.

MADAME GOLDSCHMIDT. A Dresden letter in Galvani's Messenger contains the following:

"I attended the second of a series of concerts given by Herr Goldschmidt, Schubert, and Kummer. The evening will be memorable in the annals of the musical world, as that on which Madame Jenny Goldschmidt made her first appearance in public since her marriage and return from America. For days previously, the music shop from which tickets were issued had been besieged by the public of Dresden, and many hundreds were turned away disappointed.

It was with much anxiety that I saw the hour of the concert approach; I knew Madame Goldschmidt had been ill and hoarse for many days, and it was only at the last moment that she determined to sing, rather than disappoint the expectant public. She had selected for her part in the concert the beautiful hymn, for solo and chorus, by Mendelssohn, Hör mein Bitten, Herr, and, but that I felt grieved that she should make such exertion when suffering from hoarseness and indisposition, I should have enjoyed without a drawback the perfect expression she gave to this most lovely music. The manner, which she gave the words, O könnt' ich fliegen wie Tauben dahin, had something in it which seemed to carry one far from this dull earth away into the blue heavens. Her voice is as fine as it ever was; and in the songs with which she finished her evening's performance, one felt as much as ever her infinite superiority to all the singers of the present day, evinced equally in the supernatural charm of her simple style, as in the most brilliant and difficult floriture of the modern Italian school."

Other paragraphs from letter-writers in Dresden, mostly Americans, have been going the rounds in the newspapers, which we have not copied. One scarcely recognizes this fresh and great-souled child of nature and of genius in their pictures, so offensively do they besmear her and "her Otto" with their pietistic conventionalities.

CHILDREN'S MERRY CHRISTMAS MUSIC.—Father Haydn's Kinder-Sinfonie, as played the Germanians Saturday afternoon, was delightfully droll. Little drums and penny trumpets, and hum-birds, and the melancholy two notes of the cuckoo, &c., &c., were all wrought into the web of the violin music, like the bright-colored yarns that peep out a stitch or two at a time upon a sober canvass. The Andante was especially quaint, by the contrast of a solemn, sentimental movement with those masqueradish little auxiliaries. How the partridge-like whirr of the Walldteufel put in the element of mystery! Germans know how to wake a child's fancy.

In New York, too, they had a children's symphony, called Santa Claus, composed by Fry for Jullien's orchestra. The Tribune says:

The piece, after a slow movement portraying the dignity of the occasion, gives us the evening festivities—their conclusion—the Lord's prayer set to the orchestra—the lullaby—a snow storm with imitations of the winds—the tolling of the hour of twelve—the coming of Santa Claus in his sleigh—his gift distribution and retreat—the adeste fideles—the children discovering their gifts, when the orchestra plays on children's trumpets, whistles, drums, rattles, etc.—the finale hallelujah chorals. This symphony lasts half an hour; but notwithstanding it was loudly and stubbornly encored on its first performance on Christmas eve, and M. Jullien obligingly repeated it. On account of the complete success attending it, M. Jullien will give it again to night, after awarding to it the advantages of additional rehearsals.

CONCERTS AT HAND.—The "Messiah" again to-night. —"Sampson" by the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY again to-morrow night —JULLIEN comes back to fill the Music Hall all next week, and no longer. Enough said! —Mr. ARTHURSON announces a vocal concert, with organ-playing by MÜLLER, and other good help. He will also teach while in the city; and we are sure our singers, many of them, would do well to get from him right notions about recitative, &c. —THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB next Tuesday evening offer a rich programme. We are sorry to see that they do not find it pays to continue the afternoon rehearsals. Next Friday's will be the last. —The next GERMANIA concert is a week from to-night. Schubert's Symphony will be revived. Will not the Germanians let us have the harp of APTOMMAS in orchestra?—say in Gade's "Echoes from Ossian" overture, which needs a harp part?

THE PROPOSED SYMPHONY SOIRÉES.—Are our readers aware that the subscription list, at Wade's, will remain open only one week longer! If we would not let slip so fine an opportunity, we must be prompt to put down our names, and not only that, but to secure the names of all true music-lovers whom we know. Effort is due in such a case. It is one in which the music teachers and professors should be interested. Let them too subscribe and get subscribers. It should touch the pride of the profession to have so classical a scheme of concerts fail among us.

True, it is brought forward amid unusual obstacles, as: 1. It is late in the season. So much the more need of effort.

2. The price, as first stated, was too high for many. But now it is put so near to the half-dollar price (three dollars for the five soirées) as to make no material difference.

3. The evenings proposed (Wednesdays) are complained of. It would be better to have Saturday. But the Germanians expect no profits from these concerts; whereas their Saturdays can be turned to good pecuniary account. Swell up the list, then, and they will give you Saturday.

The plan is too good to be allowed on any account to fall through. Let us suggest further, as an inducement for those who feel a professional or quasi-professional pride in the keeping up of good music, that a permanent classical Musical League or Union might naturally grow out of five gatherings of such a company as this would bring together.

DRUM OBLIGATO!—We mean the drum for delinquents. The first of January reminds us that nine months of our Journal's year have gone, and yet hundreds of our subscribers ("in advance," the terms were) have still neglected to remit to us these little trifling $2 sums, which collectively compose the bone and sinew of our enterprise. We pay as we go; how many times are we expected to notify and send round to our subscribers, before they think it proper to pay us?

But think of this! Who would believe this possible of persons who love music! In cases not very many, and yet not very few, considering, have original subscribers continued to receive our journal, six or eight months into the second year, before notifying us that they never wanted it a second year, and so declined to pay the bill presented!!

AT TREMONT TEMPLE.

The Mendelssohn Choral Society

HAVING been so fortunate as to have gained, in an unusual degree, the approbation of those present at the ORATORIO on last SUNDAY EVENING, and to have elicited numerous requests for a repetition from those whose approval it is an honor to merit, and in whose taste and judgment it is safe to confide, and also from many who were unable to obtain admission on that occasion, has decided to repeat

HANDEL'S "MESSIAH,"

On NEW YEAR'S EVE, Saturday, Dec. 31, at TREMONT TEMPLE, commencing at 7½ o'clock, as performed on CHRISTMAS EVENING with so great success.

It is not one of the least flattering of the testimonials to the excellency of the former performance, that the

have been induced, by the advice of their friends, to enter into this Concert in mutual partnership with the M. C. S. The accompaniments will be given with the same number in the Orchestra as on Christmas evening.

Tickets 50 cents each, to be had at Wade's, Reed's and Ditson's music stores.

—Edward L. Balch,

THE GREATEST METHOD OF THE AGE!THE MODERN SCHOOL

FOR THE

PIANO-FORTE,Is an Instruction Book which will enable one to Become a Great Pianist

IN THE SHORTEST TIME!

THIS Work is admitted by the most celebrated Pianists and Teachers, both in Europe and America, to be BY FAR THE MOST INGENIOUS, SIMPLE, PROGRESSIVE AND COMPREHENSIVE METHOD FOR THE PIANO THAT HAS EVER BEEN PRESENTED TO THE PUBLIC,—embracing a complete system, from the very outset to the highest classical music.

The anatomy of the hands is shown by beautifully colored plates. The entire work surpasses all previous musical publications, as regards mechanical appearance and elegance.

The author, NATHAN RICHARDSON, has spent the last five years in Europe for the sole purpose of getting up an Instruction Book, which would embrace the styles and effective Exercises of ALL distinguished Pianists and Teachers. To accomplish that object, he was assisted byEIGHTEEN EMINENT EUROPEAN PIANISTS.

The result has been, an Instruction Book so comprehensive and ingenious, that a pupil will acquire the styles and mechanical difficulties of all celebrated Pianists, and that, too, with far less labor and practice than is usually required to learn an ordinary composition, under the old methods.

All who are interested in Music, are invited to call at the

and examine the work for themselves, and they will be surprised that a work which appears so simple should guarantee such wonderful results.

It is beautifully got up, in embossed cloth, gilt edges, sides, and back, 330 pages, and sold at $4 00 per single copy.

A very acceptable Present for Christmas and New Year.

Organ Playing—Dresden, 1840.

[From Chorley's 'Music and Manners in France and Germany.']

[The Herr Schneider here commemorated is not the Friedrich Schneider of Dessau, whose recent death is noticed in another column, but his brother Johann Schneider, of Dresden.]

I will not libel any musician by asking him if he be fond of the organ. The further removed he be from personality in his preferences of Art—the more devotedly addicted to Thought in its noblest, if not most excursive, flights,—the more exquisitely will he relish, the more eagerly return to those grave and sublime pleasures—to those oracular utterances, as it were, in which musical Truth and Poetry, of the highest order, make themselves known. After a London season of fever and competition and excitement, when the newest wonder-player has been hardly heard before he has been pushed off his stool of popularity by the newest singer, when one strain of music has been hurried out of the memory by some other of a more seizing piquaney,—to find in the midst of the comparative quiet of a German town, and the yet more modest tranquility of an occupied but not a dazzling career, an instrumentalist who, in his way, might challenge the Liszts and Paganinis of his century,—was as great a gratification to the mind as his artistic exhibitions were a delight to the ear. And to me the gratification was doubled, inasmuch as it came by way of sequel to the traces of Bach I had been exploring at Leipsic.

The weariness which the paltry "Die Beiden Schützen" of Lortzing, at the Opera House, had left upon my spirits, was only half effaced by a long morning among the Venetian pictures in the Gallery: when, as I was sitting at dinner, on a certain Saturday, a promised note of introduction was handed to me, which privileged me to present myself at Herr Schneider's door. By the way, this simple ceremony is by no means so easily to be performed at Dresden as elsewhere. In no town that I have ever visited is it so difficult to find out your acquaintances. Bells are scarce; door-plates, as far as I could see, utterly unknown. The first floor knoweth nothing of the cunning of the second—especially when the latter is inquired for in bad English-German; and in every house I approached,—to judge from the silence and impenetrability and difficulty of access which prevailed,—the inhabitants might, one and all, have been suffering under an epidemic dun-phobia. To the third story, however, of the mansion where Herr Schneider carries on his own studies and directs those of others, I was guided by the full chord of many voices; and for the only time in Dresden, I found him whom I came to seek without that running to and fro, and that hesitation of servants, which take so much of its edge off the pleasure of a first visit.

I remember a story of a Swedenborgian who, on meeting a stranger, suddenly exclaimed, "I have seen you before, but whether in the body or out of the body I cannot tell." This address I could have echoed on presenting my credentials to Herr Schneider. I had seen him "out of the body" years ago, during the whole time when I was occupying myself in tracing the imagined character of a German organist, in a forgotten book;—and his simple and hearty welcome, and his homely and intelligent features, on which a smile sits more at its ease than on many countenances far more regularly agreeable,—in short, the appearance, air, and abord (as the French say) of the man, had the welcome familiarity of old acquaintanceship. It was late in the day when I paid my visit; and he had been occupied among his musical avocations since the lark's hour of rising. But when I told him how short the duration of my stay in Dresden must be, he sent for the keys of the church and the bellows-blower, as if he was doing the most natural thing instead of the greatest favor imaginable,—without any superfluous words between us. Indeed, profuse thanks would have suited ill with his hearty plainness of manner. And we were out of the house, and on the road to one of the rarest musical pleasures I ever enjoyed, as if we had known one another “in the body” for years, within ten minutes of his breaking the seal of ———’s friendly letter.

The Sophien-Kirche, or Evangelical Church, which we reached after passing down two or three of the dark and narrow streets in which Dresden abounds, is one of those bleak and melancholy Lutheran buildings where the destroyer and the image-breaker have left their visible traces. It once belonged to a Franciscan convent; and a superbly enriched portal, opening upon the Kloster Platz, remains to tell what the rest of the building has been. Its interior aspect is yet more fragmentary, and clearly indicative of sack and plunder. The church is supported by a double row of columns, with a large and irregular gallery stretching round one half of it. The vault and pillars are debased by parsimonious whitewash: a few birdcage-like pews are hung up and down on its high walls: it has a few quaint old pictures, a mouldering monument or so, surmounted by a crucifix; and the same papistical symbol above the dingy rococo of the high altar. The fading of daylight gave these objects that sad and sombre hue which Time has imparted to more than one picture, where a like assemblage has been combined by Weenix or some other such painter of interiors. There was something, too, in the reverberation of our feet, as we went up the gallery stairs, which said more to my fancy than it would be at all discreet to print. The best got-up scene could not have been made so appropriate for the music of meditation—which organ-music is.

Herr Schneider's instrument stands in a corner of the gallery, clad in a white case with silvered pipes, and decked out with a quantity of rocco gilt garlands. It has only two keyboards, each four octaves and a half, in visible register; thirty-four stops; and a long pedal-board, nearly as well worn as St. Peter's toe in the Vatican. The voice proceeding from the first handful of keys put down, informed me of the neighborhood of something surpassing after its kind. This is one of the great Silbermann's organs; and never heard I pipes of such a ripe and fascinating sweetness of tone, from the lowest elephant pedal C to the skylark C altissimo;—no hissing, no wheezing, no lumbering, no growlings,—none of that ferocity of sound which makes some of our famous English specimens surgical to the ear. Compared, indeed, with aught in modern organ-building, the Silbermann instruments, at Dresden, are what the sumptuous ruby glass of the Middle Ages is to the ripest-red of the Bohemian manufacture. Only a few weeks before I had been listening to our own noble organs at Christchurch in London, and in the Town-hall at Birmingham. A few weeks afterwards I was admiring a magnificent musical structure in progress of erection in the Westminster Abbey of the French—the cathedral at St. Denis. So that I was not without some opportunity of comparison, to warrant me in simile-making: and it is to be remembered that, as regards tone, the difference between player and player is little to be felt in the case of the instrument in question.

But in all that regards hand, and foot, and mind,—firmness of the first, brilliancy of the second, and concentration of the third,—Herr Schneider is to me as unrivalled as his organ. Drawing out a dear, shabby old book from his depository, he asked me to choose which of Bach's grand fugues he was to play me; and, almost ere I could mention those with which I was most familiar, had begun to add to my treasure by opening one, in B minor, I had never heard before. I have been warned, again and again, during the progress of transcribing these pages, that a written account of musical execution is likely to be as barren of fruit as the dancing lessons which the country school-mistress directed from a book with mathematical diagrams; but I must, once again, disregard the warning, as far as insisting upon the union of power and quietness which characterized Herr Schneider's performance. Those who treat organ-playing as "a black business," to which they bend themselves with frowning brows, and coat-sleeves turned up half-way to the shoulders,—the school of kickers, swingers to and fro, who make much exertion cover up very little skill,—might have taken a lesson from this admirable artist, whose hands, as they glided away over the keys ("worked away" is the established phrase), were bringing out into their fullest glory all those magnificent chains of sound,—all those replies, and suspenses, and accumulations, which, with a calm but never-tiring munificence, the noble old Cantor of the Thomas-Schule has lavished in his compositions. Perhaps a finer specimen of these does not exist than in the fugue in E minor, with which Herr Schneider next indulged me; where the subject, spreading in form like a wedge, offers such excellent scope for the amplification of science and the arrangement of climax. I withdrew to the further corner of the gallery, where twilight was now fast sinking; and, while listening to this marvellous performance, lost the personality both of composer and the performer, more completely, perhaps, than I have ever done. It was neither Bach nor Schneider: the building was filled, to running over, with august and stately Music; and the old childish feeling of mystery and delight which, in the days when I was sparingly admitted to the acquaintanceship of any instrument whatsoever, the gigantic sounds of the organ used to awaken in me, came back as if I had been only — years old.

After one or two more glorious displays of entire mastery over the key and pedal-board,—“It is too dark for us to see any more of Bach,” said my liberal host; “so you must excuse what I am going to do,” and, with that, struck off at once into an improvisation of rare beauty of figure, and affluence of device. The subject was not at all a recondite one;—simple and bold, and at first I fancied a little drily treated: what, indeed, is there that would not sound so after the unfoldings of Bach? But, whether the admirable artist was excited by the keen relish I showed, or whether it is the nature of such powers as his to sustain and to excite themselves,—as he went on, the depth of his science was surpassed by the brilliancy of his fancy. It was the work of one hand to draw and close the stops which were wanted by the play of his imagination: a matter, of course, in which he could receive no help. But he ministered to himself with such a wonderful promptness and agility of finger, that the changes of hand from the key-board to the register were never felt; while so subtly were they combined and alternated, as to be totally clear of producing that piecemeal effect in which the fantasy-work of common organists so often ends, from a want of a like judgment in combination. Till then, the remarkable mental energy demanded for an exhibition like this never struck me in all its fullness. And yet, not only must the performer originate thoughts, but, by new and happily-successive admixtures, contrive effects totally, of course, beyond the reach of him who has only before him the plain and immovable keys of a piano-forte. Taken merely in its most matter-of-fact sense, as a display which proved nothing, here were memory, combination, promptitude, invention and mechanical skill, united. I may be laughed at, but I could not help imagining that the exercise of a power at once implying thought, self-mastery, and a patient-use of physical strength, could hardly have been carried to so high a perfection without its favorable moral influences; and that if it were so, herein, and not from their being erected in churches, might lie the superior sacredness of organs beyond other instruments—herein the holiness of the performance of the music written for them. By the time that Herr Schneider had brought his improvisation to a close, I could hardly distinguish either himself or organ from among the mass of gloomy shadows that had fallen round me; and I left the church in that pleasantly thoughtful state which suits so well with Dresden, and in which there is rest and not excitement. Lights were gleaming up and down in the windows of the high houses surrounding the Neumarkt: here and there a solitary foot-fall was to be heard, the sounds of daily traffic being for the most part over.

At nine precisely on the following morning I was again at Herr Schneider's elbow, in the organ-loft of the Sophien-Kirche, anxious to bear him company through the services of the morning. He had warned me that the plain forms of Lutheran worship forbade his exercising his craft with anything like fantasy; but I would not have exchanged what I did hear for the most elaborate performance which hands and feet in concord could have completed. Before the service commenced to an ample congregation, he treated us to a brief prelude on the full organ, of great majesty and brilliancy, as clear in design and as symmetrical in elaboration as though it were an impromptu fait d'loisir. Then, while accompanying the psalms—five or six of which were most admirably sung by a choir of eighteen boys and young men—the extent of resource brought by him to bear on a prosaic and inferior task (as a second-rate player might choose to esteem it) was to me little less astonishing than the force he had shown in mastering the difficulties of Bach. The interludes between the verses were substantially and solidly dignified, yet sufficiently rich in ideas to set up for a twelvemonth some of the renowned improvisers I have heard; while the artful and unexpected management of the stops, so as to produce every variety of crescendo and diminuendo, entirely precluded the occupation of the swell. Though I stood close by, I was unable, from a want of familiarity with the manipulations of the instrument, and the rapidity with which the changes were executed, to take any note of the successions and mixtures of stops employed. Receipts in such a matter are of little use to the half-taught, and none to the full-grown, artist.

Between the corales, which, thus sung and thus accompanied, I would fain have crystalized for the benefit of all English choirs (could the miracle of the tunes frozen in Munchausen's horn be repeated), I confess myself to have been busier in turning over the venerable and well-thumbed music-books, and gathering what I could from their pages, than in trying to translate the drowsy and not very clear accents of the Pfarrer into a service I could follow. There is much to be said some future day about these German psalm-tunes: a store of pleasant anecdotes belongs to them. One of the most beautiful, for instance, that I heard that morning—Nun ruhen alle Wälder—had been in its early days as secular a melody as “Rousseau's Dream.” It was the composition (so M. Mainzer had informed me in his amusing “Esquisses Musicales”) of the famous Henry Isak, on the occasion of his being summoned from Inspruk to Munich three hundred years ago—a farewell tune, which got into every German mouth, and was seized hold of by the Reformers, on Rowland, Hill's principle of turning profane music to good account. Harmonized, and finely sung by many voices, as I heard it, it seemed unfit for any service save that of the Temple. Other of the tunes were by Herman, Pretorius, Criiger, Dr. Martin Luther himself; and in many antiphonal parts of the service the Ambrosian and Gregorian chaunts seemed to have been retained, as well as the popish crucifix and candles on the altar.

Felicien David's “Desert.”

Among the compositions promised us by the Germanians at an extra Concert (probably next Saturday) is the one work which made Felicien David famous, and which they intend to perform with the assistance of the Mendelssohn Choral Society. It had quite a run of popularity in New York some ten or twelve years since. In October last, it was brought out in London, under the conductorship of Benedict, on which occasion the Morning Post indulged in the following pleasant criticism on the work itself:

The inaugurative concert opened with Felicien David's ode symphonique, entitled “The Desert.” Those who seek in the science of sweet sounds nothing more than the illustration of ideas, however unmusical in their nature, and gladly tolerate monotony, quaintness, noise, ugliness—in short, anything which may serve to express a subject—will, doubtless, be highly delighted with this very strange, but, by no means unintellectual work. For our own part, we infinitely prefer to hear sweet, touching, natural melody, colored by rich and glowing harmony, varied and developed by the resources of counterpoint, thinking that there is an inherent abstract beauty in music, which should never be lost sight of in a composition, whatever its subject may be. M. David, however, evidently holds an opposite opinion; and, therefore, in considering his score, we must endeavor to look at it from his own point of view. This work commences with an orchestral prelude, intended to convey to the mind, by means of musical sounds, an idea of the vague immensity and tingling silence of the desert. The author here means, of course, to express his own sensations on first beholding the dreary, burning waste. He has been there, and therefore knows all about it. In this respect he has the advantage of us, and we cannot, therefore, pretend to decide authoritatively whether or not his tones faithfully delineate the sensations a reasonable being might experience under such circumstances. To express silence by sound is certainly no easy matter, but as the idea of immobility is essentially connected with it, nothing but monotony can be employed with anything like truthfulness; and of this M. David has availed himself to such an extent as to annoy our ears, and tire our patience extremely. We do not like musical deserts; sterility in a work of art is our abomination, and the subject which legitimates it is assuredly that which nothing but the direst necessity would induce us to attend to. The greatest merit, then, of this portion of the score, in one sense, and its most grievous sin in another, is that it is expressive. After this most graphic description of nothing, we have a recitation, in which the very vague qualities of the “vast expanse” are duly set forth. Then, after another orchestral movement, in which the author perseveres in his barren fancies, there comes another recitative, informing us that the musical pilgrim heard “sweet melodies,” and “harmony profound,” in the silence. He must have had remarkably sharp ears, or at least very long ones. We could certainly detect nothing of the kind in his musical illustration. Next we are favored with a chorus, called “The Glorification of Allah.” Who the singers are is not stated. Certain it is that the pilgrim, however vocally inclined, could not sing a chorus by himself; neither could he, we imagine, get any help from the desert, or even the silence; for, although the latter possess the powers of melody and harmony, its union with the pilgrim's voice would only make a duet.

A duet between silence and a pilgrim would doubtless be a novelty; but this cannot be meant. No matter. This chorus is spirited, and has a vigorous characteristic rhythm. We like it much better than the vague desert illustration. After this there occurs another recitation descriptive of the approach of the caravan, which, we are told, "dimly emerges, as from the realm of night, like some huge serpent of the desert deep, and the first coming wave of flooding ocean." Here is a choice of similes. Our readers may take the serpent or the wave—it is perfectly indifferent to us—but they must have a large appetite for poetical licenses if they swallow both.

This is followed by "The March of the Caravan," accompanied by a chorus; a piece of real merit, the best thing, in fact, in the ode. Next comes a "Desert Tempest," in which the dark simoom, with "pestilential breath" (a very unsavoury image this), comes rushing on the fire-fraught blast," knocking down the unfortunate travellers right and left in a most distressing manner. It is really dreadful. Not only have we the nasty simoom upon the blast, a wind mounted upon a wind, with another wind for its breath, but "the angel of death" astride "upon destruction's wing" is also "hovering over our head." We cannot wonder at the occupants of the caravan being horribly frightened, or that the composer, amid such a confusion of terrors, should have thrown a good deal of it into his music. That he intended to illustrate here a scene of wild excitement was evident enough; but we could make out nothing clearly but a tremendous uproar. Perhaps this is all that was meant.

After a choral prayer, in which a delivery from

"The flaming breath of the simoom's nostrils" is humbly requested, "the caravan resumes its march."

This ends the first part of the ode.

The second begins with an illustration of "Night in the Desert." This is followed by a "Hymn to Night" (a solo for the tenor voice), a chorus in praise of "The liberty of the desert," and a tenor song called "Evening Reverie." In the third part we have a recitation with orchestral accompaniments, in which an attempt is made to illustrate sunrise and its effects on the desert. In this we are told of a "Saffron Aurora, with golden locks and rosy cheeks, issuing from the silvery chambers of the east, heralding the approach of the Day-god, who on his flaming throne, drawn by fire-steeds, fills the blue arch of Heaven with golden light." This variety of colors, perhaps, suggests the idea of a rainbow rather than that of a sunrise; and the music sounded to us more like an illustration of a shower of rain, with occasional growls of thunder, than anything else; but we have never been in a desert, and upon such vague compositions every man is free to put his own construction. The liberty of the subject is dear to us. After this, we have the "Song of Muezzin," a perfectly hideous production, but doubtless highly characteristic.

Then "the caravan resumes its march," and "disappears in the distance" (we thought it had departed long ago); the desert is again "hushed into silence profound," as a proof of which the chorus in glorification of Allah is again pealed forth by 40 voices.

Such is Felicien David's "Desert," which will doubtless delight the lovers of the modern illustrative school, who will not fail to see in it a continuation of the spirit of Beethoven. To us, however, it bears as much resemblance to the incomparable musical poet's inspirations, as a flashy, cheaply got-up Lowther-arcade bauble does to a true diamond.

What Punch says of us.

NEW AMERICAN MOVEMENT.—Somebody writing from Naples, about Music, to a fashionable contemporary, says:—"I know, too, more than half-a-dozen Americans, who have left their gold cupidity behind them, and are now in Italy, living in small, dirty back-rooms with a pianoforte, practicing solfeggios, with the intention of becoming singers of Italian opera." The development and cultivation of Music in the soul of America may, perhaps, tend to arrest the progress of Filibusterism, and other stratagems and spoils, including the spoliation of black liberty; and to render the airs which JONATHAN sometimes gives himself, on the fishery question for instance, tolerable. But it will, in all probability, produce results yet more extraordinary. A go-ahead people will not be content to stop short at operas and concerts. Music will be utilized; applied to political and social purposes; employed to enhance the charms of eloquence, and adorn the wisdom of statesmanship. Patriots will sing bravuras at caucus or in Congress, on behalf of freedom; and Presidents will express themselves in notes arranged to form symphonies; whilst the foreign policy of the States will take the form of overtures. The uselessly contests which sometimes occur in the Legislature will be replaced by grand scenes; and the stump-orator that now is, will become a stump-warbler; whilst the mob will respond in chorus. American song will be famous all the world over, and command immense engagements, being paid for—as no doubt it will be delivered—through the nose.

Friedrich Schneider.

The name of Schneider has long held a high place in German music. The death of Herr John Christian Frederick Schneider, who has for many years past been Chapelmaster to the Duke of Anhalt-Dessau, is announced in the foreign journals;—the year of his birth is said to have been 1786. His birthplace was the neighborhood of Zittau, where music was a good deal cultivated among "simple folk" as well as professors,—"since the father of the family, who began life as a weaver, is said, by the force of perseverance and propensity, to have gained an appointment of organist at Watersdorf and elsewhere:—and to have himself superintended the education of his boys. The subject of our paragraph became early distinguished from among "the many," not merely as a pianoforte player, but as a composer,—and during the course of his life, which was disadvantageously contemporaneous with the career of Beethoven, Weber, Spohr, and Meudelssohn, contrived to assert his individuality and to take his place among the musical creators of Germany. The list of his works is long, and includes almost every form of musical composition—theatrical writing alone excepted. Perhaps Herr Schneider's Oratorios, which have taken their turn among other oratorios of the second class at the German musical festivals, are the works by which he is best known in England,—since, if we recollect right, portions of his 'Deluge' and 'Last Judgment' were, some quarter of a century ago, introduced at our Oratorio. The list besides, contains oratorios entitled 'Paradise Lost,' 'Pharaoh,' 'Christ the Master,' 'Absalom,' 'Christ the Child,' 'Gideon,' 'Gethsemane and Golgotha,'—also cantatas, psalms, hymns, and other service-music. Altogether, Herr Frederick Schneider may be commemorated as a worthy and thoroughly-trained artist, belonging to the great period of German music.

Singular Opera Case in Paris.

[From Galignani's Messenger.]

Considerable sensation had been caused in musical circles by Count Thaddeus de Tyszkiewicz, a German, one of the editors of a musical journal of Leipsic, having brought an action against M. Roqueplan, director of the Grand Opera, to recover damages for having, on the 7th October last, caused the Freyschütz of Weber to be performed, with mutilations, and in a very imperfect manner. To this action M. Roqueplan responded, by a demand that M. Tyszkiewicz, as a foreigner, should be obliged to deposit 1,000*fr.* as security for the costs, and by an action against him for damages for what he called his libellous complaint. M. Tyszkiewicz having duly deposited the 1,000*fr.*, the two cases came on yesterday before the civil tribunal. M. Laehaud appeared for M. Tyszkiewicz. He stated that his client belonged to a family connected with the princely one of the Dukes of Lithuania, that his aunt was the sister of Poniatowski, and that one of his ancestors was the last Polish ambassador sent to the Court of France—also that as editor of the journal at Leipsic, he was a great musical authority. He then went on to say that seeing the Freyschütz—an opera of which he was a passionate admirer—announced for the 7th of October, he went to the theatre expecting to find the performance worthy in every respect of the Grand Opera of Paris. But that, instead of that, the instrumental part of the performance was most scandalously executed, the choruses did not know their parts, the tenor introduced what he considered ornaments which were not "set down for him;" the principal female part was filled by a third rate cantatrice; and suppressions of the best portions of the third act were made, whereby the act was rendered ridiculous and incomprehensible. In addition to all this, the opera was made the lever de rideau or introduction to a ballet. On the whole, M. Tyszkiewicz declared that he had never seen the noble chef-d'œuvre of Weber treated with such profanation in the most wretched theatre of Germany. In support of this opinion of his client, the advocate quoted extracts from feuilletons of M. Berlioz and other eminent critics; and he then went on to contend that damages were due, because the defendant had announced Freyschütz but had only given a part of it, and because it was right and proper to defend the works of men of genius from mutilation. And as damages were due to his client, he contended that the counter action of M. Roqueplan must be dismissed. M. Celliez, advocate of M. Roqueplan, said that the action was a most ridiculous one, and had excited loud laughter amongst the public; and he intimated that the general opinion was that M. Tyszkiewicz was a very original character, or insane. He afterwards alleged that the opera was performed on the evening in question as it was arranged in 1850 by M. Pacini and M. Berlioz, as it had always been performed, and as it had been sanctioned by the Ministry of the Interior and the Ministry of State; and that M. Roqueplan, being the director of a subventioned theatre, was obliged to perform, without any alteration or addition whatsoever, the pieces so sanctioned. As to the plaintiff's assertions of the badness of the performance, vocal and instrumental, the advocate declared that they were calumnious, and that when they were made with respect to such a theatre as the Opera, they did not deserve a reply. He contended that M. Tyszkiewicz had only brought his action from the hope of gaining notoriety, and he maintained that, as that action was a calumny on M. Roqueplan's system of management, he ought to be made to pay damages, if only to teach him that he could not be allowed to employ such means to bring his name before the public. The public prosecutor said that, in his opinion, no damages were due to M. Tyszkiewicz, as the opera had been performed as the public were accustomed to see it; and he left it to the tribunal to say what reparation was due to the director of the Opera for the attack made on it. The tribunal gave a judgment which declared that, if it were true that important passages were omitted from the Freyschütz in the performance of the 7th October, those passages had been constantly omitted since 1850; that it resulted from this fact, which in principle was to be regretted, that works cut down were announced to the public as intact; but that the plaintiff having had only to submit to the omission which had been imposed on the public from the beginning, could not establish that he had suffered any damage for which reparation was due; that as to the counter demand of M. Roqueplan, he had not proved that he had sustained any damage which could be estimated; and that consequently both actions should be dismissed. The tribunal, however, condemned M. de Tyszkiewicz to the costs.

PERCOLESE.

[FROM THE GERMAN OF GEIBEL.]

Now at last his work he endeth,
And the pious Master sendeth
Grateful thanks to Heaven's throne;
Then break forth in glorious pealing,
Through the Temple's lofty ceiling,
Holy hymn and organ tone!

Stabat mater dolorosa
Juxta crucem lacrymosa,
Dum pendebat filius,
Cujus animam gementem
Contristatam ac dolentem
Pertransivit gladius.

And the virgin mother's anguish
Makes each heart with sorrow languish,
While the organ louder swells;
Till in music's heavenly tide
Grief itself is satisfied,
And the tear of pity wells.

Quis est homo, qui non fletet,
Christi matrem si videret
In tanto supplicio?
Quis non posset contristari
Piam matrem contemplari
Dolentem cum filio?

Holy fear and earnest longing
O'er the Master's soul come thronging,
Preluding that death is nigh;
Then with faith ecstatic burning,
See him to the altar turning,
To the Virgin throned high.

Virgo virginum præclara,
Mibi jam non sis amara,
Fac me tecum plangere;
Fac ut portem Christi mortem
Passionis fac consortem
Et plagas recolare.

Hark! seraphic voices singing!
From the heavenly regions bringing Wondrous music down to men!
Holy spirits earthward fly,
Bear the Master's soul on high,
And the song ascends again.

Fac me cruce custodiri,
Morte Christi præmuniri,
Confoveri gratia;
Quando corpus morietur,
Fac ut animæ donetur Paridisi gloria.

Mr. Fry's "Santa Claus" Symphony.

[The design of the composer, in this new Christmas Symphony, is thus described by the musical critic of the New York Tribune, who may be presumed to know quite as well about it as the composer himself. We quoted it last week with Haydn's Kinder-Sinfonie, but evidently it could be no child's play to carry out all that the author has here undertaken.]

We have seen it stated that the composer of "Santa Claus" intended it for an occasional piece—a sketch, etc. This is not so. He intended it—in regard to instrumentation—as the means of exposing the highest qualities in execution and expression of the greatest players in the world. As to spirit, he designed it in the introductory movement to represent the declamatory style in which he conceives oratorios ought to be written. Next, the verisimilitude which should mark music adapted to festivities from its rollicking traits and abandon. Then he designed to show all the sexual peculiarities of the orchestra, dramatically treated. Likewise the accents of English speech as related to music. He wished, also, to prove, as he believes, that the Lullaby, poetically handled, is as sublime as the Madonna and Child, if looked at artistically, and connected with it may be four separate counterpoints, all distinct and all painting different ideas and facts. Next, he wished to connect the music of nature with the tragedy of human life—the latter played by M. Bottesini, an artist who exhausts wonder and dumb-founders praise; and the composer essayed, too, to paint the sublimest music in the world—that of the deity singing the monody of the passing world in the winter's wind. Next, he wished to individualize in music our only remaining fairy,—the character being grotesque, yet withal gentle and melodious, and with the sweetest mission that ever fairy performed. Next, he desired to paint the songs of the stars—the fluttering ecstasies of hovering angels—on the purest harmonies of the violins, only to be achieved by artists who have given a life of labor and love and lyrical devotion to extract the transcendental element in their instruments. Next, he designed to paint the change from starlight to sunlight by poetical analogies and mathematical facts. Then he sought to imitate the mother's cry to her little ones by rousing them on Christmas morning, and by the playing bo-peep, which as a little love story, admits of dramatic harmonies. The introduction of toys into the orchestra at this point, may be considered by the thoughtless, as a burlesque, but not so did the composer consider it. The divine words "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven," make the artistic painting of children and their toys, as much a mission of art as the writing of a hallelujah chorus. The finale too of this symphony, where an orchestra of drums is introduced to represent the rolling of the spheres, is among the composer's ideas of the necessity of towering sonority to crown a long work designed to be of a religious and romantic character.

There is a great originality of conception and grandeur of treatment in this New Year's Poem, and we believe that it will take a place among the very best lyrical productions of the age.—N. Y. National Democrat.

HYMN OF THE EARTH TO THE SUN ON NEW YEAR'S DAY.

I.
O, thou majestic One, whose sleepless eye
Watches the planets that are thine own brides,
Even as a god from his superior sky
Watches the winding of the starry tides—
Centre of Life! My glorious Spouse! O, hear
My hymn that duly rises on each glad NEW YEAR.

II.
Through the long months thou hast looked down on me
With the same love as through the cycles past:
And, in the summer, o'er my shore and sea
Thy passionate beams were from the centre cast;
And Life, full bounding Being, as of old,
Over my swelling bosom brightly rolled.

III.
The bridal-fruit!—in fair flowers all a-glow;
In birds that image swift, divinest thought;
In populous seas where warmed waters flow:
In woods that syllable the music taught
By sybil-winds, and in the babe whose soul—
Immortal wonder—sanctifies the whole.

IV.
O, how I thrilled through every leaping vein!
O, how I felt the heavings of my heart!
And lifted up the immemorial strain
That shook my lips when first I formed a part
Of this Creation, of which thou wert made Husband and Lord, by HIM in Light arrayed.

V.
Say, was it wrong that thus I turned to sound—
Delicate as some spirit's feet on flowers—
A mother's gladness, while I looked around
On my star'd sisters in their azure bowers—
Mothers like me, who ever in their turn
Feel thy loved kisses on their full lips burn?

VI.
And was it wrong that thus I nursed the fire
Of keenest joy—knowing that yet 'twas mine
To be alive with Heaven's light crowned Sire
From whose large nostrils roll the flames divine
That still impregnate, so that o'er my plains
Nations may still endure like ever-lengthening strains!

VII.

Glory, and Power and Joy! The Nations still Spring from my womb and lift their conquering psalms:
Great Europe keeps the mountain of her will;
Strong Asia guards her coronal of palms;
Swart Afric strays amid her wondrous blooms,
And still the Eagle-People wear their broad, free plumes.

VIII.

I know that Evil yet makes many a liar
Of wo and madness in the myriad homes;
I know that Battle keeps his red arm bare,
And gory banners float on tyrant domes,
While cunning priests blight many a lovely sod,
And slay my children in the name of God!

IX.

These are the things that often force the wail
From my pierced heart, and in the spherul song
Make painful discord; they shall not prevail!
Yet shall the Right be throned above the Wrong!—
Yet shall my note, unmarred by tuneless Crime, Harmonious float within the eternal chime!

X.

Smile not that unbelief, O Sun!—but see
By my Atlantic fixed a Nation great,
And wise and true—though young—and free!
In it I mark the signet seal of Fate,
From whose fair form the mighty truth appears:
"Evil, and Crime, and Wo must die beneath the Years

XI.

That even now within the Future stand
On tip-toe waiting for the beck of Time—
The radiant Years, beneath whose high command
A Star of Peace shall smile o'er every clime,
While one sweet word, like halcyon's wings unfurled, LOVE! LOVE! must float forever through the world!"

XII.

Glory, and Power, and Joy!—hut hark!—I hear
The great Bell of thy Orb—that's duly rung
To mightiest music on each glad NEW YEAR—
How through the trembling space its notes are flung!—
Calling on me to lift my Song to HIM
Before whose intense Light even thou, O Sun, art dim!

DRUM OBLIGATO!—We mean the drum for delinquents. The first of January reminds us that nine months of our Journal's year have gone, and yet hundreds of our subscribers—"in advance," the terms were) have still neglected to remit to us those little trifling $2 sums, which collectively compose the bone and sinew of our enterprise. We pay as we go; how many times are we expected to notify and send round to our subscribers, before they think it proper to pay us?

[A GOOD TIME TO SUBSCRIBE FOR THE JOURNAL OF MUSIC is the first of January. Bound volumes of the first year, and all back numbers can be furnished, to those who wish to keep the musical record complete.

Oratorios.

MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY.—The repetition of the "Messiah," on Saturday evening, in spite of the universal satisfaction given by the first performance, turned out to be for the benefit of a mere handful of listeners, scarcely outnumbering the performers themselves. The almost unprecedented snow storm of Thursday had laid an embargo upon locomotive privileges. Our out-of-town friends were shut out entirely, and in town, the enterprise that had availed us to tug through snow drifts for three days, now felt a natural reaction, which made it greater joy to stay at home for once, than to be seeking vain renewal of an excitement so complete the first time, that the same causes could not make it as complete again. This is the law of all excitements and all victories that pertain to human nature; and many, we doubt not, instinctively remembered the fatality and much mistrusted if the "Messiah" would sound as well a second time as it had done a week before.

The Society however came bravely up to the work, nor was aught wanting in the solos, the Germania orchestra, or the conductor, BERGMANN, who all did their duty heartily and with true loyalty to Art; not unmindful, it may have been, that it had been Handel's own fate to perform his oratorio to a far emptier house than that, nor of his undaunted: "Never mind, the music will sound to better." The performance was a very fine one, under the circumstances; in some parts fully up to the high-water mark before left; but as a whole it fell necessarily somewhat short. The chorus was not out in its full force of numbers, and there was less to inspire, and no more advantage to be taken of the important lever of surprise, since now the weight of expectation had shifted to the extreme end to be lifted. Several new omissions had to be made, in consequence of beginning later than on Sunday; and there had been no time, of course, to thoroughly revise the arbitrary three-part division of the various pieces of the oratorio, as we suggested last week. We believe all present were much pleased with the performance; while those who went with earnest purpose to acquire a deeper impression and clearer understanding of Handel's masterpiece, must have been happy in a second opportunity, such as occurs none too frequently. The concluding "Amen" fugue rings in our mind yet; it gave us the true feeling of never-endingness, with zest and appetite to correspond, which lies in the nature of a true fugue; we longed to hear its spiral chase go on for a half-hour more, at least.

We are pleased to learn that the Choral Society have it in contemplation to bring out "St. Paul" or "Elijah," during the season.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—The second of the subscription concerts, and the second representation of Handel's "Samson," drew out a large audience, in spite of the bad going, last Sunday evening. It was a pleasure to see and hear and breathe and feel again in the noble Music Hall, with its simple but artistic aspect, and the clear, elastic ring with which it truly reports every true tone;—although we confess we should have been puzzled to define any very marked acoustic failure in the New Tremont Temple, after those two trials, except such as might have been attributable to the closeness sometimes of the atmosphere. Yet it did seem to us, in coming back, that the Handelian choruses rang through the Music Hall with more vitality of resonance. And certainly the voice of Mrs. Wentworth seemed to tell with twice the power it did on the preceding evening.

But not to let the hall usurp the credit justly due the singers, we must say that the choruses in "Samson"—the few choruses there are, and very grand ones,—were rendered with remarkable precision, spirit and effect. The contralti of the Handel and Haydn are no match for those of the new society; perhaps not the soprani; but the tenors and basses are in much superior force, and in round, unisonous and telling mass of tone may challenge comparison with any that we remember in this city. We observe less of that disagreeable shouting and straining of the tenor voices than in former years. Indeed the many years practice and experience of the more permanent members of the Handel and Haydn chorus lend a palpable advantage.

The overture, with its contrasted series of movements, and its richness in ideas, enough to justify any antiquarian love for the quaint Handelian forms, was played with a refreshing liveness and point, and so were the accompaniments throughout; not excepting the trumpet obbligato in Miss STONE's great song, which this time helped and did not mar. The other triumphs of the evening in the way of solo-singing, were the warbling, cooing melodies in the part of Dalila, rendered with exquisite beauty and, as it seemed to us, with less childish sweetness and more womanly ripeness and soundness of tone, than usual, by Mrs. WENTWORTH; and the spirited, declamatory recitatives and airs of Harapha, especially "Honor and Arms," as sung by Mr. AIKEN. We do not remember any thing better in its kind, from any of our native singers, than this last. The part of Samson abounds with trying recitative, which, falling in the lower and middle regions of the voice, grows rather dull and tedious in the rendering of Mr. Low. Now and then a high note of his tenor charms us with its pure and golden quality; and in a portion of the air: Total eclipse! no sun, no moon, &c., it told with sweet and beautiful pathos. But his recitative not only lacks declamatory force and crispness, but suffers from a certain ordinary and as it were country conversation character of voice and style: the very quality which music, as the ideal language, should never come within a thousand miles of once suggesting. There is always merit in Mr. BALL's singing, though one tastes a little too much of the sculptor's clay (pardon the image from a sphere of Art in which the same gentleman has won real laurels!) in the somewhat thick and heavy mould of his musical periods.

We cannot but repeat the thought which always strikes us when we hear an oratorio. It is the choruses, and not the solos, which under ordinary circumstances must ensure the success of such works. "Samson" abounds in solo, in song and recitative dialogue, and hence, without the rarest singers, fails of its full effect; though to be sure, the choruses are doubly refreshing when they do come. The common ear no doubt loves melody; and minds of common culture, not baptized into the love of music pure and for its own sake, or not at home in thoughts ideal, impersonal and grand, are naturally most interested in music which is wedded to some personalities, hence in song or dialogue as pertaining to dramatic characters, or, wanting such intrinsic personality in the thing sung, in the personality of the singer. Thus in a promiscuous audience, twenty will be eager to know how Mrs. Wentworth sings, to one who thinks of the song itself and the composer. This is the rule. And yet Handel's choruses, and even Mendelssohn's, are so instinct both with humanity and grandeur, that it is a well established fact, that the choruses in all the late performances of oratorio have charmed and lifted up the great mass of the audience, as no songs sung by any less than Jenny Lind could lift them up and charm them. The inference is, the more choruses the better. Not that we would take away the solo-singer's occupation, or be ungrateful for the frequent pleasure we have had in this way from our native artists.—But in the selection of oratorios for performance, would it not be the better policy to take those in which choruses predominate over solo, instead of solo over choruses as in "Samson"? There is that magnificent and sublime "Israel in Egypt," with its great mountain ranges of double choruses, by Handel: why will not one of our societies give us that? Were it not better worth the study, and surer to impress a simple and disarm a critical audience, than the Rossini opera of "Moses" done over into quasi oratorio shape, with its abundance of long winding, florid single or part melodies, which task the utmost powers of the most trained Italian voices? It is too late, of course, to ask our Handel and Haydn friends to change the programme for their season. "Moses in Egypt" is announced and we presume nearly ready, and we shall extract all the pleasure that we can from it and wish it all success. Our hint is thrown out for the consideration of oratorio societies in general, for their future conduct. Without urging its interference with present arrangements, we wish that in the long run it may have some weight.

Of Music Wedded to Mortal Verse.

MR. EDITOR:—In common with yourself and others, who have expressed themselves through your columns, I have enjoyed the excerpts from the operas of Wagner which have made so many moments memorable. Now that this "Master in more forms than one" is as fairly before us as we may expect for a long while, I wish to make some suggestions, more by way of query than querulousness, concerning "Tannhäuser."

In Wagner's theory of Operatic Music, as I understand it, the Libretto is to be adequate to the music; that is, it must not contain anything that will offend a highly cultivated poetic sense, or a proper idea of philosophy, art or history.

But what are we to think of Tannhäuser judged by this test? I am sure that any one who has a canonical calendar of saints, and who knows anything of the history of one St. Elizabeth of Hungary, who on earth was wife and widow to Louis IV., will find discord in every part of the opera. At what time of Elizabeth's life could any such incidents as those in Tannhäuser have occurred? According to the most reliable historic evidence, St. Elizabeth was daughter of Andrew II.; was born at Presburg in the year 1207; was betrothed to Louis at four years of age, he being eleven,—and commencing his reign as Landgrave of Thuringia in 1215, the marriage was completed six years afterward.

Now it is inconceivable that there should have been any such contests of Minnesingers in which she was involved, whilst she was receiving her education at Wartburg; for it is well attested, that the betrothal vows between the young Princess and Landgrave were most sacred and dear to them. It is not that there may not be correctly a poetic and musical Romance drawn from the life of such persons; but when such a romance entirely overturns every correct idea of a character in history, and makes all accounts nonsense, it is clearly out of taste, and artificial rather than artistic. Jacobus de Veragine, Surinus, and, more than all, Dietrich, have made us as fully acquainted with this Saint's life as we can be with any life of that period. The latter was born in Thuringia near the time and scene of her remarkable life and death. He not only studies all the works on her history, but "not satisfied with these, visited monasteries, castles, and towns, interrogated the oldest and most truthful persons, and wrote letters, seeking fulness and truth in all." She had early an inclination rather for some secluded holy place, than the society of the court, and chose by lot St. John as her patron, the Protector of Virginity. In their early espousals "the princess was laid in the cradle of her boy spouse," "and the infants embraced with smiles, from whence the bystanders drew a joyful omen of their future happiness." As they grew older their affection increased; they knew each other by the names of "brother and sister" alone. Most truly has Mr. Kingsley in his "Saint's Tragedy" made her say to Isentrudes:

What is this love? Why, is he not my brother
And I his sister? Till these weary wars,
The one of us without the other never Did weep or laugh: what is't should change us now?

The interest and beauty of her life centre on the singleness of her love for this one; on her yielding up the enjoyment of a happy wedded life with him,—on giving him up to the holy wars for the sake of being "perfect through sufferings;" and on her meekly dying of a broken heart. It is well known that she did not long survive him, but died in 1231, on a hard floor in a cell in one of her own hospitals, having descended thither from her throne and happiness. She was canonized by Gregory IX., four years after.

Now in all this history there is absolutely no room to suppose that she could at any time have been brought into the part given her in Tannhäuser, however shadowy and mythic it may be designed to be. The only way seems to be, to imagine that she was Tannhäuser's guardian genius after her death, which would be inconsistent with the opera. It would be well enough if we could have in the opera the two Venuses of the earliest Orphic mythology as travestied into mediæval Provence,—the Venus and the Eros, or Celestial Love. But it will be a blemish, unless some new historic light be cast on it, that this sacred principle should be personified in one with whom there are other and still higher associations, to which violence is done.

Slowly but surely I think we are trained into the faith that Music must condescend when it chooses to illustrate itself by objects or even signs, as words. I never hear a grand oratorio tied on to antiquated modes of thought, unscientific statement, bad exegesis and worse translation, but I recur to the Immortal Old Man in the dream of Jean Paul, with a soul made to aspire and ascend the eternal chain of worlds, yet doomed to live on the earth forever. Surely it makes some difference when one hears the exquisite air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," after he knows, that there is no doubt that in the passage, (Job 19:25,) the word usually translated "Redeemer" means truly "Avenger of blood," and was the title of a relative whose duty in old times it was to save the reputation of a man, by saving his inheritance from mortgage, or marrying his widow. Job was reflecting that although men thought his afflictions the evidence of some secret sin, yet after he was dead, some relative would vindicate his reputation, and goes on to say that "without his flesh," not in it, he could see God. Of course this has no very material bearing on theological controversy, but it does inspire a timidity toward all music which does not feel its superiority to all incarnation into form or symbol. Music only enters the soul when we listen as angels listen; then word or form or our own bodies are impertinences. Talking birds are not the most musical.

We apprehend the whole difficulty in our correspondent's mind grows out of the gratuitous assumption that Wagner's Elizabeth, sainted and pure as he describes her, was at all intended for the Saint Elizabeth of history. Yet in constructing an ideal character, had he not a right to draw the moral and spiritual elements thereof from the most ideal characters which history affords? Might not every actual fair saint serve him in his conception of an ideal saint?

With the main thought of the last paragraph of the above, (to which the other part is made subservient), we fully sympathize. Music is more than words, and oftener descends than otherwise, to wed with words. But we have little fear that any "exegetical" considerations will ever enter anybody's mind to rob "I know that my Redeemer" &c., of the high interpretation of the Handelian music. That seems to us like digging in a dry and stony soil for arguments to prove what does not need such argument.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

The audience of the fourth Chamber Concert was uncommonly large, and the programme uncommonly interesting; especially the first part, which consisted of two of the most admirable of Quartets. The first was the old favorite by Mozart, the No. 4, in E flat, of which we spoke somewhat at length last year, and whose beauties one does not begin to exhaust, were he to hear it for the hundredth time. For it is one of those perfect products of a pure ideal imagination which by no possibility can ever become commonplace. If one would know the heaven-wide difference between really high Art, and the ad captandum superficial effect pieces, which win such multitudes away from Art, he finds a fine example in this Quartet. The so-called popular and taking melodies, from a "Prima Donna Waltz" to the most elaborate bravura of Italian opera, grow stale by repetition; you are delighted once, you call them good, and soon they get to haunt the atmosphere, become a fashion or a listless habit ("whistled for want of thought"), and you grow sick of hearing them. The Quartet in E flat is full of melody; melodies are intertwined and interwoven in and out through its whole harmonious texture; most of its movements win and delight even the uncultivated ear on the first hearing; but they lead the mind away and up into an unwonted, higher, freer state of being; you fling away all commonplace, bed-ridden and belittling associations as your soul floats in the free element. The charm is impersonal and strengthening to the soul. This melody, these harmonies do not, like the popular airs aforesaid, return upon you in your listless moments, to avenge themselves upon your self-indulgence, by identifying themselves with your foolish and idlest thoughts and dearest states of mind, haunting and boring you continually. You cannot drag them down to earth and commonness; you cannot vulgarize them; they preserve their ideality and selectness; they remind you of a higher, truer element, within you, yet above you, of which they are the native voices and the audible vibrations, and while they hover near you, refuse to let you drag them down with you to your own idle, vulgar level. It is a spiritual charm which sanctifies these pure products of an inspired imagination. Yet they are no mere abstractions; they are positive works of Art, that address the senses at the same time with the soul. They are as palpable realities of sense as common airs and dances: yet they refuse to be hummed or danced to, at least in the body. They are like great persons, high, spiritual characters, persons of genius, whom we may meet familiarly, and yet never can we fully know them and appropriate them; moving among us and of us, they refuse to be made common; their look and voice tell ever of a higher, truer element which eludes the enfeebling grasp of familiarity.

This is most true of the Allegro and Andante of this Quartet. But in the Minuet and Trio, we have the simple, naïve, childlike, playful sort of Mozart melody; here, for the time being, all seems perfectly familiar and accessible; the shining visitors descend to mingle upon equal terms in the light-hearted sports of us mortal children. How natural and unstudied seems the tune of it! how pleasantly at home we all are in the fascinating company! But the shining ones are gone before you can think of detaining them; they are not to be caged and tortured, like every day tunes, in a hand organ—not they!

The Mozart quartet was nicely played. Not so, we are sorry to say, the wonderful Quartet of Beethoven, whose fiery impetus and course thick-set with difficulties betrayed the bows into too rough and angry intercourse with the strings. There was more than usual of that scratching kind of tone, which so very few quartet parties manage to avoid in rendering Beethoven. We suppose it must be the last and crowning perfection of quartet-playing to work itself out pure entirely from this dross, without sacrifice of fire and manliness. This rough mode of attacking the strings, too, frequently involves the greater sin of false intonation, especially in the highest octave.

The Quintette Club are not always given to it: hear them in a quartet of Haydn, such as the Adagio (God save the Emperor) with variations, played at the end of the concert,—or in that earlier one of Beethoven, with the Andante and variations,—or in many others we might mention, and it all comes out smoothly and invitingly to the ear; the tones speak out or sing out from the strings, instead of being tortured out, and the musical nerves and sense are conciliated and put in delightful rapport with the themes discoursed to them. This our quartet-players can and do often realize, and it attaches their audience to them in the long run. What extra difficulties there may be in rendering such a piece as this first of the three "Rasoumofsky Quartets" of Beethoven, our friends of the Mendelssohn Club know better than we can; but we trust they will persevere unto a pure and clear and easy victory over obstacles as great as these. None the less, however, do we thank them for giving us a renewed introduction to a work of such rare originality and greatness. It is one of the most wonderful emanations of the Beethoven individuality, and shows the all-mastering logic of his art in the development of his themes in a remarkable manner. The ideas are nervous, bold, unique and pregnant; and the rhythmical forms unfolded into the most intricate, yet symmetrical and expressive fineness of divisions. It is hard to believe that the opus number, fifty-nine, can mark the true date of this composition. In rare individuality of thought and manner, in remoteness from all common forms, in utter newness of invention and of exploration as it were in wondrous, untried spheres, it seems in advance of the symphonies of the same or later date, (the C minor symphony is op. 67), and indeed of all the symphonies before the ninth and last. These are all clearer and more readily appreciable to the common ear, than are these quartets of his middle period. Does it not prove, that in quartet-writing the composer invites you to communion with his most interior, esoteric self; that it is the most advanced portion of his being that seeks utterance in this form of Art?

The Second Part of the Concert opened with an arrangement from Wagner's Tannhäuser, the "Song to the Evening Star," a fervent and religious strain, which in the opera is sung by the spiritual minnesinger, Wolfram von Eschenbarg. It is a tenor song, and could not of course retain all its true character when given to the clarinet. The violoncello would have sung it more appropriately; but the violoncello was needed for bass in the quartet accompaniment, which we presume was the secret of such an arrangement. The piece, as it was, gave great pleasure to the audience, who insisted on a répétition. A Quintet by Gade, (op. 8. in E minor), played here for the first time, impressed us as very beautiful, but in the same vein of cool sea-shore, romantic fancy as his other works,—a vein which finds more scope in the freer form of the overture, and even in a symphony, than within the stricter requirements of quintet or quartet.

JULLIEN'S ORCHESTRA. We have barely room to allude to the first of the new series of Concerts, on Thursday evening. The audience was smaller than it ought at any time to be for such an orchestra. The floor of the Music Hall, at the fifty cent price, appeared well filled, but the dollar and dollar and a half balconies were sparsely populated. The instruments were not quite as numerous as before, yet the music seemed none the less brilliant and effective. The programme was mostly made up of oft-repeated pieces, to which the habitués could hardly turn with much zest; and in a programme already superabounding in quantity, it was rather severe to submit to the encore of nearly every piece. But for the "Prima Donna Waltz," and the "American Quadrilles," and the "Carnival of Venice" flute solo, there were of course fresh auditors, and for their sakes it was well. The "Masaniello" overture was splendidly performed; the solemn, stirring Hungarian national air, in one of the JULLIEN quadrille sets, was worked up to a pitch of sublimity at the close. The Allegretto from the 5th Beethoven symphony, with its tranquil, happy, equable tempo, is always welcome. BOTTESINI's new contrabasso solo, which he calls, "Cerito," was the most marvellous and artistically interesting of all that we have heard from this rare magician. Mlle. ZERR sang from Lucia, and some English songs; and the brothers MOLLINHAUER discoursed their aerial harmonies to the unalloyed delight of all ears. There were, too, new and curious polkas, &c., by JULLIEN.

But the feature of the evening was the long orchestral selection from his opera "The Destruction of Pompei," which was full of striking effects; now passages of quaint and sober beauty, like the antique strain: "O Isis;" and now overwhelmingly grand and awe-inspiring, like the finale, which represents that city's doom.

Last evening JULLIEN was to give his "Shakespeare Night." But his repertoire did not include Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," the grandest musical production, perhaps, ever prompted by the genius of the great bard. We trust he will bind that up also into his next Shakespeare sheaf.

CONCERTS AT HAND.—This afternoon JULLIEN'S orchestra at the Music Hall. Observe, it begins at a quarter before three.—To-night the GERMANIANS play Schubert's symphony, and Gade's "Ossian" overture, which has a harp obligato part for Mr. APTOMMAS.—To-morrow night, the third and last performance of "Samson," by the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—JULLIEN again on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings.

The last GERMANIA REHEARSAL opened with a delicious symphony by Haydn. We hope they will repeat it. Haydn always opens a concert well; he puts you in a genial and accepting mood for music. The first finale from Don Juan also diffused lively satisfaction.

We grieve to hear that little PAUL JULLIEN lies so dangerously ill at Buffalo, that his life is almost despaired of. Brain-fever is the disease. Camilla Urso has been engaged to supply his place in Mme. Sontag's troupe.

Foreign.

VERSAILLES.—The Orpheonists have executed in the church of the chateau, the mass composed for them by MM. Halevy, Adolph Adam, and Ambroise Thomas. Madame Widemann sang an "O Salutaris" and an "Agnus Dei" by Panzeron.

VIENNA.—During the last week of November, Balfe's Opera of Keolanthe, was performed at the Court Theatre.—The post of Chapel-Master of the Cathedral, vacant by the death of Drechsler, has been given to M. Gottfried Prayer, author of the oratorio of Noah.—M. Willmers, the pianist, is here, and his playing is much extolled.

LEIPSIC, 25th Nov.—The Conservatoire of Music, founded by the late Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, has just celebrated the anniversary of the birth of that illustrious composer by a public performance of his oratorio Saint Paul, in which the pupils of the establishment took part.—At the Theatre they have revived two old operas, Les Deux Journées of Cherubini, and Le Médecin et l'Apothicaire of Dittersdorf.—Berlioz is daily expected here to give some concerts at the Gewandhaus.

STOCKHOLM.—The Theatre Royal re-opened with La Muette of Auber. Since then they have given Le Gaieté of Adolphe Adam; Martha, by Flotow; and Preciosa, by Weber.

ST. PETERSBURG.—Nandin, the tenor in place of Mario, has made his debut with success in Lucrezia Borgia. In Robert le Diable, Medori, in the part of Alice, has made a veritable sensation. Tamboirik was splendid in Robert. Mlle. De la Grange made a hit in Le Barbier with Ronconi, Calzolari, and Lablache; and again in Lucia with De Bassini and Calzolari. Carlotta Grisi, in the ballet, will be replaced by Mlles. Giraud and Fleury, from Paris.—Henselt, the celebrated pianist and composer, is about to make a tour in the interior of Russia.—The Prophète has been produced with a still greater effect than last year. Tamboirik made his rentrée in the part of Jean of Leyden, and his magnificent voice produced an immense effect upon the audience. Mlle. La Grange was the Fides.—Mlle Louise Christiani, the celebrated violoncellist has just died.

A Good Commencement.

President Pierce, Queen Victoria, Emperor of Russia, King of Holland, President Santa Anna, Emperor of Austria, Pope of Rome, Emperor of China, King of Denmark, Queen of Spain, King of Belgium, Sultan of Turkey, King of Prussia, King of Sweden, Emperor of France, King of Sardinia, and, in fact, portraits of all the principal rulers of the world, at the present time, may be found in "Gleason's Pictorial" for the present week, being number one of a new volume. Besides the above, this beautiful weekly contains quite a number of other fine engravings—such as New Year's festivals in Germany, China, Algiers, and the West Indies. Also a group of the New York Police, in their new regulation uniform—chief, captain, privates, etc. A Family Register; Scenes in Turkey; A Turkish Lady at Home; A Turkish Soldier; A Turkish Fruit Vender; A Turkish Policeman, etc. A number of excellent stories, poems, etc., by the best American authors, are also to be found in the above number; and, to crown all, the paper has come out in an entire new dress—being much beautified throughout. Terms of the "Pictorial,"—one subscriber, one year, $3 00; two subscribers, one year, $5 00; four, $9 00; eight, $16 00. Single copies, at six cents each, may be obtained at any of the periodical depots throughout the country.

—Edward L. Balch,

MUSIC! MUSIC! MUSIC!

IT IS NOW AN ESTABLISHED AND CONFIRMED FACT THAT THE

Modern School for the Piano-Forte

IS BY FAR THE MOST INGENUOUS, SIMPLE, PROGRESSIVE AND COMPREHENSIVE METHOD FOR THE PIANO THAT HAS EVER BEEN PRESENTED TO THE PUBLIC,—embracing a complete system, from the very outset to the highest classical music.

The anatomy of the hands is shown by beautifully colored plates. The entire work surpasses all previous musical publications, as regards mechanical appearance and elegance.

The author, NATHAN RICHARDSON, has spent the last five years in Europe for the sole purpose of getting up an Instruction Book, which would embrace the styles and effective Exercises of ALL distinguished Pianists and Teachers. To accomplish that object, he was assisted by

EIGHTEEN EMINENT EUROPEAN PIANISTS.

The result has been, an Instruction Book so comprehensive and ingenious, that a pupil will acquire the styles and mechanical difficulties of all celebrated Pianists, and that, too, with far less labor and practice than is usually required to learn an ordinary composition, under the old methods.

It is not an abridgement, neither is it an old work translated, revised, and remodeled. It is a work which is entirely new throughout, and is thoroughly adapted to our wants. It has been examined and admitted to be the best Instruction Book ever published in America, by the following distinguished Professors, Pianists and Teachers, who have given us the most complimentary recommendations, which have already appeared before the public.

The Erards and their Instruments.

[The following biographical sketches are translated and abridged from the French of M. Fétis.]

SEBASTIAN ERARD, founder of the celebrated piano-forte and harp manufactories at Paris and London, which still bear his name, was born at Strasburg, in 1752, and was the fourth son of a cabinet maker, who did not marry till the age of sixty-four. He inherited from his father a robust constitution, and evinced in childhood a courageous spirit; for it is said that at the age of thirteen he climbed the steeple of the Strasburg Cathedral, and seated himself upon the summit of the cross. At the age of eight years he was sent to the schools to study architecture, perspective, linear drawing, practical geometry, &c. Throughout his life he was continually occupied with new inventions; in the latter half of it he slept but little, and his bed was always covered with papers and plans of instruments. This fertility of invention and execution accounts for the multitude of models still found in his workshops at London and Paris. He lost his father at the age of sixteen and sought employment at Paris, where he became apprentice, and soon foreman, in a harpsichord manufactory. The young workman's ingenious questions so puzzled his master that he dismissed him, reproaching him for wishing to know every thing. But another famous maker, having received an order to construct a harpsichord requiring knowledge that was out of his daily routine, had heard of the young Erard, and offered him a certain sum if he would make it, and allow him (the employer) to put his name upon it. Erard consented, and the person who had ordered the instrument was so astonished at the perfection of the workmanship that he asked the manufacturer if he were really the author of it; the latter, taken by surprise, confessed that the instrument had been constructed for him by a young man of the name of Erard. The fame of this adventure soon spread through the musical world, and drew attention to the young artist, who soon signalized himself by his clavécin mécanique, a masterly invention and achievement, which caused a great sensation among the artists and amateurs of Paris.

Sebastian Erard was not yet twenty-five years old, and already his reputation was so established, that he was applied to for all sorts of new things which people wished to have constructed. Distinguished persons sought him; and the Duchess de Villeroy, a great patroness of artists, and passionately fond of music, tried to attach him to her household. But preferring his independence, and having long desired to visit England, he was only prevailed upon to remain with the duchess long enough to execute several ideas of hers, having a suitable work room in her hotel, and enjoying the most perfect liberty. It was here that he constructed his first piano-forte. This instrument, known for some years in Germany and England, was not yet common in France; the few pianos found in Paris having been imported from Ratisbon. It was de bon ton in great houses to have these foreign instruments. Mme. de Villeroy one day asked Erard if he could make a piano; the piano was already in his head; he set immediately about it, and this first piano from his hands bore the stamp of a man of invention and taste. It was heard in the saloon of the duchess by all the amateurs and artists of distinction, and many noble seigneurs were eager to order and possess instruments like it; but they were not so eager to discharge their part of the contract—the most of them never paid!

About this time, his brother, Jean Baptiste Erard, joined him; and this indefatigable worker, and upright, loyal man, from that time shared the labors and the fortunes of Sebastian. The great demand for their pianos soon obliged them to quit the hotel de Villeroy, and found a large establishment in the Rue de Bourbon, (faubourg St. Germain,) which gradually became the first in all Europe. The jealousy of other musical instrument makers was roused, and one actually procured a seizure upon the Erard establishment, under the pretext that they had not subscribed the laws of a certain guild; but Erard found protectors, who made known his merit to the king, Louis XVI., from whom he received a flattering patent. Under this protection the establishment of the two brothers developed more and more, and the sale of their two-string and five-octave pianos (such as they made at that time) was immense.

Among other inventions which continually occupied him, Sebastian Erard made at this time an instrument with two key boards, one for the piano and one for the organ. This was prodigiously popular in high society. One was ordered for Marie Antoinette. The queen had a voice of little compass, and all music seemed written too high for her. Erard made the key board to slide so as to transpose the music, from a semitone to a tone and a half, at will, without any mental labor on the part of the accompanist.

The troubles of the revolution, so injurious to all industry, induced Sebastian to go to England, and open new channels for the products of his manufactory. There he remained several years, and founded an establishment like that in Paris, filled with instruments entirely of his own invention. In 1794 he took out his first patent for improvements in the piano and harp, and his instruments were soon in great demand. But the desire to return to France never forsook him, and he arrived at Paris in 1796. Then, for the first time, he manufactured grand pianos, in the shape of harpsichords, after the English system, of which he had greatly perfected the mechanism, and brought out his harps with single action, which he had invented some ten years before, but had not at that time made public. These pianos were the first instruments with escapement, ever made in Paris; they had the defect of all the instruments of that kind, that of slowness of action in the levers and the hammers—a fault complained of much by artists accustomed to the easy play of the small pianos. This difficulty Erard labored to overcome; and after many trials he produced, in 1808, a new kind of grand piano, in which the action answered more promptly to the touch, while its smaller dimensions were more suited to the size of the Parisian saloons. Dussek played upon one of them with great success in the concerts given at the Odéon by Rode, Baillot, and Lamarre, on their return from Russia; amateurs and artists were well satisfied, but not so Erard himself, as we shall see.

In 1808 he returned to England, where he put the seal upon his reputation by the invention of his double action harp. By giving to each pedal the double function of raising the string a half or whole tone, as might be required, he overcame the whole difficulty of completing the gamut of the harp in all the keys. It cost him years of labor and great outlay, but the success was perfect. The double action harp appeared in London in 1811, when paper money was in the greatest circulation, and the sales in one year amounted to twenty-five thousand pounds. Returning to Paris, he introduced the same manufacture there.

Frequent visits to France made him neglect the manufacture of pianos at London, and his establishment there became devoted to the harp exclusively; but in all the fifteen or twenty patents which he took out in England, new ideas for the perfecting of the piano, as well as harp, were expressed. These he proposed to execute in France. At every exposition of the products of industry, his works were crowned; he had received every kind of public testimonial, when in 1823 he exhibited the model of his chef d'œuvre, his grand piano à double échappement. These new instruments were since established in the London manufactory by his nephew, Pierre Erard. The naturally robust constitution of Sebastian Erard began finally to yield to the incessant labors of so active a life upon the vast theatre of two such capitals as Paris and London. In 1824 he was afflicted with the stone, yet still devoted himself, from the moment of a successful operation, to improvements in organs and other instruments, until an aggravated return of the disease put an end to his career in the month of August, 1831.

PIERRE ERARD, nephew of the preceding, was born at Paris, about the year 1796. His early studies were with a view to his continuing the manufacture of instruments invented by his father and uncle: he was taught music, mathematics, and linear design. Sent to London, when quite young, to direct the manufacture of Sebastian Erard's harps, he has passed there the greatest part of his life. In 1821 he published an account of his uncle's double action harp, under the title of "The Harp in its present improved state, compared with the original pedal Harp." After the death of his uncle, he became his heir, and took charge of the manufactory in Paris, where in 1834 he exhibited several new models of pianos. At the same time he published an historical description of "The improvements introduced into the mechanism of the Piano by the Erards, from the origin of the instrument to the Exposition of 1834," fol., with eight lithographic plates. M. Pierre Erard has since lived alternately at London and Paris, directing the two great establishments which he has inherited.

Sketch of the Life of Felicien David.

Felicien David was born in Cadeuet, (South of France), on the 8th of March, 1810. His father, who had a large fortune, and possessed extensive property in the West Indies, before the revolution of St. Domingo, was obliged to return to France in 1790, and died at Cadeuet in 1815, leaving four children, of whom Felicien was the youngest.

Felicien David, from his infancy, showed the most astonishing musical talents. When only thirteen years of age, and an enfant de chœur in the church of Aix, he composed hymns and motets of remarkable melody. At eighteen, he left the Jesuits of Aix, an orphan, without resources. He was placed in a notary's office, which he soon left to become a second leader in an orchestra; and, in 1829, he became the Maestro di Capella of St. Sauveur Church, at Aix. It was about that time that he wrote many songs and nocturns, in three or four parts, which even now would be admired.

David had, at Aix, an uncle rich enough to assist the young musician; unfortunately the gentleman was a miser, and had no respect for the fine arts. So, when David left his little provincial town, to go and study at Paris, all that he could obtain from his generous relation was an allowance of ten dollars a month, which was stopped after a few months.

After having studied thorough bass with Lesueur and Reher, fugue and counterpoint with Fétis, and organ and extemporization with Benoit, M. David adopted the new religion of St. Simon, and left the conservatoire to become the organist and composer of religious choruses for Fathers St. Simon and Enfantin. After the breaking up of the St. Simonian establishment, at Menilmontant, several members of that society intended to go to the East. M. David was one of them, and he carried with him an excellent piano forte, which had been given him by a piano forte manufacturer of Lyons. We shall not follow the artist during the two years which he spent in the East; it will be sufficient to say that he could have become the favorite of a Pacha, but he was anxious to return to France. He left Cairo on the 18th of February, 1835, at the time the plague was killing two hundred persons a day at Alexandria. Not wishing to embark there, he traveled to Syria by land. This is a fine journey for an artist. To see Gaza, Jaffa, Jerusalem, St. Jean d'Acre, the ancient Tyre, Sidon—to cross the desert when the mind is stored with the remembrance of Constantinople, Smyrna, with its handsome women, Rhodes, that chivalric island, Cyprus, Chii, and the sunny islands of the Archipelago. Think of the people of these different countries, with their rich and characteristic dresses—their harsh or sweet language—and tell if they do not form matter for exalting the imagination of an artist? These impressions have been translated by David, in the most poetical manner, in the symphony Le Désert.

On the 19th of June, 1835, M. David landed in Marseilles, where he gave a concert, at which his Oriental compositions were favorably received. He arrived in Paris in August of the same year, for the second time. His first care was to publish the Brises de Orient, for pianoforte, which were in six numbers. He expected great success, but these beautiful melodies remained unknown, because the publishers did not recognize a new name, and consequently did not puff him in the papers. Sad and dispirited, but conscious of his genius, he lived for two years in the closest seclusion, writing symphonies for full orchestra, after Beethoven's school. One of these symphonies was performed at Valentine's concerts, in 1837, but for want of notice, was only known and appreciated by artists and connoisseurs. After several years of solitude, in which he had to struggle against almost abject poverty, at the recommendation of his friends, he made a resolution to strike a decisive blow for reputation. Money was advanced to him, and he prepared himself to give a concert, on the 1st of December, 1843. The room was taken, and preparations were going on, when unexpected circumstances obliged him to postpone the concert which was to decide his fate. He thought then of turning the postponement to his own advantage, by writing a new work in a novel style, and so constructed as to produce a striking sensation. Still under the impression of his magic remembrance of the East, he looked for some poet who could enter, with himself, into these ideas, and found the very man in one of his former companions in Egypt, Mr. Augustus Colin, of Marseilles. This writer composed the poem of the Désert, the music of which was made in the space of about three months, from April to July, 1844.

The symphony of Le Désert was performed in the concert hall of the Conservatoire, in Paris, on the 8th of December, 1844, and excited an enthusiasm unexampled in the annals of musical art. * * * * *

The following lines were written by David to a friend shortly after the production of Le Désert: "At last I am rewarded for all my studies and struggles. Last night I gave my second concert at the Italian opera-house; my success was as grand and still greater than on the first night. The élite of Paris attended. This new performance has consecrated my triumph. I have received these ovations without intoxication; I know what they will require of me in future. I have now a vast responsibility, and with the help of God, I trust that I shall not be inferior to myself in my new works."

Since its performance in Paris, it has been given in almost every capital of Europe, with astonishing success.

Gleanings from German Musical Papers,

The fourth of November, being the anniversary of the death of Mendelssohn, was commemorated, as usual, by the Leipsic Conservatory, with appropriate music, consisting entirely of compositions of the lamented master, as follows: Beati Mortui in Domino, an unprinted work, for men's voices; Sonata for the piano, Op. 6, performed by the Herr Professor Moscheles; "For the Lord, he leadeth the wandering," &c., sung by Fräulein Hoffmann (unprinted); the Overture for string instruments; and the Choral: O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden, for solo, chorus and orchestra (unprinted), the solo sung by Fräulein Auguste Koch of Bernburg.

LEIPSIC.—At the third Gewandhaus Concert a new comedy-overture, by Rietz, was played; a new singer, Fräulein Bergauer, from Prague, made her debut in the aria from "Fidelio" (Abscheulicher! &c.); and Herr Landgraf, the clever virtuoso, who sings so charmingly upon his clarinet, performed a long lost and recently recovered Concerto of Mozart.

In the fourth concert, the brothers Wieniawski, from St. Petersburg,—one distinguished as a violinist, the other as a pianist,—made their appearance. Schumann's fourth and newest Symphony was brought out for the first time; also Beethoven's overture, Op. 124, and Rossini's "Tell" overture. Fräulein Bergauer sang an air from Hans Heiling and some Lieder at the piano.

The fifth concert in the Gewandhaus, (where Mendelssohn had so often conducted in the prime of life) falling on Nov. 8d, was converted into a Mendelssohn solemnity. His oratorio, "St. Paul," was worthily brought out under the direction of David. Herren Schneider and Behr gave the male solos with all the warmth of expression which the composer had put into them. Fräulein Bergauer and Fräulein Hoffmann also gave great satisfaction. The latter, a pupil of the Leipsic Conservatory, surprised all by the full, sound ring of her voice and by her artistic method. The choruses were sung by the resident Song-unions with skill and con amore.

Of the sixth concert, (Nov. 10), the ornament was Fräulein Marie Wieck, the young pianiste, sister of Mme. Clara Schumann. She played the F minor Concerto of Chopin, a Saltarello by Stephen Heller, an Idyl, by Julius von Kolb, a young artist of kindred talent, and Henselt's "If I were a bird," all to the unqualified delight of that exacting audience. Fräulein Bergauer sang an Aria from Gluck's "Orphans." Of the orchestral pieces the Signale speaks as follows:

"The 'Echoes from Ossian,' which stand not merely on the title, but are felt in the music which Gade in his overture causes to sound to us from the far back traditional times; as well as the stronger sister of the Pastorale, with its wine-intoxicated Hungarian peasants'-wedding finale(!)—the golden A major Symphony of Beethoven—consoled us somewhat for the misfortune of living in this musical Present."

The first Chamber Concert in the Gewandhaus, at Leipsic, took place Nov. 21st. The programme included a Quartet of Beethoven, in A; Schumann's Quintet for piano and strings, performed by Clara Wieck and Herren Concert-master David, Röntgen, Herrmann and Wittmann; a string Quartet in D minor, by Schubert (posthumous), played by David, Röntzen, Herrmann and kapelmeister Rietz; and Variations serieuses for piano solo, by Handel, played by Clara Wieck.

Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony" and Cherubini's overture to "Medea" were performed at the second Euterpe Concert, Nov. 22. Fräulein Emma Koch sang songs of Mendelssohn and Schumann; and Herr Ad. Köckert played a violin concerto of Molique.

BERLIOZ was expected at the Gewandhaus concerts in December.

Beethoven's Missa Solennis, in D, has been performed in the Odeon Concert at Munich. The execution was so ripe and so well rounded in all parts, that the hearers were astonished at the grand clearness of the composition, in spite of its depth and fulness of thoughts. This is the Mass for which Beethoven could find no publisher, so that he offered it to the various European courts for an honorarium of fifty ducats. Only the kings of Prussia, Saxony and France, and the emperor of Russia accepted his proposal. On the part of Prussia, Beethoven was asked whether he would not rather have a royal Order, than the fifty ducats. "Fifty ducats, or nothing!" said he. Goethe, minister at Weimar, returned no answer to his letter.

"Butterbrodt" in the Leipsic Signale, discoursing of a miscellaneous concert where some things did not sound so full as others, makes a roguish allusion to Jullien:

"And yet it ought to sound full, as Jullien says. Apropos, this Jullien, this parade man, is just now in America. He is said to have had prodigious success with his fantasia on Yankee Doodle, and to the following text:

O dudel, dudel, dumm, dumm, dumm!
O Pudel, Pudel, summ, summ, summ!
O Rudel, Rudel, Rum, Rum, Rum, Schrum, Schrumm, Dumm!

In the last strophe the orchestra naturally dies away in a universal ppp whistle, after developing a frightful fff energy upon the third, in which the Rum plays the principal part. The effect of the whole was truly sublime and gave most brilliant proof that every language has its own peculiar melody."

The oratorio performances this winter by the Sing-Akademie in Berlin are to include: the "Alexander's Feast," by Handel, the "Elijah" of Mendelssohn, a Mass of Cherubini and a Te Deum of Grell.

A new and excellent lithographic portrait of CHOPIN, after the celebrated painting by Ary Schefer, has just been published by Schlesinger in Berlin.

Dorn's Opera, Die Niebelungen, to which Gerber has written the text, is to be brought out in the Royal Opera House in Berlin, in January, at an expense of 10,000 thalers for decorations and wardrobe.

The election of M. Reber to the membership in the French Academy, vacated by the death of Onslow, is said to give general satisfaction, although Berlioz, David, &c., were among the candidates. Reber has established his name by his symphonies, which are marked by excellent orchestration, lovely thoughts and graceful fancies, although he is accused of too fondly imitating Haydn. More recently he has tried his hand at comic opera, first through his Nuit de Noël, and then through his Père Gaillard. The most successful air in this is almost a repetition in its first eight bars of an air in Fra Diavolo; but soon he returns to himself and creates out of his own resources. Most popular, and justly so, are his charming little songs, some of which (Hai lulli, Bergeronette, Chanson du pays and La Captive) have been transcribed in a masterly manner for the piano by Stephen Heller. Reber is what is called an original. He is shy of men, and by his downright way of speaking the truth to people's faces, has earned the name of a Paysan en Danube. His choice does the more honor to the Academy, that he has probably never troubled himself to gain a seat in it.

EMILE PRUDENT has returned to Paris. His last stay in England was quite remarkable. In 30 days he gave 35 concerts in 27 different towns. Six Erard grand pianos were kept crossing and recrossing each other on the different railroads, so that one might be in readiness for each appointment. In one instance this virtuoso gave three concerts in twenty-four hours. Everywhere he found an enthusiastic public.

Joseph Gungl is giving concerts in Berlin with as much popularity as ever.

"Joggeli" is the queer title of a new opera by Taubert, the genial composer of Jenny Lind's "Birdling" song and of good things in many kinds.

THE ROYAL QUEST.

[From "Passion Flowers."]

They tell me, I am shrewd with other men,
With thee I'm slow and difficult of speech;
With others, I may guide the ear of talk,
Thou wing'st it oft to realms beyond my reach.

If other guests should come, I'd deck my hair,
And choose my newest garment from the shelf;
When thou art bidden, I would clothe my heart
With holiest purpose, as for God himself.

For them, I wile the hours with tale or song,
Or web of fancy, fringed with careless rhyme;
But how to find a fitting lay for thee,
Who hast the harmonies of every time?

Oh friend beloved! I sit apart and dumb,
Sometimes in sorrow, oft in joy divine;
My lip will falter, but my prison'd heart
Springs forth to measure its faint pulse with thine.

Thou art to me most like a royal guest,
Whose travels bring him to some lowly roof,
Where simple rustics spread their festal fare,
And, blushing, own it is not good enough.

Bethink thee, then, whene'er thou com'st to me
From high emprise and noble toil to rest,
My thoughts are weak and trivial, matched with thine,
But the poor mansion offers thee its best.

Letters from Abroad.

SHIP GERMANIA, Oct. 1853.

MY DEAR DWIGHT:—You see I am better than my promise, and actually begin a letter on board ship, in the midst of the heaving Atlantic. Not that I have any musical intelligence to send you. The ocean, to be sure, is suggestive of unutterable harmonies—that is, when you are not seasick. Then, the movements, whether adagio or otherwise, are not the most agreeable. But after having been once thoroughly exercised by the ugly fiend of the billows, these same movements become not unpleasant.

Poets, from Homer to Alexander Smith, have sung of the music of the waves and winds. But their songs have usually come from some safe nook in the sea-side rocks, or from the smooth pebbled beach, where the ocean was but an accompaniment to the quick melody of waving trees and grass on the shore. But there is much to be seen and felt far at sea, from a ship under full sail, scudding through the waves, which the dweller on land knows little about.

As I watched the two great planets in the west, the other evening, slowly sinking towards the shoreless horizon, throwing their faint reflections on the heaving water, a fitful and broken melody came to me and sang itself thus:—

The stars are shimmering in the sea,
The wide, wide, heaving sea—
Our friends are gone—the ship sails on,
A speck on the shoreless sea;
And we sit gazing on the west,
The home of all we love the best,
Away o'er the darkening sea.

Away, away, o'er the twilight sea—
The grey, dim, shadowy sea—
The ship speeds on, and we are alone
With the stars of Eternity;
But our thoughts go back and our prayers ascend,
And we pledge each fond and faithful friend,
Away o'er the twilight sea.

There is much material for music and verse on board ship. But the ship must be a good, comfortable, elegant ship; none of your cranky concerns, one half full of water and the other half under water,—all tan and grease and creaky timbers and sailor's oaths. You need large, elegant staterooms, airy cabin, cozy smoking room, good table, wide, clean quarter deck, amiable captain, clean-shirted mate, passengers disposed to friendly contact, some good fellows and agreeable ladies—so much you need as you need house, fire, and clothing—a material basis. Then comes in the æsthetic, intellectual element with a good grace. Then you enjoy with a relish the view of the surging billows from the tilting, rolling deck,—the strong breeze rounding out the immense wing-like sails—the dash of the salt spray against the stalwart sides—the rolling and pitching in your berth at dead of night—as the song has it:

"What matter, what matter!
I can ride and sleep."

Then you enjoy leaning out of the stern-windows as the shadows of night descend, to watch the sparks and corruseations streaming out from under the keel, as if some submarine fire were boiling up under you. Then you go on deck for your before-breakfast promenade, and after peeping at the compass and glancing at the sails to see if we are making our course, watch the sea gulls or the petrels, or the "school" of tumbling porpoises, or if it be calm, the nautilus, and "the hueless mosses under the sea," or haply some distant ship on the level horizon. Spite of its monotony, there is much to be enjoyed on the ocean by the lover of nature.

Here is a Frenchman aboard, who seems to have in his stateroom a whole curiosity-shop. He is musical, for he has a flageolet, a cornet, a violin, and I know not what other instruments. He is piscatory, for he carrieth fish-hooks and lines; he loveth shooting, for to-day he brought out his gun and fired at a sea-gull; he is artistic, for he hath slates and pencils—topographie, for he carrieth large maps—mechanical, for he useth a hammer and other tools—he is a lover of birds, and has about him, parrots, bobolinks and sparrows—and whenever a stray bird lights on the ship, he is sure to catch it. I shall not be surprised, if he brings out a live monkey, or if I learn that he is superintendent of an actual giraffe, stowed away somewhere in the hold.

PARIS, Dec. 11th.—From the cabin of a ship on the Atlantic to Paris—here is something of a grasshopper leap in my correspondence.

I went the other night to the Italian Opera, and heard Mario in I Puritani. Ah, here was something rich and rare. I need not say that his singing was truly delicious. I am sure there can be but one opinion about Mario. In the first place his appearance goes far in his favor—he is tall, graceful, handsome, and a good actor. His voice is by far the most perfect tenor I have ever heard—sweet, rich, delicate, powerful, impassioned, and wonderfully equal in all these qualities throughout his entire compass. Where you hear anything so perfect, you are troubled somewhat that he now and then permits himself to escape out of his natural and legitimate register, and to break into a shrill, feminine, chanticleer-like falsetto. Though only a few notes, they mar the symmetry of his performance. It is like patching a new cloth coat with ladies' silk. Better that he should omit those few upper notes, however flute-like and sweet—and the music would suffer nothing by the omission.

Tamburini I also heard. His name has long been celebrated, and his voice is still fine and sonorous. I was rather disappointed in him, but I should have remembered that he is no longer young.

Madam Frezzolini, the prima donna, seems like a person who has studied hard and accomplished her rôle very creditably. But she sings with effort and excites no enthusiasm.

The Emperor and Empress were present at this Opera, and I had them in full survey the whole evening. I should have known them anywhere from the engraved portraits which one sees in the shop windows.

If during my sojourn here I hear anything good in the way of music, I will send you a note of it—if I have time. Ever yours,

X.

THE TROUBADOUR.

[From the Italian of G. BERTHET.]

Through the forest dreary
Goes the Troubadour alone;
All his gay delights are gone,
His soul is weary.

All that face, so fair before,
Marred with shadow of distress;
That sweet voice of music is
That sweet voice no more.

Long his heart in secret burned;
Till the passion sweet and strong
Found a voice; and in his song
All his spirit yearned.

Shut within his chamber high
Listened to that song his lord;
Ah! the rash, unthinking bard
Dooms himself to die!

But to save the hapless youth
Thrilled the lady's tender heart;
And she pleaded, with no art
But her stainless truth;

Never had she heard his vows;
And her beauty chaste subdued
Swift the rising angry mood
Of her jealous spouse.

Glad the gracious lady smiled
'Neath her husband's proud caress;
But the banished bey must press
Forth into the wild.

Of those dear and fatal eyes
He no more must see the flame,
Nor oblivion draw from them
Of his miseries.

Lone he leaves the halls and mute,
Where he woke the echoes loud
With his martial songs and proud,
With his gladsome lute.

So he goes—he quits the gates—
Gazes on them—holds his breath;
As with rending pangs of death
All his heart dilates.

And he seeks the forest soon,
There he wanders to and fro
Shunning day's intenser glow,
Seeking but the moon.

Fall'n the flowers that bloomed before
On those youthful cheeks of his;
That sweet voice of music is
That sweet voice no more!

W. H. H.

MATTHEW LOCK was originally a chorister in the cathedral church of Exeter, and a pupil of Edward Gibbons. Very early in life he attained a considerable degree of eminence in his profession. He was employed to compose the music for the public entry of King Charles II., and not long afterwards was appointed composer in ordinary to that monarch.

Dramatic music was that in which he chiefly excelled, but there are likewise extant many valuable compositions for the church. Amongst others is the morning service composed for the Chapel Royal, in which the prayer after each of the commandments is set in a different way. This was deemed by many persons an inexcusable innovation, and, on the whole, was so much censured, that he was compelled to publish the entire service in score with a vindication by way of preface.

Lock appears to have been a man of an unpleasant and quarrelsome disposition, and consequently he involved himself in almost continual broils. About the year 1672, he was engaged in a controversy with Thomas Salmon, A. M., of Trinity College, Oxford, on the subject of a book written by him, and entitled "An Essay to the Advancement of Music, by casting away the Perplexity of different Cliffs, and uniting all sorts of music into one universal Character;" Lock could not refrain from attacking this work. Accordingly he published "Observations upon a late Book, entitled an Essay, &c.," which lying immovable upon the booksellers' shelves, he afterwards republished it with a new title. Salmon answered it in "A Vindication of an Essay to the Advancement of Music from Mr. Lock's Observations." The subject matter of this dispute is not of sufficient importance to demand any detail of the arguments; suffice it to say, that, under a studied affectation of wit and humor, the pamphlets, on both sides, are replete with the most scurrilous invective and abuse.

The musical world is indebted to Lock for the first rules that were ever published in England on the subject of thorough bass. A collection of these were inserted in a book entitled "Melothesia," which also contains some lessons for the harpsichord and organ, by himself and other masters. It is well known that Lock was the composer of the music to Shakespeare's plays of "Macbeth" and "The Tempest," as altered by Sir William Davenant, and, in conjunction with Draghi, to Shadwell's opera of "Psyche." He was also author of a collection of airs, published in 1657, entitled "A little Consort of Three Parts, for Viols and Violins," and, of the music to several songs printed in "The Treasury of Music," "The Theatre of Music," and other collections.

The ballad was the favourite dance of the Italians. This word, now used only to designate the words of a peculiar species of song, is derived from the Italian ballare, to dance, and originally signified a dance accompanied by a chant. This dance was probably pantomimic, exhibiting the story of the accompanying verse by that expressive gesticulation in which the Italians of all ages have excelled.

One item of the late foreign news states that Hafis Effendi, a Turkish poet, has written a national hymn in the style of the Marseillaise—a patriotic war-song, of course—which is stimulating the enthusiasm of the Ottoman against the Russians in an extraordinary degree. The Turk has not, heretofore, been supposed to have much of the chanting cherub about him; but all Turkey is now said to be sounding with the strains of the new lyric.

MENDELSSOHN.—In an English journal of the year 1842, we came across the following:—

During a recent tour in Switzerland, the great composer visited an asylum for the blind, in the Canton de Vaud; where, as is usual, he was required to sign his name in the visitor's book. No sooner was the illustrious name made known, than many of the pupils of the establishment, devoted to the study of music, thronged around the master, requesting that their attempts at composition might have the honor and advantage of his supervision. Mendelssohn, with his usual affability, corrected several of these attempts, and commended their authors. He was then unanimously importuned to give them a specimen of his high musical talent, when he seated himself at the organ in the little chapel of the hospital, and improvised for half an hour, introducing the themes of his several blind scholars, in so masterly and effective a style, that the whole party was moved to tears.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 14, 1854.

Jullien's "Shakspeare Night."

Such was the title of the second of these brilliant entertainments. It was a fancy, a notion, certainly, to make up a musical programme of works identified somehow, in name or spirit, with the creations of the great dramatist. And yet such a fancy was interesting for once, especially since Mendelssohn has shown us that there may be music of such kindred inspiration with at least one vein of Shakspeare, that, when once heard, the mind must ever delight to associate the music with the poem. The fairy element of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" certainly did translate itself into music in the exquisite tone-reveries of the boy Felix. We really do not know of any other music that can properly be called Shakspearian, except it be Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," which found no place in M. Jullien's programme. Beethoven, indeed, is the only musician, perhaps the only artist in any sphere, whose genius throughout suggests to us analogy with Shakspeare; and whom, in mansidedness of creative power, never repeating itself, but yielding in each effort a distinct vital product, we could venture to pronounce the equal of the great bard. For Beethoven has produced symphonies as perfect in their kind, yet as unlike each other, as "Hamlet" and the "Merry Wives," or "Lear" and "As you Like it."

But what shall we say of the piece with which this concert opened,—the overture to "King Lear," by Berlioz? In his writings about Art, his letters to his friends, &c., Berlioz seems so genial, so sensible and so appreciative, that we confidently hoped, through the clear and powerful medium of Jullien's orchestra, to find his overture—not, what it seemed to us in some imperfect Musical Fund rehearsals some years since—but really a work worthy of its high pretensions, eccentric as it might be in its forms, and striving to exceed all earlier bounds of instrumentation. In instrumentation it certainly evinces rare power; it is also full of impetus and fire; but impetus of the most impatient, fragmentary and distracted sort, and fire of the most ignis fatuus fitfulness. Its repeated fever crises of brazen fortissimo were enough to unsettle one's brain as badly as the ingratitude of daughters had unsettled Lear's. And this was about the only verisimilitude with Shakspeare's tragedy that we were able to detect. If madness were designed to be the passion-spring and motive of this music, it was altogether the assumed and blustering madness of Mad Tom, poor "Turligood," and had nothing of the poetic, touching quality of the old king's madness, so pathetic and imaginative, where he sits down on the cold ground, in the rain, and says; "Come, let us reason with this philosopher!" It was rather an audacious enterprise, one would think, for any composer less than Beethoven to essay such a theme!—But the overture at least served to show forth the brilliant qualities of Jullien's band; the massive unison of his great double basses in the opening measures; the promptness, splendor and precision of his always true and justly blended brass instruments; the fine and nervous outline of his violin passages; and the warm coloring and graceful flow of reed and flute tones in their turn.

The entire "Midsummer Night's Dream" music of Mendelssohn, so far as orchestra without voices could suffice (and that included all the essential features), followed next. The music is too familiar to require notice on its own account. It was played richly, splendidly:—but we are obliged to confess, it was played noisily, roughly, stunningly, in the forte passages of the overture and wedding march—or else we, in the first end gallery opposite the stage, were placed in the very focus of all the explosive din and echo of trombones and drums. When Jullien has played this music before, we have not felt this in anything like the same degree; but now we missed the fine and delicate beauty, the soft and dreamy pianissimos, the light and shade, which we must ever associate with this exquisite music. The comic march, however, of Bottom and associates was laughably effective.

The rest (of the Shakspearian portion) was old English music. Mlle ZERR sang Dr. Arne's "Where the Bee sucks," &c., from "The Tempest," a sprightly, pleasant trifle, with bits of symphony that are strikingly in Handel's manner. Old Matthew Lock's music to "Macbeth," was given entire, in orchestral arrangement, the ophicleide, bassoon and oboe doing good execution in the wild witch melodies. There is something grand and wholesome about much of this old music, although it is rather monotonously kept in one key throughout many movements, and shows but a tame conception of the supernatural, compared with the modern German music which is so native to that element. It was a curious piece of musical rococo, however, which made up in historical, whatever it might lack in intrinsic interest. And Jullien, without voices, without witches, and without cauldrons (save his kettle drums), gave us a far clearer and bolder conception of the famous old thing than we ever had before.—So much for Shakspeare.

Part Second of the programme was almost purely Jullien, and included two of his very happiest productions in very different veins. First (for the thirteenth time in America), came the most brilliant, masterly and thoroughly Jullienesque of all his grand effect pieces, the "Great Exhibition Quadrille." We find it so happily hit off by the accomplished critic of the Courier and Enquirer, that in lieu of attempting a description of our own, we insert his:

"Who has not heard it has not heard Jullien. For richness and variety it is unequalled by any pot pourri that we remember. The mastery of the orchestra and the power to combine musical sounds effectively with sounds which are mere noise, displayed in it, indicate a genius for instrumentation, an intuitive knowledge of the capacities and relations of all vibrating bodies, from sticks, stones, and brass kettles to violins, which truly borders on the marvellous. One of the most pleasing and original effects in the composition was produced by the use of the fagotto in the cadences of the Spanish Zapateado. It was indescribably quaint and grotesque, and yet seemed so germane to the theme that the idea of its remarkable originality did not obtrude itself upon the mind until after a moment's reflection. The finale of this Quadrille shows Monsieur Jullien in his glory. It is introduced by a terrible clangor of an army of drums, which gradually diminishes, and finally dies away into an almost inaudible pulsation—in which, however, every parchment vibrates. After this, a few bars from the cornet and the stringed instruments are interrupted or rather overwhelmed by the roar of voices which finally break into a cheer, and God save the Queen bursts from the band. It is played in the midst of a din which passes description. Bells ringing, apparently out of time and out of tune, cannon booming, and an inexplicable confused clash and roar made by one knows not what, and coming one knows not whence, convey the impression of a vast metropolis thronged with a jubilant multitude; and in the midst of this, and towering over it, is heard the English National Anthem. Were all London agog, its chimes ringing, salutes firing, and all its musicians uniting with all their hearts in God save the Queen, an audience, suspended in mid-air over the city, would hear very much such a combination of sounds as becomes harmonious under the baton of Monsieur Jullien in the splendid finale to this Great Exhibition Quadrille."

All that was wanting to the full effect in this instance was a crowded audience, so essential always to the glory of the Jullien music, which is calculated to that end. The other piece was his "Katydid Polka," which still revives the pleasant sense of summer nights in Castle Garden. "Irish Quadrilles," an Italian song by the ZERR, a clarinet solo by WILLE, &c., made the balance of the entertainment.

Sixth Germania Concert.

Come, let us worship once more at the true shrine! The SYMPHONY BY SCHUBERT! It is called the Symphony in C, because, though a dozen symphonies have been discovered in the careless heap of MS. remains of that inspired young genius, this alone has yet attained to print or public hearing. It was first introduced to a Boston audience a year ago last autumn by the little orchestra conducted by Mr. SUCK, and was more effectually repeated in the following winter once by the Germanians. We think the majority of hearers (or rather, sitters and bystanders) at that time voted it a very long Symphony. Many also found it wild and strange, and even owned that there were fine things in it. A few were charmed and borne along upon its full rushing tide of deep and tender inspiration, not once thinking of the length, till disappointed that the spell was over. We briefly noted then our own conviction of its beauty, its artistic and poetic worth; alluding to the solemn introductory Andante, opening with an old church-like strain intoned by the French horn solo; the fire and strength of the Allegro; the oft-returning lovely theme of the Andante; and the rich surprises of continually new and exquisite ideas in the Scherzo and Finale. All this we felt with ten-fold certainty and joy last Saturday night. The entire Symphony was admirably rendered, so that every point was clear and all the features blended in the warm and true expression of the whole. Then we thought that, after Beethoven, we never had heard a symphony so beautiful, so thoroughly inspired, so wonderful. In abundance of ideas, new and fascinating, it seems even to exceed anything of Mendelssohn, though not perhaps in the working up. The mind is haunted by the lovely, perfectly original, pregnant and yet very simple main theme of the Andante. No wonder it returns upon us so often, and in so many happy combinations, before the composer is willing to dismiss it! He was in love with this exquisite God-send, and did his best—how reverently and how effectively!—to make us love it! He never heard his symphony, save in the mind's ear, as he wrote it down! There it lay, like refuse, in the old heap of manuscripts, till ten years after his death Schumann and Mendelssohn found it, recognized it, and gave it to the world. The Scherzo was shortened by the non-repetition of the strains; but they too were ideas worth repeating, and which one would prize an opportunity of fixing in his memory more indelibly. The Finale, Allegro Vivace, was a perpetual series of exquisite surprises; new melodic thoughts, in admirably managed contrast, kept continually announcing themselves in ways most appetizing and irresistible. By skilful preparation of harmony and instrumental coloring these dainty themes spread, as it were, each its own magical halo before it, as it came, and expectation every time was fully, doubly satisfied. The attentive, interested look of the whole audience was quite remarkable throughout the symphony, and merited, we do believe, another opportunity of hearing it and of appreciating it still better.

The piano-playing of Mr. ROBERT HELLER, (a name that has magical associations), seemed to take well with the audience. He has a neat, clear touch, and facile, tasteful execution; but it was rather a senseless hodge-podge that he treated us to, under the promise of "selections from Mendelssohn, Chopin, Thalberg, &c." There was no Chopin about it. He began with that bright and dainty little Lied of Mendelssohn's, called sometimes "Spring Song," which served him only as a prelude to variations on the hack-nied Donizetti serenade: "O, summer night." The encore produced nothing better. Mr. ARTHUR TOMMAS performed a fantasia from Semiramide upon the harp, in masterly style, wisely declining to respond to the vociferous encore of the thoughtless ones, who seek to prolong the present course of sweetmeats, without considering its effect on the whole bill of fare.

Gade's overture, Nachklänge aus Ossian, was less striking to us than it was before we knew Gade better. It has a decided individuality, entirely in harmony with such a subject as the wild, misty, sea-shore dreaminess, and old warrior minstrelsy of Ossian, and is a work of power and beauty. But it is just the individuality of all that we have heard from Gade: he appears to write ever in that one vein. The harp had less to do in it than we had fancied; but that little, especially in those cool and humid arpeggios that mingled with the opening and closing chords, lent quite a poetic coloring.

Mr. Bergmann's Trio for two horns and bassoon, had a quaint, sombre and scholastic sound, with a sort of contrapuntal fascination about it, and exhibited to good advantage the instruments and tasteful execution of Herren KÜSTENMACHER, PLAGEMANN and HUNSTOCK. The remainder of the programme was light and varied: a good flute solo (good as such things ever need be) composed and executed by the tasteful CARL ZERRAHN; an orchestral Polonaise Concertante, by Wittmann (a very pleasing and euphonious thing that, in which almost every instrument ran out in turn in its little stream of solo; the Dance des Fées, of Alvars, deliciously played by Mr. ARTHUR TOMMAS; and finally the overture to the "Siege of Corinth," decidedly one of Rossini's best.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.—Thursday completed the brief nightly series of brilliant musical feux de joie, vouchsafed to us this time. They were all essentially of the same character as those we had in Jullien's first visit, and the programmes made up mostly of the same materials. With the exception of the "Shakspeare Night," these programmes have been almost exclusively of the light and miscellaneous order, the "American" and "Exhibition" Quadrilles forming alternately, or combinedly, the grand features. Of course there is nothing to be said of them, that has not already been said by ourselves and everybody else that writes of these things; except that the orchestra has played as splendidly as ever, that "Yankee Doodle" and "Hail Columbia" still bring the crowd upon their feet, that Koenig, and Wuille, and Lavigne, and Hughes, and Collinet, and the Mollinhausers, and above all, Bottesini, have not yet exhausted admiration by their wonderful solos, &c., &c. Only it is a pity that they will still keep playing the same solos, and that the "Carnival of Venice" still takes it upon itself to answer all encores, a nimble Proteus of all shapes, from Liliputian flageolet to giant double bass!

To the full glory of Jullien music a crowded hall is necessary. And that we had in overflowing measure at the benefit of Jullien, Wednesday night. Jullien's benefit is a sure signal for a monster gathering; and this time, sympathy for his losses by the burning of Metropolitan Hall in New York, (which swept away the labors of twenty years, in the shape of nearly all his MS. compositions, which are irrecoverable, and not to be estimated at any money price) probably added its might to old attractions of the favorite. It was a sight indeed to one entering, as we did, just far enough to peep down from the top gallery corner, over those delighted human masses; the old quadrilles and polkas became new in the fresh multiplying mirror of so many responsive faces; we never saw a more happy and enthusiastic looking audience; music and multitude were mutually glorifying.

On Thursday night the great feature of the concert was Mr. Fry's "Santa Claus" Symphony. It is a most ingenious, original, effective, entertaining production. The curious professions of the verbal key to it, upon the back of the programme, really seemed to be made good in the music, if one carefully followed it. Marvellous effects of instrumentation are produced, and the imitative and description parts of it are often very admirable. But it taxes all the resources of a Jullien orchestra to render them. It presents too many points for notice in our present abridged space, and we shall perhaps return to it again.—The Freyschütz overture, and the Andante to the C minor Symphony—those two first entering wedges in our orchestro-musical culture here in Boston—were played with great breadth and grandeur of effect, and plainly made their mark upon the audience.

THE SYMPHONY SOIREES. That noble plan of the Germanians, we are sorry to say, is proved to have been brought forward too late in the season. Our music-lovers are already too much preoccupied with multitudes of musical and other engagements. But the plan is yet good for another year, and doubtless will be realized more gloriously than it could be now, after the Germanians shall have returned from their summer visit to the Fatherland, where they are longing to rekindle their true German Art enthusiasm at the perennial shrines.

Mlle GABRIELLE DE LA MOTTE.—We listened with pleasure, at her recent private soiree in the Chickering rooms, to the performance of this accomplished young pianiste, who comes among us as a teacher, after enjoying the instructions of Liszt, Prudent, and other great European masters. Both in the brilliant fantasia style, as Liszt's Lucia and Patineurs, and in the classical, as a Mendelssohn Capriccio, and one of the earlier sonatas of Beethoven, she proved herself an excellent pianist, in the opinion of a numerous and cultivated audience that evening. Of Mlle de la Motte, as a teacher, the Transcript says:

To a brilliant execution she adds a thorough acquaintance with the scientific theory of music, a refined taste, and a rare and happy faculty of imparting her knowledge and enthusiasm to her pupils.

Mlle. La Motte has tested the soundness of the system of class instruction adopted by the musical conservatoires of Italy, France and Germany, in which, to say nothing of the economy of time and money, the spirit of emulation has been found to work marvels in the development of talent among the pupils. Experience has shown that where two pupils receive instruction together, their progress is far more rapid and secure than that of two pupils receiving individual attention. And when considerable progress has been made, the advantages of two playing together, with a frequent alternation of parts, are too apparent and decided to require discussion.

Mlle. De La Motte aims at imparting brilliant execution combined with expression, and to develop that fine sense which enables the performer to discriminate between the ideas of the great artists—between Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Prudent, Thalberg, and Liszt. The advent of a teacher with so high a conception of her profession and of art, cannot but be hailed as an important event by our music-loving community.

Mlle de la Motte has been advised to give a series of four Musical Soirees in the rooms of Messrs. Chickering, where a list is open for subscribers. We trust that she will find a remunerative and appreciating audience.

"MUSICAL LETTERS FROM ABROAD." By LOWELL MASON.—Such is the title of a beautifully printed and bound duodecimo, of 300 pages, published by Mason Brothers, New York. These letters were written home by Mr. Mason, during a musical tour in Europe between January 1852 and April 1853. They originally appeared chiefly in the musical papers of New York, in the Boston Traveller, and some few of them in this journal. It was a good thought to gather them together in a permanent form. For they are full of interest, and contain graphic, simple and straight-forward records of what the author saw and thought and felt, among the most famous musical men and schools and festivals of Germany and England. Especially complete and life-like are his descriptions of the Birmingham, Norwich and Dusseldorf Musical Festivals of 1852. Of course our great mass teacher had an especial eye to the educational provisions for music, and to whatever could be learned respecting Psalmody and Sacred Music generally. Yet his perceptions are generally clear, and his conclusions shrewd and to the point in other fields of musical interest as well as these. Every friend of music would do well to have a copy.

THE "NEW YORK MUSICAL REVIEW & CHORAL ADVOCATE," published by Mason Brothers, comes to us in a new and greatly improved form. It is now issued fortnightly, instead of monthly. It discards the old pictorial title page, and presents itself in sixteen pages of a plain and decent English looking garb. The first four pages are filled with original music, Glories, Psalms and Sentences, by Lowell Mason, Hastings, Bradbury and other popular writers and arrangers. The reading matter is greatly improved and presents in this first number truly a rich variety of well written or selected matter. The criticisms are sound, and the summaries of musical doings in Boston and many other places besides New York, quite full and faithful. Among other matters we are pleased to find in it a commendatory notice of the article in our journal about the self-styled "Pupils of Liszt and Mendelssohn," from which we copy and endorse the following:

"In the course of further very just remarks in the article in Dwight's Journal, to which we have alluded, we find the following:

As the good is always more scarce than the bad, Germany numbers also many more bad than good musicians; and unfortunately, she likes to send the worst ones to America, and keep the best ones herself!

"This we heartily endorse. American art and artists have suffered much from the men here alluded to. They are that class of foreigners who, coming among us because they had not the ability or knowledge to sustain themselves at home, delight in sneering at everything musical which is American. American composers, or teachers, or singers, they are in the habit of abusing on all possible occasions. These are they who are fond of deriding the 'Yankee Psalm-singers,' and 'Down-east Singing-masters,' as they term American musicians.

"It is unfortunate that we in America have great musical reverence for a mustache and a foreign accent. Having been accustomed (very justly) to regard Germany as that country which has made the highest musical progress, and given to the world the greatest masters of this science, we have made the foolish mistake of thinking every German must be a good musician! As if a diet on sour krout and German sausages must necessarily result in musical proficiency!

"A brighter day is dawning, however. We are beginning to discover, that the mere fact that a man is a German does not necessarily make him a musician. American teachers, who add to a sufficient musical knowledge, that common sense which enables them to impart it to others, are beginning to be appreciated, and to rank in the estimation of the people more nearly as they should, while, as a consequence, those foreigners whose chief qualifications have been high pretensions and impudence, are beginning to be properly appreciated also.

"Now, let us not be misunderstood, (misrepresented we expect to be,) as taking ground against German music and musicians. Germany has given us the great masters, who stand far above all others. Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, are names in reverence of which we yield to none. Their works are those which we would counsel all to study and look up to as the great models of musical excellence. We have also many German musicians among us, gentlemen of real ability and knowledge, who are exerting a most beneficial influence, and accomplishing a great work, and whom we delight to honor. It is these others who are mere pretenders, and by whom we have been so much imposed upon, that we take exceptions to; and it is these who are loudest in their sneers and abuse of American music."

The "Review" retains its able editor, Mr. C. M. CADY, with the corresponding editors of the last year, besides three other gentlemen, whose names it does not mention.

This publication has reached the fifth year since its commencement.

"ACOUSTIC ARCHITECTURE, or the Construction of Buildings with reference to Sound," by J. B. UPHAM, M. D. Printed in New Haven. This little volume, of some fifty pages, now reprinted from Silliman's American Journal of Arts and Sciences, is an expansion of the able and instructive series of articles which appeared last year in our own Journal. Probably no writer has studied the subject so thoroughly and philosophically as Dr. Upham; and now that the world is so interested in the building of good music halls, the light he sheds upon a hitherto dark problem should be indispensable to architects and building committees, as well as to all who take a scientific interest in music. These papers were certainly too valuable not to be collected and completed in such form of permanence.

CONCERTS AT HAND.—To-night the GERMANIANS offer us a most attractive extra Concert. Felicien David's Ode-symphony, "The Desert," a work of great celebrity, will be presented entire, with the aid of the well-drilled chorus of the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY, and of Sig. CAMOENZ in the solos. Such an opportunity has never before offered itself. Besides this, we are to hear again the glorious Tannhäuser overture, the great rain chorus from "Elijah," the harp of APTOMMAS and other brilliant things.

On Tuesday night the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB will repeat the great Quartet in F of Beethoven. Also Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, and the Quartet in D, of Mendelssohn.

MR. ARTHURSON requests us to state that his Concert is unavoidably postponed until further notice.

Musical Intelligence.

PARIS, 4th Dec.—At the Academie Imperiale de Musique laocita and the accomplished Rosati have again this week been the attractions. The ballet has been given twice with Le Comte Ory, and once with Le Maître Chanteur. The charming danseuse will remain with us till the 10th. At the Opera Comique Le Nabab, Haydée, Marco Spada, Collette, Le Pere Gaillard, and L'Ombre d'Argentine have been played, assisted with Sainte Foix, and Mlle. Lemercier. Every time that the Mousquetaires de la Reine is played, the part of Captain Roland procures for Herman Leon a new and legitimate success. The Emperor and Empress attended the representation of I Puritani on Thursday. Mario sang divinely. It is announced that Pacini has been writing a new opera for the Theatre Italien, entitled La Cantatrice di Madrid, which will most probably be produced during the present season. The director of the Theatre Lyrique, M. Jules Seveste, has just accepted an opera in four acts, the libretto by M. Henri Trianon, and the music by M. Georges Bousquet, author of Tabarin, which had but mediocre success last year. The distribution of the prizes at the Conservatoire Impériale of music and declamations, will take place on Sunday next, the 11th inst. They will be presented by the Minister of State. The following is the programme of the concert to be given for the benefit of the "incendiés" of the 7th arrondissement, in the Salle Sainte Cecile this day, by the Societe de la Grande Harmonie, organized by Adolphe Saxe:—

- I.
1. Overture Carnaval romain,.....Berlioz.
2. Fantaisie pour orchestre sur Giralda,.....Adam.
3. Air la Favorite,.....Mlle Wertheimer.
4. Duo piano et violoncelle,.....MM. Norblin et Brisson.
5. La Marche aux flambeaux,.....Meyerbeer.

- II.
1. Overture, Zampa,.....Hérold.
2. Romance Carillon de Bruges,.....Mlle Wertheimer.
3. Solo, piano,.....M. Brisson.
4. Air varié, orchestre avec soli,.....M. Mohr.
5. Benediction des pagnards, Huguenots, Director of the Orchestra, M. Mohr.

The Marche aux flambeaux was composed by Meyerbeer on the occasion of the betrothing of a princess of Prussia. The composition of this kind of morceau belongs to a ceremony of the middle ages, and is still observed in the German Courts. On the day of the betrothing of a prince or princess royal, it is the custom for each of the betrothed, with torch in hand, to make the tour of the salon several times, and to pass before the sovereign; the prince giving his hand to a lady, and the princess hers to a gentleman of the Court. All the guests follow the betrothed, who change partners each time until all present have walked round the room with them. The march is always written in 3-4 time. It is a slow movement in the style of a polonaise, and scored for a military band. We hear that Mlle. Closs has made a great hit at the London Wednesday Evening Concerts, held in Exeter Hall, in Mendelssohn's first concerto, and that she delayed her departure to play the same concerto again. We are in expectation of seeing her daily in Paris, en route to St. Petersburg. She has already announced a concert to be given here, in the Salle Herz. She is to play the violoncello sonata, in B flat, of Mendelssohn, with M. Seligmann; a prelude of Stephen Heller, some lieder ohne worte by Mendelssohn, an impromptu by Chopin, a sonata by Beethoven, and Le roi des Aulnes (the Erl King), by Stephen Heller.—M. Briard, the young violinist "Laureat" of the Conservatoire, formerly a pupil of Baillot, has returned to Paris.—The sisters, Sophie and Bella Dulcken, have obtained success in Paris, one on the pianoforte, and the other on the new instrument called concertina.—M. Knster, a violinist, and dramatic composer, is now in Paris. M. Emile Steinkuhler, a composer, has received from the Emperor a gold medal, as a mark of satisfaction for the Marche Imperiale which he composed, and which was executed during his Majesty's stay at Lille.

BERLIN.—The new opera by M. Flotow Rabezahl, will be brought out this month.—Vieuxtemps is expected in January, when it is expected he will give a series of concerts.—For the fete of the Queen, the Theatre Royal gave Gluck's Armida. On the same occasion, a concert was given at the Theatre of Potsdam under the direction of the pianist to the Court, M. Theodore Kullak. Among other things, a duet from La Reine de Chypre, of Halevy, was executed; Parish Alvars' Danse des Fées, for the Harp; some lieder by the Princess Charlotte of Meiningen and Theodore Kullak. Among the executants were Mlle. Johanna Wagner, M. Adolphe Formes and Solomon, Mlle. Alvars, and M. Theodore Kullak. From the 20th to the 27th Nov., the Theatre Royal played the Huguenots, the Prophete, and Don Juan.

Sung by Signor CAMOENZ.

PART II.

THE DESERT.

This splendid master-work of F. David has been in rehearsal ever since the return of the Germanians to Boston, and they flatter themselves that the true and perfect rendering of this Symphony is well worthy the liberal patronage of Boston's musical inhabitants. The expenses for preparation being unusually high, they solicit a large attendance. A Descriptive Programme will be for distribution in all the Music Stores from Thursday morning, and the Germanians would call particularly attention to this highly interesting description. A numerously augmented Orchestra being needed for the performance of the "Desert," they will, at the beginning of the Concert, repeat Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser," to answer the many requests of their appreciating patrons.

Tickets 50 Cents each, for sale from Thursday morning, at all the usual places.

No Subscription tickets admitted.

Doors open at 6½. Concert to commence at 7½.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The best works on Piano Instruction existing.

IN PRESS:—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO-FORTE, translated from the latest and most approved German Edition, by G. A. SCHMITT.
Also JUL. KNORR'S REVISED EDITION OF A. E. MULLER'S METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.

The above works are in reality the most complete, elaborate, and, at the same time, condensed works on the subject of which they treat. They contain Studies and Examples which will lead the scholar to a mastery of all the modern achievements of the Art; and are, in the opinion of leading German critics, the best books on musical instruction extant. The GUIDE is not only a key to the succeeding work, but contains a list of over two hundred pieces, by the first masters, in progressive order, with notes of advice to the teacher, showing how they might be best practised for the advancement of the pupil.

The COMPLETE METHOD contains many suggestions of the greatest importance to Teachers and Pupils that have not been mentioned in any other book of instruction.

These exceedingly valuable works are in press, and will be ready at an early date. OLIVER DITSON, Boston.

PUBLIC REHEARSALS.

THE GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY will give PUBLIC REHEARSALS at the Boston Music Hall every WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, at 3 o'clock, commencing Oct. 26.

The full Orchestra will perform at the Rehearsals.

MUSIC! MUSIC!! MUSIC!!!

IT IS NOW AN ESTABLISHED AND CONFIRMED FACT
THAT THE

Modern School for the Piano-Forte

IS BY FAR THE MOST INGENIOUS, SIMPLE, PROGRESSIVE AND COMPREHENSIVE METHOD FOR THE PIANO THAT HAS EVER BEEN PRESENTED TO THE PUBLIC,—embracing a complete system, from the very outset to the highest classical music.

The anatomy of the hands is shown by beautifully colored plates. The entire work surpasses all previous musical publications, as regards mechanical appearance and elegance.

The author, NATHAN RICHARDSON, has spent the last five years in Europe for the sole purpose of getting up an Instruction Book, which would embrace the styles and effective Exercises of ALL distinguished Pianists and Teachers. To accomplish that object, he was assisted by

EIGHTEEN EMINENT EUROPEAN PIANISTS.

The result has been, an Instruction Book so comprehensive and ingenious, that a pupil will acquire the styles and mechanical difficulties of all celebrated Pianists, and that, too, with far less labor and practice than is usually required to learn an ordinary composition, under the old methods.

It is not an abridgement, neither is it an old work translated, revised, and remodeled. It is a work which is entirely new throughout, and is thoroughly adapted to our wants. It has been examined and admitted to be the best Instruction Book ever published in America, by the following distinguished Professors, Pianists and Teachers, who have given us the most complimentary recommendations, which have already appeared before the public.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Beethoven and his Three Styles.

BY M. W. DE LENZ.

[From the French of HECTOR BÉLIOTZ.]

Here is a book, full of interest for the musician. It is written under the influence of an admiring passion, which its subject explains and justifies; but the author, nevertheless, preserves his liberty of thought—very rare among critics—which permits him to control his admiration, to blame at times, and to recognize the spots upon his sun.

Mr. de Lenz is a Russian, as is also Mr. Oulibicheff, the author of the biography of Mozart. Let us remark, en passant, that among the serious works of musical criticism published within the last five years, two have come to us from Russia.

I shall have much to praise in the work of Mr. de Lenz; therefore I would first of all consider the reproaches which he seems to have incurred in the preparation of his book. The first bears upon the manifold German citations which bristle in the text. Why not translate these fragments into French, since all the rest is in the French language? Mr. de Lenz, as a Russian, must necessarily speak a great number of languages, known and unknown; he probably said to himself: Who does not speak German? as that banker who remarked: Who has not a million? Alas! we Frenchmen do not speak German, who have so much difficulty, and who so rarely succeed in learning our own language. Therefore it is very unpleasant to us to peruse with a feverish interest the pages of a book, to fall at every moment into such pitfalls as this: Beethoven, addressing Mr. Rellstab, said: "Opfern, wie don Juan und Figaro, konnte ich nicht componiren. Dagegen habe ich einen Widerwillen." Very good! But, after all, what did Beethoven say? I should like to know. This is very annoying. And this quotation is even ill-selected, for the author, for once, gives himself the trouble to translate it, which he by no means does for a thousand other words, phrases, narratives, and documents, of which it is doubtless important for the reader to know the import. I like quite as well the mode of Shakespeare, in Henry IV., where, instead of a reply of a Welch woman to her husband, an Englishman, these words are substituted in a parenthesis: "(Glendower speaks to her in Welch, and she answers him in the same.)"

My second reproach bears upon an opinion emitted by the author with regard to Mendelssohn; an opinion already advanced by other critics, the motives of which I beg Mr. de Lenz's permission to argue with him.

He says: "We cannot speak of modern music without mentioning Mendelssohn Bartholdy.... We share with all the respect which a mind of his stamp commands; but we believe that the Hebrew element, with which the mind of Mendelssohn is imbued, will prevent his music from becoming the acquisition of the whole world, without distinction of time or place."

Is there not a little of prejudice in this manner of appreciating this great composer? and would

Mr. de Lenz have written these lines had he been ignorant of the descent of Paul and Elijah from the celebrated Israelite, Moses Mendelssohn? I hardly think it. "The harmony of the synagogue," says he again, "is a type easily to be traced in the music of Mendelssohn." Now, it is difficult to conceive how the psalmody of the synagogue could have acted upon the music of Felix Mendelssohn; for he never professed the Jewish religion: we all know on the contrary that he was a Lutheran, and a fervent and convinced Lutheran.

Moreover, what music is there which can ever become the acquisition of the whole world, without distinction of time or place? None, assuredly. The works of the great German masters, such as Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, who all belonged to the Catholic religion, that is to say, the universal religion, admirably beautiful, living, sound and powerful as they are, will never attain to this, any sooner than those of others.

Setting aside this question of Judaism, which seems to be broached unfittingly, the musical stamp of Felix Mendelssohn, the nature of his mind, his filial love for Handel and Bach, the education that he received from Zelter, his rather exclusive sympathies for German life and the German home, his exquisite sentimentality, his tendency to shut himself up within the circle of ideas of a given city and public, are all appreciated by Mr. de Lenz with much penetration and cunning. From the comparison which, in the same chapter, he establishes between Weber, Mendelssohn, and Beethoven, he draws also conclusions which seem to me just and to the point. He ventures also to make very sensible remarks upon the fugue, and the fugued style, and their real musical importance; on the use made of them by the true masters; and on the ridiculous use made of them by those musicians of whom this style is the constant preoccupation. He quotes, to support this theory, the remarks of a consummate contrapuntist, who has passed his life in the fugue, and who might have found more than one good reason for discovering therein the sole means of salvation in music, but who loved truth better. He says: It is a too honorable exception of the exclusive ideas of Art, that we should not do the reader" (who understands German) "the service to reproduce these remarks for him. We read in an article by Mr. Fuchs of St. Petersburg: 'Die Fuge, als ein für sich abgeschlossenes Music-stück,' etc., etc." (He speaks Welch.)

Well, look ye! I would give much to know at once, what Mr. Fuchs has written about this, and I am doomed to be disappointed.

After having established very ingenious comparisons between Beethoven and the great German masters, his predecessors and contemporaries, Mr. de Lenz gives himself up to the study of the character of his hero, to the analysis of his works, and finally to the appreciation of the distinctive qualities of the three styles in which Beethoven wrote.

This task was difficult; and we cannot but praise the manner in which the author has accomplished it. It is impossible to enter more fully into the spirit of these marvellous musical poems; to more completely embrace the whole, and the details: to follow with more vigor the impetuous eagle flights; to see more clearly when he soars aloft, or sinks earthward; and to say all this with more frankness. In my opinion, Mr. de Lenz has, in this respect, a double advantage over Mr. Oulibicheff. He renders full justice to Mozart. Mr. Oulibicheff is far from doing the same with Beethoven. Mr. de Lenz acknowledges, without hesitation, that divers pieces of Beethoven's composition, such as the overture to the Ruins of Athens, and certain portions of his piano sonatas are feeble, and little worthy of him; that other compositions, little known, in fact, are absolutely devoid of ideas, and that two or three are monstrous logogriffs. On the contrary, M. Oulibicheff admires all in Mozart. And Heaven knows if the glory of the author of "Don Juan" would have suffered by the destruction of many of the compositions of his youth, which have most impudently been published! Mr. Oulibicheff would clear all away from around Mozart; he seems to suffer impatiently any talk of other masters. Mr. de Lenz is filled with a true enthusiasm for all fine manifestations of the Art; and his passion for Beethoven, though it be not a blind one, is, perhaps, more profound and more living than that of his rival for Mozart.

His indefatigable researches during a period of twenty years, throughout all Europe, have caused him to acquire many curious notions, not generally known, of Beethoven and his works. Several of the anecdotes which he relates have this importance, that they tend to explain the musical anomalies scattered throughout the productions of the great composer, to account for which all attempts have hitherto been fruitless.

Beethoven, we know, professed a robust admiration for those grim-visaged masters, whom Mr. de Lenz mentions, who made, in music, an exclusive use of that purely rational element of human thought, which it is impossible to substitute for grace. Do we know the tendency and extent of his admiration? I doubt it. It recalls slightly, to my sense, the taste of those rich gastronomists, who weary with their Lucullan banquets, were pleased, at times, to break their fast with a red-herring and a buckwheat cake.

Crystal Palace Grand Organ, (London.)

(From the Preliminary Report of the Directors.)

Having carefully viewed the building, the Committee unanimously recommend the eastern extremity of the transept as the best position for the instrument, supposing it to be placed in the building, and they have prepared the scheme of such an Organ as they think will be of sufficient power and comprehensiveness.

In this scheme they have included all the modern improvements in the Organ; and for the reasons above mentioned, have employed a much larger proportion of reed stops and large pipes than has usually been thought necessary. They have also inserted two stops, commencing with pipes of 64 feet, speaking-length.

Hitherto, the longest pipe employed has been thirty-two feet, sounding two octaves below the lowest note of a violoncello.

The magnitude of this Organ is necessarily very great. The rough drawings which have been prepared for the guidance of the Committee, show that it will occupy an area of 5,400 feet, so that supposing it to be placed at the end of the transept, and to extend from one gallery to the other in width, its depth will be about 50 feet, and its altitude may be about 140 from the ground.

The internal structure of such an instrument is divided into stories, like a house, for the convenient support of the sound-boards and pipes. In the present case, the feeders of the bellows must be moved by a small steam-engine, and this, together with the feeders, should be disposed in an underground apartment beneath the organ.

The space beneath the first floor of the organ may thus be entirely disengaged, being only occupied by the pillars required for the support of the organ, and by the wind-trunks.

This portion of the structure should be constructed substantially of stone, iron, or brick, and open on all sides with arches, and will thus form a part of the area of the transept. The pillars may be made hollow so as also to serve for wind-trunks, &c.

The front of the Organ must be, as usual, an ornamental frame containing a select arrangement of pipes, and for the designing of this part, the Committee request that an Architect be appointed to confer with them.

In this form the large pipes will necessarily form a prominent and novel feature, from their unusual magnitude. The whole should be designed in a style to correspond in lightness and transparency with the general forms of the surrounding architecture.

The interior of the Organ should be symmetrically arranged, and in such a manner as to show as many of the pipes as possible at one view. The sides and back of the Organ may be constructed, in a great measure, if not wholly, of iron frame-work and glass, and thus spectators in the galleries will be enabled to inspect the interior, and to see the mechanism in action.

It is not advisable to admit visitors in general to the interior of the Organ, because its mechanism and pipes are very liable to derangement; but these must be arranged with every convenience for accessibility, for the purpose of tuning or inspecting the mechanism.

In the present stage of the proceedings any attempt to convey a description of the instrument which it is proposed to erect, so as to enable a just conception of its structure to be formed, would be very premature, inasmuch as the Committee—waiting the sanction of the Directors to their general plan above explained, and the appointment of a builder for the organ, and an architect,—have not yet proceeded to work out the design of the organ in its details. They can only state that their object is to produce an instrument vast in its compass, gigantic, though graceful, in its structure, and so wonderfully deep and various in its tones, as to place it on a vantage ground above all others, and thus hold out a rational expectation that it will at once be unique and noble.

Nor is it unimportant, in a pecuniary point of view, to observe that it will probably, on completion, become highly remunerative. It is stated on good authority, that the Apollonicon realized upwards of £40,000 in a few years, which leads to the belief that the Crystal Palace Organ, would be an excellent investment.

It has been shown to your Committee by those well informed on such matters, that celebrated organs have for many years past brought, when sold, as much as they originally cost. It is said that the Haarlem Organ, which cost £10,000, is worth more than that sum, and so with many others.

It is necessary to state, for the information of the Directors, that an organ of the scale required will absorb a sum of £25,000, or more. A detailed estimate, of course, cannot be prepared until exact working drawings and specifications of the proposed instrument have been made. Its construction will probably extend over three years at least; and if carried on with the desirable rapidity, the sums required in the successive years will be, £8,000, £5,000, and £5,000, respectively.

A New "Jupiter" among Symphonies.

To the Editor of the Journal of Music.

MY DEAR SIR:—As many of your readers have never seen a full and impartial description of Herr Löstiswitz's pictorial Symphony, I take the liberty of sending you an account of the performance by an ear witness.

Musical expression has certainly made great progress during the present century, but a triumph so wonderfully complete as the one here described, it is almost impossible to conceive.

Your readers will certainly arrive at the conclusion that there is no limit to the power of descriptive music.

BERLIN, APRIL 1st.

DEAR FRIEND:—I cannot forbear writing to you to express my deep regret at your departure from Berlin before the production of Herr Löstiswitz's pictorial Symphony. The rumors which had prevailed for some time amongst the dilettanti respecting this stupendous work of modern art-genius had already raised the minds of every class of the community in Berlin to the highest point of expectation, and led to the belief that a musical crisis was at hand, pregnant with results of the deepest consequence to æsthetical philosophy. But great as was the expectation formed by the public, it was surpassed by the reality, and a perfect fever of enthusiasm pervades the town at the moment of my sitting down to record this recent but ever memorable event in the history of sound-craft.

You may remember that the subject chosen by the gifted artist, is by no means one affording the ordinary broad points of imitation more especially demanded by the drama of sound. It is based upon the incidents of every day life, borrowing nothing from the rich sources of passion, the inspiration of romance, or the suggestive charms of a poetical existence. The present effort has been made (how successfully all Berlin can witness) to paint through the medium of sounds, unaided by words, the progress of a merchant's life. The name given to this truly wonderful production of self-poised genius is "Das Tongemalt Kaufmanns Leben Gedicht," literally "the sound-pictured poem of a merchant's life,"—a name in itself replete with interest to the student of German metaphysics, who here finds the whole circle of the fine arts embraced in a single phrase, agreeably to an exquisite sense of their intimate relations; a piece of descriptive music being first called a poem, and then being said to be painted, and this painting, lastly, being declared to be executed in sound. The details of this unparalleled symphony would occupy more space than any letter could afford: they absorb sixteen closely-printed pages in a synopsis just written by the learned and eloquent Stufenonsenz, in the Musikalische Zeitung, which I will forward you by the first post. In the meantime accept the following brief and meagre analysis.

I ought to tell you, in the first place, that the orchestra on this occasion was erected on the pit of the opera house, the audience being arranged on the stage. In addition to an unusually large stringed instrument department, there were four and twenty trombones, eighteen trumpets, nine pairs of horns, six ophicleides, ten serpents, thirteen pairs of cymbals, two gongs and eight drums, tuned to each interval of the octave.

The band was swelled by amateurs of distinction, and the whole was led by the father of the composer; the last circumstance, as may readily be supposed, augmenting the deep interest of the scene to a degree of intensity bordering on the painful. Three quarters of an hour were required for tuning this immense mass of instruments.

This being over, see now ascending, amid the overwhelming plaudits of the audience and the orchestra, a young man of a pale and interesting countenance, with an immense profusion of uncombed black hair, lending romantic disorder to an appearance in every way peculiar. This is young Löstiswitz, and he turns towards the immense assemblage which greets him, while he gracefully endeavors to remove the hair out of his eyes in order to survey them. Still he ascends, and still they applaud, and still he labors to behold them through the struggling curtain of a dark hair-maze. But at length he has reached the rostrum of the conductor. All is at once as still as death. On him, the hero of that evening, every eye is bent. Many already have poured forth the soul-tribute of tears. His modest demeanor wins all hearts. And now he waves his baton, and the breathless silence is broken by the first stroke of the orchestra (the chord of the 1-2-3-4-5-6-7-8-9-0) struck by the whole band staccatissimo Ffff with the unity of a single gun.

A pause ensues. Then there begins a plaintive warbling strain on the oboe, accompanied by the ophicleides and one gong. This marks the first entrance of the boy-man into mercantile life. The lingering remembrances of his boyish sports and pleasures (graphically depicted by the touching accents of the oboe in E major) are brought effectively into contrast with the rough rebukes and reproaches of the senior clerk, conveyed by the bassi in C minor. Want of punctuality, and inaccuracy in the details of business, are now sharply urged against him by the violins, in staccato passages contretemps. He submits with becoming modesty to this censure in a holding note on the second bassoon. But his mind presently rallies; he girds himself up for his daily task; he is sensible of a divine energy; and now a strict fugue is led off by the tenors, and grows upon the ear through all the forms of harmonic proportion, self-evolving, infinite, yet regular. This proclaims new habits of business, exactness in accounts, well-kept books, and general exemplary conduct. Years roll on, accompanied by the violoncello; the youth wins the approbation of his superiors—the man is a partner in the firm! Vainly, my dear friend, should I endeavor to convey to you the least adequate conception of the exquisite and finely-preserved gradations by which this picture-poem-sculpture-music expresses to the sense of the spectator-auditor, crescendo poco à poco, the commercial progress of its youthful hero. With this noble climax, the first movement concludes.

After a short pause, needed alike by the audience and the performers to recruit their spirits, exhausted by excitement, a graceful Pastorale movement commenced, indicating that degree of comfortable independence and rural retirement which are the fruits of well-regulated industry, when the time-earned blessings of competence have placed within reach of the successful partner a small house and grounds in the suburbs, unfurnished, with other conveniences. Every morning at nine o'clock, after a moderate but excellent breakfast, we see him driving into town, in G major, Allegro two-fours; every evening at five we see him returning to dinner, on the dominant.

I observed more than one commercial man in the room, who had passed through all the usual stages of mercantile life, yielding himself up to the delusion of the moment, and revelling in associations rekindled among the embers of existence by the spell of the spirit-ruler. Every mind was conscious of a secret regret when the last note of this movement expired. It was to them as the going down of an autumnal sun, bright, but prophetic of no genial return.

Now followed an Adagio un poco prestissimo, piano quasi forte, senza tempo—by far the most sui-general and future-age-anticipating portion of this divine work. Löstiswitz has here displayed that deep insight into the principles of instrumentation, which gives him the extraordinary superiority he at present enjoys over contemporary composers as a combinationist.

This movement commences with a trio for two serpents and an octave flute, indicative of extensive commercial embarrassment, and so skilfully has the composer applied the resources of his genius to the subject before him that, with this simple machinery, the whole process of what appears a complicated bankruptcy is brought before the mind with startling reality; in so much that it may be doubted if in a country like England, this portion of the symphony would not require considerable modification, in the event of its performance there. The failure of correspondents, the blockade of the Mexican ports (this would never be permitted by your government I conceive), rumors of the plague at Alexandria, the consternation of clerks and accountants, the presentation of bills for payment, the impetration of renewal, the galling insolence of minacious creditors—all these things told, and were told with such effect, that a powerful sensation of alarm pervaded the whole house, in the midst of which, Herr —, of the firm of — & Co., was carried out in a state of suspended animation. At length a calm ensues; the assets are found sufficient to prevent injury to credit, confidence revives, orders pour in, and all again is harmony and prosperity. Then comes the grand finale.

A brisk Allegro in triple time denotes the accumulation of money in the three per cents; but this movement gradually assumes a statelier style and loftier measure as honors succeed to riches; and, at length, the freedom of the city having been presented in a complimentary Andante for four horns, not without a neat and appropriate reply from the double bass, and a prince of the blood royal having proposed for the sixth daughter in a subsequent bar, the whole of this prodigious work is brought to an end on a sustained dominant, equally remarkable for the novelty of its sequences, and the perfect propriety of its matrimonial arrangements.

Oh! my dear friend, much as I have said, I feel how inadequate my words are to convey a correct impression of this unique Art-fruit. But you must wait till you see what Stuffenonsenz has said about it in the synopsis which I have to forward to you. The power of sound in embodying the visible forms of things—its direct appeal to the eye—can no longer be a point in question.

To Germany belongs the credit due to the discovery; she first explored what may be called (literally) the phenomena of music; and she it is that is bringing the discovery to perfection. It was reserved for Löstiswitz to crown the vindication of music from the prejudice which has hitherto set it down, after Plato, as ἀσφατὸν τι (something not to be seen) as it is described in the foolish motto prefixed to that English tone-art-paper, the Musical World. It was reserved for him to reverse Ovid's Metamorphoses and restore to Echo her visible form. You know the school of music in which he has been educated, and the transcendent capabilities which it has newly opened up to the view of awakening Europe. But great as are the masters which adorn that school, it may safely be said that no one of them has ever done more than Löstiswitz.

Yours ever,

[From the New York Tribune.]

A New Metropolitan Hall.

The reconstruction of a new edifice in this City, for concerts, meetings and exhibitions, is a subject which should occupy the public mind. We have now, since the deplorable destruction of Metropolitan Hall, no such place of sufficient size, of adequate taste in its arrangements, and with the external brilliancy so inspiring to actors and audiences. Philadelphia, however, has two splendid halls—the old Musical Fund and the New Music Hall. Boston, too, has a magnificent New Music Hall. Baltimore, likewise, has a very large hall, though deficient in decorations. But New York, in this way, has nothing of a size fit for her claims and boasts. Her largest saloon, Niblo's, would hardly suit Cleaveland or Buffalo, towns of yesterday. Her present position, in this regard, is simply provincial; and if it continue, it will be contemptible. We must have a new Metropolitan Hall—for concerts primarily, and secondarily for meetings, philanthropic and political; for conventions, scientific, artistic and moral, and for exhibitions of various kinds.

It may be said such a building will not pay. We question this assertion most pointedly. We believe that Metropolitan Hall did pay a good interest. We have known about $190 a night paid for the room, gas and door-keepers included, and that for some twelve nights; and here alone is some $5,000, or an interest on $45,000 for a mere passing breeze of rental. M. Jullien, too, has paid rent during two months, six nights a week, for the same hall; and to say that such a demand for such a hall does not pay, is nonsense. It is a good investment, although it required an enthusiast to build it.

We believe, in fact, that no better stock need be required, than that which could be invested in a new Metropolitan Hall on the old site, which is unsurpassably good. The demand for such a hall is just as steady as that for bread and butter, and the investment just as safe. All that is required is, that the building should be fire-proof. The walls, joists and beams should be iron; the floors should also be incombustible; the stairways and gallery fronts should be iron; in a word, it should be impregnable against fire.

For the purposes of Art simply, we should like to see a hall built irrespective of the cent-per-cent. principle. And if we were a civilized community this would be done. Why not? Peter Cooper gives some $300,000 to a scientific Institute. Anson Phelps leaves $100,000 to religious foreign missions. Every year heavy legacies are left, or donations made, for objects, good, bad and indifferent, but when Art comes up as a vital question, then vulgarity and stupidity rules, and nothing is done. Our Colleges, forever prating of Greek, know nothing of the Grecian spirit, which was artistic. Homer, having received his education in Egypt, literally sang to the lyre, and lyrical poetry was used in Greece three hundreds years before prose was known in the literature of that country. Demosthenes, as his orations show, and as any classical scholar can read, drew his best inspirations from the lyrical Homer; and the best part of Daniel Webster came from the lyrical Homer too, at second hand through Demosthenes. So pure Art has shone, unacknowledged in our literature and eloquence,—while Colleges, dying millionaires, living millionaires, and all others giving away money, dying or living, to institutions, have left her literally to shift for herself. Hence the taste of the people is so low that they go night after night in overwhelming crowds to see white men with blackened faces making mountebanks of themselves in order to delectate their vulgar audiences, who wear good clothes, with what is called negro music; as if music could be good which atheistically caricatures the oppressed, or has no higher derivation than despised ignorance.

It is, indeed, time that we were out of this slough of barbarism. It is time that the rhodomontade of our colleges—our literati—our public men—upon "ripe scholarship" should end; and the grand æsthetics of that nation—the Attic Grecian—to which we are most indebted for our civilization, should ripen truly the collegiate, the literary and the public mind. We should have a Metropolitan Hall at the service of artists for a nominal price. But if we have not the sense and wisdom to build such a thing as we do other institutions, independent of mere money—let it be built at once as an investment, and constructed so that it can not be destroyed by fire.

THE SINGING LEAVES.

A BALLAD.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

I.

"What fairings will ye that I bring?"
Said the king to his daughters three,
"For I to Vanity Fair am bonne,
Now say what shall they be?"

Then up and spake the eldest daughter,
The lady tall and grand,
"Ye shall bring to me the diamonds great,
And gold rings for my hand."

Thereafter spake the second daughter,
That was both white and red,
"For me bring silk that will stand alone,
And a gold comb for my head."

Then slowly spake the least daughter,
That was whiter than thistle down,
And among the gold of her blithesome hair
Dim shone the golden crown.

"There came a bird at sunrise
And sang 'neath my bower-eaves,
And sent the sweet dream that bade me
To ask for the Singing Leaves."

Then the brow of the king swelled crimson
With a flush of angry scorn,
"Well have ye spoken, my two eldest,
And chosen as ye were born."

"But thou, like a thing of peasant blood,
That is happy hindling the sheaves!"—
Then he saw her dead mother in her face,
And said, "Thou shalt have thy Leaves."

II.

He bade farewell to the elder twain
And touched his lips to their cheek,
But 'twas thrice he kissed the Princess Anne,
And looked back and did not speak.

And he has ridden three days and nights
Till he came to Vanity Fair,
And easy it was to buy gems of gold,
But no Singing Leaves were there.

Then deep in the greenwood rode he
And asked of every tree,
"Oh, if ye have ever a singing leaf,
I pray you to give it me!"

But the trees all kept their counsel;
They said neither yea nor nay;
Only there sighed from the pine tops
A music of seas far away.

Only the aspen pattered
With a sound like growing rain,
That fell ever fast and faster,
Then faltered to silence again.

Some leaves he plucked from every tree,
And his good knights all plucked some,
But they missed the spell of the weird greenwood,
And withered and were dumb.

"Oh, where shall I find a little foot-page,
That would win both hose and shoon,
And will bring to me these Singing Leaves,
If they grow beneath the moon?"

Then lightly turned him Walter, the page,
By the stirrup as he ran,
"Now pledge to me the truesome word
Of a knight and gentleman,

"That you will give me the first, first thing
You meet at your castle gate,
And the princess shall get the Singing Leaves,
Or mine be the traitor's fate!"

The king's head drooped on his bosom
A moment, as it might be—
'Twill be my hound, he thought, and he said,
"I pledge my word to thee."

Then Walter took from next his heart
A packet small and thin,
"And give you this to the Princess Anne,
The Singing Leaves are therein."

III.

As the king rode in, o'er the loud drawbridge,
A maiden to meet him ran,
And, "Welcome, father!" she laughed and cried Together, the Princess Anne.

"Lo, here are thy Singing Leaves," quoth he,
"And wo, but they cost me dear!"
She took the packet, and her smile
Deepened down beneath the tear.

It deepened down to her very heart,
And then flushed back again,
And lighted her tears as the sudden sun
Transfigures the summer rain.

And the first leaf, when she opened it,
Sang, "I am Walter, the page,
And the songs I sing 'neath thy window
Are all my heritage!"

And the second leaf sang, "But in the land
That is neither on earth or sea,
My harp and I are lords of more Than thrice this kingdom's fee!"

And the third leaf sang, "Be mine! be mine!"
And still it sang, "Be mine!"
Then sweeter it sang and ever sweeter,
And said, "I am thine, thine, thine!"

At the first leaf she grew pale enough,
At the second she turned aside,
At the third, 'twas as if a lily flushed
With a rose's red heart's tide.

"Good counsel gave the bird," she said;
"I have my wish thrice o'er,
For they sing to my very heart," she said,
"And it sings with them evermore."

She brought to him her beauty and truth,
But and broad earldoms three,
And he made her queen of the broader lands
He held of his heart in fee.

TASTE PROGRESSING. — Passing through one of our Boston streets the other evening, we actually heard some one whistling, for a dozen bars or so, the first theme in the overture to Tannhäuser.

PASSION-FLOWERS. — Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields. 1854.

We would add to this simple page the naive frontlet of Bettine von Arnim,—This book is for the good and not for the bad. Nothing is more obvious than that many critics, of taste most precise and orthodox, may find some fault with nearly every poem here;—well, let them speak, as they have, and go on to apply their horn-eyes to the next publication. But there are other critics who can bring all things to the test of what is real and universal,

'Forgetting vulgar rules, with spirit free
To judge each author by his own intent,
Nor think one standard for all minds is meant.'

Yet it is really a grave thing, and, in this country, a rare thing, to publish such a book as this. Lively description and subtle sentiment have been the highest characteristics of the almost infinite and infinitesimal brood of female songsters which the Rev. Mr. Griswold has harbored under his wings; timidly, yet earnestly, we have demanded something deeper than these, something truer to the idea of American womanhood. Shall we say that now, for the first time, we have been answered? We surely believe that this work stands for such a want in our Literature, and that it is one which very many will not willingly let die. As the old Athenian who returned home from the temple with his visitors, we would say, "Let us enter, for here also are the Gods"; and are persuaded that many will rise up from the perusal of these verses and say: If this is not Poetry, all that I have loved and worshipped in Poets has been a broken reed on which I have been leaning, and now the secret has no tongue for me!

The volume is rightly enough named "Passion-flowers:" though it is not necessary that one should read far to find that underneath the modest claim of "flowers," there is a full kernel,

"Which, if cut deep down the middle,
Shows a heart within, blood-tinctured, of a veined humanity."

These first pieces are not only about Rome, and suffused with the scenery and associations of Rome, but they reveal, as do the rest, a Roman culture. There is evidence enough of a recognition of Greek methods, and an acquaintance with Greek Literature,—but their influence is certainly not felt beyond the style, and often not there. In the poem, so full of plastic energy, "From Newport to Rome," it is not Aspasia, but Portia, who cries out against those who dance on the bleeding heart of the world:

For the brave world is given to us
For all the brave in heart to keep,
Lest wicked hands should sow the thorns
That bleeding generations reap.

* * * * *

Oh world! oh time! oh heart of Christ!
Oh heart betrayed and sold anew!
Dance on, ye slaves! ay, take your sport,
All times are one to such as you.

Our limits will not allow us to introduce many extracts here. Several of the most striking have been published in this Journal. We would point to the pieces entitled "Correspondence" and "Mother Mind," as the seal of this prophetic: earnest, heroic,—conscious that God is over all, and so detecting the harmony of the particular with the universal; knowing that

There is no great and no small
To the soul that maketh all.

"A Child's Excuse" and "The Royal Guest" show a simple and tender appreciation of all the gifted and good. In a certain tingling of the emotion in every fibre of the writer, which always has a galvanic effect on the reader, we are reminded of that master of modern heroic verse, Robert Browning,—"Miss Barrett's" compliment to whom we have already applied to our authoress. Witness, "My Lecture," "Death of the Slave Lewis," and "My last Dance." The latter is very characteristic. There is a dance amongst the Oriental Dervishes, where the motions of the limbs accord with the planetary orbits. The most flaming worshipper could not enter more into the spirit of the dance than this:

She gave her impulse to the dancing hours,
To winds that sweep, to stars that noiseless turn;
She marked the measure rapid hearts must keep,
Devised each pace that glancing feet should learn.

Occasionally there is a morbid tone in these notes; nearly all are given in "sad perplexed minors." But we are not of those who would find fault with a book for these, however much we might feel for the severe encounters which suggest such. Their absence has often involved more serious deductions; and, after all, so long as we cannot see with God's eye, this life is a grave problem. We have here the charities which a life, whereon no experience or message has been ever lost, alone can bestow. And we shall read these verses from time to time with something of that faith with which the devout ascribe power to the pale look of hair from some fair Renunciant. For its authoress we would love to bind a chaplet of her representative flowers, and clasp it with a rose-diamond. c.

REVERBERATING HALLS.—The difficulty occasioned by the reverberation of sound in the Capitol at Nashville, has been remedied by a thick laying of sand dust on the floor, covering it with a heavy curtain. The Ohio Constitutional Convention remedied a similar defect in College Hall, Cincinnati, by covering the walls with canvass.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXXVII.

NEW YORK, Jan. 8.—Well, when I called our music hall the Metropolitan nuisance, I had no thought of its being so suddenly and sadly abated. So now we are without any musical head-quarters, unless we go back to the old Tabernacle. Strange that a city of this size should never have possessed a good room for music! But one regrets the loss of even a bad one, if its place cannot be supplied. I fear there is little hope of another being built, at present, this side of the new opera house: poor Tripler's experiment has proved too costly—it ruined him. If one should be built, may Apollo see that acoustical principles be not wholly ignored, and the goddess of prudence see that some decent means of egress form a part of the architect's plans and drawings!

Jan. 12.—Have been reading Mr. Mason's letters upon musical matters in Europe, and am greatly pleased with the book. In these days of controversy among our church music people, this calm, candid report of what Mr. M. saw and heard in Germany and England, is of very great value. It is just the book which teachers of singing classes, and attendants upon Musical Conventions should read. They certainly—if they have any reasonable quantity of brains—cannot fail to see that there is something beyond even a "tune" or an anthem, in the domain of music, and a something too which they can only learn to appreciate and enjoy, by combined effort on a grander scale than they have hitherto attempted. In reading the accounts of the great musical festivals which Mr. Mason attended, and which he has so finely described, I have felt an almost painful longing for the time—which will yet come—when in our inland cities—say Springfield, or Worcester, Syracuse or any other centre of easy access—choirs and native orchestras shall come together for the performance of the "Messiahs" and "Samsons" and "Elijahs." Perhaps that time may be nearer, now, than I imagine. At all events this book cannot but do something toward awakening the right spirit for this desirable end.

Speaking of hooks, what a strange compound of wisdom and folly, brilliance and dullness, strength and weakness, magnificent description, lofty sentiment and sickly sentimentality, the new novel, "Charles Auchester," is! I do not know when I have been more excited by a fiction than by this, in passages, or more wearied in others. There is more genius than talent displayed in it. One thing is clear, that the god of the author's idolatry is Mendelssohn, and that the love for him amounted to passion—perhaps a cold passion, like Bettine's for Goethe.

Some one has said that one of the Rothschild family wrote it. In its boundless enthusiasm for all that is Jewish, it would give "color to this idea", did this enthusiasm seem like that of a member of the Jewish family; but to me it seems more like the unlimited admiration of an outsider. That a man is the author I do not believe. No man could draw these pictures of the female characters; no man could draw the hero Seraphael (Mendelssohn) such a namby-pamby character—considered, not as a musician, but as a man. It reads to me all the way through as if written—or, at least, thought out—in German, and as if the manuscript had been revised by some one so familiar with that language as occasionally to overlook glaring Germanisms. It is queer, but all the way through I am reminded of Mrs. Kinkel, wife of the Prof. Kinkel described in Dickens' Household Words, the one who was sentenced to imprisonment for life during the Baden revolutionary troubles in 1849, but who escaped to England afterward.

She knew Mendelssohn, was an enthusiastic admirer of him, is a fine writer, a very fine musician, and shows in her writings, on a smaller scale, the same points of strength and weakness in which this book abounds. The book is all music, and high class music too.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 21, 1854.

"Our Wagnerism."

We publish with pleasure the following letter from our esteemed friend and townsman in Leipzig, whose word is always welcome, even when it calls our own ideas in question. For if we differ, it is the same earnest search for truth in Art, that leads us for the time being into diverging paths, and which we are bound to suppose, if each is faithful, will in due time also lead us round to the same goal. But whether we do so greatly differ in the matter here discussed, we shall submit to the reader after he has read the letter.

LEIPZIG, NOV. 11, 1853.

MY DEAR SIR:—You have of late shown yourself in the Journal so devoted a lover of modern German music, and so zealous an exponent of the sounding phrases of Mr. Liszt, and the Neue Zeitschrift (concerning Wagner in particular), that courtesy might perhaps prescribe silence to one, who in this part of your musical creed is of so opposite a way of thinking. I can, however, well understand that the performance of certain works such as the Tannhäuser overture, which is unquestionably novel and brilliant, should produce a great effect in a concert room, and lead the hearers to a belief in the genius of its composer; but were you to reside a twelvemonth in Germany, where not only the overture but the whole opera is frequently to be heard by those who like it, where the dullest and darkest and most confused works of the three, (who, as Mr. Chorley remarks, labor in the "cause of musical dislocation,") are not to be so escaped, I am sure you would at least modify your opinions. Having been in Germany now more than a year, and having found that my own feelings in regard to Wagner in particular, from ardent curiosity, have passed, through aversion, to a firm conviction of the falseness of his theories in dramatic music—and believing also that if this music does succeed in forcing itself into admiration, true Art would at least for a season die and disappear, I was tempted by an article in the Gazette Musicale, due to the pen of M. Fétis (being the 2d letter addressed to dramatic composers,) which seemed to me singularly just and true, to explain as far as lay in my power why I have this settled conviction that music in Germany is travelling fast on towards the regions of chaos. M. Fétis argues that Wagner's theories concerning operatic music are utterly false. M. Fétis poses as an axiom that beauty is the primary object of any musical production—Wagner, that to truth all things are to be sacrificed.

Now in an opera, absolute truth is an impossibility. Wagner's rhythmical recitative is just as false as the Cavatina and Aria that he wishes to put down. Men and women in daily intercourse speak, and do not sing or recite verses or rhythmical phrases. We accept the thing called Opera, which to the sober eye of reason is an absurdity, because the beauty of musical idea makes us forget its falsity. The necessary qualities of a good libretto are varied versification, and striking points for effect, which excite the composer's genius and arrest the attention of the public. M. Wagner thinks that by destroying Melody he approximates more nearly to Truth; and admitting that his operas are a little more like real life, no one can thank him for taking away that which charmed us into forgetfulness of the primary absurdity of the opera, and leaving us a strange, anomalous thing, which is neither opera nor drama; which is equally wide of the Truth to which he aspires, and deprived of the charm that made us accept its falsity. The modern school of music in Germany, which includes the music of Wagner, much of Schumann and Berlioz (who, although a Frenchman, belongs to the same movement), Brahms, and Liszt, who is the preacher and setter forth of the wonders of the genius possessed by these gentlemen, is supported, firstly, by themselves, they having formed a league offensive and defensive; secondly, by the Neue Zeitschrift, which but lately informed us that Mendelssohn was a man of talent, while the above mentioned exponents of the modern school were men of genius; thirdly, by the young musicians, who are brought up to believe that their first compositions must be modelled upon the Ninth Symphony and that the First is a puerility. But the real opinion of the men who still make German Art estimable and admirable, those whose counsels are best worthy of seeking, is utterly adverse to this Mutual Adoration Society. Moscheles, Hauptmann, Gade, Richter, and out of Germany the best musical critics of France and England are unable to perceive the glories of the new lights—and show by their actions and speech that they consider all this as injurious to the cause of true music and high Art. Success is no test of excellence either, in Schools of Art. There was a time in Italy, when Bernini and his scholars filled the Italian cities with statues robed in frittered draperies, whose attitudes were twisted out of all nature, and admired for their very oppositeness to all which the Grecian masters had laid down as admirable. So far was this mania carried, that young men went to seat themselves upon the Ponte St. Angelo at Rome, to study and draw the statues placed upon the bridge. Statues which now are looked upon as beneath contempt. Things were in this false state, when Canova came and led the people back into the true path, by showing them what the great master of antiquity had done, and how their theories in art were founded upon a careful study of nature, and a healthy simple inspiration. So that until a musical Canova come, who has the genius which enforces authority, and whose mind is simple as was that of Haydn, lovely as that of Mozart, and strong as that of Beethoven, I fear we shall have to grope farther yet into the realms of musical darkness.

Perhaps you have not heard of Mr. Brahms, a young man of Hamburg, whom Dr. Schumann sent to Leipzig with a letter which was published, and in which he stated his opinion that Brahms was a youth of astounding genius. The letter was filled with expletives such as were never used in regard to Beethoven, injudicious, to say the least, when used to so young a person. Now-a-days the masters in art do not say to juvenile aspirants of undoubted gifts, as Haydn said to Beethoven when he heard him perform the three Sonatas afterwards dedicated to him, "Young man you have talent, but you have need to instruct yourself still further in your art." Herr Brahms has talent, perhaps of a very high quality, and although his Sonata for Piano which he performed at the Gewandhaus last week, is very obscure in many parts, some of the ideas are striking, and of a high quality. I shall never forget though, the effect of Mozart's quintet in G minor, which followed this sample of the modern school. So clear, so pure, of such childlike simplicity and beauty of idea—the very acme of art—because art, which seemed like a simple and natural outpouring of the soul. David played the 1st violin part, in the very most admirable style, it was perfection, and will ever be remembered by one of his hearers at least, with gratitude and delight. But my letter is already too long, and I have no space to tell you of many great musical pleasures which have been mine this winter. Another time I will speak of Gluck's masterpiece, Armida, heard at Berlin, and the "Vestal" of Spontini, at Dresden, and of the promised pleasures of hearing Mrs. Goldschmidt, Joachim and the 9th Symphony at the Gewandhaus very shortly. Wishing you much success, I remain

Yours very truly,

CHARLES C. PERKINS.

We have heard the overture to Tannhäuser, and have admired it, and have said it. It is the only real, bonâ fide specimen of Wagner's music, that we have heard. Of course it would be childish haste and folly for us to give in our adhesion to Wagner altogether as a composer, and especially in the character claimed for him as the inaugurator of a new era, a new school in Art; still more especially in his character as a dramatic composer, we having never heard one, nor even a fragment of one of his operas, save in a mere orchestral arrangement without voices; and understanding at the same time that the central principle of his whole operatic theory is the inseparable union of the music and poetry. The orchestral excerpts from Rienzi, which the Germanians have played to us, gave us little pleasure, and we expressed but little. But we thought it only fair to remind ourselves and our readers, that Rienzi was an early work, written before his Wagnerism proper was developed. Some of the movements (orchestrally arranged) from Lohengrin, his latest opera, did seem to us to possess a beauty and expressiveness quite imaginative and fine. We therefore have not been in a condition to find or to declare ourselves either pro or anti-Wagner.

The same with regard to the German "New School" generally. We know it not enough to condemn it or espouse it as a school. A few hearings of one symphony and one quintet of Schumann have given us great pleasure and led us to hope much from him; to his songs we have become quite partial, and to his little piano "Album" pieces in their way. We are but beginning to know him, and by no means are prepared to settle his precise rank in the long line of composers. Of Berlioz (whom our friend classes with Young Germany,) we have heard nothing but the overture to "Lear," of which we spoke soon after Jullien's "Shakspeare night," and nothing to attract us. Is it not rather early therefore to reproach us with "devotion" to the "modern German music?" Besides, we need not assure any constant reader of our journal that we are among the staunchest and devoutest lovers of Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn, to say nothing of Handel, Bach, and other venerable names. Should we become enamored, therefore, of the new tone-prophets, it could not be by their converting us from our old lovers. So far as we find ought to advocate in Schumann or in Wagner, it is not against, but with, their noble predecessors. For catholic in Art we do wish and intend to be, and must accept that which affects us with a sense of the divine and beautiful, whether it be new or old, whether it be like or unlike, one or many.

In one sense we have "devoted" our columns to Wagner. That is, we have printed much concerning him. His was a new fame in the world musical. Sounds of the great controversy concerning him had come across the ocean. New topics naturally claim more space than old ones in a journal that would give a reflex of the world's musical events and progress. We accordingly digested accounts of the life and works and theories of Wagner from the German and French papers, from his friends and foes, and from his own writings, that it might be seen or conjectured what he amounted to. We did this impartially, pointing out evidences of rare power and originality, with many things in detail true, but not accepting his main theory of opera and drama, or rather of the connection between Poetry and Music. Sometimes we described his peculiarities in the language of his admirers; but what we copy we no more endorse, than does the daily newspaper the things it publishes under the head of telegraphic despatches. We have translated parts of Liszt's glowing analysis of Tannhäuser, remarking on the singularly complete and beautiful plan of an opera, which it disclosed, but mainly because Liszt's chivalric endorsement of Wagner is one of the interesting musical facts of the day, and because Liszt writes so finely and appreciatingly of musical Art in its nobler and more spiritual aspects. We have alluded to the bitterness and harshness of certain English criticisms, because they seemed to us to bear the marks of prejudice upon their face, and to be not so modest as it becomes one to be towards any new manifestation of power in Art, when it has really made a deep impression on minds among the most capable of judging.

Taking into account all we have read, for and against, with his own writings, with the report of repeated successes of his operas in German cities, and with what little of his music we have heard in our benighted region of the great world musical, we have sometimes ventured the conjecture that Wagner, while in our view wrong in his main musical theory and right in many of his special criticisms on existing Opera, must yet be a man of extraordinary talent, nay, creative talent, perhaps genius; and that such indications of power demand of the world that it should wait until it fairly knows, before it utterly condemns. We thank our friend for telling us what the majority of old professors think in Germany, and for the frank report of his own ears and feelings, after a year's exposure to the Wagner music. It shall all help us in getting at the truth. Yet it is not impossible that even in Leipsic he may be more under the influence of prejudice and party in the matter, than we here, who coolly look on from a distance.

So much for Wagnerism. From our friend's doctrine of the inherent absurdity of Opera, we shall have to express our dissent, but have not room this week.

Concerts of the Past Week.

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY. The Extra Concert, on Saturday evening, was but poorly attended, as extra concerts mostly are now in the thick of the musical season. Yet we doubt not, a better programme would have better drawn. We think Felicien David's "Desert" was pretty generally understood beforehand, in spite of the reproduction of ten-years old puffs, to have been a fleeting glory of the past. Since the day of its first sudden popularity, since the glowing anticipations of its author's future achievements (all printed as of yesterday in the biographical sketch upon the programme), ten years have elapsed, and what has he done? and where shall we find a musical community anxious to renew acquaintance with "The Desert?" Our musical societies and artists lack faith. We do believe that the Ninth Symphony, with no better choral treatment than it had last winter, would have drawn a larger audience. It was given then, and given successfully; yet there ever returns the old distrust in the appreciation of the public, and the last year's glorious gain is thought not safe enough to build upon, and the best things are not risked. Faith, faith, faith, is an all-essential condition of a sound and steady progress, in musical, even more than in common matters.

Some eight years since we heard Le Desert in New York. Its style was newer then than it is now; yet, in spite of many pleasing effects, some sweet melody, and great ingenuity as a descriptive work, its general impression on us was feeble, sweetish and monotonous. This time it was much better executed, yet yielded nothing more, in the way of mental gain or refreshment. The music is monotonous. Should it not be so to convey a feeling of the desert? We answer, unless Art can bid living springs gush in that desert, it had better leave it to the Arabs and its own waste sameness. Silent vastness, indicated by "long and measured unisonous chords," varied only by the oft-returning camel trot, the simoom, and a few sentimental lover's night songs, of a style of melody quite common now (if not when these were written), offers small variety or contrast. It was exceedingly well played, and the choruses were sung as well as could be wished; but we could not sympathize, when all was over, with the last words on the programme: "Thus ends one of the most gorgeous musical poems in the whole range of music." The solo portions suffered in being transposed from the tenor to the baritone of Signor CAMOENZ, the hearty looking Englishman, who also recited in a hollow and prosaic kind of conversation voice the intermediate fragments of the poem. "The Desert" has its admirers, as we chance to know, but they are neither the musical public nor the musical few. We do not mean to deny that the work has interest enough to entitle it to a hearing, and more than one. But when there are so many greater and immortal works, with which we have barely begun to be acquainted, and when available evenings are so few, when "Life is short, and Art is long," is it the best economy of our musical opportunities to waste them upon what is hardly third rate?

"The Desert" continually reminded us of "Museum" music. With fitting scenery and plenty of turbaned Arabs, it would take the first rank among those brilliant oriental spectacles whereby our friend Kimball annually crowds his popular establishment. Of course, we do not mean that the music is not a great deal better than one hears in such things; but it suggests essential similarity in kind.

The Concert opened with the overture to Tannhäuser, now a decided favorite with the great musical public. It seemed to be keenly relished; and yet, we are bound to say, it was not so well played as on former occasions. In the rich and solemn opening the wind instruments were not in good tune; and by a new disposition of the orchestra, to accommodate the chorus, the trombones and drums were posted high against the organ screen, where their effect was overpowering.

Besides the choruses in "The Desert," the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY gave a fine rendering of the great chorus in "Elijah," Thanks be to God, &c., describing rain after drought and the rushing of the waters. Those strange, moist-sounding chords, were given with great certainty and richness. But the chorus suffered from want of appropriate introduction. One needed that which in the oratorio leads up to this grand climax. Instead of that it came in after one of Mr. APTOMMAS's harp solos, which, however pleasing in their place, could not prepare the mind for such a chorus. Miscellaneous programme-making should be more a work of art. As the effect of a picture depends somewhat on the hanging, so does that of a piece of music on its relative position in a programme. The song of Spohr, by Signor CAMOENZ (with harp and horn accompaniment), was over before we could begin to make out what was the amount of it.

But the above mistake was doubly, trebly atoned for, and the desert was redeemed to perfect bloom at the last AFTERNOON REHEARSAL, by the repetition of that glorious Symphony by Schubert, a work inspired and beautiful in every bar!

To-night the Germanians offer us a better opportunity of appreciating "The Desert," at a regular Concert, when we shall be sure of the advantage of a great audience. We shall try to learn!

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—We have only room to say that the last Chamber Concert had the largest and most interested audience of the season; that the great Beethoven Quartet in F was with laudable courage and ambition essayed again, and with far more success than before; and that the Mozart Quintet with clarinet, which concluded the evening, was indeed delicious in its every movement. The intermediate pieces we were obliged to lose.

L'Art du Chant appliqué au Piano. By S. THALBERG. First Series, No. 1. "Quatuor de l'Opera I Puritani," de BELLINI. Op. 70. (Oliver Ditson.) pp. 9.

Mr. Ditson is here reprinting a right valuable work for those who would learn to play the piano with expression. Thalberg has embodied all his taste and experience in a series of admirable rules and well chosen exercises, arranged to the express end of teaching the art of singing on the piano. "With this view," he says, "we have selected our transcriptions from those masterpieces of the great composers, both ancient and modern, which are peculiarly vocal in their effects." And a rich series is this first, comprising six transcriptions. The first, which we have here reprinted, is that beautiful Quartet in I Puritani, which is so arranged as to give distinct individuality to each of the four voice parts, which are engraved in larger notes than the merely instrumental parts, thus challenging the player's attention to the melody continually. The whole is carefully provided with marks for fingering and expression, and it is all easily practicable till we reach the last two pages, where it will cost some practice to sustain a trill through several measures with the last fingers of the right hand while its other fingers have to execute a melody. The piece is beautiful enough to reward practice.

In the coming numbers we are promised an air by Pergolese; the Adelaide of Beethoven; an old church melody by Stradella; the Lacrymosa, from Mozart's Requiem; a duet from the Nozze di Figaro; and another from Rossini's Zelmira.

Leaves from my Musical Diary, by ADOLPH KIELBLOCK. pp. 7. (O. Ditson.)

Here are three charmingly melodious and expressive little pieces for the piano; simple, clear and chaste in style, and conceived in an artistic spirit which saves them from anything commonplace. The two first are in the form of Songs without Words; they illustrate the best points of musical elocution, and should be good lessons in the same direction with the work of Thalberg, above noticed. The third is a pleasing Waltz, called "Remembrance of Germany," somewhat in the manner of the waltzes ascribed to Beethoven.

Funeral March, by Wm. R. BARCOCK. Op. 10. (Published at the Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St., Boston, by Nathan Richardson.)

This is a sincere and worthy tribute to the memory of JONAS CHICKERING. It is accompanied by a speaking portrait of this lamented dear friend of musicians, lithographed by Tappan and Bradford from a daguerreotype by Whipple. The title page bears an appropriate funeral device, and the whole is engraved in a style of unusual elegance and costliness. The March itself is solemn, broad and grand in character; decidedly one of the most respectable efforts of young American composition. It is free from aught trivial, or commonplace, or overstrained;—in thought and sentiment, we mean—for there is some overstraining of the muscles in the very crowded and extended harmonies for the left hand, which renders its smooth performance not a little difficult. The writer is an organist and used to a key-board where octaves, twelfths, &c., sound out at the pressure of one key.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS.—The friends of this talented and estimable young lady—and they are all the music-lovers of our city—are rejoiced to hear of her successful debut in opera, in the theatre at Brescia, in Italy. The Evening Gazette translates the following account of it from an Italian paper.

"Brescia, Teatro Grande.—(Correspondence of the Cosmorama of Nov. 26th.) We have heard with profound admiration the Semiramide of Rossini, and now see how superficial in every point of view are the ideas of some reformers, who would consign to oblivion the works of that great maestro, to pay homage to modern composers. The first laurels were obtained by the prima donna contralto Adelaide Phillips (Arsace), who debuted on our stage. Her voice is pure, melodious, simple, and educated in a very good school. The public was lavish of well merited applause. We predict and prophesy from the heart a most brilliant future for this modest young lady. Soss (Semiramide) was also received with favor, and was much applauded, especially in the duet with Arsace, which was given with master skill. Tomha (Assur), Benincore (Oroe), and Dei (Idrene), satisfactorily sustained their parts.

It is a pleasant thing to know that this good news came from a young sister aspirant for the same artistic honors, (also from Boston) whose turn is yet to come, she having sailed a little later than Miss Phillips to the countries where the voice has justice done it, and who hereby shows what spirit of generous interest in each other's success exists between them.

CONCERTS.—OTTO DRESEL's next evening, at Chickering's, will be Tuesday, 24th. The Bach Concerto, for three pianos, which made such an impression last year, will be played. Also a Quartet by Schumann, and a Trio by Beethoven, both new to us: and delicious dreams from Chopin.

HARP SOIREES.—It will be a rare pleasure to hear the harp of APTOMMAS in the elegant Chickering saloon, where the faintest, exquisite harmonics will be clearly heard. See card below.

The best works on Piano Instruction existing.

IN PRESS:—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO-FORTE, translated from the latest and most approved German Edition, by G. A. SCHMITT.
Also JUL. KNORR'S REVISED EDITION OF A. E. MULLER'S METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.

The above works are in reality the most complete, elaborate, and, at the same time, condensed works on the subject of which they treat. They contain Studies and Examples which will lead the scholar to a mastery of all the modern achievements of the Art; and are, in the opinion of leading German critics, the best books on musical instruction extant. The GUIDE is not only a key to the succeeding work, but contains a list of over two hundred pieces, by the first masters, in progressive order, with notes of advice to the teacher, showing how they might be best practised for the advancement of the pupil.

The COMPLETE METHOD contains many suggestions of the greatest importance to Teachers and Pupils that have not been mentioned in any other book of instruction.

These exceedingly valuable works are in press, and will be ready at an early date. OLIVER DITSON, Boston.

—Edward L. Balch,

MUSIC! MUSIC! MUSIC!

IT IS NOW AN ESTABLISHED AND CONFIRMED FACT THAT THE

Modern School for the Piano-Forte

IS BY FAR THE MOST INGENIOUS, SIMPLE, PROGRESSIVE AND COMPREHENSIVE METHOD FOR THE PIANO THAT HAS EVER BEEN PRESENTED TO THE PUBLIC,—embracing a complete system, from the very outset to the highest classical music.

The anatomy of the hands is shown by beautifully colored plates. The entire work surpasses all previous musical publications, as regards mechanical appearance and elegance.

The author, NATHAN RICHARDSON, has spent the last five years in Europe for the sole purpose of getting up an Instruction Book, which would embrace the styles and effective Exercises of ALL distinguished Pianists and Teachers. To accomplish that object, he was assisted by

EIGHTEEN EMINENT EUROPEAN PIANISTS.

The result has been, an Instruction Book so comprehensive and ingenious, that a pupil will acquire the styles and mechanical difficulties of all celebrated Pianists, and that, too, with far less labor and practice than is usually required to learn an ordinary composition, under the old methods.

It is not an abridgement, neither is it an old work translated, revised, and remodeled. It is a work which is entirely new throughout, and is thoroughly adapted to our wants. It has been examined and admitted to be the best Instruction Book ever published in America, by the following distinguished Professors, Pianists and Teachers, who have given us the most complimentary recommendations, which have already appeared before the public.

Beethoven and his Three Styles.

BY M. W. DE LENZ.

[From the French of HECTOR BERLIOZ.]

Mr. de Lenz relates, that Beethoven, walking one day with his friend Schindler, said to him: "I have just found two themes for an overture. The one may be treated in my own style; the other is in conformity with the style of Handel. Which do you counsel me to choose?" Schindler (can we believe it) advised Beethoven to adopt the second theme. This advice pleased Beethoven, on account of his predilection for Handel. He unfortunately conformed to it. It is said that he censured Schindler much for having thus counselled him. In fact, the overtures of Handel are not the most prominent features of his works; and to compare them with those of Beethoven, is to place a forest of cedars in parallel with a growth of mushrooms.

"This overture, op. 124," says Mr. de Lenz, "is not a double fugue, as it has been supposed. We may believe that the theme which Beethoven would have treated in his own style might have become the foundation of a much more important work, at a time when the genius of the artist was at its zenith—when the man enjoyed his last days of exemption from suffering. Schindler, doubtless, said to himself that the genius of Beethoven reigned rivalless in the free symphonic style; that in this he had no one to imitate; that the severe style was, at the most, an obstacle to overleap; that in this he was not at home. The overture produced no effect; It was pronounced inexecutable; and so it was, perhaps."

It is difficult, I should reply to Mr. de Lenz, but nevertheless, very executable by a powerful orchestra. Thanks to the prominent features of Beethoven's style, which penetrate the gross tissue of the Handelian imitation, the entire coda and a number of passages, move and attract the hearer, when well rendered. I have myself directed the execution of this overture; the first performance took place at the Conservatoire, with a first class orchestra. It was found that the style of Handel's overture was so ill-produced, that it was applauded with transport. Ten years after, indifferently performed by a feeble orchestra, it was severely judged; the style of Handel was acknowledged to be perfectly imitated.

Mr. de Lenz here relates the conversation of Beethoven with Schindler, on this subject: "Wie kommen Sie wieder auf die alte Geschichte?" etc. (He speaks Welsh.)

In this minute and intelligent review of the works of the great composer, an account of the attacks perpetrated against them must necessarily hold a place; it is there, in fact, but very incomplete. Mr. de Lenz, who treats so rudely the correctors of Beethoven, who scoffs at, and scourges them, was not aware of one half their delinquencies. One must have lived long in Paris and in London to appreciate the full extent of their ravages.

As to the pretended fault of engraving which Mr. De Lenz believes to exist in the scherzo of the symphony in C minor, and which would consist, according to those critics who sustain the same opinion, in the unseasonable repetition of two bars of the theme, at its reappearance in the middle of the piece; this is what I have to say: There is no exact repetition of the four notes C, D, E, F, of which the melody is composed; the first time they are written in minims followed by a crochet; and the second time in crotchets followed by a rest; which quite changes their character.

Moreover the addition of the two contested bars is by no means an anomaly in the style of Beethoven. There are not a hundred but a thousand similar caprices in his compositions. The mere fact that the two added bars destroy the symmetry of the phrase, is not a sufficient reason for his abstaining from them, if he had the idea in his mind. No one ridiculed more than he what is called la carrure, or squareness. There is a striking example of his boldness in this style, in the second part of the first piece of this same symphony, page 36 of the small edition of Breitkopf and Härtel; where a measure of silence, which appears superfluous, destroys all the rhythmic regularity, and endangers for the ensemble the return of the orchestra which succeeds it. Now, I shall have no difficulty in showing that the melody of Beethoven, thus prolonged, was so done with formal intent. The proof is in this same melody, reproduced a second time immediately after the point d'orgue, and which contains again two supplementary bars (D, C#, D, C#) which no one seems to notice; bars, differing from those which many would suppress, and added, this time, after the fourth bar of the theme, whereas the two others are introduced into the theme after the third bar. The ensemble of the period is thus composed of two phrases of ten bars each; there is, therefore, an evident intention of the author in this double addition—there is even symmetry, which would not exist, if the two contested measures were suppressed, leaving the two other measures which have not been attacked. The effect of this passage of the Scherzo does not shock; on the contrary I confess it pleases me much. The symphony is thus executed in all the parts of the world in which the great works of Beethoven are understood. All the editions of the score, and separate parts contain these two bars; and, when, in 1850, with regard to the performance of this master-piece at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society of Paris, a journal reproached me with not having suppressed them, considering this error of engraving a fact of public notoriety, I received in a few days a letter from Mr. Schindler. Now Mr. Schindler wrote me expressly to thank me for not having made this correction. Mr. Schindler, who passed his life with Beethoven, does not believe in this pretended fault of engraving; and he assured me that he had heard the two famous measures in all the performances of this Symphony which took place under the direction of Beethoven himself. Would not the author have corrected it immediately had he recognized it as a fault? Whether he changed his opinion or not on this subject, in the latter years of his life, I cannot say.

Filippo Trajetta.

[The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, in recording the death of this once noted composer, which took place in that city on the 9th inst., adds the following interesting memoir, which we copy with the omission only of a few unessential details.]

Phil. Trajetta was born at Venice in the month of January, 1776. Tomaso Trajetta, his father was one of the most eminent pupils of Durante, the well known founder of the Neapolitan school; after leaving whose instructions, he was called to compose for San Carlo at Naples, the Aliberti at Rome, and the principal theatres of Florence, Venice and Milan. He was subsequently called to teach Maria Theresa, Joseph the Second and Catharine the Second, in whose courts he composed his most successful operas. At St. Petersburg he became acquainted with a Swedish lady, whose brothers occupied a high position at the Russian court, and, although of a different religion from his own, he being a Catholic and she a Lutheran, he married her. Finding his health to suffer from the rigors of the Northern winters, Trajetta paid a short visit to England, and then removed to Venice, where he died in the year 1779. He was buried in one of the principal churches of Venice, and the inscription on his monument does him the high honor to designate him as Musicæ Reformer!

Phil. Trajetta, at the time of his father's death, was in his third year, and had but a faint recollection of him; but his stately manner, large wig, and richly ornamented sword, which he always wore, made an impression on the boy, which was never effaced from his memory. The care of educating the young Trajetta now fell upon his mother, who, with the strictest severity of maternal love, fulfilled her duties with justice to her son, and honor to herself. Trajetta was placed under the charge of the Jesuits at the Public Studies of Venice, which he left at the early age of thirteen, having received the unusual distinctions of being awarded the highest, and, we believe, only premium in the gift of the Examiners, who, at that time, were selected from the principal officers of government.

After studying music, (which was only intended as an accomplishment, his expectations pointing to the glory and eclat of military life), under minor professors, he was placed under the instruction of Feneroli and Perillo, who inducted him into the mysteries and profundities of thorough-bass, counterpoint, fugue, and composition generally. These learned musicians—pupils of Durante, and co-disciples of his father—finding him beyond the reach of any further instruction from them, advised him to go to Naples to profit by the superior advice of the veteran Piccini, likewise a pupil of Durante, to whom, in fact, the world is indebted for the brightest ornaments of the lyric stage in the Augustan age of musical composition.

In Piccini he found a kindred spirit, and, as he often said with tears of gratitude, he derived from him much important information, and many valuable hints in the philosophy of composition.

At Piccini's house he met many distinguished composers and singers, and frequently sang duets with the great tenor, Davidi the elder, of whom he always spoke in terms of unreserved praise.

About this time he composed, as an amateur, an opera in which Davidi was to sing at San Carlo; but, the revolution then breaking out, Piccini, being suspected of republican tendencies on account of his daughter's marriage with a gentleman who wore the unpardonable cockade, was obliged to fly from Naples, and hence, through the loss of Piccini's influence and protection, the abandonment of the design of producing Trajetta's opera.

Trajetta then joined the patriot army and fought by the side of Mack, who, although a Colonel in the royal army, threw up his commission and took the humble position of private soldier, and thus contended against his former companions in arms, although commanded by his father—the Generalissimo of King Ferdinand's forces. It is unnecessary, at this place, to attempt a description of the brutal betrayal of the patriot army by Lord Nelson and Cardinal Ruffi. We only refer to these misfortunes of the patriots to show their entire and perfect defeat; large numbers were thrown into prison, and Trajetta was among them, charged with the additional crime of having composed the patriotic hymns, which were sung by the soldiery from morning till night.

He remained in a horrible dungeon, several feet below the level of the sea, without light, without clothing, almost without food, surrounded by vermin and filth, for the space of eight months, when he was liberated through a secret influence, provided with a German passport, and placed on board an American vessel owned by General Derby, of Boston, who was also a passenger. Trajetta arrived in America in the winter of 1799, and settled in Boston, where he wrote the beautiful System of Vocal Exercises, since published in Philadelphia, and composed his celebrated Washington's Dead March. He resided some time in New York, where he composed the cantatas, "The Christian's Joy" and "The Prophecy;" also the opera of "The Venetian Maskers." He subsequently became a theatrical manager in the southern cities, producing before the public a lady bearing the name of Eliza Trajetta, and supposed to be his daughter—but she was not—who created a great sensation as a singer and actress.

Trajetta was solicited by Da Ponte, the former poet laureate of Joseph II, to return to New York to compose for La Signorina Garcia, but unfortunately, before his arrival, the company was disbanded. He then returned to the South, where he lived, secluded and quiet, in the mountains of Virginia, enjoying frequent visits from our ex-Presidents Madison and Monroe, who held him in high esteem and confidence.

His second return to the North was instigated by his friend and pupil, H. K. Hill, by whose assistance the American Conservatoire was established in Philadelphia, which produced, in 1828, the splendid oratorios, "Jerusalem in Affliction" and "The Daughter of Zion." At a later period his cantatas, "The Nativity" and "The Day of Rest," were performed by other associations.

Trajetta was a thorough contrapuntist, a performer on nearly every instrument of the orchestra, a solo-performer on several, an impassioned and cultivated singer, possessing a barytone voice of great natural ability, trained by severe study to fill the highest tenor part, and an inimitable orchestral conductor. He was likewise an accomplished linguist, a skilful chemist, a profound mathematician, and a well-read historian. In his manners he was elevated, dignified and elegant, observing the nicest punctilios of etiquette, yet constantly showing the ever-varying nuances called forth by deep feeling. He was a warm friend, an impartial critic, a man of indomitable pride and unswerving principle, always ready to bestow a favor, but never willing to receive one; in every sense he was a gentleman.

For several years Trajetta has lived a retired life, receiving visits only from a few pupils, who know how to appreciate the advantages gained from his vast learning and enlarged experience, and who retain for him a deep love of his virtues, and a profound admiration of his genius. In person Trajetta was short and slender, having remarkably small hands and feet, a flashing grey eye, large aquiline nose, and massive forehead surmounted by a peculiar arrangement of the hair—a la Virgil—which gave to his expressive face an appearance not to be forgotten.

Gleanings from German Papers.

It seems the musical firmament is never to want stars. We find the following in the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung, under date of Munich, Dec. 19.

"Upon the two young Polish artists Weiniawsky, whose second concert Franz Lachner himself directed, one of the first Munich authorities sends us the following opinion:—Criticism has thus far never dared to rank any violin virtuoso whatever with Paganini, the master most perfect in the technicalities of his art, nor even to allow any one a place near him in comparison. Herr Heinrich Weiniawsky has succeeded in forcing the admission that he not only comes near the idolized Paganini in style, rising even to the so-called demoniac caprices, but adds many a new charm. As there is here no room for a full and particular criticism upon all the technical points in this gentleman's playing, suffice it to say simply that in respect to tone, bowing, staccato, arpeggios and double stops in thirds, sixths, and tenths, greater perfection is not possible. Equally extraordinary is his brother Joseph, hardly yet 15 years of age, as a pianist. The elegance, cleanness, and strength of his touch, his clearness in the most difficult runs, the finish and roundness of his play, secure him already a rank among the first virtuosos."

That is certainly stating the case strongly.

Here is another paragraph to be recorded in the vernacular. We find it in the Kölnische Zeitung.

"Dec. 20th. The three hundredth performance of "Don Juan," which was given there for the first time Dec. 20th, 1790, 63 years ago, has taken place on the stage of the Royal Opera house at Berlin, before a crowded audience. The Regisseur of the grand Opera, Herr Stawinsky, recited a monologue, which closed amid universal applause. Fraulein Wagner was the Donna Anna. The Berlin National Zeitung gives a complete statistical account of the distribution of all the parts on the Royal Berlin Stage, from its first performance, Dec. 20th, 1790, to its three hundredth, Dec. 20th, 1853. We see among them that the talented and accomplished actor, singer, and author, Edward Devrient, now of Carlsruhe, has appeared there at various times in the characters of Don Juan, Leporello and Masetto."

The same mail brings the news of the death of Musikdirector Heuschkel, at Biberich, on the Rhine, near Mainz. He was one of C. M. von Weber's instructors. He died on the 5th Dec.

In March another opera by the Duke of Gotha is to take its chance before the public. The Berliners are to do it. Of course the "first rank of Logés" will pronounce it good. We do not know any reason, though, why even a German prince may not rise to the rank of a composer—they say Prince Albert (of the same family) has risen to be a Russian spy.

How much shall I Practice?

It is not of so much consequence how long you practice as it is how you practice. You may practice from morning till night, and yet you are likely to have gained nothing by it, except bad habits. Be mindful, above all, of what you are doing, and let your ear be with it. You will sometimes meet pianoforte-players who play like machines; who neither hear nor feel what they are playing. This results especially from the neglect of the ear. The study of the mechanism of piano-playing too easily induces us to play thoughtlessly, since it requires so little feeling; hence do not dream, but be spirited and cheerful and have all your senses about you, so that nothing escapes your control. Five-finger-exercises, scales, chord-passages, double tones, arpeggios, trills ("the most beautiful ornament through three centuries," as one musical writer calls it), ought to be practiced every day, because they are the rudiments of all compositions for the piano-forte. So we must strive to grow every day at least a little better in the execution of them. With this view, the constant practice of the celebrated exercises by Cramer, Moscheles, Kalkbrenner, Bertini, Döhler, etc., in which almost every peculiarity of the piano-forte is regarded, and among which are pieces of solid musical value—is earnestly recommended to every one who desires to become a fine pianist.

With the mechanical cultivation the musical must go hand in hand. Hence do not always play exercises, but also pieces which ennoble the taste and feeling, pieces which contain true music. In the selection of these, we have regard to the nature and character of the piano-forte; they must display its finest qualities; to use a professional term, they must be pianoforte-like. You frequently find pieces for this instrument which sound most beautifully upon paper, but very badly upon the piano-forte; and you may congratulate yourselves if after playing them, one or the other of your nice fingers is not spoiled. The musical literature, however, is more than rich in compositions in which the instrument is not made a sacrifice to the music, but pours forth its sweetest tones with brilliancy and splendor. It is only necessary to know who has written them, and where they are to be had. This knowledge you may claim of your teacher.

It is further necessary for the improvement of the taste to hear good music frequently, and to read about it. For the former, every important city offers opportunity enough, and Boston more than any other in this country; for the latter, I recommend the regular perusal of the paper in which you just now—perhaps only accidentally—are reading. If besides, you enjoy the intercourse of intelligent musical persons, there is no fear that your taste will go astray.

To speak now of the amount of time which ought to be devoted to your daily practice, provided it is conducted in the manner above described, I may say: practice as much as possible; the more the better; practice two, three, four, or more hours a day, regularly; also avail yourself of all the accidental time in which you are at leisure, and do not even disregard the minutes.*

*I need not observe that this is said to advanced scholars, not to beginners. These latter, especially if they are children, should, in my opinion, not practice at all; at least not during the first lessons. If, however, their parents or other relatives are able to control their proceedings, it is of course another affair.

As for the right use of these latter, I translate a funny, but very instructive passage from Friedrich Wieck, one of the most experienced, intelligent, and successful music-teachers in Germany. He says:—

"You don't make enough of the minutes. As the general attainments of our education require so much time,—as our friends bereave us of so many an hour,—alas! and the balls with their preparations consume whole days,—alas! and parties, sleighrides, lectures, etc., can also not be attended to without wasting fine hours: should we not at least save the remaining minutes? It is ten minutes before dinner; to the piano, quickly! two five finger-exercises, two scales, two difficult passages from the music-piece which I am studying, and a self-composed exercise, are easily done,—and now the turkey and the pie will taste the better. My dear Emma, we may talk ever so long about the immense snow, yet it does not melt for that. Look here! how do you like this passage? It is from a beautiful Notturmo by Chopin, but so difficult that I must practice it a hundred times more than any other one, lest I should always be obliged to stop on its account, and never play the piece before an audience. Do you not think it is wonderfully fine, elegant, and original? To-night I am doomed to pass three hours without music; therefore I shall now busy the disobedient third finger with a very dry, but most useful exercise. It has by its obstinacy and weakness spoiled me so many a fine passage; I'll trouble it now until it gets tired, etc., etc.

"What do you think? How many hours may these minutes amount to in a year?"

Though not all playing is practicing, yet playing to an audience is always most useful, and indispensable for the acquiring of that confidence, that self-command, without which no performance will succeed; not to mention that the thought that more ears than our own are listening, together with a natural ambition, stimulates us to an uncommon exertion of all our powers, which of course must be much in favor of our progress. Try, therefore, frequently to delight your friends by the playing of the pieces you have thoroughly studied; but never play to persons who disregard music or who are in the habit of talking during your performance; cease instantly when you hear it. This is by no means impolite; it shows only that you esteem music higher than they do.

From all things regularly done we reap a double fruit. Hence practice regularly so that it shall become a dear custom with you. Attend to it even when you do not feel inclined, when your spirits are low. Full-grown persons must have enough mastery over themselves to perform their duty at any time with cheerfulness; and children too must learn it. (But don't make them cry; try rather to prevail on them by love.) A proper pianoforte-student should even possess heroism enough to renounce the most tempting pleasures, when interfering with his regular time of practice. Should you not be able to do so, do at least what Fr. Wieck said about the minutes. Never flatter yourself with the thought that a few days make no difference; on the contrary, three or four days without practice put you six or eight days back. This being the truth, you will admit that some of your friends are on a wrong way, who close their instrument for weeks and months together, and go into the country to practice horse-back-riding, gunning and bathing, instead of the piano-forte. If you enjoy these recreations after your day's work is done, I have no objection to it; but never sacrifice to the horse or the gun a minute of your regular time of practice.

Much regular and careful practice is by all means indispensable. No fine pianist has become so without it, however great his talent, however good his instruction. I know a number who have practised not only all the day, but a part of the night too, so that one might say, they lived upon the key-board. But this I would not advise you to do, even if you had the time and perseverance. You have not made music your profession; to you she shall only be a dear friend, who accompanies you soothingly and comfortingly through all the trials of life; who exalts your joys and your sorrows; ay! who exalts and ennobs yourself, your whole being, if you treat her rightly. Should we not do all we can to gain such a friend?

THE CEMETERY IN —.

Go Northward from the busy town, pass by the placid pond,
And enter the secluded wood but a few steps beyond;
A pathway, slippery with the leaves from former summers shed,
Through well befitting shade conducts to the City of the Dead.

The gentle knoll that Nature reared, the green and grassy glen,
Art's fairy fingers have retouched and beautified again;
No sights unwelcome, no rude sounds the scene's soft beauty mar;
Mid flowers and marble monuments the resting-places are.

And many an elegant device upon the stones behold!
The Angel-child, the broken shaft, the serpent's mystic fold:
Hope's Anchor, that the life-worn soul cannot but rest upon,
And the faithful Flame aspiring still to the Everlasting Sun.

As in the neighboring city's streets workmen with every year
New habitations for the throng of living men uprear,
So evermore extend these homes, as, to long slumber led,
Earth's severed households meet once more in the City of the Dead.

And in the crowded city's streets men waken with the day,
And to the workshop and the mart pursue their eager way:
But with the sun upriseth none that here hath lain his head,
To walk among the grass-bound paths in the City of the Dead.

And through the crowded city's streets men journey from afar,
On pleasure and on gain intent, in loaded coach and car;
But the dwellers in the sepulchres,—they travel not again;
Ho! Pilgrims that have entered here, here doth your rest remain!

And through the spacious city streets pass long processions off,
With martial music on the air, and banners borne aloft;
Here only funeral trains come in all noiselessly and slow,
Not now to laud some son of earth, but to lay some sleeper low.

There need no rites of prayer and hymn to consecrate this grove,
Where sighs and gushing tears have been and longings of vain love;

Where while the dust to kindred dust friends, families return,
Sorrow within the heart shall lie like ashes in the urn.

Where every soul that hath been bid some loved one to resign,
Hath in its secret chamber said, "What sorrow is like mine!"
And hearts like Rachel's still shall bleed, and will not have relief;

Such woes, sweet wood, have hallowed thee: thou'rt consecrate by grief.

From my Diary. No. XXXVIII.

NEW YORK, Jan. 15.—Last night, in spite of the attractions of Wood's Minstrels, Christy's Minstrels, Buckley's Minstrels, and Uncle Tom's Cabin at some three different places of amusement, a fine large audience assembled at the Tabernacle to hear the performances of the Philharmonic Society! Well, that is encouraging. Think of it; this is the twelfth season, and the public—which crowds three halls nightly, year in and year out, to hear, "Down in Tennessee," "Lucy Neal," "Jim along Josey," and other classic melodies from the South, or imitations thereof,—has reached the point of sustaining four—yes, four concerts a year, like those of which Boston has from ten to twenty in a winter, not to mention the extras. The Tabernacle was not crowded—there was room enough for a few more—but still there were so many, that after the concert I went on my way rejoicing. Still, when I reflect how much the cultivation of a taste for high Art, be it in painting, sculpture or music, depends upon a long familiarity with the great works in either department, I do not wonder that the Philharmonic Society has not yet been able to fill any hall of large dimensions. Had Metropolitan Hall not been burned there were some chance for hope, that a new class of the community might be induced to attend by adopting a scale of prices, as Jullien did. There are two things, which sometime or other in the lapse of ages may possibly be achieved even in New York—an annual series of Oratorios, and another of Symphonic concerts, well supported.

Last night we had the second Symphony of Schumann—which did not take me along with it. Indeed, the nearer we drew to the close the better I was pleased. Until the works of Haydn and Mozart are lost I do not wish a repetition of this. I found it very heavy and dull—it required an effort to listen to it. How different it was with the second Symphony of Beethoven, which came after the intermission! Really, for richness of melody, clearness of structure, and glorious beauty of instrumentation, does any of Beethoven's works surpass it? The one I hear last I find always is his best. Within a few days I have been looking over some German musical periodicals of the time when this work was composed, and it does one good to see how it at once took its place all through Germany, with the best of Mozart and Haydn. The period from 1793 to 1806 was very fertile in the production of Symphonies. Who now knows the authors of them, save the two great exceptions? From 1803 to 1807, Beethoven had a rival in this department of music—not Haydn—"hin war all seine Kraft"—he had ceased to write—but one whose works were more highly praised than his own. His name was Eberl, and, had he lived, perhaps he would not now have been forgotten. This, by the way.

As I listened last night to that glorious work, I went back half a century in imagination, and looked at the audience in Prince Lobkowitz's palace, as they listened to this work, so full of innovations, so new in its ideas and in the mode of treating them, so difficult (then) of performance, and deformed—as they must have thought—by such oddities and singular freaks. However, they became reconciled at length, and then came the "Eroica," and—the man was crazy!

Miss Brainard is a sweet singer, with a delicious voice, and Schubert's Ave Maria seemed well chosen, which Handel's "Rejoice Greatly" did not, for her.

A man by the name of Mozart once ventured to express an opinion, that Handel, however much in some of his songs he gave way to the fashions of his time, always had something in him—and that in the midst of his old fashioned roudades there is an idea, for one capable of appreciating it. I have a certain feeling of respect for the opinion of that same Mozart, and felt all the way through the "Rejoice Greatly" that with the trumpet tones of a Mara, or a Malibran, it would stir up the soul.

Mendelssohn's Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt was the closing piece, but we had very little "stille" (silence), owing to so large a portion of the audience hurrying out to get a "glückliche Fahrt" home, in omnibus and car. The piece lost its effect, and had I never heard it before I might have agreed with some critics, who were speaking in hard terms of it, as we came out—as it is, not.

Jan. 20.—I declare there is one delightful place in this city to go to, and that is Bryan's Gallery. After some months' interregnum, I find it has all the charm of novelty again. If the collection was anywhere but in this money-changing place, it could not be so deserted. But its owner is above the usual modes of attracting attention, and like a certain musical journalist, who might be mentioned, thinks that the good, like truth, will make its way. So it will, no doubt, in time, but truth makes martyrs' skulls her stepping-stones. White's catalogue has really great merit, and the best possible preparation for the galleries of Europe, which one can make in this country, is to study these pictures with that pamphlet in hand. There are several young ladies just now studying in the gallery and making copies of their favorites. One devotes herself mainly to heads, another to landscapes, and succeeds so well that I think we shall hear of her again, after her studies in Italy, whither she goes this spring, I am told. Those who make copies here can hardly do it from any pecuniary motive. S. told me of a case in point. A young painter of a good deal of merit occupied himself some three weeks upon a copy of one of Bryan's pictures, and succeeded finely. When finished it was framed at an expense of $8. It was sent to a dealer, who sold it and returned the artist—$11. I forget whether, reckoning up all the expenses to which he had been put, calling his time nothing, this sum left him 12½ cents plus or minus.

A friend rather joked me for putting so much faith in Mr. Bryan. Now, he is a man who has studied the subject on which he speaks, he never makes rash assertions, does not pretend that his is a collection of master-pieces,—claiming only to have specimens of masters—and in all cases speaks of a picture, and of his opinion of it, in a manner which shows both his knowledge and honesty. I am not ashamed to trust a man whose opinions upon paintings are quoted with respect by the London Art Journal.

BOSTON, JAN. 28, 1854.

Musical Instruments.—Crystal Palace Awards.

We have received, in pamphlet form, the "Report of the Jury on Musical Instruments, at the Crystal Palace, New York, 1853." It is an interesting and instructive document, from the pen of Wm. Henry Fry, reporter of the Jury, besides whom the Jury consisted of Messrs. Wm. Norris, of Philadelphia, (Chairman); Geo. F. Bristow, (Secretary), Emile Girac, Theo. Eisfeld, Alfred Boucher, and Richard Storrs Willis, all of New York; L. Meignen, of Philadelphia, M. Jullien, and Max Maretzek.

The Report bears every internal evidence of candor, intelligence and faithful devotedness on the part of the Jury, whose method of examining and testing the multitudes of instruments submitted to them appears to have been philosophical and thorough. They held their sessions, for the sake of greater quiet, chiefly in the night, after the palace was closed to the public, and frequently their labors were pursued "hard on to morning's dawn." Each member also made his own observations singly at all convenient times.

Undisturbedly and temperately, they examined every instrument practically, theoretically, and historically; looking to its positive outworkings, its relations to art, and connection with previous steps, improvements, and claims to originality. In order to determine as exactly as possible the merit of each instrument, there was adopted a scale of adjectives, each of particular import as applicable to quality of tone, equality of the same, action, strength, finish, originality, and so forth. The notes of all the scales were tried diatonically, chromatically, in octaves and in chords; the tenacity and durability of the components of whatever instrument carefully considered; the supposed or stated rank or price of the instrument taken into view; the nature of any novelty, asserted or found, specially weighed. On each and all these points, the votes were finally taken. And in order that no treacherous memory might injure the cause of any claimant to honors among the exhibitors of pianos, those instruments were ranged side by side, by order of the musical jury. Thus our body was enabled on the instant to determine, comparatively and positively, the quality and rank of whatever instrument so tested. And I may here remind you, Mr. Chairman, of a fact which constantly and agreeably struck us during these general investigations and decisions—which was, that the combined opinion of the jurors hardly in a single instance differed from that contained in the private note-book of each member of it, taken down during his individual investigation; and this gratifying circumstance will account for the absence of any minority Report, and for the unanimity of opinion to which we have come.

Of course, the most important instruments before the Jury were the Piano-fortes. They started with the principle that the highest quality of any artificial instrument is its resemblance to the singing voice; and on this ground, of vocality of tone, they unanimously awarded the first prize to Erard's Grand Piano. The remarks of the Report on this instrument will be read with interest:

That there may be no misunderstanding as to the decided opinion of the Committee on this very important matter, let me state that their appreciation of Erard's Grand Pianos is complete and irrefragable; that they deem these instruments not only the best, but much the best, in the great vocal quality indispensable to the first class; and that, under the hands of a modern master, whose digital dexterity and diversified grasp can compress distant octaves into sonorous juxtaposition, and shade to the extent allowed by the piano whatever note, such an instrument partakes, in a measure, of the eloquent and heroic temper of a chorus and an orchestra, and opens a new era in the transcendental possibilities of pianoism. This fact should be impressed on our American makers, in order that they may strive to reach, as speedily as possible, the apex of distinction thus accorded to the great French maker. It may be remarked, in connection with this matter, that the superiority of Erard's pianos arises from his superiority as a musician. Instructed in the rules of High Art, and with the delicate and noble sense of a master of sound, he comes to the work of piano-forte making better fortified than any other man. He feels and knows what are the highest lyrical requirements of a piano: and the advanced ingenuities of the age seconding his efforts, he is enabled to take, incomparably, the first rank as a maker of poetically-toned piano-fortes. The Committee, however, came to a conclusion in regard to Erard's pianos that, owing to a single great deficiency, which shall be stated in its proper place, their use in the United States must be extremely limited; but with this qualification, they are of opinion, that American piano-forte makers should study high musical art, as Erard has done, if they would rival him: by that they mean Musical Method, Style, and Philosophy.

The single deficiency alluded to, is their not standing in tune in our climate. The Committee made a distinct experiment upon all the pianos, in regard to their relative powers of standing in tune. The other qualities taken into the general account, were invention, quality of tone, action, touch, frame and case. Under each head they note three degrees of excellence, designated by the terms fine, good and fair. Of Grand Pianos there were only six exhibitors. The Messrs. Chickering, of this city, offered no specimens of their manufacture. The instrument of Erard, Paris, was pronounced fine in all the above qualities, with the exceptions of frame, which is set down as good, and durability of tune. To it was awarded the first bronze medal, the silver being reserved for new inventions. The same to that of Huni & Hubert, Switzerland. Bronze medals also were awarded to the Grand Pianos of Stodart, England, and of Bassford, New York. The specimen exhibited by Hallett & Davis of this city, was pronounced fine in quality of tone, fair in equality, good in action, and fine in touch, frame and case, but received no award. Among the Cabinet-Upright Pianos, bronze medals were awarded to Pleyel and to Erard, and a silver medal to Debain, all of Paris. Among Square Pianos of three strings, in whole or part, bronze medals are awarded to Huni & Hubert, Switzerland, to Bassford, to Lighte & Newton, and to Firth, Pond & Co., all of New York; and "Honorable Mention" to Hallet & Davis, and George Hews, of this city. Among the Square Pianos with two strings, the "Æolian Attachment" of Gilbert was "admitted" by the Committee, and a bronze medal awarded.

We admire the frankness with which the Report dismisses some productions as of bad tendency in Art. For instance: "The Banjos, being esteemed barbarous, are passed by our body, as unworthy of notice and beneath the dignity of Art." "Keyed-Stop Violins, inartistic and injurious to Art;" "intended to act as guides, by way of frets to the soul of the player." And the following is a richly needed lesson:

The necessity of Schools of Art and Design among us is exhibited in not a few instances, in the vulgar, tawdry decorations of American pianos, which show a great deal of taste, and that very bad. Not only do we find the very heroics of gingerbread radiating in hideous splendors, fit for the drawing-room of a fashionable hotel, adorned with spit-boxes among other savageries; but even the plain artistic black-and-white, of the keys—that classic simplicity and harmonious distinction—is superseded for pearl and tortoise-shell and eye-grating vermilion abominations. The Committee would advise the makers of these latter instruments to keep them exclusively for the Shanghai trade.

We cannot enter farther into the particulars of this interesting Report; but to give an idea of the extent and the importance, both commercially and socially, of the manufacture of musical instruments in this country, we conclude our extracts with the following:

Few persons, your Reporter would remark, are aware of the great and rapidly growing trade in musical instruments. If the Committee be not misinformed, the value of the manufacture of pianos alone in this country is equal to one-fourth of that of the cotton crop; that staple which is supposed to weigh chiefly the chances of peace or war with Europe. At the present rate of increase in the manufacture of American pianofortes, their annual value must in comparatively a few years, reach the enormous sum of fifty million dollars. This immense spread of the lyrical material in the United States, our Committee wish me to dwell upon, as it does not appear in public documents, or enter into the speeches of statesmen, but which, nevertheless, has more to do with the elevation and sustentation of a people worthy of being called free, than most vaunted treaties or the best senatorial orations. Our Committee fully believe, that the artists and fabricators who introduce the love for the beautiful into the homes of the humble; who substitute pictures, statues, pianos, or whatever other out-working of taste, for rude, coarse, and noxious excitements and stimulants, have infinitely more to do with the glory and advancement of the American people, than the solution of party questions, or the straw-thrashings of discussion on dispensable government functions. The Committee would express their pride to note, that the army in this country is with difficulty amassed; the Report of the Secretary of War, just out, showing that one-third of the men have to be recruited afresh each year, the service offering such poor attractions in comparison with the inducements which industry everywhere presents in the United States. This fact they would place alongside of another: that there is hardly a laborer or workman in this country, who may not in the course of a few years, by the practice of temperance and prudence, be enabled to adorn his little home with a pianoforte, which, for comparative excellence, is so remarkable, that the wealth of states, a few years ago, could not have commanded such an instrument. These significant and eloquent facts in regard to the construction and disposition of the instrument most in use, the piano, the Committee would present to the public as all-important to home industry and home wealth; and they would express their opinion, that if the American makers improve for the next few years, as they have for the past few years, they may defy competition in pianos, as they already do in brass instruments.

SEVENTH SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT. This was, we believe, unanimously voted the feeblest, least inspiring and least entertaining of the series. It certainly was a bad plan to repeat the "Desert." At least the only good resulting from it was the removal of the last lingering shadows of a doubt that David's "Ode-Symphony" is literally a desert. As a dessert, after the not very satisfying courses of the first part, its music was about as stale and disappointing as the pun itself. Sig. CAMOENZ, whether New England cold or desert dreariness possessed him, sang scarcely a note in tune; not only were the sweetish tenor songs let down to baritone, but the barometer kept sinking. Yet no storm ensued:—i. e. of applause.

Part First consisted of Weber's overture to Oberon (good, but of late too common); the grand bass air from Mozart's "Magic Flute": In diesen heiligen Hallen, sung by Sig. CAMOENZ (by no means so common as it should be here); an orchestral Scherzo by Robert Schumann, which, taken thus out of its connection, was unintelligible and uninteresting to the many, whereas the entire work (Overture Scherzo and Finale) would have been both too long and too strange for a wide appreciation; the march, not the overture, from Mendelssohn's "Athalia" (the overture is grand, the march is but a second, feeble working up of the ideas of the Wedding March); and finally of the Rondo Capriccioso of Mendelssohn, for piano, played by Mr. ROBERT HELLER (with fine clear, sparkling touch, and easy execution, only coldly and without much light and shade). This, however, produced a hearty encore and was followed by one of the florid Andantes through which Jaell's fingers used to flit with so much liquid grace. Mr. Heller's turn came properly before the March; after some pause, the gentlemanly agent, Mr. Bandt, came forward and said: "Ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Heller is not here—I cannot find him!"—and the loud good humor with which this honest and naïve announcement was applauded, showed that the audience felt and admired its contrast with the pompous studied apologies so common in such cases.

The Music Hall was nearly filled, though not quite to the mark of previous Germania nights. This and the faint applause following the "Desert," were good signs to offset what has been said of the lapsing taste in this community.

WEDNESDAY'S REHEARSAL.—We rejoice that the Germanians do not allow these valuable opportunities to be converted wholly to the ends of the amusement-seeking flirts and chatter-boxes. These are not promenade concerts, where people talk and walk and dance and flirt, with music playing in the centre, like a fountain, all unheeded, save by now and then some musing solitaire amid the buzzing throng. They are opportunities whereby the denizens of town and country may make some acquaintance with good music, and where what meets the growing taste of the more earnest, is wisely mingled with, or rather followed by, light strains to catch the ears of the young seekers of amusement, in the hope that now and then a soul among them also may be caught upward by the real music.

Last time they gave us Mendelssohn's graceful, childlike, charming little overture to his domestic opera, "The Return from Abroad;" followed by the strange and sombre Andante, the exquisitely flowing and melodious Allegretto, and the Saltarello finale of his "Italian" Symphony (No. 4). This was followed by piano-playing from Mr. ROBERT HELLER, the Overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor," by Nicolai, and every form of dance, waltz, polka, galop, &c.—music, not for music, but to dance by.

EXTENSION OF GRACE.—By the new announcement of Mr. Bandt, it will be seen, that the Germanians have increased the three remaining nights of their subscription series to seven. They will give a concert every Saturday evening till the 18th of March inclusive. (Eight, in fact.) These are to be alternately "light" and "classical." Thus they provide for either taste by turns, and equally. Thus, after all, we grasp substantially those "Symphony Soirées" that dangled so tantalizingly before us and were then (as it seemed) finally withdrawn; while at the same time the Germanians will throw out plentiful "sops to Cerberus," that has so long worried them with clamors after more songs and dances and light music. It may also test effectually the relative strength of parties in this matter: although that by no means necessarily follows. We expect the "lights" to out-number—we are sure they will out-shout and clap—the rival party; but we expect also to show that the "appreciating few" fond of good music for music's sake, are not by any means so very few as it has been tauntingly and often said.

To-night the "lights" have it. A programme light indeed! and (if we may be pardoned the suggestion) a little too closely modelled upon Julien's programmes, not to endanger the Germania prestige. But we are glad to see that good overtures and parts of symphonies are not excluded. There will be some strains to warn the merry ones that higher spheres of joy and harmony exist; and perhaps these brief and fleeting glimpses of the angel will charm some to pursue his shining into the so-called "classical" soirées.

Otto Dresel's Third Soiree.

A more delightful, pure, rich feast of music than that of Tuesday evening, we have not yet had. The Chickering saloon seemed fuller than ever with the most attentive listeners. The first piece, the Trio by Beethoven, in D, op. —, has not been publicly performed before in Boston, and made a deep impression; especially that marvellously beautiful second movement, Largo assai ed espressivo, where the impassioned melody of the strings is veiled in such a thin and mystic element by the softly flowing, exquisitely fine divisions of the piano, that an awed sense of spiritual presences creeps over one. Hence it has acquired the name of Geister, or "Ghost Trio," in Germany, from this slow movement; though there is nothing of the same element in the brilliant opening Allegro con brio, or the concluding Presto. The three artists, DRESEL, BERGMANN and SCHULTZE entered entirely into the spirit of the music, which they rendered with most satisfactory clearness, finish, light and shade and true artistic fervor.

For graceful and poetic recreation between this and the next solid piece, Mr. Dresel gave us masterly interpretations of shorter piano solos from Chopin and Mendelssohn. Of the former, a Polonaise, in A flat, in the bold, chivalric, brilliant, patriotic mood of Chopin, and the spiritual and dreamy Nottornos in E major and B major. Of the latter, the Duetto and one other of the Lieder ohne Worte.

The Quartet by Schumann, for piano and stringed instruments, played here for the first time, interested us from beginning to end. It is full of fire and vigor and originality and effective contrasts. The Allegro is one of those clear, full, sustained movements, which any one, familiar with Mozart and Beethoven, might at once appreciate. The Scherzo and Finale were more strangely individual and extremely difficult, and doubtless puzzled many hearers, till attention flagged. So far as we might dare to judge from a first hearing, it is a noble work, and leaves us still in ignorance of what the Athenæum critic means by "ugly music."

The Second Part was sacredly appropriated to the glorious Concerto by Sebastian Bach. The three pianos were played by OTTO DRESEL, J. TRENKLE, and CARL BERGMANN,—the latter's debut, and a most satisfactory one, in the character of pianist. The stringed instruments were ably manned, as last year, by members of the Germania Orchestra. The full, rich, satisfying streams of melody, now in bold unison, now in "harmonious difference discreet," rolled on rejoicingly and grandly. One's soul is buoyed up and strengthened by such broad and swelling rivers of sincere and generous music. When such spontaneous, gushing heartiness is found united (as in Bach) with the highest mastery of artistic skill and learning, the pleasure is the greatest which one mind can give to another. That he had as much sentiment as learning, no one could help feeling in the second movement, the Andante, in Siciliano measure, which has the most delicate and spiritually pensive coloring. The success of the Concerto was complete; all enjoyed, all felt it; all were enchained by it to the end, and carried home a conscious treasure in its recollection.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. At the Annual Meeting of this Society, on Monday evening, 16th inst, the following Resolutions, offered by James Sturgis, Esq., were unanimously adopted and their publication ordered in this Journal. The mover introduced them with some interesting and affectionate reminiscences of our deceased friend's travels in Europe, in 1850, during which time he had been for three months his companion.

Whereas, It has pleased God to remove from the scene of his earthly labors our beloved associate and friend, JONAS CHICKERING, and

Whereas, It becomes this society, at its first subsequent gathering, to take fitting notice of this so mournful event and so serious loss, therefore it is

Resolved, That the Harvard Musical Association recognizes in his demise an irreparable loss; since it is the removal of one personally endeared to all;

one who was ever earnest in his endeavor to promote the cause and raise the standard of that science which so deeply interests its members; and who by his position and social influence did much to extend the musical cultivation and improve the musical taste of the community and country.

Resolved, That this society has lost a true friend and most worthy member, the musician an earnest and liberal benefactor, the musical community a faithful co-operator, the City of Boston a valuable citizen and one whose modesty and liberality equalled his usefulness and integrity of character;

Resolved, That this society deeply sympathizes with the bereaved family of the deceased; and that a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to them and the same placed upon the records of the Association.

Money versus Music: or Business before Art.

MR EDITOR;—A friend called my attention the other day to a letter from Boston in the New York Musical Review, in which among other matters, Mr. Dresel and his soirées are discussed. The letter is evidently "a business operation." The compliments lavished upon Boston and the Bostonians—the laudatory notices of all our native celebrities, from the Handel and Haydn Society to—Ike Partington! the whole tone and spirit of the paper prove this.

Our leading manufacturers of musical instruments are tenderly patronized. We are gratified with the information that Church-music is better cared for in Boston than in any city in the world, and our choirs, choristers and organists are implored to send in their names to the N. Y. M. R. that the clairvoyant or clair-oyant critic may be enabled, sitting in his own sanctum, to discourse as appreciatingly of their various excellencies as he could if he had heard their performances with the bodily ear! Why not—since a kindred spirit is able to produce the very best article of Paris correspondence in a snug back room of the Herald office? The writer in the Review was evidently "laboring in his vocation." He felt of course that all these compliments required the relief of a good stinging bit of injustice to something or somebody. And casting about for a victim, he unluckily for himself, stumbled upon Mr. Dresel, about whom he expatiates in a manner so perfectly absurd, that his remarks would be beneath notice were they not made to serve as the introduction to a general vituperation of foreigners and foreign artists, which, as an appeal to the basest and silliest portion of the public, deserves a brief rebuke.

During two successive seasons, Mr. Dresel's quiet, unostentatious and elegant soirées have been fully attended by persons familiar with the best music on one or on both sides of the Atlantic. These persons, who have listened with ever fresh delight to Mr. Dresel's renderings of the finest musical compositions, are naturally astonished to learn that they ought to be ashamed of themselves for failing to perceive his "automatic rigidity of touch," his "heavy playing," his "remarkable jumbling together of the notes," which they never remarked. Those (and they are not a few) of the best amateur performers in what the critic is pleased to call "the most musical community in America," who have been enjoying Mr. Dresel's "unequal scales and arpeggios," are rebuked and urged to a nobler ambition by the intimation that they can play much better than he themselves! And the sympathies of the audience are enlisted in behalf of the dead whose works they love, by a suggestion that the bones of Chopin probably writhe in his grave whenever Mr. Dresel plays a Notturmo!

How well our critic is fitted to reveal to us our strong delusion, may be inferred from the fact that he can not only tell us how badly Mr. Dresel plays what he does play, but also how horribly he plays what he does not play! The Sonata Pathétique of Beethoven was our critic's particular affliction at Mr. Dresel's second soirée. What a fine-ear must he be, who was excruciated by Mr. Dresel's inaudible performance of a piece not in the programme—"a ditty of no tone," piped to the spirit only, an invisible massacre of a masterpiece, upon an immaterial piano! But, as I said before, the utter folly of this writer's remarks upon so accomplished and admirable a performer as Mr. Dresel, would provoke no notice were it not that they are conceived in the worst spirit of the janissary press. The interests of Art in America demand that the public feeling should make it plain that our communities, desirous of serious and advancing musical culture, will tolerate no such unprincipled assaults upon that most estimable and valuable class of persons, the foreign musicians, who bring to us the results of a culture necessarily higher than our country has yet attained. We welcomed the tacticians of Germany in the infancy of our military education—the engineers of France when we were learning to build and to bulwark our cities—we now look to Europe for whatever of ability, of learning and of taste she can furnish to us—that our native capacities for music, as well as for all other arts and sciences, may be well and worthily developed.

The improvement of American musical instruments can neither be arrested by the sneers of third-rate foreign musicians, nor accelerated by the applause of venal native critics. When American musical compositions can command the attention and the admiration of American audiences, the foolish sneers will be found on the same side with the venal praises.

And neither American manufacturers nor American composers can fail to feel that nothing can be so hurtful to the interests of Art, and consequently to their own interests, as the debasing influence of a vulgar and reckless press—a press boutiquière, which deals in criticisms as barbers deal in wigs, or astrologers in destinies. Balzac has given us in the portraits of Lousteau and his friends, the features of these retailers of opinions, whose convictions are their own only as the linen-draper's goods belong to the linen draper till the purchaser appears. We have not yet imported many representatives of this class; but a more meanly ambitious and contemptible variety of the same type has sprung up in our own soil, which threatens to do mischief to the cultivation of the "humanities" among us. It rests with the public to decide what the extent of the mischief shall be. The musical public of Boston, at least, we feel sure, will take care that on this soil the noxious influence shall not spread far nor sink deep. II.

Our correspondent administers a deserved rebuke. He hits the nail upon the head, when he characterizes the "letter from Boston," with its shameless and dishonest criticism upon as true an artist as has ever yet set foot in Boston or upon our shores, as a business operation. Any person, at all acquainted with the mysteries of newspaperdom, and especially of New York musical journalism, must have seen through the matter at a glance. That letter plainly did not emanate from any Boston source; nor from the editorial fountain proper of the Review in which it appeared; nor from any person who could properly be called musical or who had any serious love or reverence for Art, or who could necessarily be presumed ever to have heard Mr. Dresel play, or who, if he had heard him, could have judged whether his playing were good, bad or indifferent;—but from a travelling business emissary of the said Review, from its financial drummer, who sends these off-hand letters home, well-spiced with personalities, both flattering and abusive, to pique the curiosity of all the meanest of the many, and thus advertise his paper and draw in subscribers, advertising patronage, &c. The publication of the letter was heralded by paragraphs in Boston daily papers, (paragraphs of that questionable aspect between editorial puff and business advertisement,) calling attention to the spicy number of the Review. No matter who is victimized in such a case, no matter how the cause of Art is served, the main point is to make a stir about "our Journal," and make every body want to see it. The famous Sontag bribery stir in New York, some months since, is understood to have emanated from the same source and with the same motive.

In a word the article was written in the interests of business, and not in the interests of Art; although that business was to circulate an Art journal. In these late and palmy days of journalism there has sprung up to monstrous power, in New York, what has been very happily denominated a "Satanic Press." In what does its "satanic" element consist? In its unscrupulous, unblushing sacrifice of truth and public confidence to its own business interests; in its appeal to had passions and vile curiosity to make the paper sell. Shall musical journalism, also,—shall the ministry of the Press to the sacred cause of Art and Taste in the community, be tempted into borrowing these satanic levers of an outward, and commercial success! God forbid it! This is the only serious ground for taking notice of the letter. An artist, like Mr. Dresel, cannot suffer from such wanton and absurd attacks. But the cause of Music and true Art in the community must surely suffer, if business agents and subscription canvassers may be allowed to climb into the critic's chair, and make or unmake artists' reputations with the unsuspecting many, among their other advertising "dodges."

We sincerely hope the proper editors and publishers of the Musical Review will disown the letter which they may have carelessly allowed to deface their columns. It is but a week or two since we were moved of our own good will and conviction to notice the enlargement and improvement of the Review with commendation. The commendation was sincere; we had seen much to like and to respect among its editorials. We were pleased to find it copying and approving an article from our journal (written, will its editors believe it, by the very artist whom they now so virulently attack) about the so-called "pupils of Liszt and Mendelssohn." The Review singled out for special praise the sentence which declared that Germany sends over swarms of bad, as well as good musicians to our shores; and proceeded to expatiate upon the jealousy between native and foreign musicians in so reasonable a manner, although from the "native" point of view, that we did not hesitate to meet it half way and endorse its views.

Why could not the matter have remained there, upon the basis of a fair and catholic settlement? Why revive again this old stupid, bitter prejudice of native against foreign music teachers and musicians? We are sure the editor of the Review would not have done it of his own accord. But the business canvasser, who writes the letter, finds that too profitable a string to leave unpulled. He must sweep in the many,—make them all subscribe. The many are those interested in one way or another in the great business speculations of psalm-book publishing, piano-forte making, choir-teaching, &c., &c. This is the great musical world, which pays, which rolls up the grand subscription lists. And alas! for human nature, there is littleness and jealousy enough in it, to make a caricature of any foreign artist, who maintains a higher stand, quite palatable. This is the way our agent-critic evidently reasoned: what a fine bait to the many-headed monster to serve up one of the best German artists for its malicious pleasure! But we have too much faith in human nature, and in our music-loving countrymen, not to believe that (with some few exceptions) they reject the bait, and that such arts of circulating musical journals are regarded only with contempt.

The letter is cunningly devised and fortified, opening with a wholesale flattery of Boston, and ending with a neat little complimentary paragraph to our own journal, which we gratefully acknowledge, but cannot let it blind us to the truth, or silence us upon occasion of so foul an outrage against Art, as this attack on Mr. Dresel.

SIXTY-FOUR THOUSAND IN FIVE MONTHS:
THE SHAWM, a Library of Church Music, containing about One Thousand Musical Compositions; consisting of Psalm and Hymn Tunes of over One Hundred different metres; Anthems, Sentences, Chants, and every description of Sacred Set Pieces, with a new Sacred Cantata complete; also, (in the Singing School Department,) Easy Glee, Part-Songs, Vocal Exercises, &c. By WILLIAM B. BRADBURY and GEORGE F. ROOT, assisted by THOMAS HASTINGS and T. B. MASON, (of Cincinnati.)
The publishers have the satisfaction of announcing that for the first time since its publication, a little more than five months since, they are up with their orders for this book. So utterly unprecedented has been its sale, that, though the greatest exertion has been unceasingly made in its manufacture, it has been heretofore impossible fully to supply the demand.
The immense number of sixty-four thousand copies have been actually issued within the short period named, and yet until this day (Jan 21st), we have not known the time when we were not from one to six thousand copies behind our orders. Regretting the disappointment which many have experienced in not obtaining a supply heretofore, we believe we shall hereafter be able to fill every order promptly.
Of course no commendation is needed, of a work which gives such indisputable evidence of entirely meeting the wants of all classes of singers.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE attention of Subscribers to our regular series of Concerts is called to the following: On counting the number of subscription Tickets that have until now been presented for the past seven Concerts, the undersigned ascertains the fact, that the number which is still in the possession of purchasers does far exceed the number of seats in the Hall, although the sale had been stopped when the number fixed by the Committee were disposed of. This disproportion arises from the irregular use of Tickets in the hands of many purchasers; and to satisfy all holders of Tickets, the Society have concluded to give a Concert on

EVERY SATURDAY EVENING,

Until the 18th of March inclusive,

Making SEVEN more Concerts instead of THREE, admitting Subscription Tickets to any of those seven Concerts. The undersigned has had applications from many of the subscribers to compose the programme of mostly classical compositions; and again from many to have the Germans perform more music of lighter character. To satisfy all, the Society have adopted the following plan:

To perform alternately a programme of classical and one of modern music—which brings the next Concert in the category of the latter style, a Concert in which none but light music, with few exceptions, will be performed.

A limited number of Subscription Tickets at the usual terms can then be disposed of, and those who wish to secure additional sets or half sets, are invited to procure them at WADE'S Music Store, during the hours from 12 to 2. A Programme will appear on every SATURDAY MORNING in the principal papers.

The best works on Piano Instruction existing.

IN PRESS:—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO-FORTE, translated from the latest and most approved German Edition, by G. A. SCHMITT.

Also JUL. KNORR'S REVISED EDITION OF A. E. MULLER'S METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.

The above works are in reality the most complete, elaborate, and, at the same time, condensed works on the subject of which they treat. They contain Studies and Examples which will lead the scholar to a mastery of all the modern achievements of the Art; and are, in the opinion of leading German critics, the best books on musical instruction extant. The GUIDE is not only a key to the succeeding work, but contains a list of over two hundred pieces, by the first masters, in progressive order, with notes of advice to the teacher, showing how they might be best practised for the advancement of the pupil.

The COMPLETE METHOD contains many suggestions of the greatest importance to Teachers and Pupils that have not been mentioned in any other book of instruction.

These exceedingly valuable works are in press, and will be ready at an early date. OLIVER DITSON, Boston.

—Edward L. Balch,

MUSIC! MUSIC! MUSIC!

IT IS NOW AN ESTABLISHED AND CONFIRMED FACT
THAT THE

Modern School for the Piano-Forte

IS BY FAR THE MOST INGENIOUS, SIMPLE, PROGRESSIVE AND COMPREHENSIVE METHOD FOR THE PIANO THAT HAS EVER BEEN PRESENTED TO THE PUBLIC,—embracing a complete system, from the very outset to the highest classical music.

The anatomy of the hands is shown by beautifully colored plates. The entire work surpasses all previous musical publications, as regards mechanical appearance and elegance.

The author, NATHAN RICHARDSON, has spent the last five years in Europe for the sole purpose of getting up an Instruction Book, which would embrace the styles and effective Exercises of ALL distinguished Pianists and Teachers. To accomplish that object, he was assisted by

EIGHTEEN EMINENT EUROPEAN PIANISTS.

The result has been, an Instruction Book so comprehensive and ingenious, that a pupil will acquire the styles and mechanical difficulties of all celebrated Pianists, and that, too, with far less labor and practice than is usually required to learn an ordinary composition, under the old methods.

It is not an abridgement, neither is it an old work translated, revised, and remodeled. It is a work which is entirely new throughout, and is thoroughly adapted to our wants. It has been examined and admitted to be the best Instruction Book ever published in America, by the following distinguished Professors, Pianists and Teachers, who have given us the most complimentary recommendations, which have already appeared before the public.

unpopularity of the wondrous inspirations is an inevitable misfortune. Yet, is it a misfortune? . . . I doubt it. It is perhaps necessary that such works should remain inaccessible to the multitude. They disclose talents full of charm, splendor, and power, destined, if not to the lower class, at least to the third estate of intelligences: brilliant genius, like that of Beethoven, was created by God for sovereign hearts and minds.

[From the New York Musical World and Times.]

Mr. Fry's Letter to Mr. Willis.

NEW YORK TRIBUNE OFFICE: }
January 10th, 1854. }

MY DEAR WILLIS:—As a well-wisher to yourself and your journal, I regret to see such a notice as you made in the Musical World of the 7th instant, consisting of a dozen lines all told, on my Symphony of Santa Claus, with a paragraph on two other symphonies of mine, containing several egregious and injurious misstatements. To both of these editorial paragraphs permit me to reply at length, simply for the cause of truth and the interests of High Art.

I believe that Santa Claus is the longest instrumental composition ever written on a single subject, with unbroken continuity; it was composed expressly to exhibit the poetry and grandeur of Jullien's superb orchestra; it was presented designedly and appropriately for the first time, upon Christmas Eve at Metropolitan Hall, and repeated nearly every evening until the departure of the company for Boston, and received with intense and affectionate applause, and encored upon every occasion, notwithstanding its extreme length of half an hour; and such a work merits extended criticism in a musical journal. I am aware it may excite your surprise when I claim for Santa Claus that it is the longest unique symphony ever written, as we all know that a few of the classical symphonies, composed according to the classical four-movement rule, require over three quarters of an hour to perform; but I intend in this communication, to combat the position which you have taken as to my non-observance of the unities, and to demonstrate that that there is no more unity in the four distinct movements of the classical symphony, than in four different novels or different plays by the same author,—that their so-called unity is an illogical absurdity of the founder of the school, and only accepted and admired by those who have not the radical originality to expose the error, and who take on trust in music, as in religion, in government and in political economy, all things which bear the sanction of ages. But for Santa Claus I claim that it possesses the unities, which in the classic symphonies have no existence whatever, notwithstanding the folios of ink shed concerning them.

To characterize, as you do, Santa Claus as "an extravaganza"—a work whose tens of thousands of notes are written with the most conscientious regard to the philosophy of Art, as I understand it, and the requirements of change or progress which alone can preserve an Art from decay, would surprise me if I could be surprised. I think that the American who writes for the mere dignity of musical Art, without recompense, requires better treatment at the hands of his countrymen at least. This is the more due from an American, as the Philharmonic Society of this city, consecrated to foreign music, is an incubus on Art, never having asked for or performed a single American instrumental composition during the eleven years of its existence, but which has greedily sought for and eagerly thrust before the public every pretentious emanation from the brain of Europeans; which, too, never would play Mr. Bristow's Symphonies, that I caused to be brought for the first time before the public last winter, and whose merits Mr. Jullien was so quick to appreciate, that he, also, recently performed them. I would say, en passant, that I am not led to these remarks on the Philharmonic Society by any personal feeling, as I myself have never asked from that Society the performance of any composition of mine; but I make common cause with Americans, born or naturalized, who are engaged in the world's Art struggle, and against degrading deference to European dictation, such as, if I am rightly informed, is a part of the musical faith of the performers and some of the subscribers to that Society. As the chances for an American to put before the public any work of musical High Art, depend, in this country, upon the accidental presence of such a liberal-minded man and consummate musician as M. Jullien; as the journals-in-ordinary who profess even to have musical critics ignore such works, even when so presented to the public, and played with as much applause and enthusiasm as could possibly be accorded to any work (though the same critics would elaborately praise the same works if they bore a foreign name), there ought to be at least one technical journal in this city where technical criticism and extended analysis of original works are habitually rendered.

In reference to this matter I would state that I am connected with The New York Tribune as political and general editor, having too the critical musical department in my hands. In the capacity of musical critic, I deem it inseparable from the honest performance of my duty to write, however late at night I may sit down to the task, a full notice of any musical performance of particular novelty, so that it may be spread before the readers of that journal the very morning after the performance has taken place. Notwithstanding the Tribune is but a newspaper and of course not devoted specially to music, and has no musical types to express a musical quotation, as sometimes may be absolutely necessary to convey to the reader the meaning of the musical text and critical comment, I omit no occasion for such aesthetic duties. For example—when Il Profeta—The Prophet—of Meyerbeer, though the work of a foreigner in a foreign land, and hardly requiring criticism on this side of the water to add to its reputation—was produced lately at Niblo's, I deemed it my duty to get the full score from the manager and study every page, and on the night of the first performance, when it closed at near midnight, to sit down in my editorial room, and write some three columns of analytic criticism—historical, vocal, instrumental and personal—of the work and of the special performance of that night—all of which appeared the next morning in print, though of course I did not get to bed till dawn. I mention this to show simply what I consider a conscientious performance of a critic's duty; and of what is due by Americans to Europeans. How much more, then, is due by Americans to themselves, in the growing state of Art in this country! and how clearly, from my point of view, should I expect to see the same justice extended to me, which in all cases I mete out to others—not being guided by any geographical or chronological bias in my artistic estimate of men or things, as seem to be the Philharmonic Society and the critics who think with or speak for it!

But I give the public a symphony,—as an instrumental work, corresponding in rank and magnitude with The Prophet as an operatic work—a symphony written in the school of romantic and not formalistic Art—novel in design, novel in treatment, novel in effects, novel in instrumentation,—requiring nothing short of the incomparable qualities of a Bottesini, a Wille, a Hughes, a Lavigne, a Reichert, a Koeoig, and others of that grade to play it—written so as to double the resources and sonority of the orchestra compared with classic models—and your journal despatches it with a dozen lines—and these, in my judgment, embody a total misapprehension of the intention and spirit of the piece.

I do not know what the meaning of serious Art is—you saying my symphony is not serious. Lamb said once to a knot of wits around him—"Let's be serious, the fools are coming." And this grandiose swindle of seriousness is made the touchstone of Art, though the great writer of humanity, SHAKESPEARE, owes his greatness to his equal power over mirth and wit, with passion and grief—and makes his murder of Duncan in Macbeth, followed by the porter's jokes—and the quadruple tragedy of Romeo and Juliet, preceded by the Nurse's chatter and Peter's comicality. As for myself, I utterly and absolutely contemn such a view of serious Art. It is for the want of this whole genius, that Europe has given us no Shakspeare in music, both Beethoven and Mozart being but half made up—Beethoven being incapable of gaiety and Mozart destitute of comedy—and neither of them having uttered a witticism in speech or music in the whole course of his life.

I state broadly, that Mozart had no comic genius. His muse was mainly gentle and passive, rising to the sublime, but not comic. It may be safely stated, that a comic character should show his comedy, above all, in his solo, and the comedy of Leporello's in Don Giovanni, I, for one, cannot discover.

As to Beethoven's comedy, I shall not treat on that, as the claim is never set up that he possessed it; but I have heard him called the Shakspeare of music a hundred times: to which I reply, also, "Fudge!"

It is because there is no real view taken of the philosophy of Art—of musical Art—that a piece which begins as mine does in Heaven and then swings down to Hell, returns to Heaven, and thence to Earth to depict the family joys of a Christmas party; then dismissing the party, making tender adieu vocal according to sex and verisimilitude,—puts the LORD'S PRAYER to music, not with the drawl of monks a la Palestrina or the frizzle of eunuchs a la Farinelli, but according to the colloquial accents and purity of innocence and love,—which gives the tulaby connected with quadruple counterpoints used as they ought to be, not for mathematical somersets—ups and downs for the sake of ups and downs, but for the only true direction of music, the conveyance of an idea,—which seeks to render artistic Santa Claus, our only Fairy, who in loving sweetness is transcendental in comparison with Queen Mab;—which paints a snow storm,—in such a manner as according to the Journal of Commerce, "to cause a shudder to run through the cloaks and furs of the audience;"—which involves too, at the same time, the expression of that miraculously great artist, Bottesini, in describing the despair of a perishing traveller in the snow storm, using for the first time in Symphonic Art the grandest of sombre and pathetic instruments, the double bass in a solo cantabile;—which in portraying the "songs of the stars" on the advent of the Messiah takes the violins a whole octave above the classics into ethereal regions deemed impossible for their orchestras;—which draws children as they ought to be—poetically—toys in hand on a Christmas morn,—not as Haydn has done in his Toy Symphony, where the idea is so "run into the ground" that it was hissed in London notwithstanding the exquisite care with which Jullien gave it, rendering it on Lilliputian instruments beautifully and artistically made,—but as a momentary hint and a childish fanfare on real toys, while the orchestra discourses infantile poetry in Bo-peep heard above the din;—which winds up with a Christmas hymn instrumented with all the fullness of which only a great modern orchestra is susceptible, fortified by a chorus, and twelve drums,—the latter to express the sublimity of the rolling spheres, echoing the glad tidings,—this all, I think worth more than the passing paragraph given to it in your journal. Even had it been hissed—instead of as it was applauded to the echo—it should have received a better notice.

What is music, let me ask, in defining my position as a composer? Is it learning, or mathematical intricacies? No: if it be only these, I would leave off writing and take up mathematics where I left, and learn to calculate an eclipse. Is it imitating classical models? No. Is it "linked sweetness long drawn out?" No, it is the original mode of expressing an original idea. In the dreary ignorance of what is music, "imitative music" is called "the lowest kind." But all music is imitative, or it is good for nothing. If it be music painting passion or emotion, it but imitates artistically the tones of the voice which in speaking symbolize the thoughts and feelings. If it be descriptive music, it imitates either the language of nature as expressed in the elements or in vocal creation. To this may be added the painting of scenes by music connected with those scenes—such as a lugubrious march for a funeral—a national or other dance to call up the characters of the merry makers;—the barrack blast of the trumpet to cause the soldier to pass in review before the imagination, and so forth. To this must be conjoined mystic music, where the chords or melodic traits wind and wend like the mind's exhalations in more finely spun dreams. [Examples omitted.] * * *

The fugue, with its derivatives, finds its proper home on the organ and in the cathedral, where it typifies eternity (completely in its windings, but incompletely in the positive nature of its harmonies) and conveys the idea of vastness and impersonality; but a fugue transplanted, except for indispensably dramatic purposes, and stuck into orchestra or piano or quartet music for the sake of showing the learning of the author (as is done in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred) only shows his ignorance and want of self-reliance in the full expression of his works. It is understood that every composer who has brass enough to come in presence of the public, has written many a fugue while a journeyman—before he became a master. I mention this because there is a vast deal of cackling whenever a fugue appears by some new hand.

I have now spoken of High Art simply: there are other things to be considered, such as solo performances to exhibit the execution of the player in variations and otherwise. Such things are contrary to my views of High Art; but it is a fact which must not be overlooked that the purity and eloquence of the tone of every performer are in exact ratio of his mastery over mechanical difficulties. Witness all the solo players in Jullien's orchestra; and Listz, Thalberg, Gottschalk, &c. This fact has hitherto escaped criticism in noticing virtuosity; there is, too, a philosophy in mastering these difficulties, as they may be applied successfully in certain dramatic orchestral treatments. I have now described what I think the highest intents of Art according to the closest classifications.

Now in connection with these views I consider symphonic music, whose movements are stereotyped, whose counterpoints stand out so that they are praised, is not music of the highest kind. The ars celare artem is wanting. Hence I do not consider it the highest mission of music for Beethoven to take this initial passage, from what many call his greatest work, the Eroica, and after using it through hundreds of bars, forming the greater part of the first and second divisions of the allegro, to put it in the form of a mechanical crescendo, with an imitation free part, also mechanical, above, the whole ending with an anti-climax. But I do estimate it as the highest mission of Art when Weber, in his overture to Der Freischütz, merges form into force, verisimilitude, and subtle art, and when with Shakspearean impulse and dramatic progress he crowns the work with the grand major finale. Whether there is any mere classical ingenuity in the construction of such a piece—whether double, or triple, or quadruple counterpoints are used, or have any abstract existence even—whether the author ever got over the worse than pontem asinorum, counterpoints at the ninth and eleventh, never occurs to the musical listener—genius swallows up such detail. But to suppose, that because Weber did not lug in counterpoint was owing to ignorance, is like imagining that a college professor of Greek cannot conjugate tupe because he does not speak Greek on all occasions. In comparison with Der Freischütz overture I consider every instrumental piece previously written, on the symphonic model, as inferior in point of truth and genius; and whatever may be the opinion now, time will decide in favor of Weber.

Now I shall touch upon instrumentation. In Handel's time instrumentation had hardly got beyond the stringed quartet, so Mozart was called in to fill up the orchestral blanks in the original score of the Messiah. Haydn, however, who has done more for instrumentation than any other man, vastly enlarged it: he made it classical and pure in its school. Beethoven lent a sombre majesty to certain portions of it hitherto undeveloped. Rossini called its virtuosity into play: doubled the horn parts:

divided the first and second violins into two parts severally playing in octaves; increased its sonority, especially in piano passages; redeemed the trumpet part from the platitudes and vulgarities assigned to it by the classics. (I will except from this a single dramatic bit by Gluck.) The orchestra, as Rossini left it in his William Tell, was very much as it now is, saving the introduction of the bass clarinet, the sax horns and saxophone, and some details, especially of violinism.

As wind instrument players were generally not good, and their instruments imperfect, in classic times, we find in the classic scores comparatively little for them to do, and they are hardly ever trusted alone. Hence the stringed instruments begin to play at the first bar, and only stop as a particular favor at the last, making as the characteristic of what is called classical music a most wearisome monotony. As well might a painter use but one tint. "All red, no red." However preferable the stringed instruments are to others, it fatigues my ear to hear them throughout a whole symphony without stopping—I don't care who writes it. I have no reverence for names, but am all for facts. Instrumentation has immensely widened and improved its means since classic times. In the first place, the character of the stringed instruments comes out with three fold-force when heard after the wind, especially the brass in a long sustained passage. Their highest notes, too, are in lovely contrast with the flute, written as it ought to be, (the classics not understanding this instrument) and with the clarinet and oboe according to their present possibilities. Thus I have, in Santa Claus, carried the violins in the orchestra up to with perfect safety, to represent the scintillations of the "stars that sing." But my limits forbid me to enter into the wide sea of instrumentation, and I shall hurry on to a conclusion, noting particularly now your very words in regard to this symphony of Santa Claus, as well as to two other symphonies of mine played by M. Jullien, to which, in the same number of your journal, you devote a few lines.

In the first place you make no mention of any peculiarities of the instrumentation of The Day in the Country, except an entire misrepresentation, for which you should give your authority. You say:

"The author has re-cast the instrumentation (of The Day in the Country) to adapt it to the style in vogue at Metropolitan Hall."

I do not feel complimented, Mr. Willis, that you should think I am influenced by such irreligious or atheistic views of Art, as to adapt my music to any style in vogue. I consult my soul in writing, and nothing else. But you are utterly mistaken in saying that I recast the "instrumentation of The Day in the Country to adapt it to the style in vogue at Metropolitan Hall." The Day in the Country and The Breaking Heart were both written in the same week, previous to the Lectures which I delivered at Metropolitan Hall last winter. They were both performed at the first lecture. The scores and parts then used are the very ones used by M. Jullien at Castle Garden last summer, and recently at Metropolitan Hall; and neither in the score nor in the parts, from the time they were composed last winter, has there been the alteration of a single note. I do not know what may be the processes of other composers. For myself, I only compose when I feel in the vein, and what I produce in this mood, I do not afterwards think I can alter for the better. But your error is a very natural one. I am an American, and was not born in Germany during the last century, and therefore, &c., &c. Likewise, according to your journal, sometime since, the instrumentation of The Day in the Country wanted "experience." That experience, it seems, was gained after I had received a few hints, etc. I understand all this, Mr. WILLIS. The instrumentation was pronounced "thin" in some parts. It was and is "thin." I so intended it. The thinness is where "lithe sixteen" is painted in the score, and so I divide my violins into six or eight parts, and portray the sex by pitch. If the classics did not do so, it was because they did not know how. But the adaptation to the style of instrumentation to which you allude "as in vogue at Metropolitan Hall," was simply, I suppose, the unison brass instruments, which portray in a bizarre minor the rough steps of boors—lusty, bull-headed chaps—in the same dance; but I always seek to adapt some means to ends, so of course, I availed myself of the stoutest musical leather to make up that article. I am aware that it is not classical; but remember, Mr. Willis, if I thought the classic models perfect and unalterable, I would not write at all, or be their obedient orang-outang; and as there are but two things in this world—substance and shadow—and a man is either the one or the other, I would not play shadow. If I did not think I could make a school for myself, I would not write at all; for so has done every man who has made any name. But every such composer has considered it beneath the dignity of his mission, servilely to copy pre-existing forms, and follow in the steps of his "illustrious predecessors," as the critics always and invariably would have him do, ramming authorities down his throat, when he feels that he could teach those authorities. If he has not studied and made himself master of the art of writing fugues and sonatas, he is an ignoramus, a quack and pretender, who does not know the rules of his trade; but if he publish fugues and sonatas for the purpose of showing that he can do so, it is about as much to his credit, as to publish the multiplication table to show that he had committed it to memory, and was able to write it down.

The Breaking Heart, you speak of in your paragraph,

"as being written of late, shows an unquestionable improvement upon The Day in the Country, even after the changes introduced into the latter by the author." I must be thankful, I suppose, for small favors, but here is a duplicate blunder—the old one as to the date of its composition, which I corrected above, and this new one on the "improvement" I have made as an apt scholar. As The Breaking Heart was composed at the same table and in the same week as The Day, what time was there for improvement, even if I was "never so smart?" But if my recollection serve, of the two pieces, The Breaking Heart was the first composed.

Then again you say, "the parts (of The Broken Heart) move more freely; the melodies are of a broader style, and the various departments of the orchestra are more dexterously brought into use." As regards the freedom of the parts, of course I cannot contravene any judgment on a point of taste or perception:—every critic has a clear right to form his own—but I would remark that The Day is immensely difficult to play, and was only heard for the first time precisely in Metropolitan Hall at the last Concert, after it had been played during months in Castle Garden, in Boston and the South: verifying the experience of the Conservatory at Paris, which gives three month's rehearsal to a Symphony. But, Mr. WILLIS, I intended in The Breaking Heart, the melodies to be of a broader style. The Breaking Heart represents a tragedy in a cathedral—that materialized home of eternity—where the senses of the neophyte, in religion or architecture, are appalled—subdued by such colossal evidence of the grandeur of human genius. I shall never forget my sensations in visiting for the first time the Cologne Cathedral, where the forest is wrecked upon stone, the vault of heaven idealized in dizzy arches—the sunset and clouds hurled into the circular windows, and all breathing a Faith which can no longer evolve such an idea. Of course when I take an educated, delicately reared young lady—not simply a young woman—and put her to die of love and melancholy in such a cathedral—when I arrest her ear by an Agnus Dei (Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world!) as played on the organ poetized,—for such I consider the heroic plaints and thunders of the mighty brass instruments as I have treated them in the orchestra, where human breath inspires the sound, and not a pair of bellows as in an organ—when I write, as has never been done before, the double elegy of violoncellos in deepest double octaves, fortified by Bottesini's bass playing the melody and not with the other basses—"the melodies" should be "broader," than when I take, as in The Day in the Country, the open fields, where red cheeked, short petticoated peasant girls, with their grinning swains, have it all to themselves in bubbling jollity!—all save the unhappy bumpkin who mourns the ill-success of his suit in the vein of peasantdom as I understand it.

In connection with this, you say you "will not inquire whether there be unity—musically speaking." He rejects such unity as something antiquated and worn out; quite opposite to the expression of an idea—and so we pass on.

Now, what is unity? Define it. Eschylus, and Eschines, and Sophocles had one standard. Shakspeare had another, and Voltaire, accordingly, called the last a barbarian. But to my apprehension—Shakspeare understood the unities—of human nature. So in music: some, because Corelli wrote sonatas in a certain form, and then Boccherini, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Onslow, and other great men, copied them—call that form a "unity"—and the only unity in music. If you think so, I do not; I think I can invent as good forms as Corelli or the others, and if I did not, I would consider myself out of place before the public.

Let me now squeeze in a word about the form and so-called unity of the musical classics. I have quoted the Eroica symphony of Beethoven already, and do so again, as one will answer for all symphonies. The first movement of this is in 3-4 time, and is a very long Allegro. The first third of it is repeated bodily: the remainder is taken up with the variations or developments of the first third, and repetitions of its original motives—but both in the original key, with a coda or peroration. Now, this is a complete whole, and much the largest in spirit and duration of the four movements of which the symphony is composed. The ear does not really require anything more after its first movement, if unities were observed; but as they are not, a dead march follows—a long movement—having no connection whatever with the preceding piece; and instrumented, by the way, as no dead march ought to be;—the stringed instruments utterly predominating—though the verisimilitude of a dead march depends upon the use of the brass and wood instruments; and I consider such a procedure as wide from music's Dramatic Truth, as trying to imitate an organ by harps in the orchestra, or by playing on the strings of the violins with the fingers. But this apart, the march is complete in itself, and forms Finale number two. Then again, apropos to nothing, we have a Scherzo—or "playful" movement—rapid, chattering iterations, which have about as much connection with the preceding, as a fandango danced on a tomb-slab has to do with the unities. But this is a perfect piece in itself, and forms a Finale, number three. Then comes a Finale number four, including an air with variations, which of course, has no dramatic meaning or progress, and no blood relationship to the "hero" celebrated, and this with a coda, completes the symphony. If there be any unity in these four separately complete, and utterly disjointed movements, I cannot discover it. The classical unities, in a word, exist in the movements separately, but the four movements are not united as a whole.

The unities in a play or an opera are in the situations and progress of the plot, not in the number of the acts; but the unities of a classic symphony seem to be the number of its movements or acts. Plays and operas are written in one, two, three, four, five and even six acts and are not condemned or approved for conforming to any rule, if there be any, as to the number of acts. But applying the unity-rule of the classic symphony-upholders to them, we would annihilate all that are not of some required number of acts, say four; and with quite as much reason and common sense as guide these classical critics, in their musical verdicts. But there must be unity in a play or opera, or it would be devoid of interest, no matter what the number of its acts or the time required for their performance; whereas the four distinct movements of a classical symphony have no more unity than four acts of four different plays, and to give such a dramatic performance as that, and call it a play, and praise it specially for its regard to the unities, would be no more an absurdity than we find in the much vaunted classical unity symphonies.

But the unities of Santa Claus—and those of my other symphonies—are based on dramatic meanings: there is a plot, and they tell their own stories, according to the programme, and each movement is closely connected with its fellow in sequence; and that is what I call unity; and any authority to the contrary I despise as I do the claims of the House of Hanover to the United States, or any other rubbish of the last century that cannot stand the test of time. There are so many who cry—"There is but one Musical God, and ——— is his prophet," that it would be quite unnecessary for me, were I of that faith, to contribute one voice more to swell the chorus of praise; but as it is, I enter my protest against musical error, no matter by whom committed, or how venerable, or how solemn or truculent in its attitude.

But unfortunately for your argument, The Breaking Heart has a great deal of classical unity. To be sure it begins in seven flats before it gets into four, the key, but that is to express the mysticism of the place with the uncertain wanderings of the sufferer. But fairly aloft, the classical modulations are followed, besides some that they did not use, but which I intend to render classical. Its Agnus dei is in three flats, the classical relation to four—and then we get back to A flat by classical recurrence—and the piece, after several transitions, ends on the key note. It is true its last notes are not preceded by the dominant chord or the cadence plagale—but by an enharmonic transition, leading to the final chord on A flat, with the tender third C above;—but we must remember the symphony began with a breaking heart—seeking God—in anguish and mysticism—and so we end, the third representing Love—for it is Love's note—which did not fall in death.

As I am discussing the tender passion, let me say en passant in the critical vein, that the erotic principle, inseparable from Nature in the productive seasons, is wholly wanting in Beethoven's Pastorale symphony. How differently with Shakspeare:

Duncan. This castle hath a pleasant seat: the air
Nimble and sweetly recommends itself
Unto our gentle senses.

Banquo. The guest of summer,
The temple-haunting martlet, does approve
By his low mansion, that the heaven's breath
Smells woefully here; no jutty, frieze, buttress,
No coigne of vantage, but this bird hath made
His pendent bed, and procreant cradle: Where they Most breed and haunt, I have observed the air
Is delicate. [Macbeth, Act I. Scene IV.

My limits will not permit me to quote on this eroticism of Nature the most beautiful descriptions in our literature: the one in Emerson's Essay on Love, and the other in Tennyson's Locksley Hall. Music, being "the food of love," can better convey it even than poetry.

But to hurry on to your special remarks on Santa Claus:

"Mr. FRY'S Santa Claus we consider a good Christmas piece, but hardly a composition to be gravely criticized as an earnest work of art. It is a kind of extravaganza which moves the audience to laughter, entertaining them seasonably with imitated snow-storms, trotting horses, sleigh-bells, cracking whips, etc. Moreover, in the production of these things there is no little ingenuity displayed. The discordant winds are most discordantly well given; and among the graver features of the piece, our Lord's Prayer (as given in musical recitative) is marked and impressive."

Santa Claus opens with a slow movement seven minutes long, being as long as the model piece of Weber, the Freischütz overture, I have cited above. The scene is laid in Heaven, under circumstances of the most awful grandeur—the announcement that the Son of God is about to be born of woman. I use as precursor to this the triad or trinity of keys—E major, C major, and A flat major,—all in a few measures, and having a precursory meaning of what is to come—the E being the Santa Claus or Saint for children—the C being the jubilee key—and the A flat the lullaby, or Madonna and Child. Then comes the discourse of the archangel on Koenig's cornet, which, if set to words from the Bible, as it could be, would be of the most severe simplicity, as each single note is designed to be wedded to one declamatory syllable,—and not as the old oratorios are impiously written, with measured Italian roulades or formal solfeggi, expressing nothing but bathos. This announcement in C is followed by a Madonna trait in A flat, leading by an enharmonic transition to the dominant of C,—and then follows the archangel's announcement, played by all the brass instruments in declamatory unisons, as though the universe echoed the glad tidings, while the violins play from to typify the wide dispensation of religious harmony. I then break through musical rules to hint at hell, and wind up with major harmonies of heaven. In all this you can discover no attempt to write "an earnest work of Art." If doubling the means of the orchestra over the classics to depict a sublime idea, be an earnest work of Art, you will find it done. So too you can find no earnestness where Mr. Wille sweeps on his divine clarinet through musical space, to come to earth, and describes the gentle festivities and affections of the family circle on the day of the year. Nothing serious, in the attempt I have made to draw dramatically the line between the easy abandon of the spirit of the family circle, and the company manners of the general ball-room! Nothing earnest where, to paint character in the dance, there is a triple counterpoint, to represent the children, the youths and the old people—the latter joining in the dance "just because it is Christmas." Nothing serious—when the dance being, as I conceived, artistically eased off by adieu, we come to The Lord's Prayer, which has been musically kicked under foot until I took it in hand! Nothing serious in the Lullaby—where the marvellous saxophone speaks of the mother (of Mary and the infant Saviour transcendently) and the rocking, and breathing, and the out-door winds that cannot harm the infant are all plain to the audience who listened devoutly—but mothers did not laugh, for more than one eye filled with tears. Nothing serious when, the Lullaby having gradually died away—we have an enharmonic transition to E major, the first chords floating snow-like without a bass! and here, I must expatiate a moment on the Snow-storm. You call the winds of it discordant. I call them sublime, because they imitate nature or God. If Haydn, in The Seasons, Beethoven, in The Pastoral, and Rossini, in William Tell, had not made dismal botches in attempting to describe a storm, I would not have picked out one for delineation—as there is no use of hitting the bull's eye twice. But especially as I have heard Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony praised to the skies, while I consider it, as descriptive or suggestive music, with certain exceptions, very bad (mind I don't speak of it as a composition apart, but as a Pastoral symphony); I determined to write some music of nature as it ought to be written. In The Day in the Country, I wrote the dance, masculine and feminine, as it ought to be written, having lived more than a year among the peasants of Europe, and knowing what makes them dance, and knowing that if such a tune were played as Beethoven sets down for the short-skirts and wooden shoes to dance by, they would stick to their lager-bier tables and broad flirtations. In that symphony I would have introduced a summer storm written as it ought to be, but I required many new orchestral resources which at present do not exist—and I did not choose to write a penny-whistle storm, which, being like anything else, I would have to explain, as the critics of Beethoven do with regard to the Pastoral Symphony, "the feelings of the composer during the storm," etc. But the feelings of people differ during storms.

Now it is a rule in Art—all Art—that its value and interest depend on its near but not precise resemblance to Nature. If it imitate Nature too faithfully, it loses interest. * * * So in the imitation of the elements of external nature there must be likeness, where it can be compassed, or the musician is ignorant of that part of his trade, however great in others.

The winds of winter may be imitated since Paganini has given us a new school for the violins. These winds, which are to me the sublimest music in the world, I have noted from childhood, as I lay awake in a dark chamber, wondering if Santa Claus had come down the chimney or not. Afterwards I heard the works of the great composers—Haydn's Winter in his Seasons utterly disappointed me. It had no truth or poetry. So the Storm of The Pastoral Symphony, as I heard it at the Conservatory of Paris, only excited similar feelings. I determined as soon as the opportunity offered to write two storms, one summer and the other winter. The opportunity was given me a few days since, to write the latter, by the presence of M. Julien, who respects America, as he executes American compositions alongside of European. These winter winds have sobbed and mourned through ether in their wild grief for thousands of years, forever circumambient the poles, and riding the storm as it careers from the arctic each circle of the seasons. They are the type of grief which is always eloquent and generally sublime. God speaks of the passing world in them: they are the audible epitaph of mortality—cold, death-like.

In regard to painting external nature, I would remark, as applicable to the subject in hand, that the plastic arts, as evolved during our century, have given us new revelations, and so may descriptive music in this country, as soon as the mental mumps and measles of national childhood—or the eruptions and fevers of juvenile and provincial-like classicism, are passed away, and we shall believe in nature and not in names. The world has faith finally in the new genius of the new school of painting. It knows at last, that Gudin can paint the sea as mortal man painted it not before; that Turner's skies are stolen from the heavens; that Vernet's horses almost leap and snort out of the canvass; that Meissonnier puts the largeness of six feet into six inches in his little art-miracles. It knows, too, that Powers bows the body of his feminine figures into a curvilinear swell and ideal loveliness rivaling the Venus of Milo. It needs, however, a little time in this country to arrive at the belief, critically expressed (the public has already done it at Julien's concerts) that Romance, Religion, the elements, Nature,—all offer new fields for genius in music—but it must be genius and not conformity—it must spring from a musical pope and not a musical pewholder. The vapid chatter about "Handel, Haydn and Mozart," must give place to analysis on Art as a thing which is no respecter of persons. I esteem the great masters in music for what they have done, more than all the disciples of the musical blind asylum, who receive all with dark credence, can do; for I draw distinctions between the performances and the shortcomings of these great men. But I cannot praise as comedy what is no comedy; as description what is caricature; as technical progress what is mechanical stand-still; or orchestral variety what is orchestral sameness; and as burning poetry what is frozen mathematics. Particularly in spiritual romance and descriptions of nature are the musical classics wanting. As Claude Lorraine paints (I hope the magazines will forgive me), his clouds like rolling pins, and his rocks like batter, with which, if nature had anything in common, chaos would come again, so the old musical masters make rolling pins and batter of their nature-work.

The winds, my dear WILLIS, are not discordant, as you assert. Like geological strata, they lie in harmonious beauty as they come from God's hand. Each one of these layers has a distinct melodious meaning, which in music may be represented by a minor third—and there are many of these minor thirds—and they heave along in harmonic masses the plain of sound, until suddenly at some signal from the Eternal, they rush up altogether furiously through several octaves to the highest point of despair, which can only be represented by that crucifixion-note, the minor ninth, and having so "cried with a loud voice," rush down the scale to their cold cradle below, where they rock and rock, or sing themselves to sleep. But to poetize the winds alone, did not satisfy me,—although I know precisely what would be the result with the audience, who were not conscious of the means I used to produce these effects, neither of the geology-like structure of the winds, nor the mysticism of putting sordini on the violins to render the sounds omnipresent and apart from tangibilities:—so I wrote in counterpoint with the storm the fate of a Perishing Traveller; the moaning human voice represented here by transcendental appoggiaturas, and the climax of despair shrieking in the pitch of masculine humanity at the minor ninth, as the winds scream at a like interval four octaves above. All this I consider "earnest" Art.

Earnest, too, is the hell tolling the awful hour of midnight, while nature remains suspended on a single unresolved chord; and the burr of the bell harmonies is described by the tremolando passages, the violins playing with the bow upon the finger board—an effect not in the classics. Earnest, too, is the introduction of Santa Claus, with the violin harmonies over him: and as no instrument can paint that fiery but the bassoon, I consider the choice of that instrument and not of any other, equal in musical value to the best fugue ever written. Bells, too, are musical and serious: so thought Mozart when he ragged them in Zauberflöte: so think I. And the cracking of a whip is sound and is earnest—Handel wished to introduce the firing of cannon in his Te Deum—a "laughable" idea of the same sort. But I shall not pursue this theme farther than to observe, that the gravest truths are laughed at when first presented—and I should not be surprised, therefore, that Santa Claus, though touching the deepest chord of the popular heart in religion, in festivity, in love,—in a mother's love—in childish ecstasies which alas, in after life never return—in the mysteries of birth and the terrors of death, God singing the dirge in the winter's wind—in the Messiah Hymn of a Christmas morn, should not be considered "an earnest work of Art."

I have been obliged to make this communication what may be considered, at a first glance, unduly long, in order to define my position as a composer, or the apostle of a new lyrical faith, if anything,—and not an almanac, receiving thankfully the broken meats from the tables of classic composers, and relishing them instead of offering fresh, substantial viands.

In all that I have just written, I wish to be understood as separating from myself the works presented by me to the public and noticed in your journal. Art is everything, and the composer nothing. It has been said that composers are not judges of their own works; but nevertheless, I claim to possess this much judgment:—I have not seen the first line of the first criticism on the different works I have produced in this city, which points out any, even the slightest, violation of the rules of composition as laid down in the text-books; and I profess to have studied all these text books and to thoroughly understand the business of a composer, as to history, science, Art literature, and practical effect. If, then, my compositions are correct grammatically and rhetorically, all that the critic can award to or take from me, is the possession of original power which moves the public, makes its mark upon the work, and causes it to live. It would be folly and vanity for me to battle with any critic who may deny me this latter quality, nor would I feel hurt by his so doing, as he is only one of the million-headed public who can set his seal upon any work. It is not, you will perceive, upon any such grounds as these, that I mention the want or the misdirection of criticism in this city; but I am only impelled to affirm that the duty of the critic upon American works of Art, is to analyze them thoroughly—praise them when they merit it, condemn when they deserve it,—but in censuring to give a reason for such opinion, and to quote positively in musical types what the errors and blunders are, when such are stated to exist—and is this duty performed?

Faithfully yours,

WM. HENRY FRY.

American Composers.

MR. EDITOR:—In your paper of the 7th inst. is given an extract from Mr. Fry's description of his own symphony, Santa Claus, lately brought out by Julien, and you preface the article by saying—"We coupled it (the symphony) last week with Haydn's Kinder Sinfonie, but evidently it could be no child's play to carry out all that the author has here undertaken." Now, I may be very much mistaken, but this apology appears to me to contain a covert sneer at Mr. Fry and his symphony, and if this be so, I am sorry to see an additional instance of the not uncommon, but very unworthy treatment, that our American composers receive from those who should encourage them and be their friends.

It seems to be the impression of most of our musical critics, that no production, whatever its merits or pretensions, is worth their serious notice, unless it be an article of foreign manufacture; and when a Briton or a Fry is so lucky as to find a maestro with sense enough to perceive merit in their symphonies, and liberal feeling enough to produce them, with an orchestra that comprises the world's best players, these sapient Daniels—the critics aforesaid—are deaf as adders, and loftily ignoring the composition, (because as Mr. Fry says in his letter to R. S. Willis, the author "is an American, and was not born in Germany during the last century, and therefore, &c., &c.") turn to, and pen another panegyric of praise to the classic masters. Now I do not in the least object that our critics should, with all their prolific power of piled up superlatives, laud Handel, Haydn, and Beethoven, for the praise is well deserved, but what I do want, is, that our own composers should have a "fair field," and when a symphony, or other musical composition claiming to be ranked with works of High Art, written by an American, is performed, that it shall receive the meed of just and serious criticism,—that its merits shall be acknowledged, and its faults, if it has them, exposed, and that critics shall not consider the fact that it is a home production, prima facie evidence of worthlessness.

I know of no reason why the Present—why America, shall not produce musical compositions to rank with any ever written, or why American composers may not have science as profound, imagination as fertile, and taste as refined, as the composers of any other country or age; or indeed, when they have at their command, as no past age has had, all the possibilities of the orchestra fully developed, why they should not make their descriptive music surpass all previous efforts, just as they have the more perfect medium of expression to aid them. Mind you,—I do not in the least deprecate the constant production here, of the works of those sons of genius and Germany, whose names are as familiar to us as household words. I should be sorry indeed to lose the privilege of hearing frequently the compositions of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and of the living European writers, but I say let us give those few of our own countrymen who devote themselves to High Art, an equal chance; let their productions be heard, and receive a candid, and if possible, a favorable attention. By such encouragement, it may be that more in our land shall be led to devote themselves to earnest study of Art, and among them all there shall be more than one good, and perchance one, great name, to reward the kind encouragement bestowed.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 4, 1854.

Mr. Fry and his Critics.

Not many of our readers, we are sure, will murmur at the space we give to-day to the very remarkable letter of Mr. Fry to the editor of the New York Musical World and Times, Mr. R. S. WILLIS. The closely printed columns look quite formidable; but let the eye once light on any paragraph and you will certainly read on, and then go back and read the rest. We are only sorry to be obliged to make any (though comparatively slight) omissions, in order to furnish the gist of the whole at one reading. So pleasant a piece of most decided individuality has seldom turned up in the dry ways of musical literature, as this Santa Claus letter, whatever may be thought of Santa Claus itself. Whether Mr. Fry succeeds or not in vindicating the title of his so-called "symphony" to be considered an important product of a new and earnest school of "High Art," in which he walks in no man's footsteps, but transcends the "classics" as to all the real ends of Art; whether he succeeds or not in proving the love of Handel, Mozart and Beethoven sheer affectation, slavish idolatry, pedantry and "old-fogyism," and in demonstrating the huge strides by which "Young America" has put all that far behind it: he certainly does write up his own artistic merit with a splendid audacity of disbelief in the world's musical authorities and models, with a refreshingly heroic and naive self-confidence, a glorious top-of-the-world sort of feeling, a smart, eccentric, spicy talent, an evident knowledge of the science, history and practice of his Art, and a wonderfully quick and quaint suggestiveness of thought, that must make this apology for Santa Claus against the classics, and for musical Young America against musical old Europe, a memorable document of the present queer stage in our musical history. It sums up and intensifies to an almost burning focus the arguments and aspirations of this would-be-all in music, as in all things,—this ambitious and irreverent young giant Jonathan. We think it ought to stand here in our columns as a part of the record of this strange early stage of musical development in our "fast" country. And in this view we doubt not our friend Willis will look kindly on our thus transferring bodily so large an amount of matter from his columns to our own.

Besides, we had hoped and promised to say more of Santa Claus, after having owned ourselves amused and surprised by novel and striking instrumental effects in the one hearing that we had of it when Jullien's orchestra was here. But every thing is said, a hundred times better than we could say it, both from the composer's and the sober critic's point of view, in this rich correspondence we are copying. To Mr. Willis belonged of course the right and the delicate duty of replying to the letter; and he has done it with most admirable tact and temper, as we mean to let our readers see next week.

Like Mr. Willis, we confess that we had never dreamed of regarding Santa Claus as anything but an extravaganza. Like him, we admire the talent, the independence and the generous social qualities of WILLIAM HENRY FRY, and prize his friendship, while we dissent from his peculiar notions about Art, and while we are unconscious, so far, of having felt in any of his compositions that unmistakable magnetism of genius which should stamp his novel forms, or formlessness, as classical for times to come. Like him, too, we have necessarily, by the whole tone and spirit of our criticism, and our whole Art creed, implied or spoken, drawn down upon us the displeasure of this "manifest destiny" native American, or anti-European party in music, which deems it an insult to suppose that anything attempted by an American, upon as great a scale, in composition, is not as worthy of attention and of fame as any great work of the greatest masters. It behoves us, therefore, in our own inability to take their point of view, to let the ablest advocates of this cause speak in our columns for themselves. And where both advocate and artist are united in one person, as in Mr. Fry; where, if preaching and prophesying and interpreting and arguing can possibly do the thing, he is so eminently the man to do it; where he has set about it with such thoroughness and vigor as in this letter; the least that we can do in justice to him and to his position (which we possibly do not appreciate), is to copy the letter for our readers.

But tell us, good friends, after all, are you not fighting a vague bugbear of your own erecting, under this name of "classical"? Some time ago we indited an editorial (which we left half finished), in the hope of clearly settling what is meant, in the living and best sense of its every-day use, by this phrase "classical music;" if we succeeded in proving anything it was its undefinableness. For instance, here is our friend FRY, who makes it to consist in one or both of two things: viz. 1. a respectable degree of age, and, 2. certain technical forms of structure, arbitrarily adopted by men like Bach or Mozart, and tamely and mechanically copied by their followers. Now where is the real lover of what in common parlance we call classical music, who will accept both or either of these definitions? Do we love the older music because it is old? No. Do we limit our admiration to the writers of any given period? By no means. Are not the warmest worshippers of Handel, Bach, Beethoven, just the very men who hail with most enthusiasm a Schumann and a Wagner, compared with whom, as innovators, (at all events the latter,) Mr. Fry has certainly not gone any very alarming length. Mr. Fry cites the Freyschütz overture against the classics, Beethoven's symphonies and all;—but every classical music-lover includes that in the classics. To be sure, there has been some talk about a distinction between classical and romantic in music, as in literature; but the common use of the term classical—as when the Germanians, for instance, contrast a "classical" with a "light" or miscellaneous concert,—covers both those kinds. Chopin, in his dreamiest reveries, following the freest play of fantasy, is quite as classical as Bach or Mozart now with the great mass of music-lovers whom Mr. Fry arraigns. Chopin, who is for the most part all fantasia, shares our enthusiasm with the great symphonists and fuguists. The overture to Tannhäuser is newer and stranger, and not less romantic nor dramatic, than the Freyschutz; yet it has earned its place, by pretty general consent, in the most strictly classical programmes. And Mr. Fry and Mr. Bristow, and 'Herr Löstswitz' himself, whose programme rivals Fry's, are sure to be accepted just so soon as the world shall see that they have done what they themselves suppose they have:—just so soon as their audiences shall feel that there is genius, inspiration, beauty, poetry of music in their symphonies, at all proportioned to the audacity and oddness of their designs. Believe us, it is not a question of schools and authorities, of following or discarding models, whether a man shall be recognized as a great composer. It is simply a question of genius. And genius can be perennially fresh in old forms, or draw us intimately near to itself and make us feel at home with it in whatsoever new forms.

Why then is not friend Fry willing practically to submit the merit of the American symphonies to what he himself maintains to be the only true test?—namely, to time and the world's impression. Have they not an equal chance with every work of Art, which rests upon no previously earned prestige of authorship? Have they not all the chance that genius ever has, to work their way into recognition? Of course the bulk of our public concerts and musical entertainments must consist of pieces of a guaranteed excellence, of works that the world knows to be good, sure to give pleasure, sure to inspire and to reward attention. It will not do to invite the public to perpetual experimental feasts of possibilities; to assemble a concert audience, like a board of jurors, to listen to long lists of new works and award prizes. Yet if a work have genius in it, it will sooner or later make its mark upon the world. The chances now-a-days are that it will do it pretty soon, in spite of classical or of contemporary competition. This talk about pedantry, and blind reverence for the past, is very well and very brave. We all like it in the abstract. But whom does it hit? Does Mr. Fry believe that any set of musical pedants, purists and exclusives have the power in this country, or in any country at this age of the world, to make or damn his symphony? Pedants have little power over the world's likings. A musical pedant would think a dry, mechanical fugue-writer, provided he were only learned, and did all strictly according to the rules, as good as Bach. But it is the musical instinct of mankind, it is the feeling and poetic soul, in the most instances unlearned, that has kept Bach and dismissed the thousand and one mechanical fuguists to oblivion. Germany has produced thousands of symphonies as classical, according to Mr. Fry's definition of the word, as Beethoven or Haydn; but the appreciative music-lovers, learned or unlearned, professional or amateur, who love Beethoven's music, and do not love Fry's, have not been apt to recognize the classical affinity.

No. The value of a symphony is settled by the public, precisely as the value of a poem or a novel. A large class are captivated in either by superficial glitter, or feeble sentimentality, or high spiced novelty, or blood and thunder. A large class seek amusement and amusement only.—Presently the opinion of the appreciative, serious, thinking minds is felt, and it is recognized that there is a vast difference between Tennyson or Wordsworth, and the magazine poetry that circulates so widely. Is this difference based, think you, upon the grammatical or rhythmical or logical construction of the poems? No, nor is it in the world's ultimate appreciation of musical poems, symphonies, &c. Der Freyschütz overture, to cite Mr. Fry's favorite, could never have been talked and argued into popular acceptance. It is of no use to tell us why we ought to like Santa Claus; the thing is to make us like it.

The letter opens many topics into which we cannot enter. For instance, the question of "the unities" and of "imitative music," which have found fitting treatment at the hands of Mr. Willis. What we are most anxious to state here as our conviction is, that there is no very general prejudice, (certainly none on our part) against American composers as such. Art soars above all narrow nationalities; and there is of course no inherent a priori reason, as a correspondent in another column says, why this age and this country may not produce works of Art, in every kind, as great or greater than the famous masterpieces of the world. The creative soul and genius of humanity undoubtedly are not exhausted; but progress, growth, continual upward aspiration and achievement, we believe as strenuously as any one, are still the law of human history. But who shall foretell the coming of a genius in the world? Who shall anticipate its hour and birth-place? What patriotic faith in our New World's great destiny can ever make us feel the new spell of genius, until that genius convert us to itself by its own proper magnetism? If a new Beethoven was born in America this very morning, is not the world as sure to hear from him and own him, as if he had sprung up under the guardianship of Liszt at Weimar, or of Hauptmann, Moscheles & Co., at Leipsic?

Time will take care of all these questions. Meanwhile we conclude with assuring our correspondent, "w," that our few hasty words in anticipation of Fry's Christmas Symphony contained no "covert sneer."

THE NEW YORK MUSICAL REVIEW defends the absurd "criticism" of its "Boston correspondent" upon Mr. Dresel, and declares said criticism "did not originate with the source upon which it is charged by Dwight's Journal." But it is careful not to deny that the whole letter, with the exception of the paragraph on Mr. Dresel, did emanate from that source. What matters it, whether the letter-writer himself wrote that paragraph, or whether he procured it? We can only say that we think very poorly of the judgment and the spirit of the critic, whoever he may have been, and that the criticism contained internal evidence, which was pointed out, that he could not have heard Mr. Dresel's concert, or did not know what he was hearing.

As for Mr. D.'s artistic abilities we must continue to think as highly of them as ever; and if it only were true, as the Review intimates, that "Mr. Dresel is, in a fair sense, about half editor of Dwight's Journal: that it, to a large extent, merely echoes his ideas, feelings and prejudices," we should esteem it not the poorest compliment that could be paid us. For musical opinions and partialities, like Mr. Dresel's, are those which in the long run have the sanction of the highest names in Art, as well as the respect and sympathy of all the most appreciating and refined. Many of his ideas are only those which the Musical Review itself has often professed.

It charges our rebuke with bitterness; says it must be "the boiling over of rage on the part of one who is smarting under the influence of merited censure." That is as much as to hint that Mr. Dresel himself wrote either the communication or the editorial that followed and sustained it. Both were written wholly without his prompting or his knowledge. And from disinterested motives, from indignation that a deserving artist should be thus coarsely victimized, to advertise and circulate a paper, through an appeal to a mean prejudice against foreign artists. What we wrote, was with the certainty that we were acting probably against our own business interests, but for the cause of Art and Truth;—yes, with that "reverence for Art," which this New York Review declares with holy horror that it deems "profane"!

The Review says we failed to copy the "Letter from Boston," and that we wrongly accuse it of reviving the prejudice against foreigners. We had not room to copy; but here we give the paragraphs referred to, the remainder of the letter being, as was said before, made up of compliments to all and several in the musical world of Boston, not excepting our own journal.

Mr. OTTO DRESEL is giving a series of soirées: pianoforte music predominates in his programme, which is mainly played by himself. Mr. Dresel sometimes writes good music; but he can never rank high as a pianist. There are many amateurs—ladies as well as gentlemen—in this country, who are his superiors. He plays with automatic rigidity. His fingers are stiff; he plays heavily, and jumbles the notes together in a manner which is at least remarkable in the execution of a person who claims recognition as a public performer. His scales and arpeggios are unequal; one tone being too loud, and another too soft; one legato, and another staccato, and so on through all the qualifying characteristics of pianoforte playing. In the Sonata Pathétique, by BEETHOVEN, which Mr. Dresel played at his last soirée, these deficiencies were painfully apparent. The tones were not properly separated; he did not play cleanly; he played without sufficient power, and his execution was quite insufficient for the proper performance of the composition. His style was also entirely out of character. Mr. Dresel's attempts to interpret Chopin's music are absolutely ridiculous; and were it possible, they would cause the bones of Chopin to writhe with agony in his grave. There is no spirit of Chopin in Mr. Dresel. He knows not Chopin. He knows only Dresel. No matter whose composition he plays, it is, for the time being, Dresel's—it is sunk to the level of his own. It would be well for Mr. Dresel to confine his public performances to his own compositions; he would then render them to the satisfaction of the author.

There is a small class here who affect not anything American. American compositions, American instruments, American critics, American artists, and American art, they always sneer at. These high priests of musical snobdom mostly confine their communications with the public to an expressive pantomime, in which are employed only the nose, the lip, and the shoulders. Their noses they turn up; their lips they curl; their shoulders they shrug. Some have been known occasionally to elevate their eyebrows in a peculiar manner, and give the bystanders to understand that if they chose they could say something which would, perhaps, be worth listening to; but they never say any such thing. The leaders of this class are generally third-rate foreign musicians who, unable to get a living at home, have brought their ignorance, their jealousy, their impudence, and their ill-manners to this market. They here meet with a similar class indigenous to the soil; the foreign and native noses, lips, and shoulders fraternize; they are turned up, and curled, and shrugged in unison; their owners fret, and growl, and sneer, and starve in unison: some get situations as teachers; some give soirées; some turn critics, and laboriously praise the efforts of their brethren in affliction; one after another they are weighed in the balance of public opinion, are found wanting, and suffered to take refuge from general contempt in merited oblivion.

Let the reader judge for himself, first, of the justice of the criticism; second, of the spirit of it; third, whether its motive does not appear in the second paragraph; and fourth, whether the vigorous advertisement of the article in the daily papers does not confirm our theory of its appeal to popular anti-foreign prejudices to make the Review sell.

The Review alludes to our complaint that business agents and subscription canvassers should be allowed to climb into the critic's chair, and says "it comes with a bad grace from the editor of a musical journal who, in assuming his position, frankly confessed (see Dwight's Journal, Vol. I, No. 1) that he was not in any sense a thoroughly educated musician, in theory or practice." We were guilty of that frankness. We actually in our short-sighted folly thought to commend ourselves by not claiming to know and be everything. In the Review's theory of musical journalism, a little modesty is plainly a most fatal error. But think of the meanness of twisting such a confession into such a use! We should not have commenced our Journal, did we not believe and know that one may do much for the cause of music and good taste, even without being a complete musician in the professional and technical sense. Such an one may rightly criticize, if not in all things, yet in many things. But for a mere subscription agent to assume the place of a critic, is to make it questionable at all times whether the criticism is written in the interests of Art, or in the interests of business. It is not the first time that this same writer has taunted us in the same way with the same expression. What better confirmation could be asked that we rightly appreciated the spirit and motive of the letter?

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

MR. EDITOR:—I observe that the Editor of the New York Musical Review seems to feel aggrieved because I did not accompany my observations upon "The Letter from Boston" with extracts from that letter, or failing this, animadvert upon the remarks which called forth my communication, point by point. I feel bound to magnify my own forbearance by a statement of reasons. The "criticism" upon Mr. Dresel was no criticism at all. It amounted to this: that Mr. Dresel was an exceedingly poor performer. If a man should say of Mr. Longfellow, that he had no knowledge of metres and no sense of rhythm; that his versification was unequal and his expressions unapt; that his similes were inappropriate and his figures unmeaning; that multitudes of young gentlemen daily wrote better verses in the Albums of Lalage and Chloris,—it would certainly be a very silly and superfluous thing to follow up these allegations with specific denials. A wise friend of Mr. Longfellow would content himself with saying that, all these things being so, it was at least odd that intelligent people should buy Mr. Longfellow's books, read and enjoy them. Just so, there was nothing to be said in the way of comment upon the letter writer's demolition of Dresel, excepting that Mr. Dresel was and is listened to with pleasure by large audiences of the best cultivated people in "the most musical community in America." Had the letter writer been present at Mr. Dresel's concert, he probably would have selected some other victim. The N. Y. M. R. will see that nothing could have been more good-natured than my conduct in sparing its correspondent the republication of his remarks. And I hope the Editor of that Journal will receive the assurance of an unprofessional scribe, that a hearty detestation of vague and vulgar criticism, which traffics in praise and blame, was my only motive for noticing the communication at all.

Concerts of the Week.

The concerts in this city, since our last, have been the following:

EIGHTH OF THE GERMANIA SERIES. This led off the new order of "light" and "classical" programmes for alternate Saturday evenings. It was one of the light description, and gave great satisfaction to an audience only slightly inferior in numbers to those of previous evenings. We did not stay through the whole; not, however, from any classical exclusiveness, for we should be sorry wholly to outlive the mood and the capacity to experience pleasure from such a sparkling miscellany of pieces, admirably performed. The Lindpaintner overture, to be sure, which is so full of martial drums, and which so tortures and bedevils "God save the Queen," was not much to our taste. The "Pholomelen Waltz," by Strauss, was delicious. It is one of those early Strauss waltzes, which we have always thought superior to anything in the waltz kind;—real genial little poems in their way. Mr. ROBERT HELLER played Mendelssohn's Rondo Brillante, for piano, with orchestra, with great brilliancy and clearness, though not as it was played by Jaell. The "Storm" from Beethoven's Pastorale, gave the true feeling of a summer storm, even if it does not daguerreotype the thing as literally as the composer of Santa Claus would like. It was a mistake, however, to clip round the storm so close, and not let it conclude itself, as it does almost perforce in the symphony, by the warm and beautiful finale. Mrs. WENTWORTH sang as pleasingly as ever.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. We own to having enjoyed the music of "Moses in Egypt" exceedingly last Sunday evening, although it is absurd to make an oratorio of it, and although many of the military, triumphal strains are anything but sacred. But Rossini, in this opera, is so surpassingly elegant and graceful and inventive in melody; the duos, trios, quartets, &c., are so finely wrought up; and the instrumentation throughout has such a Titian glow and lusciousness of color, that it could not but be a pleasure, after a long interval, to recall all the music once more in its order, as thus vividly and delicately brought out. The orchestral parts alone, as played by the Germanians, were a rare feast; but the singing too was generally quite beyond what we had deemed reasonable expectations. The choruses, especially the "Prayer," were very impressive. Miss STONE and Mrs. WENTWORTH achieved great successes in the parts of Nicaule and Esther; and the new voice (Miss S. E. BROWN) by its freshness and purity gave excellent promise. Mr. ARTHURSON's tenor, in Osiris, was sweet and true, and highly satisfactory, save in the weakness of a few of the highest tones. Mr. WHEAT, too, ably sustained the part of Aaron. Messrs. BALL and AIKEN, in the two bass rôles of Pharaoh and Moses, sang extremely well, but lacked (what perhaps it was hardly fair to expect in such a representation) dramatic fire and energy. The organ (played by Mr. MÜLLER) told with fine effect, wherever it was used.

The Sixth concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE CLUB was a great success; enthusiastically enjoyed by the largest and best audience we have yet seen at any Chamber Concert. The Quartet in A (op. 29) by Schubert was less striking than we expect always from that name, except in a remarkable and beautiful modulation in the Minuet. The Prelude to the Fugue in C, by Bach, arranged for piano with violin obligato, and quartet accompaniment, by Chas. Gounod, of Paris, and played by Messrs. TRENKLE and AUGUST FRIES, was most satisfying music and capitally rendered. It had to be repeated. Mr. TRENKLE "covered himself with glory" in his really masterly performance of Mendelssohn's first Trio, and again in the Introduction and brilliant Polacca by Chopin (op. 2), for piano and violoncello, the latter played with his usual artistic feeling by WULF FRIES. This too was encored. The Song from Tannhäuser found favor again; and the B flat Quartet (No. 6 of op. 15) of Beethoven was played uncommonly well.

Mr. APTOMMAS's "Harp Soirée" was charming. Of course he played well; HELLER played well; and Sig. CAMOENZ sang, not only in tune, but with good style and effect, a barcarole, a tarantella and a monk's song, that suited his bluff voice and manner. The second "Harp Soirée" will be next Monday, and we commend it to our readers.

Mlle. DE LA MOTTE's first Private Soirée took place at Chickering's, Thursday Evening. Previous engagements deprived us of the pleasure of hearing her in a rich programme, including parts of Trios by Beethoven and Mendelssohn, Thalberg's Maise fantasia, Liszt's Galop Chromatique, &c. She had the assistance of the brothers FRIES in the Trios.

Foreign Items.

The autumn season at La Scala closed with Verdi's Trovatore, given with proud éclat. Two pieces, the Miserere, and the duo between the soprano and barytone, were encored. The Trovatore has been performed 21 times during the season, and Ernani nine times. At the theatre Carcano, in less than three weeks, Rigoletto attained to 13 representations.

The following is the programme of the second concert of the Société Saint Cécile, extra from the subscription. This concert is every year consecrated to the execution of works of contemporary composers:

1. Overture,.....M. Th. Gouvy.
2. The Flight into Egypt, (fragment of a mystery in the old style),.....H. Berlioz.
3. Andante-scherzo, from symphony,.....Mathias.
4. Peter the Hermit, (scene for hary tone, chorus, and orchestra),.....Gounod.
5. Symphony,.....
- Director of Orchestra,.....M. Seghers.
- " " Chorus,.....Wekerlin.

Bosio makes her rentrée at the opera in Betty, by Donizetti. La Muette has been laid aside for the present.

Cruvelli will make her debut in Les Huguenots. La Vestale will follow; her third role will be that of Héléne in Jerusalem.

The first representation of the new opera-comique of M. Reber, which was to have taken place on the 21st December, was postponed on account of the indisposition of Mme. Miolan Carvalho. It is entitled: Les Papillottes de M. Benoît. The libretto (in 1 act) is by Messrs. Barbier and Carre.

At the Italian opera, M. Ragani has engaged a German basso who will make his debut in Don Giovanni.

Leopold de Meyer gives a series of concerts in Vienna during the month of February. He has not performed in that city for over six years.

Balfe's new opera, La Kenlanthe, was performed at Vienna with success.

Benedict, the eminent composer, and most illustrious pupil of Weber, has gone to Munich, to direct the first performance of his new opera: The Crusaders, which is to inaugurate the opening of the Grand Theatre of that Capital.

Mr. Bonnehé is reaping well deserved laurels in La Favorite at the grand opera, Paris.

SIXTY-FOUR THOUSAND IN FIVE MONTHS!

THE SHAWM, a Library of Church Music, containing about One Thousand Musical Compositions; consisting of Psalm and Hymn Tunes of over One Hundred different metres; Anthems, Sentences, Chants, and every description of Sacred Set Pieces, with a new Sacred Cantata, complete; also, (in the Singing School Department,) Easy Glee, Part-Songs, Vocal Exercises, &c. By WILLIAM B. BRADBURY and GEORGE F. ROOT, assisted by THOMAS HASTINGS and T. B. MASON, (of Cincinnati.) The publishers have the satisfaction of announcing that for the first time since its publication, a little more than five months since, they are up with their orders for this book. So utterly unprecedented has been its sale, that, though the greatest exertion has been unceasingly made in its manufacture, it has been heretofore impossible fully to supply the demand.

The immense number of sixty-four thousand copies have been actually issued within the short period named, and yet until this day (Jan 21st), we have not known the time when we were not from one to six thousand copies behind our orders. Regretting the disappointment which many have experienced in not obtaining a supply heretofore, we believe we shall hereafter be able to fill every order promptly.

Of course no commendation is needed, of a work which gives such indisputable evidence of entirely meeting the wants of all classes of singers.

THE SHAWM may be had of booksellers generally.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE attention of Subscribers to our regular series of Concerts is called to the following: On counting the number of subscription Tickets that have until now been presented for the past seven Concerts, the undersigned ascertains the fact, that the number which is still in the possession of purchasers does far exceed the number of seats in the Hall, although the sale had been stopped when the number fixed by the Committee were disposed of. This disproportion arises from the irregular use of Tickets in the hands of many purchasers; and to satisfy all holders of Tickets, the Society have concluded to give a Concert on

EVERY SATURDAY EVENING,
Until the 18th of March inclusive,

Making SEVEN more Concerts instead of THREE, admitting Subscription Tickets to any of those seven Concerts. The undersigned has had applications from many of the subscribers to compose the programme of mostly classical compositions; and again from many to have the Germanians perform more music of lighter character. To satisfy all, the Society have adopted the following plan:

To perform alternately a programme of classical and one of modern music—which brings the next Concert in the category of the latter style, a Concert in which none but light music, with few exceptions, will be performed.

A limited number of Subscription Tickets at the usual terms can then be disposed of, and those who wish to secure additional sets or half sets, are invited to procure them at WADE'S Music Store, during the hours from 12 to 2. A Programme will appear on every SATURDAY MORNING in the principal papers.

—Edward L. Balch,

MUSIC! MUSIC! MUSIC!

IT IS NOW AN ESTABLISHED AND CONFIRMED FACT
THAT THE

Modern School for the Piano-Forte

IS BY FAR THE MOST INGENIOUS, SIMPLE, PROGRESSIVE AND COMPREHENSIVE METHOD FOR THE PIANO THAT HAS EVER BEEN PRESENTED TO THE PUBLIC,—embracing a complete system, from the very outset to the highest classical music.

The anatomy of the hands is shown by beautifully colored plates. The entire work surpasses all previous musical publications, as regards mechanical appearance and elegance.

The author, NATHAN RICHARDSON, has spent the last five years in Europe for the sole purpose of getting up an Instruction Book, which would embrace the styles and effective Exercises of ALL distinguished Pianists and Teachers. To accomplish that object, he was assisted by

EIGHTEEN EMINENT EUROPEAN PIANISTS.

The result has been, an Instruction Book so comprehensive and ingenious, that a pupil will acquire the styles and mechanical difficulties of all celebrated Pianists, and that, too, with far less labor and practice than is usually required to learn an ordinary composition, under the old methods.

It is not an abridgement, neither is it an old work translated, revised, and remodeled. It is a work which is entirely new throughout, and is thoroughly adapted to our wants. It has been examined and admitted to be the best Instruction Book ever published in America, by the following distinguished Professors, Pianists and Teachers, who have given us the most complimentary recommendations, which have already appeared before the public.

Beethoven and his Three Styles.

BY M. W. DE LENZ.

[From the French of HECTOR BÉLIOTZ.]

(Concluded from last Number.)

He felt, himself, both the force and the grandeur of his mission; the whims which escaped him in many instances leave no doubt upon this subject. One day his pupil, Ries, having ventured to call his attention to a harmonic progression in one of his new works, declared faulty by theoreticians, Beethoven replied: "Who forbids this?" "Who?

why, Fuchs, Albrechtsberger, all the professors." "Well, I permit it." In another instance, he said, with naïveté: "I am of an electric nature, that is why my music is so admirable."

The celebrated Bettine relates in her correspondence, that Beethoven said to her one day: "I have no friend: I must live with myself alone, but I well know that God is nearer to me in my art than to others; I commune with him without dread; I have ever acknowledged and understood him; neither have I any fear for my music, it can meet no evil fate; he to whom it makes itself intelligible must become free from all the wretchedness which others drag about with them."*

Mr. de Lenz, in recounting the singularities of Beethoven in his social relations, says that he was not always so savage as in the last years of his life; that he often figured in balls, and did not dance in time. This is rather too much, and I will permit myself to doubt it. Beethoven possessed in the highest degree the appreciation of rhythm; his works bear witness to this; and if it was really said that he did not dance in time, it must have been because it was thought piquant to make this puerile observation, and to consign it as a curious anomaly. Some persons pretend that Newton knew nothing at all about arithmetic, and do not believe in the bravery of Napoleon.

It appears, however, if we believe a great number of German musicians who have played the symphonies of Beethoven under his direction, that he conducted indifferently the execution even of his own works. This is by no means incredible; the talent of the leader of an orchestra is special, like that of a violinist; it is acquired by long practice, and by very pronounced natural dispositions. Beethoven was a skilful pianist, but a detestable violinist, although he studied the instrument in his youth. He might have been a most wretched performer on both, or no performer at all, without being any the less a prodigious composer.

It is generally believed that he composed with great rapidity. In fact, he composed one of his masterpieces, the overture to Coriolanus, in one night; but generally he worked up, turned and moulded his ideas in such a manner, that their first jet bore but a slight resemblance to their ultimate form. To have a good idea of this, one should see his manuscript. He re-wrote three times the first piece of his seventh symphony (in A). He searched for several days, wandering in the fields around Vienna, for the theme of his Ode to Joy, which commences the finale of his choral symphony. The sketch of this page still exists.

After the first phrase which presented itself to the mind of Beethoven, we find written in French the word "mauvais," bad. The melody, modified, re-appears a few lines below, accompanied by this observation, always in French: "Ceci est mieux," this is better. Finally we find it, clothed in the form which we are accustomed to admire, and decidedly elected by these two syllables which the persevering seeker evidently traced with joy: "C'est ca!"

He worked during a considerable period at his Mass in D. He re-wrote two or three times his opera of Fidelio, for which, as we well know, he composed four overtures. A recital of what he had to endure to bring forth this opera, from the ill-will and opposition of all the performers, from the first tenor to the contra-basso, would be of sad interest to us, but would lead us too far. As varied as the vicissitudes of this work may have been at first, it remains and will remain in the repertory of more than thirty European theatres, and its success would be greater, despite the numerous difficulties of execution which it presents, were it not for the incontestible inconveniences of a doleful drama, the entire action of which takes place in a prison.

Beethoven, in his ardor for the subject of Leonora, or l'amour conjugal, only saw the sentiment which it gave him to express, and made no account of the sombre monotony of the spectacle which is so closely allied to it. This libretto, of French origin, had been set to music, at first in Paris, by Gavaux; afterwards it was changed into an Italian opera for Paër; and it was after having heard at Vienna the music of the Leonora of this latter, that Beethoven had the simple cruelty to say to him: "The subject of your opera pleases me, I must set it to music."

It would be curious now to hear successively the three scores.

I will now close; I have said sufficient, I hope, to inspire the admirers of Beethoven with the desire to learn more of the book of Mr. de Lenz. I will merely add that, beside the excellent qualities of a critic and biographer which he has displayed, they will find in the catalogue and classification of the works of the maestro a proof of the religious care with which Mr. de Lenz has studied all that concerns it, and of the knowledge that has guided him in his investigations.

* Bettine to Goethe, Vienna, May 28, 1810.

Reply of Mr. Willis to Mr. Fry.

MY DEAR FRY:—As you have addressed me personally in your letter of last week, I shall adopt the same genial form of address in reply to you. I have carefully read your interesting and, certainly, in some respects, remarkable letter, and have pondered its contents. After a careful analysis of the same, I find it to consist of, 1st. Various opinions of your musical works, and an extended analysis of the same; 2d. Various opinions of the works of others; 3d. Various opinions on Art in general. In their order, I will now quote some of these opinions:

"I give the public a symphony, as an instrumental work corresponding in rank and magnitude with the Prophet as an operatic work."

"For Santa Claus I claim that it possesses the unities, which in the classic symphonies have no existence whatever, notwithstanding the folios of ink shed concerning them."

"If I did not think that I could make a school for myself, I would not write at all; for so has done every man who has made any name. But every such composer has considered it beneath the dignity of his mission, servilely to copy pre-existing forms, as the critics always and invariably would have him do, ramming authorities down his throat, when he feels that he could teach those authorities."

"Haydn's Winter, in his Seasons, utterly disappointed me. It had no truth or poetry. So the Storm of the Pastoral Symphony, as I heard it at the Conservatory of Paris, only excited similar feelings. I determined, as soon as the opportunity offered, to write two storms, one summer and the other winter."

"If Haydn, in The Seasons, Beethoven, in The Pastoral, and Rossini, in William Tell had not made dismal botches in attempting to describe a storm, I would not have picked out one for delineation."

"I think I can invent as good forms as Corelli or the others, and if I did not, I would consider myself out of place before the public."

"Fairly aloft, the classical modulations are followed, besides some that they did not use, but which I intend to render classical."

"But especially as I have heard Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony praised to the skies, while I consider it, as descriptive or suggestive music, with certain exceptions, very bad, (mind I don't speak of it as a composition apart, but as a Pastoral symphony), I determined to write some music of nature as it ought to be written."

"In that symphony I would have introduced a summer storm as it ought to be."

"Europe has given us no Shakespeare in music, both Beethoven and Mozart being but half made up—Beethoven being incapable of gaiety and Mozart destitute of comedy."

"A piece (Santa Claus) which puts the Lord's Prayer to music, not with the drawl of monks a la Palestrina, or the frizzle of eunuchs a la Farinelli."

"Which draws children as they ought to be—poetically—toys in hand on a Christmas morn,—not as Haydn has done in his Toy Symphony, where the idea is so 'run into the ground' that it was hissed in London."

"Their highest notes, too, are in lovely contrast with the flute written as it ought to be, the classics not understanding this instrument."

"I divide my violins into six or eight parts, and portray the sex by pitch. If the classics did not do so, it was because they did not know how."

Now, my dear Fry, I consider any man who honestly entertains (as I really think you do) such truly pleasant opinions of himself as are herein contained, a fortunate fellow. If anything can make a man happy in this world, it is just such self-convictions as these.

On the other hand, I do not envy you your opinions of others. I think it would qualify my own happiness were I to think, as you do, that Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Rossini, Palestrina, Farinelli, Corelli, and all the rest of those old blunderers, had made such "dismal botches" in Art, as you attribute to them:—or even if I thought that my friend WILLIS were still groping in that "dreary ignorance of what is music," which you ascribe to him.

These however, are mere moral reflections—not opinions in reply to yours. Now, Fry, as you have spoken very plainly with me, I think that you might be disappointed, perhaps, were I not equally plain spoken.

I do not at all agree with you—either in your opinion of yourself, or your opinion of others. Your opinion of me, and my dreary ignorance, I hope to modify one of these days. So we will say nothing more about that. Our mutual opinions of Art, (selves aside) are, as I understand it, what we wish chiefly to exchange in a correspondence like this. Confining myself, therefore, to these, I shall briefly touch upon some points of Art upon which we differ.

1st. You call your composition of Santa Claus a "symphony." But Santa Claus is not a symphony. You might just as well call it an oratorio. By this, I suppose you speak as an artist: according to the universally received significance of terms among artists. If you speak as an outsider, exterior to the sphere of Art, why then you can call musical productions by any name you choose—it is all the same. One term will be as unintelligible and inappropriate as another. The word symphony, in large instrumental music, has, among musicians, a definite application. It is applied to instrumental compositions of four distinct movements. Four movements, however, are not always indispensable: for there are symphonies consisting of only three movements: just as there are sonatas of three movements. These movements, however, of whatever number, are independent, complete in themselves, and have each a distinct character—like Allegro, Andante, Scherzo, Finale. But a "symphony" of one movement I think has never been heard of, this side of Santa Claus.

What is Santa Claus?—It is a Fantasia. It is a one movement piece, of irregular construction, and comes under the regular, by-all-artists-acknowledged-and-accepted, category, of Fantasias. Mozart's world-renowned Fantasia in C minor, is an instance of this style of composition. Santa Claus, therefore, is an orchestral Fantasia. To call it a symphony, where terms have, among artists, so definite a signification, is like calling a cat a dog, or a house a barn. You can do so, but nobody will understand you.

2nd. You take the position, that classical "unity" of composition consists in a certain number of musical movements, and this you vigorously combat. My dear FRY, you must excuse me, but you do not know what classical unity is. Who ever before heard of such an absurd proposition, as that the unity of a symphony, opera, or play, depended upon its number of movements, acts or scenes.

To confine ourselves to the symphony. I have already stated, that we have symphonies with three movements; as we have sonatas with less than four. Leaving out of the question then, your dramatic unity, with which we have here nothing to do, our subject being a musical one, what is symphonic unity?

This unity is embodied in each separate movement. It implies some distinct musical theme, or themes, clearly and intelligently developed. For instance: in Beethoven's symphony in C minor we have this theme:

Out of this one melodic design the composer has created almost the entire first movement of his symphony. This is a marked case of symphonic unity; most movements, however, consist of two musical themes, "Haupt and Mittel-Satz," about equally developed. Again this unity consists in the choice of keys—certain keys predominating throughout the whole piece; the passage to, and through, these keys, and return to the original key at the close, being fixed by determinate laws in Art. The only play-ground for the fancy in respect of keys, is that at the commencement of the second part of any movement, where the so-called Fantasia has its place, and where the composer is at liberty to wander vaguely for a while, through what keys he chooses—a capital chance always for you, FRY. Symphonic unity, then, implies unity of musical (not dramatic) design, and unity of key: in other words, an intelligent, consecutive, proportional work of Art: a work that has a beginning, a consequent middle, and an inevitable end:—not a vague, disconnected, illogical, plan-less composition, like a Fantasia, where the only unity ever attempted is that of ending in the same key in which one began. Santa Claus is a Fantasia, and Santa Claus has no musical unity. There may be literary unity in the story which you connect in your own mind with the music, and which you distribute on printed programmes among the audience. But there is no musical unity; such as is requisite to every composition which is anything else than a Fantasia.

Now, you may attack this musical unity as much as you please, FRY. It is a principle deep-seated in the human mind, and you can never displace or ride over it. It is only another name for musical coherence. It is that which shows design in the composer—design, the attribute of reason. It is that which distinguishes a perfectly sound and coherent mind from an unclear and incoherent one. This continual introduction of new musical themes and ideas, is a thing that no audience can long stand, any more than the disconnected vagaries of a crazy man. It is the recurrence of the themes, once heard, which pleases. It is the working-up of a clearly-pronounced subject, which arrests and keeps attention—equally with the unlearned as the learned. This is the great fault, if you will allow me to say so, in all the compositions of yours which I have ever heard. It is the peculiarity of your style. You are all Fantasia, from beginning to end. Even in your writing—as you are, amusingly, peculiarly, and strikingly so in your talking. I say in your writing. Take a singular instance in the very letter you wrote me. There you commence a sentence thus:

"It is because there is no real view taken of the philosophy of Art—of musical Art—that a piece which begins as mine does in Heaven," &c.—then—(follows a sentence)—"puts"—(follows another)—"which," &c.—"which," (&c.) "which," (&c.) "which," &c., "which," (&c.) "which," (&c.) "not," (&c.)—"but," (&c.) "which," (&c.) "the latter," (&c.).

Now after continuing in this way through a sentence extending over more than half a column of nonpareil type, you close thus:

"This all I think worth more than the passing paragraph given to it in your journal."

Now this is no conclusion at all. There is no unity in the sentence. The mind expects, breathlessly, through that long sentence, to bring up, after all these "which's," upon some grammatical and logical conclusion—vainly, however. And thus it is with such of your compositions as I have heard: they lack sequence, connectedness, logical arrangement, musical coherence. You will excuse me, my friend, for being thus plain spoken, but you were plain with me; and I must "have at you" a little, now I am about it.

3d. You say, in defining the term music, that "music is the original mode of expressing an original idea." And yet, in the very same breath, two lines afterward, you say, that "all music is imitative, or it is good for nothing."

Now this is nonsense. It is almost as bad as my "dreary ignorance." Imitativeness is not originality. If music be imitative it is certainly not original. If I imitate, in music, the bleat of a sheep, that bleat has no originality about it—if it be a good bleat. The more successful I am in the imitation, the less original I am. The more I am a sheep, the less I am a musician. You say, that music, in painting passion or emotion, imitates the tones of the voice, &c. Now suppose that the tones of a lover were actually imitated in a composition. Monotonous music enough it would be. In fact, no music at all, if the imitation were true: it would simply be a lover talking earnestly to his mistress. Nothing more.

And you say, that "music is the original mode of expressing an original idea." Now music, aside from words, cannot express ideas. Music never expressed an idea. It only suggests ideas, through the emotions which it excites, and to which it alone appeals.

My dear FRY, you are entirely wrong. Music is a perfectly independent language: not a whit an imitative language: unless it forcibly be made so. It begins where ordinary, spoken language ends. It is the subtle and refined language of the emotions. If I wish to express the passion of love in music, I express it musically,—not spoken-ly. I imitate no one, and nothing. The musical tones gush out—the speaking language is forgotten—I revel in a delicious tone-language, which expresses the feeling of love far better, and more completely than I can possibly do it by tones of the speaking voice. Some similarity there doubtless will be, between the tones of love when told, and love when sung; because the passion is the same. And, in moments of great excitement, the speaking tone rises oftentimes, and attains unto, the musical tone; the voice sings with emotion, as the voice of a fine orator sometimes does. But making music imitative is reversing the pyramid. It is inverting the climax. Music does not descend to the spoken tone—the spoken tone must ascend to music. Making music imitative, is materializing and demeaning music. It is making a parrot of that which is a nightingale—a wretched tone-slave of what is a glorious tone-master.

You have queer ideas about music. You say your composition of the Breaking Heart "represents a tragedy in a cathedral." You "take an educated, delicately-reared young lady, and put her to die of love in a cathedral." Now although you may do such a thing as this practically, (your attractive qualities, my friend, making this supposable,) I venture to say, that you cannot do it musically. When you tell us what you mean by your music, (as now,) why then we can understand what your music means—but not before. After knowing this, we can listen to the music as expressing the painful emotions of the young lady, (if you will) or the jolly emotions of the swain—but the action, itself, no music can "represent." A stage cathedral, and you and the young lady in it, and a little pantomime, could alone give us this idea of the "cathedral," and the architecture; or, on the other hand, a veritable field and the "short petticoated peasant girls, the grinning swain," &c. In the same manner, when, in the "symphony" of Santa Claus you distribute among the audience a lengthy document, telling what you mean to "imitate" in the music, why then they know what the music imitates—not before. The "symphony" per se, without this explanation, might just as well imitate the wrecking of the San Francisco, as what you ascribe to it. Even that blowing of penny trumpets, and buzzing of rattles and the general shout, might be understood as representing the joy of the passengers, (or at all events, the passengers' children,) when that gallant Captain Creighton came to their rescue.

4th. "It is a fact, which must not be overlooked," you say, "that the purity and eloquence of the tone of every performer are in exact ratio of his mastery over mechanical difficulties: witness all the solo players in Jullien's orchestra; and Liszt, Thalberg, Gottschalk," &c.

Now Liszt, Thalberg and Gottschalk, play upon the piano—an instrument of fixed tone. Of violinists, and other instrumentalists, the tone of whose instruments is not fixed, your remark may be true. But how can any conquest over mechanical difficulties improve the tone of a piano?

5th. "Santa Claus," you say, "is the longest instrumental composition ever written on a single subject." Again—"I am aware that it may excite your surprise, that Santa Claus is the longest unique symphony ever written, as we all know that few of the classical symphonies require over three quarters of an hour to perform." Again—" Santa Claus opens with a movement seven minutes long, being as long as the model piece of Weber, Der Freischütz overture."

Now the length of a piece of music is novel ground, certainly, upon which to base its musical excellence, or its requirement for a very long criticism; just as much so, as that its correspondence, in the length of time taken to perform it, with that of some piece by a great master, is very exact. This argument does not appeal to me. What has the length of a piece to do with its merits?—any further, truly than that the longer the piece, or the longer the article, the less likely people are to hear or to read it. For this reason, I am beginning to be very suspicious of the length of the "reply" I am writing at this present.

6th. You are very severe upon me, for saying in my notice of Santa Claus, that I thought it was hardly to be criticized as an earnest work of Art. Every composer certainly, knows best whether he was in earnest, even in the handling of children's rattles and playthings. You protest you were thoroughly in earnest. I believe you. Your four pages of nonpareil, my friend, in reply to my very short article, entirely convinces me of it. I take the remark back.

7th. Another error I hasten to correct, relative to the fact, which was first composed: the Breaking Heart or the Day in the Country; the Day in the Country or the Breaking Heart. You say the Breaking Heart was composed first. You know best, my friend, and as you say so—it certainly must have been composed first. But I am not bound to know much about this, (except so far as the music certainly indicated the contrary) unless you tell me: any more than I am bound to guess what you imitate in the music of Santa Claus unless you print it all out for me. There is such a thing as improving backward, it seems—that is, falling off in musical excellence. The Breaking Heart is a better thing than the Day in the Country—though it was composed first. Hence my mistake.

But I must stop. I have now answered the most essential points of your letter. Were I to reply to all you have written, I should write an opposing line-for-line, nearly, to your four-page communication. We differ entirely, and utterly; we unspeakably differ in our estimate of the honored names in Art, you have so recklessly tossed about in that extraordinary letter. The heart of every true and intelligent musician must stand still, at the relative value you put upon them and—upon yourself.

My dear FRY, I admire your genius, but it is genius astray. You are wrong in your views of Art; as I think you are in your views of handling what is sacred, in secular discussion. You are a splendid frigate at sea, without a helm. But, differing from you, as I entirely do, I think we can "agree to differ." Your qualities of heart are such as must attach every one to you who knows you—as they attach me; while your unquestioned innate capacities must compel the admiration of all—of none more than your friend at the artistic antipodes.

RICHARD STORRS WILLIS.

Punch on Variations.

Friday last, Punch had the satisfaction of being present at Signor Sivioli's farewell concert. He was exceedingly diverted by the performances of the clever violinist, which also reminded him of an idea that has occasionally occurred to him before, on hearing Ole Bull, Liszt, and other professors of musical gymnastics.

He perceived that the talents of these gentlemen lay principally in executing variations on certain favorite airs; that is, in disjoining their different portions, and filling up the intervals with divers fantastical and eccentric movements of their own—runs, shakes, and so forth; thus interspersing the original music, which was expressive of some sentiment, feeling, or state of mind, with passages which, having no meaning at all, formed an agreeable contrast to the melodies wherewith they are blended.

Now, the idea that occurred to Mr. Punch was, that the principle (so greatly to the gratification of the public) acted upon by the musicians, might be advantageously applied to the sister art of poetry. He thinks that Shakspeare with variations would very probably be received with great applause. The variations, of course, should correspond in expressiveness and intellectuality to those above alluded to. For instance, let the line to be varied be—

"To be or not to be; that is the question."

The theme might first be recited entire, and then treated as follows:

To be or not, fiddle; to be, diddle; that, tooral; is, rooral; the question, lay.

Fiddle, fiddle, iddle, iddle, tooral, looral, lay.

Tooral, to be; looral, or not; lay, to be; that is, fiddle; the question, iddle de dee.

To, yoddle; be, doodle; or, fol; not, dol; to, de; be, rol; that, ri; is, tol; the, lol; question, de rido.

Yoddle doodle fol de rol, to be; hey, down derry diddle dum, or not; whack rum ti oodity, to be; ho down, that; chip chow cherry chow, is; tra la la la, the question.

Dong, dong, harum, scarum dive, question.

Right fol de riddy, oody, bow, wow, wow!

Drowning men will catch at a straw; and considering the present declining state of the drama, Punch seriously recommends his suggestion to the notice of the managers.—Its adoption will doubtless astonish the weak minds of many, to whom Shakspeare's sense, at present, too strong for them, will be rendered more palatable by dilution.—London Punch.

Mendelssohn.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY, the son of Abraham Mendelssohn, a banker of some consequence at Hamburg, in Germany, and grandson of the great philosopher and Hebraist, Moses Mendelssohn, was born at Hamburg, on the 3d of February, 1809. The house in which he was born is close adjoining the Church of St. Michael. Hamburg is remarkable as the native place of another musician, Ferdinand David, for many years the friend and brother artist of the subject of this memoir. Felix was the second in age of a family of four children. He had an elder sister, Fanny (the late Madame Henselt), a younger brother, Paul, and a second sister, Rebecca. His mother, whose maiden name was Bartholdy, watched with anxious affection the development of the boy's mind, and in after years he repaid this motherly care with a love and tenderness which the caresses of the world never once weakened or abated.

When the boy had completed his third year, his parents changed their place of residence, and moved to Berlin. Here, under that favorable star, which from the hour of his birth had never suffered him to come in contact with anything common-place or ordinary, his wonderful talents unfolded, and early promised a brilliant future. When only eight years old he played the piano with great facility and execution, and at this tender age he acquired a fine sense of musical criticism, an intuitive power which Zelter called Mendelssohn's "Luchsauge." "He discovered," (said that artist) "six pure fifths, consecutively, in a movement of Sebastian Bach's, which I should never have found." His ear for music was extraordinary. He detected in a moment the dissonance of an instrument, or the false intonation of a voice, at a time when the music was loudest, and the great body of sound most likely to drown the discordant part. All these qualities proved him to be in possession of powers quite uncommon to youths of his age, and he was placed under the care of Zelter and Berger, two plain German artists, to be taught his first lessons in composition and pianoforte playing. Zelter called him his best and most promising pupil, when only twelve years old, and his correspondence with Goethe on the boy's progress bears honorable testimony to the warm interest he took in the education of Felix, though it tells of a rather strict and uncompromising management of a very sensitive disposition. The consequence of these letters was a fortunate one for Felix, who was brought to Goethe's especial notice. An introduction to this great man was invaluable, and we cannot doubt that this circumstance contributed in no small degree to strengthen Mendelssohn's love for all that is great, solid and classical, and his contempt for anything weak or second-rate. It may here be remarked that the publication of Mendelssohn's correspondence with Goethe would be of deep interest to the admirers of musician and poet; at present we must be content to quote short extracts from Zelter's and Goethe's letters, which allude to the mutual interest which the writers took in the boy's progress. Zelter's letters are full of such expressions as, "the youngster plays the piano like the deuce," or, "Felix is still the head man here;" and we find him writing to Goethe in the autumn of 1812, announcing his intention of a visit, and a wish to introduce his pupil to the poet—"Before I leave the world I should like to show your face to my Doris, and my best pupil." Accordingly, in the November of the same year, he actually introduced his young favorite to the poet. On the 5th of February, Goethe writes, "Say a good word to Felix, and to his parents. Since you left me my piano is speechless; one solitary attempt to restore it again would be a failure." A friendship once started was destined to be yet more and more influential over Mendelssohn; for from this time Zelter constantly related to Goethe stories of the boy's wonderful powers and application, and the poet's interest in the young musician became daily more intense. On the 8th of February Zelter writes, "Yesterday evening Felix completed his fourth opera, with the dialogues, and it was performed in our presence. I must confess my own weakness in attempting to restrain wonder at the amazing progress made by a boy only fifteen years old. There are three acts, which, with two ballets, occupy some two hours and a half in the performance. The work has fairly met with its meed of applause. Original ideas, beautifully expressed, are to be found throughout; there is no want of rhythm, dramatic power, and flow of harmony; it is scored apparently by experienced hands; the orchestral parts are not overloaded, so as to fatigue; nor, on the other hand, can I complain of a mere accompaniment and poverty of instrumentation; the band played it con amore, and yet it is not music to be trifled with. Nothing is omitted, out of place, disjointed or fragmentary; passion, tenderness, love, and joy, are all in their turn expressed. The overture is a strange production. You would fancy a painter, who, after dashing a quantity of color indiscriminately on the canvass, and gradually clearing it away from the surface with the finger and brush, produces at last a defined and distinct picture; so that the one is the more astonished that anything truthful should appear, after being subjected to such a process." Such is the eulogy of Zelter, and it must be said to his praise, that he seems to have appreciated, from the very first, that variety of thought and expression, so splendidly concentrated in after years, in such poetical overtures, as that to the Hebrides and others of equal excellence.

"Certainly," continues Zelter, "I speak as a grandfather, who sports his pet grand-child; still I know what I say, and will not expatiate on ideal excellence which I cannot prove. Applause, liberally given by the orchestral and vocal performers, is a sure criterion; and it is easy to see if an indifference and coldness, or a real earnest satisfaction carries the executants through their work where the composer gives the members of an orchestra something worth interpreting, both parties mutually succeed, and each helps to enjoy the laurels." How entirely have the words of Zelter been realized in the subsequent career of Mendelssohn! It is impossible to forget the enthusiasm shared by the vocal and orchestral members of the Leipsic Society, at the rehearsals of St. Paul and the Hymn of Praise; or the patience shown in conquering the extreme difficulties of his overtures, and the music adapted to the Midsummer Night's Dream of Shakspeare. There never lived Mendelssohn's rival, as a conductor; at times he praised sincerely, at others blamed, but, whether he smiled or frowned, the orchestra invariably acted in accordance with his suggestion, and the suggestion, and the results were sure to justify the wisdom of his choice, and their good sense in adopting it.

In the year 1823, Abraham Mendelssohn travelled, with his son, to Paris, for the express purpose of introducing him to Cherubini. This step showed an honorable distrust in popular praise, the object being to inquire, of an undoubted authority, if the son possessed so decided a genius for the art, as to make it worth while to cultivate these powers to a still greater extent. Cherubini encouraged the father to future sacrifices and efforts for the advancement of his son's welfare, and acknowledged unhesitatingly the youth's great ability. On their journey back, the travellers paid Goethe a visit. He writes to Zelter, on the 25th of May, 1825, "Felix brought out his first quartet; everybody was thunderstruck; to hear the first performance of a work dedicated to me enhances the pleasure I feel at the compliment; it has done me much good too." In the month of June, he wrote to Mendelssohn himself a "Schönes Liebeschreiben," as Zelter called it, and, in return, Felix presented Goethe with a translation of the Andria of Terence, which he had written under the guidance of his private tutor, Heyse. On the 11th of October, 1826, Goethe writes to Zelter, "Thank the excellent, active Felix for his example of earnest practical study; his production, I expect, will be a source of amusement and usefulness to the artists of Weimar, in the long winter evenings before us." In the April of 1829, Moscheles induced Mendelssohn to take a tour through parts of England and Scotland. He had the misfortune, in London, to meet with a trifling accident scarcely worthy note, except as proving how deep an interest was taken in his welfare by one of the greatest men of those days. He happened to be driving through the streets of London with a friend; the gig upset and Mendelssohn, who was thrown out, received a contusion of the knee. Zelter wrote an account of the accident to Goethe, who answered in a letter full of sympathy, "I should like to hear if favourable reports can be given of the worthy Felix; the interest I take in him is great; it is painful to see a man, who has already done so much, endangered, or at least prevented from active work, by an untoward accident, such as you tell me of. Let me hear a more comforting account."

It was now determined that Mendelssohn should journey to Italy; but, before starting, he was honored by Goethe's hospitality, who entertained him for a whole fortnight. Golden moments those few days must have been to the youthful guest, who was sent on his way rejoicing by the bard himself, who sang of "The land where the citrons bloom." From a letter of Goethe's to Zelter, we see what enjoyment he had derived from Mendelssohn's visit. It is dated June 3rd, 1830. "At half-past five o'clock this morning, with a cloudless sky, and in the most lovely sunshine, the excellent Felix left my house. Ottilia (Goethe's wife), Ulrika (Madame von Poggenwisch), and the children (Walter Goethe, the present composer, etc.) were with him. Felix charmed us here a whole fortnight, and played delightfully. He is now on his way to Jena, there to bind his friends by the same delicious spell. His name, I assure you, will be always remembered with honor amongst us. His society has been of great advantage to me, for my interest and better feelings are always excited when I am listening to music. All historical associations connected with the art are valuable in my judgment; and Felix deserves great praise for his thorough knowledge of the gradations, and several periods in music. From the fact of his possessing a retentive memory, he can perform the chef-d'œuvre of all the different schools at his own time and pleasure. He first gave specimens from the Bach epoch, and then brought me back again to Haydn, Mozart, and Gluck, finishing with the great composers of the present day, including his own productions, which make me feel and meditate. He leaves me under the auspices of my best wishes and blessings. Present my respects and congratulations to the worthy parents of this extraordinary young artist." From this time both poet and musician kept up a correspondence, until the death of the former. Goethe constantly alludes to the delightfully-interesting letters of Felix. 4th January, 1831—"You announce to me Felix's visit to Rome, and his prosperous sojourn in that city. Wherever he goes, he must of course meet with the same favorable reception, he unites great powers with such an amiable nature." And on the 31st of March, in the same year: "My chief news is that I have just received a delightful letter from Felix, dated from Rome, 5th of March. It gives me a lively picture of that remarkable young man. I feel quite sure of the success of his coming years: his genius will serve him as a "swimming jacket," to carry him safely over the breakers and stormy seas that always threaten rising greatness." The prophecy of the old king of poets was verified: for at a time when Art was on the decline, and weeds growing luxuriously over the ruins, with what an inspired energy did Felix restore what had fallen, and raise a pure classical style on the base of his own original erections. I have laid great stress in the early part of my memoir on Goethe's friendship with Mendelssohn, for it was, as we before stated, a most important period in his career; and (strange to say) most of those who have sketched outlines of his life have neglected the mention of it. Felix was the last scion of an age when German artists of any pretensions acquired excellence, in partially modelling from antiquity, without sacrificing their original power. Goethe, in whom the Grecian element so happily blended with the native German, influenced his friend in this direction by precept and example. The details of Mendelssohn's career will prove the truth of our statement. Let us look at the development of his genius, and return to that period when we left him as a boy under the care of Zelter and Ludwig Berger.

The Voice, as an Instrument.

MR. EDITOR:—As it is obvious that the abuse to which that noblest, most beautiful and difficult of musical instruments, the human voice, is so generally subjected among us, arises from the ignorance so universally prevailing, concerning the difficulty of its development and cultivation, allow me to offer a few suggestions upon the subject, which I hope may find a place in your interesting and instructive journal.

Little need be said of the nobleness of the voice as an instrument, when we remember that its organs are formed and perfected by the great Creator, and are a part of the human frame which is "fearfully and wonderfully made." It is also a model for imitation in the construction of other instruments; and those are considered most superior and perfect, that in their tones resemble most nearly the human voice. Less is necessary to be said of its beauty, especially to those who have listened to the thrilling voices and wonderful execution of Caradori, Sontag or Lind; but that more respect may be had for it, with regard to the manner of its development and cultivation, let us examine a little more closely the difficulties that attend them. None will deny that the piano is a difficult instrument, and the violin much more so, and yet every tone in the former is fixed, and can be produced at will, and beyond a doubt, by striking the right key; the violin, having but four fixed tones, is, with regard to intonation alone, proportionally more difficult. As the voice has no fixed tone at the command of the will, the difficulty of correct intonation is therefore proportionate. As an imperfect illustration of this, let us suppose the white keys on the piano-forte to be equal, and the black keys hidden from sight; then let a person endeavor to produce any particular tone he may desire, and he will soon see the difficulty in finding immediately the right one. How much more then is it difficult with the voice, when correct intonation depends entirely upon the power which long practice may enable one to acquire, in seizing upon the relation between the will and the vocal organs, as communicated to the mind through the ear by means of some instrument, or, after some cultivation, through the eye by means of notes! With some, the faculty to do this is in some degree natural, though it is none the less wonderful. It should be attained by every one, so that, as Panzeron has said, "the voice can be put down upon every note, purely, distinctly, and with ease. This may be done without effort, roughness or violence, without diminution of sweetness and liquidity of tone; and until it can be done, the pupil should undertake little else than vocal exercises."

Many persons labor under the mistaken notion that the art of singing can be pursued successfully by practice in classes; but, says the same author, "every pupil should be trained alone, at least until perfect in vocalization." Knowing, as we do, that no two voices are alike, no two cases present the same impediments, natural or acquired, how apparent is the folly of ranging a dozen or more singers in a row, all to be set to screaming upon the same general plan, without any reference to the peculiar necessities of each voice! A physician has the advantage of a teacher of singing, in the respect that he can look at the tongue, and feel the pulse, which may assist him in forming his opinion and making his consequent prescription; but what sick person would consent to stand up with any number of others, without any particular inquiry into his case, and be dosed and physicked on a wholesale system? And yet would it not be more just than in the case of vocal patients? Nevertheless it is possible that pleasing results may follow instruction in small classes, where there is not the ability or means for private tuition, with special care and consideration on the part of the teacher. "Though the introduction of singing into our public schools may also be regarded with pleasure, yet some danger is to be apprehended from disregard to the peculiar changes that the human system undergoes at an early period of life, on account of which the vocal organs should be used with great caution. Many a fine voice has been destroyed, and probably, too, the general health greatly impaired, by inattention to, or ignorance on this subject."

Let then every one who wishes to sing well, first decide if he have the time and means to pursue the cultivation of the voice properly, and then procure the services of an educated and conscientious master,—one who will teach him to sing the notes as they are written,—to give each note its full length—to make no pauses unless indicated by the author,—to make no portamento unless it is written, and to distinguish between the proper portamento, and the detestable sliding and moaning, which is become so common and fashionable,—a master who will select such songs as are suitable for him to sing, and for the place in which they are to be sung. The modern Italian Opera music, in the performance of which professional singers astonish by their execution, is frequently attempted by amateurs, who can only imitate them in a most imperfect and unskilful manner, rendering themselves ridiculous, in the effort to perform that which requires the most perfect command of the voice, and long perseverance and application in its cultivation. Let, therefore, opera music be left for the opera and professional artists, with the exception, perhaps, of some of the more simple songs, &c.; and also, leave negro melodies for those for whom they are intended,—the colored race, or such as are willing to blacken themselves in imitation of their unfortunate brethren—and let our young people, who wish to please by their vocal performances, study the beautiful ballads and songs of Schubert, Mendelssohn, and many other German, Italian and English authors.

When these matters are properly considered and attended to, and not until then, we may have good singing in our private circles. O**

Ninth Germania Concert.

Last Saturday evening the exclusively "classical" music took its first turn under the new arrangement. A purer and a richer programme never was presented to an American audience. We may also add, a more felicitously varied programme. For it is childish to suppose an incoherent medley, of symphony and polka, Beethoven and sable minstrelsy, the sublime and the frivolous, the delicately ideal and the boisterously rowdy, essential to variety. There really is more effective variety, more stimulating contrast, between the different movements of the same good symphony, for instance, than there is between the different pieces of the most miscellaneous "popular" programme: just as a select society of persons, who have real wit and character, and whose meeting proceeds from a certain key-note to a certain end, offers far less monotony and far more entertaining contrast of true individuality, than a great miscellaneous assemblage, which is aimless, light and frivolous. And of all monotonies to which soul and sense are liable, save us from the confused Babel in the brain, the torpor of stunned nerves and feelings, which results from listening to a purely heterogeneous succession of songs, dances, overtures, solos with variations, &c, &c., where one impression is recklessly trodden out by another, until hearing everything and hearing nothing come to be pretty nearly equivalent. Contrast is all-essential, but it amounts to nothing, when there is no relation between the things contrasted.

The lovers of "light" music of course complain of music that is "heavy." But heaviness and dullness do not alone or necessarily pertain to solemn subjects and to learned treatment. On the contrary, what heaviness can be compared to the effect upon the mind of an interminable series of flashy flute variations, or a whole evening of pretty waltzes, polkas, &c, which with all their brilliancy, and their coquettish gracefulness of rhythm, sound like changes rung upon one theme, until passages from all of them will haunt you in the memory of each! If you want wit and sprightliness, can not Shakspeare give it to you in as full a measure as Dion Bourciquault, or the author of the Pillicoddy farces? If you crave grotesque and fantastic recreation in your music, is not a Beethoven Scherzo, or a Mendelssohn Capriccio or overture, as daintily refreshing as a Jullien quadrille? Or do you like the glitter best without the gold?

We are no exclusive sticklers for one style of music. There is as wide room for difference of style within, as there is without, the so-called "classical" boundaries, if any one can tell just where they run. We cheerfully compromise a good deal to get a good thing, and do not mind taking quite a quantity of sand, if we are assured there is a diamond somewhere in the midst of it. Mixed programmes we have always willingly accepted, and indeed they have been the necessary policy of concert-givers thus far. But the earnest music-lovers are more tolerant of a few light things in a programme, than the party who go to talk and be amused are of a symphony. The Germanians do well, therefore, to try the experiment of an entire distinction. Let them not give purely classical programmes to a ruinous extent, in a business point of view; but it is quite well, so long as their whole season's business can afford, that some unique opportunities of this sort should exist; that there should be some purely musical occasions, as well as mixed entertainments, where music only accompanies and fills the pauses of small talk, or hints the pleasurable excitements of the ball room and the military parade.

The audience of Saturday was certainly not so large, by a few hundreds, as that of the Saturday preceding; and if that fell short of the previous standard, when there were mixed programmes, this exhibited a still wider difference. It was to be expected. Yet it was a very large audience to be gathered for a whole evening of purely orchestral performances of Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Cherubini. The Music Hall looked more than two-thirds full; at the lowest mark, there must have been twelve hundred auditors. And an audience so attentive, so delighted, so sympathetic, so discriminating in its applause we have never before seen, save in a small Chamber Concert. It is settled beyond a doubt that over a thousand people can be relied upon in Boston, at any time not positively unfavorable, for a concert made up of the best music and of nothing else. One thing we are sure of; the more this string is played upon, the more responsive and the stronger will it become. The thousand of last Saturday are guaranty of twice that number, when the custom of such programmes shall once be fairly established.

Of the performances themselves we shall not enter into much detail. Cherubini's overture to "Medea" impressed us as extremely beautiful, full of fire and nobleness, relieved with passages of tender gracefulness; and always clear, significant and earnest, as one would expect from the composer of "Les deux Journées." We doubt not it will become a favorite in our better class of concerts. The fourth piano-forte Concerto, (in G major, op. 58), by Beethoven, was also new to us. We gathered enough from the performance to convince us of its rare beauty, depth, fertility of musical invention, logical development, effective contrast and yet true intimate relationship in its different movements—in short, of all the great Beethoven characteristics. But Mr. ROBERT HELLER was not up to that kind of work; his rendering was mechanical and lifeless; so that with that great majority of listeners, who have not the eagerness to try to decipher the outlines of a composition from a mere approximation to a perfect rendering, the thing must have been rather a damper upon the lively progress of the evening's entertainment. The long orchestral introduction was very beautiful, the entrance of the piano-forte beautifully prepared, and everything excited the finest expectations, until these defects in the main figure of the foreground grew to be too obvious. Yet our desire was piqued to have this Concerto brought more fully home to us, under more favorable auspices. Mendelssohn's delightful, dreamy, fascinating overture, which takes its title from the old German mermaid story of "The fair Melusina," instantly set all right again, and brought us through the first part with an appetite.

Mendelssohn again opened the second part. His admirable violin Concerto, in E minor, was performed entire by WILLIAM SCHULTZE. Many times we have heard it, but not before with so much pleasure. Possibly Joseph Burke, at the New York Philharmonic, put more fire into it:—we did not hear him. But here there was no feebleness, no lack of earnestness; while all was chaste and finished, pure in intonation, sweet and rich in tone, and satisfactory in expression. Beethoven's glorious seventh symphony, in A, requires no comment as a composition; it has grown so familiar to Boston ears, that it speaks for itself whenever it is decently played. We do not remember that we ever before heard it from the Germania orchestra, at least since BERGMANN has been their conductor. Truly we may say we never heard it done so well; never with such unbroken purity of outline; such fiery precision or delicate shading, as the passage might require; such sympathetic coöperation on the part of every instrument. Nothing but greater mass and breadth was wanted. The strings were not quite up to the usual mark in number, and could have borne trebling. But we were astonished at the power and largeness that were realized even with such thinness of material. It was vastly more effective than a blurred copy upon twice the scale; and the only regret is that a larger orchestra is not yet found to pay. Let the Germanians persist in high endeavors, with unflinching faith in the capacity of human nature to accept what is best, and this fault will ere long be remedied. To the public we may safely say: as your attendance grows, so grows the orchestra.

Since writing the above, we have received the following, from which the Germanians, and those who sympathize with their best efforts, may certainly derive a crumb of comfort. We could point, if it were necessary, to many just such crumbs.

DEAR DWIGHT:—The attraction of last Saturday's programme brought me in from the country to an evening concert for the first time this winter, and I cannot help expressing the great satisfaction and pleasure I received. I will engage, for one, to come in to all such concerts which the Germanians may give. I trust that Mr. Bergmann and his orchestra will consider their experiment a success, as I think it undoubtedly was, even though the Hall was not completely full and they might have missed the rustle and flutter of all the butterflies who come to hear their "Pickpocket Quadrilles." The great charm of the performances was to me their uniformity of character, or rather of grade. The impression of the whole was harmonious. The effect of a beautiful and elevated piece was not marred, as in their miscellaneous concerts, by the necessity of descending in the next to the tone of some waltz or polka, very well in its way no doubt, but sometimes sadly out of harmony with the character of its predecessor. It seems to me that they have now hit upon the true principle. Let them serve up syllabub and solid fare alternately, and let each have its appropriate audience. If the more sober audience is the smaller in the beginning, it will be the surest to grow and the largest in the end; and our friends are bound to do something for our instruction as well as amusement.

Even though it should be putting some of their efforts out at interest, as it were, it is an investment that will be sure to pay in the end. I am no musician and don't know A flat from B sharp—you see I don't—but I have listened to good music till I have gained a real relish for much of the most elevated and beautiful that is offered us, and a corresponding distaste for mere flummery. This is the case I think with a large class of the Germanians' auditors, and their wants, as well as those of really musical people, are exactly met by such concerts as Saturday's. I trust they may be continued.

The repetition of the Seventh Symphony brought vividly back to my memory those times, which people as old as you and I are getting to be, Mr. Dwight, so well remember, when by special favor we used to hear it rehearsed, for the first time in Boston, in that dark old Odeon, in the gray of a winter afternoon. It was a brave attempt to play Beethoven's symphonies then, but it succeeded, and has borne fruit which the Germanians have inherited. Let them imitate the faith of their predecessors, and not allow the standard, which was set so high when there was so little encouragement to be lowered now when there is so much. B#

Handel and Haydn Society.

The second performance of "Moses in Egypt" was an improvement on the first; and, considering that it was the most elaborate and florid kind of Italian opera music, was highly creditable to a large amateur choral society. Miss ANNA STONE surpassed herself in her brilliant, bold, at times impassioned rendering of the solos of the queen and anxious mother, Nicaule. The air of Esther: "All is about me smiling" was beautifully sung by Mrs. WENTWORTH, and the following recitative and duet between her and Nicaule was capitally given. The duet, too, between Esther and Osiris (Mr. ARTHURSON) was highly finished and expressive, the tenor and soprano tones blending very sweetly. We were again favorably impressed by the fresh, clear, penetrating voice, and unaffected manner of Miss BROWN in the quartet "Oh, hear me;" and one was inclined to regret that the part of Almatea contained so little. Mr. ARKEN put more fire and elasticity into his solos than before, and his delivery of several passages was really fine. The second tenor, Mr. WHEAT, has good material, which with more culture may do excellent service.

The Canon for five voices, the Sestet, Quartet, &c. with their graceful interweavings of florid and luxurious melody, pleased universally, as they were quite neatly and, with few exceptions, expressively sung. The choruses were effective, and the orchestral accompaniments ran like a bright and beautiful arabesque throughout the whole.

The audience was very large, in spite of the cold and driving snow storm. To-morrow night the "Moses" will be given for the third time and conclude the six subscription nights.

The Midsummer Night's Dream with Mendelssohn Music.

This most difficult and delicate of theatrical tasks has actually been accomplished, with no small degree of success, at two of the New York theatres during the past week. The example was first set by Burton, whose refined taste as a manager displayed itself in the early days of his nice little theatre by the production of Milton's "Comus." The papers report favorably, even enthusiastically, of the rare beauty of the scenery and the entire getting up; of the acting, particularly Puck, Titania, and Burton's "Bottom"; and of the careful rendering of the entire music of Mendelssohn by an orchestra limited of course in numbers to the small size of the theatre. The house has been crowded, and the play is announced for repetition every night until further notice.

It is also having a run at the Broadway Theatre. We quote some sentences from an extended notice of the first performance in the Mirror.

First and foremost, of the scenery. We feel that if we were to exhaust the language of praise, we could but half express its gorgeous beauty. It elicited the most tumultuous plaudits, and must be seen to be appreciated. We will therefore attempt no description. The panoramic scene, where Oberon travels through the fairy land, surpasses everything we have ever seen upon any stage. The dropping of treble gauzes to represent mist and darkness, produced a fine and mystical effect. The machinery all worked well, and reflected great credit upon the artists. The corps de ballet was well drilled, and Mlle Leeder danced exceedingly well, and looked charmingly. The costuming was correct; the scallop shell, drawn by swans, the magnificent galley of the Amazonian Queen, and all the other appointments and accessories, were beautiful and appropriate.

Of the acting we cannot speak at length, though we should like to. A general fault was the strange liberties taken with the text. This might do ordinarily, but it is inexcusable in one of Shakespeare's plays, especially a poetical one, where the rhythm was destroyed and the beauties marred by transpositions, omissions and interpolations. The performers must study their parts more carefully if they hope to please Shakspearean critics. This fault was particularly noticeable in the chief character, who gave us too much of "Davidge" and too little of "Bottom."

* * * * *
In the overture each individual started off on his own account, as if he were playing "Hail Columbia," and ingeniously persevered until half through the piece before they got together in perfect time and tune. This surprised us not a little, as a major part of the orchestra was composed of the best Philharmonic players. The fact that they did better later in the evening, and rendered some of the music with classic elegance and faultless precision, showed that it was the result of carelessness or want of sufficient rehearsal. This fault we do not expect to see repeated, and as they gave ample proof of what they can do with Mendelssohn's music, the public will not excuse any shortcomings in future. . . . Puck's solo, "Up and down," was very well sung, the choruses were tolerably effective, and when rendered more smoothly (as we doubt not it will be) the music will constitute one of the greatest charms of the play.

We cannot refrain from saying that the management did not have the proper conception of the character of Puck. This was personated by a mere child—"La Petite Viola"—who repeated the part with a closer adherence to the text than most of the other performers, it is true, and who had been well schooled in regard to delivery and emphasis; but the audience could not avoid regarding it as a mere recitation. Puck is one of the most cunning and important personages of the drama, upon whose action most of the plot hinges, and should not be entrusted to a child, no matter how precocious. And then again, Puck was represented as a beautiful and interesting fairy, with a fair form and perfect figure. This was not Shakspeare's creation.

GERMANIA REHEARSAL. Snow, suddenly changed to floods of rain, last Wednesday afternoon, reduced the audience to a few scattered shivering groups of people, who had all to themselves a choicer selection of music than has before been given of an afternoon. First was played Beethoven's Seventh Symphony entire. Then the overture to "Medea," which marvellously improved upon acquaintance. Then came one of Strauss's graceful and poetic waltzes. Then Mr. W. R. Babcock's Funeral March, in memory of JONAS CHICKERING, arranged for orchestra by Bergmann, which was quite solemn and effective. And lastly a finale from Rossini's "Siege of Corinth."

Paris.

SOPHIE CRUVELLI.—The début of this lady at the Grand Opera, (Jan. 16th,) is thus described by "A German in Paris," in a letter to the London Musical World:

The house was crammed to the ceiling. I have rarely witnessed a scene of such excitement. The audience were literally palpitating with expectation in the interval which preceded the rise of the curtain. So great had been the curiosity to be present on the occasion, that, a fortnight in advance, orchestra stalls were sold as high as 200 francs, and the best places in the boxes were scarcely to be had at any price. On the evening of the performance the mere privilege of the entrée, without fixed places, was selling at the doors of the theatre for twenty and twenty-five francs, and finding greedy purchasers. The foyer, and all the lobbies, were crowded with persons unable to get seats. You are aware that there is no "standing room," as at our London theatres, in the Grand Opera here.

The Emperor and Empress arrived some time before the hour of commencement. The number of notabilities among the audience was so great that I shall not think of naming them. Among others, however, I must mention the celebrated Meyerbeer, whose interest in the success of Sophie Cruvelli must have been urged by two influences—the first, a real desire for the young singer's welfare; the next, the renewed impetuous given to the attraction of his Huguenots—which, I am told, among all his operas, is his chief favorite. There was Anber, too—looking young and vigorous enough to compose another Muette di Portici, and vivacious enough for another score of Black Dominoes. Benedict, just arrived from Munich, where he had assisted at his own success, was now anxious to witness that of his interesting friend and compatriot; but, as he came too late to get a place at any price, he was gallant enough to risk his neck in the heated and thronged parterre. Vivier, of course, was there—for what événement can be regarded as complete without the presence of the humoristico-spirituesque horn-player—a self-constituted, but not the less a satisfactory arbitre d'équité? To conclude, Alboni, "the imitable," the intellectual Pauline Viardot Garcia, Mario, Tamburini, and a host of artistic celebrities, with Jules Janin, Hector Berlioz, Théophile Gautier, Fiorentino, and all the authorities of the Parisian press, were observed in the crowd; and, in short, it was scarcely possible to direct an opera glass to any part of the house without bringing the face and figure of some notable person into view.

I have no time to enter into details of the performance; but I may sum up by assuring you that, by unanimous verdict, it was agreed that such a Valentine had never been seen or heard before. Had Maria been the Raoul I think the public would have gone mad. The reception given to Cruvelli on her entrance was deafening; but this was pale when compared with what followed. The first scene established her success. Her costume was in exquisite taste, and I never saw her look more fascinating and beautiful. The voice—and what a voice is Sophie's!—vibrated through the house in such a manner as to give almost a fresh musical sensation. The duet with Marcel in the scene of the Pré aux Clercs produced a furor. The applause and cheering of the organized claque—the crying nuisance of the French theatres—was utterly drowned by the thunders of approval that came direct from the audience. The claque had lost its voice, and its office was a derision. Where truth speaks out, the cry of the mere hireling is snuffed out. After the great scene, the duet between Valentine and Raoul, which follows the Benediction of the Poignards (the dramatic triumph of Meyerbeer)—the enthusiasm that ensued surpasses my powers to describe.

Miscellaneous.

The minister of state has granted a pension of 1200 francs to Mlle. Sedaine, the last descendant of the author of Richard Cœur de Lion.

Mr. Andreoli, formerly director of the Chapel of Ferdinand VII, and author of several much esteemed religious compositions, died at Barcelona, last month, in his 68th year.

Mme. Boieldieu, who died lately in Paris, was daughter of Jean Baptiste Philis, a celebrated professor of the guitar, and the younger sister of Jeanne Philis, one of the most brilliant cantatrices of the Opera-Comique.

Vienxtemps and Servais will arrive in Paris towards the end of January, or at the commencement of Feb'y.

On the 26th of Dec., Rosati was to make her debut in a new ballet at the theatre Reggias at Turin.

Since the opening of the theatre Don Carlos, at Lisbon, the Italian troupe, composed of Mmes. Castellau, Angles, Fortuni, M. M. Miraglia and Bartollini, have played Masnadieri, of Verdi, 5 times; Sonnambula, of Bellini, 3 times; Luisa Miller, Verdi, 6 times; Maria d'Inghilterra, Pacini, twice; Don Pasquale, Donizetti, twice; and Ernani once. Her Majesty Donna Maria II. was present at the six representations of Luisa Miller, and that of Ernani. They announce for the reopening Ernani, to be followed by Rigoletto, and the Travatore of Verdi, and The Huguenots, of Meyerbeer.

Donizetti's new opera in 3 acts: Elizabeth, ou la Fille du Proscrit, was announced for the 28th Dec. It will be performed by Messrs. Laurent, Tallon, Junca, Cabel, &c., and by Mmes. Colson, Petit, Briere, Girard, and Vade. The studies of the score have been directed by M. Fontana, a pupil of Donizetti. From the immense effect of the rehearsals a long success is anticipated.

MOORE'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF MUSIC:

COMPILED BY JOHN W. MOORE,

With the assistance of JOHN S. DWIGHT, Esq., and other distinguished men in the musical world. The intention of the author is to make a most complete and thorough work of the above, which will be a desideratum in the world of music. It will be published in one elegant Royal Octavo volume of about 900 pages, double columns, and will contain a complete

Dictionary of Musical Terms,

A HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE OF MUSIC, from the earliest time to the present, a

Treatise on Harmony and Thorough Bass,

a description of all known MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, with the names of the most distinguished makers, and a complete Musical Biography of over three thousand of the most distinguished Composers and Musicians who have ever lived. Mr. Moore has spent several years in compiling this valuable work. It is now going through the press as rapidly as will comport with accuracy.

P. S.—The above splendid work, which will prove invaluable to every professional musician, and to every amateur, will be ready this spring; we hope in the month of March. It has been delayed on account of the immense labor bestowed upon it, and the difficulty of stereotyping a work so full of examples. The delay, however, will not detract from the value of the work.

The price, bound in cloth, will be...$3 00.

The price, bound in half calf, will be...$4 00.

—Edward L. Balch,

THE MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE PIANO-FORTE

HAS now been examined by the most distinguished European and American Professors, Composers, Pianists, Teachers, Amateurs, Musical Critics, and Editors, with unanimous satisfaction.

It is also an established and confirmed fact, that this work is the most thorough, progressive, and complete Instruction-Book ever offered to the Public, and that a pupil can learn to play the piano in one half the time through this method that it will take with any other now in use. The following Professors, Pianists, and Teachers, have given us the most complimentary recommendations, which have already appeared in print:

From LOWELL MASON.

New York, Jan. 17, 1854.

Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON:

DEAR SIR: I have received a copy of the "Modern School for the Piano-forte." Having witnessed, in part, your efforts, when in Europe, in compilation of a book, and having known something of your intercourse with some of the best Pianists of the age, I was prepared to expect a most thorough and complete work, on the training of the fingers to the key-board. That you have really produced the best work of the kind that has yet appeared, I am fully satisfied.

LOWELL MASON.

From GEORGE J. WEBB.

Boston, Dec. 20, 1853.

Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON:

DEAR SIR: Having examined, with considerable care, your "Modern School for the Piano-forte," I feel prepared to add my humble testimony to its intrinsic merit. I regard it as a work of great value to the piano-forte student. Its numerous exercises, (many of which are new, and most ingeniously contrived,) for strengthening and securing an independent action of the fingers, together with its extensive provision for scale practice, are superior to any book of a similar nature that has fallen under my notice. It seems to me, also, to embrace all qualities necessary to enable any one possessing the requisite musical talents to surmount the greatest difficulties met with in the works of the most distinguished composers.

Yours truly,

GEORGE J. WEBB.

From GEORGE F. ROOT.

New York, Jan. 12, 1854.

Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON:

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your admirable and elegant book, the "Modern School for the Piano-forte." I have examined it with deep interest, and have been exceedingly gratified with its contents, and the manner of their presentation. I have no hesitation in saying that I consider it the best Piano-forte Instruction Book, in all respects, that has ever come under my notice; and I take great pleasure in recommending it to my friends and the public.

I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE F. ROOT.

From WM. B. BRADBURY.

New York, Jan. 14, 1854.

NATHAN RICHARDSON, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: Please accept my thanks for the copy of the "Modern School for the Piano-forte" which you so kindly sent me. I have examined it with much pleasure. The matter which it contains, the manner of its arrangement, and the style in which the work is issued, each and all reflect great credit upon American genius and American art.

The "Modern School for the Piano-forte" is undoubtedly the best work of the kind that has ever been issued from the press of this or any other country. I felt satisfied that this must be the case, even before I saw it, from the fact that so many distinguished gentlemen, in whose judgment I repose the most implicit confidence, had given it their unqualified approval. Added to this, I find, on examination, that you have embodied the leading points of excellence in the methods of Dreyschock, Moscheles, Schullhoff, and other eminent European teachers, (whose peculiarities I had an opportunity of learning while abroad;) and these having been passed through the ordaining alembic of a Yankee mind, stand forth in the "Modern School," the very ne plus ultra of piano-forte exercises and instruction.

In conclusion, I beg to say, that wherever there is a piano-forte, or a pupil, I hope there will also be a copy of the "Modern School." Most truly yours,

WM. B. BRADBURY.

Rossini.

GIACOMO ROSSINI was born February, 1792, at Pesaro, a small town in the papal states, situated on the gulf of Venice. His father was an inferior performer on the French horn, and belonged to one of those strolling companies of actors and musicians, who, to gain a livelihood, attend the fairs of the small towns in Italy; his mother, who passed for one of the prettiest women of Romagna, was a seconda donna, of passable talents. Their son of course accompanied them in these excursions. In 1799, Rossini's father took him to Bologna, where he began to study music in 1802; his first master being D. Angelo Tesei. In the course of a few months, the young Giacomo already earned paoli by singing in the churches. His pleasing soprano voice, and the vivacity of his youthful manners, gained him many friends among the priests who directed the Funzioni. Under professor Angelo Tesei, Rossini became a tolerable proficient in singing, in the art of accompanying, and in the rules of counterpoint. In 1806, he was capable of singing at first sight any piece of music put before him, and great hopes were conceived of his future excellence: it was augured from his growth, and the quality of his voice, that he would make an excellent tenor.

On the 27th of August, 1806, he quitted Bologna to make the musical tour of Romagna. He took his place at the piano, as director of the orchestra at Lugo, Ferrara, Forli, Sinigaglia, and other little towns. It was only in 1807 that the young Rossini gave up singing in the church. The 20th of March, in the same year, he entered the Lyceum of Bologna, and received lessons in music from Padre Stanislaw Mattei.

A year after, (the 11th of August, 1808) he made so considerable a progress, as to be qualified to compose a symphony, and a cantata entitled "Il Pianto d'Armonia." This was his first essay in vocal music. Immediately after this, he was chosen director of the academy of the Concordi, a musical society at that time existing in the bosom of the Lyceum at Bologna. "Demetrio e Polibio" is the first opera composed by Rossini. It is said to have been written in 1809, but it was not performed till 1812, in the Teatro Valle at Rome. Some have imagined that it was rewritten by the master for this representation; but there is no proof of the fact. His known indolence, and the active duties he was obliged to perform this year, would rather tell against such a supposition.

Such was the progress Rossini had made at 19, that he was chosen to direct, as head of the orchestra, the "Four Seasons" of Haydn, which was executed at Bologna: the "Creation," which was given on the same occasion, (May 1811) was directed by the celebrated soprano Marchesi. When the parents of Rossini had no engagement, they returned to their residence at Pesaro. Some rich amateurs of this town, we believe of the family Perticari, took the young Rossini under their protection. A young lady, of considerable beauty and fortune, formed the happy idea of sending him to Venice: he there composed, for the Teatro San Mosè, a little opera in one act, entitled "La Cambiale di Matrimonio," 1810. This was the first opera of Rossini performed upon the stage. After a success very flattering to a beginner, he returned to Bologna; and, in the autumn of the following year, (1811) produced "L'Equivoco Stravagante." The following year he returned to Venice, and composed for the carnival "L'Inganno Felice."

In this piece genius shines forth in every part. An experienced eye will at once recognize in this opera in one act, the parent ideas of fifteen or twenty pieces, which at a latter period contributed to decide the fortune of the chefs-d'œuvre of Rossini.

The "Inganno Felice" resembles the first pictures of Raphael, which he painted in the school of Ferrugino, and which display all the faults and all the timidity of early youth. Rossini not venturing to assume the master at twenty, was fearful as yet to attempt to please himself only. The same year his patrons procured him an engagement at Ferrara; and, during the last season, he composed an oratorio entitled "Ciro in Babilonia;" a work containing many beauties, but considered by critics as inferior in energy to the "Inganno Felice." After this, he was again summoned to Venice; but the impresario of San Mosè not content with gaining, for a few sequini, the talents of a pleasing composer, who was patronized by the ladies, and whose rising genius was destined to bring new honors to his theatre, thought that, as he was poor, he might treat him cavalierly with impunity. Rossini at once gave him a proof of that independence of character, by which he has since been always distinguished. In quality of composer, Rossini's power over the orchestra was absolute, and he could oblige them to execute whatever he composed. In the new opera, therefore, of "La Scala di Seta," which he made for the insolent impresario, he brought together an assemblage of all the extravagances and whimsical combinations, in which, it may well be supposed, a head like his is sufficiently fertile. For instance, in the allegro of the overture, the violins are made to break off at the end of every bar, in order to give a rap with the bow upon the tin shades of the candlesticks. It would be difficult to imagine the astonishment and indignation of an immense concourse of people, assembled from every quarter of Venice, and even from the Terra Firma, to hear the new opera of the young maestro. This public, who, during the greater part of the afternoon, had besieged the doors, who had been forced to wait whole hours in the passages, and at last to endure the "tug of war" at the opening of the doors, thought themselves personally insulted, and hissed with all the vengeance of an enraged Italian public. Rossini, not in the least moved by all this uproar, coolly asked the trembling impresario, with a smile, what he had gained by treating him so cavalierly. He then quitted the theatre, and started at once for Milan, where his friends had procured him an engagement. However, a month after, he made his peace with the humbled manager; and, returning to Venice, successfully produced two farze (operas in one act) at the Teatro San Mosè: "L'Occasione fa il Ladro," 1812, and "Il Figlio per Azzardo," in the carnival of 1813. It was also during this carnival that Rossini composed his "Tancredi."

No adequate idea can be formed of the success which this delightful opera obtained at Venice. Suffice it to say, that the presence of Napoleon himself, who honored the Venetians with a visit, was unable to call off their attention from Rossini. All was enthusiasm! tutto furore, to use the terms of that expressive language, which seems to have been created for the use of the arts. From the gondolier to the patrician, everybody was repeating "Mi rivedrai, ti rivedrai." In the very courts of law, the judges were obliged to impose silence on the auditory, who were ceaselessly humming "Ti rivedrai."

The delightful opera of "Tancredi" made the tour of Europe, in the short space of four years.

It may well be supposed that, in such a place as Venice, Rossini was not less happy as a man, than celebrated as a composer. The fame of his reputation, aided by the agreeableness of his manners, won him the heart of the charming cantatrice buffa, the signora Marcolini, then in the flower of her beauty and her talents. Her charms were all-powerful, and she succeeded in estranging his affections from his former fair patrons.

It was for Marcolini,—it was for her delicious contralto voice, and admirable comic powers, that he composed the gay and animated part of the Italiana in Algeri, which at once placed the youthful composer in the first rank of maestri.

Such was the run that this new piece obtained, that Rossini had leisure to indulge for some time in his natural indolence, for indolent he was to excess. This the following anecdote will serve to prove.

During his residence in Venice this year, (1813) he lodged in a little room at one of the small inns. When the weather was cold he used to lie and write his music in bed, in order to save the expense of firing. On one of these occasions, a duet, which he had just finished for a new opera, "Il Figlio per Azzardo," slipped from the bed, and fell on the floor. Rossini peeped for it in vain from under the bedclothes, it had fallen under the bed. After many a painful effort, he crept from his snug place, and leaned over the side of the bed to look for it. He sees it, but it lies beyond the reach of his arm; he makes one or two ineffectual efforts to reach it; he is half frozen with cold; and, wrapping himself up in the coverlid, exclaims, "Curse the duet, I will write it over again; there will be nothing difficult in this, since I know it by heart." He began again, but not a single idea could he retrace; he fidgets about for some time—he scrawls—but not a note can he recall. Still his indolence will not let him get out of bed to reach the unfortunate paper. "Well," he exclaims, in a fit of impatience, "I will rewrite the whole duet. Let such composers as are rich enough keep fires in their chambers. I cannot afford it. There let the confounded paper lie. It has fallen, and it would not be lucky to pick it up again."

He had scarcely finished the second duet, when one of his friends entered. "Have the goodness to reach me the duet that lies under the bed." The friend poked it out with his cane, and gave it to Rossini. "Come," says the composer, snuggling close in his bed, "I will sing you these two duets, and do you tell me which pleases you the best." The friend gave the preference to the first; the second was too rapid and too lively for the situation in which it was to stand. Another thought came into Rossini's head; he seized his pen, and, without loss of time, worked it up into a terzetto for the same opera. The relater of this anecdote states, that there was not the slightest resemblance between the two duets. The terzetto finished, Rossini dressed himself in haste, cursing the cold the whole time, and set off with his friend to the casino, to warm himself and take a cup of coffee. After this, he sent the lad of the casino with the duet and the terzetto to the copyist of San Mosè, to be inserted in the score. In the autumn of the same year, (1812) Rossini was engaged at Milan, when, for the Scala, he composed "La Pietra del Paragone." He had now attained his twentieth year. His opera had the good fortune to be sustained by the talents of signora Marcolini, Galli, Bonoldi, and Parlamagni, who were in the flower of their fame, and obtained a success for this piece which was little short of extravagance.

"La Pietra del Paragone" (the Touch-stone) is considered by some critics as the chef-d'œuvre of Rossini in the buffa style. After obtaining such distinguished success at Milan, Rossini revisited Pesaro and his family, to whom he is warmly attached. The only person with whom he has been known to correspond is his mother, and his letters to her are thus singularly addressed: "All' Ornatissima Signora Rossini, Madre del celebre Maestro in Bologna."

Such is the character of a man, who, half in jest, half in earnest, scruples not to make an avowal of the glory that surrounds him, and laughs at the modest prudery of the academy. Deriving happiness from the effects produced by his genius upon a people the most sensitive upon earth, and intoxicated with the voice of praise from his very cradle, he believes implicitly in his own celebrity, and cannot see why a man, gifted like Rossini, should not rank in the same degree as a general of division or a minister of state. They have gained a grand prize in the lottery of ambition, he has gained a grand prize in the lottery of nature. This is one of Rossini's own phrases. I heard it from his own lips, says one of his biographers, at a party given by Prince Ghigi at Rome, in 1819.

About the time of his journey to Pesaro, an attention was shown him as honorable as it was rare, and which is equally creditable to the giver and the receiver; his genius proved the means of his exemption from the almost universal operation of the miserable conscription laws. The minister of the interior ventured to propose to Prince Eugene, the Viceroy of Italy, an exception in his favor. The prince at first hesitated, through fear of a reprimand from head quarters at Paris, the daily advices from which were most pressing and most vigorous upon this point; but he at length yielded to the decided feelings of the public.

After this narrow escape from being sent for a soldier, Rossini went to Bologna, where the same adventure awaited him as at Milan—the enthusiasm of the public, and the more grateful meed of the smiles of beauty.

The rigorists of Bologna, so celebrated in Italy for the severity of their critical taste, and who exercised the same dictatorship over music as the members of the French Academy did over the three unities, reproached him, and not without reason, with having sometimes transgressed against the rules of composition. Rossini did not deny the justice of the charge. "I should not have so many faults to reproach myself with," was his reply, "if I had leisure to read my manuscript twice over; but you know very well, that scarcely six weeks are allowed me to compose an opera. I take my pleasure during the first month; and pray when would you have me take my pleasure, if not at my present age, and with my present success? Would you have me wait till I am grown old and full of spleen? At length the two last weeks arrive; I compose every morning a duo or air, which is to be rehearsed that very evening. How then would you have me detect little faults of grammar in the accompaniment? (l'instrumentazione?)"

Notwithstanding the candor of this excuse, a great bustle was made in the musical circles of Bologna respecting those faults of grammar. This is the same complaint that the pedants of his time made against Voltaire, whom they accused of not knowing orthography. So much the worse for orthography, was the dry remark of Rivarol.

After listening as patiently as possible to the declamation of these pedants against Rossini for violating the rules of composition, a celebrated critic made this reply: "Pray, who laid down these rules? Were they made by persons superior in genius to the author of 'Tancredi'? Does stupidity cease to be stupidity because sanctioned by antiquity and the usages of the schools? Let us examine these pretended rules a little more closely; and pray what are we to say of rules that can be infringed without the public perceiving it, and without our pleasure being in the least diminished?"

M. Berton, of the institute, renewed this dispute at Paris. The fact is, that the faults here complained of are scarcely perceptible while listening to the operas of Rossini. It is like objecting as a crime to Voltaire, that he does not employ the same phrases and terms of expression as La Bruyère and Montesquieu. The second of these great writers has this memorable sentence: "A member of the French Academy writes as they write; a man of wit writes as he writes."

Rossini is full of grammatical faults: well, be it so; and yet there is not a village in Italy which could not furnish a dozen of critics upon notes, who, for a single sequin, would undertake to correct the errors in any one of his operas.

After his success at Bologna, which is considered as the head-quarters of Italian music, Rossini received offers from almost every town in Italy. Every impresario was required, as a sine qua non, to furnish his theatre with an opera from the pen of Rossini. The consideration he generally received for an opera was a thousand francs, (about forty pounds) and he generally wrote from four to five in a year.

From 1810 to 1816, Rossini visited in succession all the principal towns of Italy, remaining from three to four months in each. Wherever he arrived he was received with acclamations, and fêted by the dilettanti of the place. The first fifteen or twenty days were passed with his friends, dining out, and shrugging up his shoulders at the nonsense of the libretto which was given him to set to music. For, besides the fire of his own natural genius, Rossini was inspired with a good taste by his first admirer, the countess P—— of Pesaro. She had read with him the works of Ariosto and Metastasio, as well as the comedies of Machiavel, the Fiabe of Gozzi, and the poems of Burati; he was therefore fully competent to judge of the worthlessness of these libretti. "Tu mi hai dato versi, ma non situazioni," he had been heard frequently to repeat to an unhappy votary of the nine, who stammered out a thousand excuses, and two hours after came to salute him in a sonnet, "umiliato alla gloria del più gran maestro d'Italia e del mondo."

After two or three weeks spent in this dissipated manner, Rossini begins to refuse invitations to dinners and musical soirées, and falls to work in good earnest. He occupies himself in studying the voices of the performers; he makes them sing at the piano; and, on more than one occasion, he has been driven to the mortifying necessity of mutilating and "curtailing of their fair proportions," some of his most brilliant and happy ideas, because the tenor could not reach the note which was necessary to express the composer's feeling, or because the prima donna always sang false in some particular tone. Sometimes, in a whole company, he could find no one but a bass who could sing at all. At length, about three weeks before the first representation, having acquired a competent knowledge of the voices, he begins to write. He rises late, and passes the day in composing, in the midst of the conversation of his new friends; who with the most provoking politeness, will not quit him for a single instant. The day of the first representation is now rapidly approaching, and yet he cannot resist the pressing solicitations of these friends to dine with them at l'Osteria. This of course leads to a supper; the sparkling Champagne circulates freely; the hours of morning steal on apace. At length a compunctious visiting shoots across the mind of the truant maestro; he rises abruptly; his friends will see him to his own door: they parade the silent streets unbonneted, shouting some musical impromptu, perhaps a portion of a Miserere, to the great scandal and annoyance of the good Catholics in their beds. At length he reaches his house, and shuts himself up in his chamber; and it is at this, to every-day mortals, most ungenial hour, that he is visited by some of the most brilliant of his inspirations. These he hastily scratches down upon odds and ends of paper, and next morning arranges them, amidst the same interruptions of conversation as before. Figure to yourself a quick and ardent mind, susceptible of every impression, and capable of turning to advantage the most trifling occurrence or passing observation. When composing his "Mosè," some one said to him, "What, you are going to make the Hebrew sing! do you mean to make them twang it as they do in the synagogue?" The idea struck him at once, and he sketched out on the spot a rough draught of the magnificent chorus so much admired in this opera, and which is observed to begin with a kind of nasal twang peculiar to the synagogue.

But let us return to our little Italian town, which we left in our anxiety, or rather in the agitation, that precedes the day of the first representation of an opera. At length the most important of evenings arrives. The maestro takes his place at the piano; the theatre overflows; people have flocked from ten leagues distance. The curious form an encampment around the theatre in their calashes; all the inns are filled to excess, where insolence reigns at its height. All occupations have ceased; at the moment of the performance, the town has the aspect of a desert. All the passions, all the solitudes, all the life of a whole population, is concentrated in the theatre.

The overture commences; so intense is the attention, that the buzzing of a fly could be heard. On its conclusion the most tremendous uproar ensues. It is either applauded to the clouds, or hissed, or rather howled at without mercy. It is not in Italy as in other countries, where the first representation is seldom decisive, and where either vanity or timidity prevents each man from intruding his individual opinion, lest it should be found in discordance with the opinion of the majority. In an Italian theatre, they shout, they scream, they stamp, they belabor the backs of the seats with their canes, with all the violence of persons possessed. It is thus that they force upon others the judgment which they have formed, and strive to prove that it is the only sound one; for, strange to say, there is no intolerance equal to that of the eminently sensitive. When you see a man moderate and reasonable in what regards the arts, begin to talk to him of history, politics, or political economy; such a man will make a distinguished magistrate, a good physician, a sound lawyer, an excellent academician, in a word, whatever you will, except an enthusiast in music or painting.

At the close of each air the same terrific uproar ensues; the bellows of an angry sea could give but a faint idea of its fury.

Such at the time, is the taste of an Italian audience, that they at once distinguish whether the merit of an air belongs to the singer or the composer. The cry is Bravo David! Bravo Pisaroni! or the whole theatre resounds with Bravo maestro! Rossini then rises from his place at the piano, his countenance wearing an air of gravity, a thing very unusual with him; he makes three obeisances, which are followed by salvos of applause, mingled with a variety of short and panegyric phrases. This done, they proceed to the next piece.

Rossini presides at the piano during the three first representations, after which he receives his eight hundred or a thousand francs, is invited to a grand parting dinner, given by his friends, that is to say, by the whole town, and then he starts in his veturino, with his portmanteau much fuller of music paper than of other effects, to commence a similar course, in some other town forty miles distant. It is usual with him to write to his mother after the first three representations, and send her and his aged father two thirds of the little sum he has received. He sets off with ten or twelve sequins in his pocket, the happiest of men, and doubly happy if chance should throw some fellow traveller in his way, whom he can quiz in good earnest. On one occasion, as he was travelling in veturino, from Ancona to Reggio, he passed himself off for a master of music, a mortal enemy of Rossini, and filled up the time by singing the most execrable music imaginable, to some of the words of his own best airs, to show his superiority to that animal Rossini, whom ignorant pretenders to taste had the folly to extol to the skies.

After terminating his engagements at Bologna, Rossini accepted an offer made him at Milan, whither he repaired in the spring of 1814. It was for the Scala that he composed "Aureliano in Palmira." In spite of many beauties, and particularly the duet "Se tu m'ami, O mia regina," which some critics have considered as the most beautiful thing of the kind that has proceeded from our composer's pen, it proved unsuccessful. It was Rossini's first failure: it annoyed him not a little, and he at once determined on changing his style.

Unsuccessful in "Aureliano in Palmira," which Rossini had composed for the carnival season, he made another effort in the autumn of the same year, (1814) and produced the "Turco in Italia," which was considered as a kind of sequel to the "Italiana in Algeri." Incessant cries resounded of Bravo Galli! (the celebrated bass singer) but not a single Bravo maestro! for, as we have before observed, on the first representations of an opera, the applauses bestowed on the singers and the master are things perfectly distinct. Trifling as this circumstance may appear, it had its decided influence upon the fate of the opera; for although some of the pieces, particularly the piquant duet, "E un bel uso di Turchia," and the celebrated quintetto, "Oh! guardate, che accidente," met with such applause, yet the opera, upon the whole, was coolly received. The national pride was wounded. They declared that Rossini had copied himself. He might take this liberty with little towns; but for the Scala, the first theatre in the world! repeated the Milanese with peculiar emphasis, he must take pains to produce something new. That the fate of this opera was determined by some local circumstances, is evident from the fact, that, four years after, the "Turco in Italia" was reproduced in Milan, and received with the greatest enthusiasm.

Mendelssohn and Shakspeare.

According to the Stationers' Hall entries, "A booke called A Mydsomer Nyghte Dreame," was entered by one Thomas Fisher, Bookseller, Oct. 8, 1600. Authorities now seem to fix on the year 1594 as the probable date of its composition. "The Comedy of Errors," "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," "Love's Labor Lost," and "The Taming of the Shrew," composed whilst Shakspeare performed the duties of tending horses at the Theatre door, have been assigned on sufficient reason an earlier date than this. Mr. Hallam (Lit. of Europe, vol. ii. p. 387), after mentioning the above Comedies, remarks of "A Midsummer Night's Dream:" "Its superiority to those we have already mentioned affords some presumption that it was written after them." It was certainly written in or before his thirtieth year.

It was obviously written with all that abandon, which is so strenuously maintained by the Poet against the Manager in the Prologue of "Faust," and fulfils his prophecy that thus a Poem becomes "the dower of coming years." No Manager would ever have encouraged or undertaken such dramatic and scenic effects as are here presented! And thus it has never been* and cannot be acted. It is a literary work, and no one who loves it would love to see it mangled by any, the best machinery, which the stage has ever produced. On this point we may quote the words of Hazlitt, who witnessed an attempt in his day to act it. "The 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' when acted, is converted from a delightful fiction into a dull pantomime. All that is finest in the play is lost in the representation. The spectacle was grand; but the spirit was evaporated, the genius was fled. Poetry and the stage do not agree well together. The attempt to reconcile them in this instance fails not only of effect, but of decorum. The ideal can have no place upon the stage, which is a picture without perspective: everything there is in the foreground. That which was merely an airy shape; a dream, a passing thought, immediately becomes an unmanageable reality. Where all is left to the imagination (as is the case in reality), every circumstance near or remote has an equal chance of being kept in the mind, and according to the mixed impression of all that has been suggested. But the imagination cannot sufficiently qualify the actual impressions of the senses. Any offence given to the eye is not to be got rid of by explanation. Thus Bottom's head in the play is a fantastic illusion, produced by magic spells: on the stage it is an ass's head and nothing more; certainly a very strange costume for a gentleman to appear in. Fancy cannot be embodied any more than a simile can be painted; and it is as idle to attempt it as to personate Wall, or Moonshine."

In this point of view one can almost tolerate the honest note in the Diary of old Pepys, who depended on his eyesight rather than his imagination,—"To the King's Theatre, where we saw, 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' which I had never seen before, nor shall ever again, for it is the most insipid, ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life."

The real desideratum in such a case was felt by Mendelssohn; and in his incidental music of Sommernachtstraum, we have the only coloring fit for this

Wild weird clime that lieth, sublime,
Out of space, out of time.

We could have forgiven M. Jullien his many grave offences; not expecting much Shaksperian scholarship from him, we had given a not ill-natured smile when he deliberately, on his Mendelssohn Nights, replaced Hermia with Hermione of the Winter's Tale; but surely next to his representation of the third movement of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor as "descriptive of an advancing army," come the definitions of the various parts of this work, in degree of folly and absurdity. Mendelssohn did not write music descriptive of the incidents in the poem, in the sense Jullien has conceived. These pieces are simply descriptions of poetic impressions, and are in no wise tied to the incident or expression of the drama. If Jullien and others wish to devote grand orchestras to the imitation of sleigh-rides and the like, let us at least preserve Mendelssohn from sanction of such ideas of Art. Verily we should have to be told by history, and not by his interpretations, that Jullien was a musical protegé of Chernbini.

This music does border on the proper gulf that must forever divide the perceptions and the impressions of the soul. If the poem itself had been less a dream of the realm of Fäerie, Mendelssohn would not, could not have written the music. But all things which enter the mind from without must partake of its conditions, and hence are really ideas; and so this music is the poetry of Shakspeare transformed into the conditions which a musical soul must needs impose on all things.

If any proof were needed that Mendelssohn gave his own Titania, Oberon, Puck, &c., and not Shakspeare's, we might make out a fair case of Mendelssohn's Hermia vs. Shakspeare's. We can scarcely imagine one of sensitive ear listening to a fine reader, such as Fanny Kemble, in Act. III., and afterwards hearing the Notturmo well performed, without finding it necessary to relieve himself of something in the former. Take, for instance, this from the 2d scene of the Aet, bearing in mind the noble responses and dignified refinement with which Hermia is introduced to us in the Play.

Her. O me, you juggler! you canker-blossom!
You thief of love! What, have you come by night,
And stolen my love's heart from him?

Hel. Fine, i' faith!
Have you no modesty, no maiden shame,
No touch of bashfulness? What, will you tear
Impatient answers from my gentle tongue?
Fie, fie! you counterfeit, you puppet, you!

Her. Puppet! Why so? Ay, that way goes the game.
Now I perceive that she hath made compare
Between our statures; she hath urged her height,
And with her personage, her tall personage,
Her height, forsooth, she hath prevailed with him.
And are you grown so high in his esteem
Because I am so dwarfish and so low?
How low am I, thou painted May-pole? Speak;
How low am I? I am not yet so low,
But that my nails can reach unto thine eyes.

And more of the same sort, until this "loving cherry" exit pursuing her twin sister; for according to Helena, (amended by Mr. Collyer's MS.)

We grew together,
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted;
But yet a union in partition,
Two loving berries moulded on one stem.

But such coarseness is impossible to our Mendelssohnian Hermia, the wonderful Löstiswitzian combinations not being then known. We have a simple Nocturne, a twilight worthy to enfold the sleeping, wearied and distracted Hermia; but in it we discover nothing more distinct than the dream that trembles on her mind, and which grows into the pleasing reality brought about by the friendly office of Puck;—when lo! the music ceases!

In the Intermezzo in A minor, we find that this great composer has selected the very part not covered by any incident for this "song without words." Hermia awakes from her terrible dream, calls on Lysander, finds herself alone and goes forth to seek him. Then as the scene closes, comes the interlude. The Scherzo is only a Fairy-piece, and could apply as well to the thousand and one fancies of German Fable, to the elves of Tieck or Novalis, as to the Fairies of Shakspeare. Certainly it would do as well to perform after a reading of Goethe's Walpurgisnachtstraum. The same may be said of the free and glorious movement of the Hochzeitmarsch. These are independent of anything out of Mendelssohn, and are affected by Shakspeare's poem, only as the culture of his century and the scenery of Italy might have influenced his music elsewhere. As Emerson has sung,

So waved the pine-tree through my thought,
And fanned the dreams it never brought.

Kean and Booth.

A remarkable article with the above title, too long for insertion in our columns, appeared recently in the New York Sunday Atlas, and was copied into the Home Journal, with a note of commendation by the editors.

The excellence of the article consists in an admiring, and in many respects judicious estimate of the theatrical genius of Edmund Kean; and the wonder of it lies in a systematic comparative depreciation of Junius Brutus Booth.

The tone of its criticism is physical and superficial; and as a specimen of the conclusiveness of its reasoning, we quote the following passage, alluding to Booth, and wish the reader to bear in mind that Kean died twenty years before him.

"Thousands of course who had never seen Kean, but of whose fame they were familiar, were naturally anxious to behold one who was constantly proclaimed to be his equal; and to this desire on their part, and on that of the rising generation, may be imputed the reason of his success in starr-ing it to the very end of his days."

After this we are prepared to learn, that "Booth's style of acting was a very bad style;" and to find the absence of male talent on our stage ascribed to "the very bad copy we kept inconsiderately praising." Farther on occurs this passage: "When a young man, emulous of rivalling Kean, he never was any thing else but a jointed stick; if he improved as he grew older, we cannot say, for his acting at that period (1825) impressed us so unfavorably, that we never had the curiosity to go once to see him, during his long career afterwards."

We read this admission with "special wonder," as in our view it renders the writer's opinion in the premises completely nugatory; for it was precisely during these twenty-seven years, that Booth's genius developed its cumulative grace and vigor; and established a power which he never lost, at once over the popular and the cultivated audiences of America.

It was never our good fortune to see Edmund Kean. His star had set before our day. The admirable paper on Kean's acting by Mr. Dana, himself a poet, and imaginative critic of a high and delicate order of genius, is probably the only permanent form in which the visionary and vanishing fame of the actor will survive.

But with the acting of Booth we have been familiar for twenty years, in all his widely varied range of characters. And to our eye he appeared never a "jointed stick," but always a model of spontaneous energy and grace;—a grace proceeding not, as our critic would have it, from "accuracy of joint," but from the sway of an informing mind. His voice too, so far from suggesting any thing like a "wheezy ruin," or being, as the writer avers with coarse and ignorant injustice, "as hard and hoarse as a clam-man's," seemed, ever to our ears a marvel of massive, melodious, and subtle intonation;—an intonation proceeding, not alone as our critic would have it, from "the formation of the mouth," but mainly from unseen fountains of imaginative thought and feeling.

Did the writer of this comparative criticism ever see Booth enact Lear, or Hamlet, or Othello? If he did, were his "eyes holden," and his senses shut against the infinite pathos and tenderness of expression, blended in feature, voice, and action, which breathed through certain passages—so that he can now say "it was quite beyond his power to depict any of the gentle emotions of our nature?"

It would seem as if the acting of Kean, grand and satisfactory as it must have been, had filled the continent of the writer's dramatic conception, so as to leave no room for the apprehension of another form of genius. But we thank him for his article, for two reasons; first, for the implicit testimony it yields, by a comparative eye witness, to the fact that Booth was considered, even in his youth, as in no respect an imitator of Kean; and secondly, that it has awakened a slumbering purpose in our own mind, to render unto Booth a recognition of his genius, as ample and exact as lies within the measure of our ability. This we propose to do in a future number.

ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. Extract from a private letter written by a Boston lady, dated Rome, Dec. 14th, 1853. "Adelaide Phillips made her debut on the 27th of November, and made a complete triumph; she evidently 'took the town by storm.' We met in Florence, a few days after, two Italian singers, who told us some of the particulars. They said it was one of the most successful debuts ever made in Italy; that she could now make engagements any where in Italy, on her own terms. They said also, that she pronounced the language finely, that there was not a fault to be found. They said, moreover, that Rossini's music had been laid aside for a long time, for want of a Contralto, and that they were now going to bring it up again. Think of that for Addie Phillips! She is one of the most joyous creatures I ever saw, and has most wonderful perseverance. I cut from a Florence newspaper a little notice of her, which I translate and enclose:

A published letter from Brescia, in regard to the performance of Semiramide, says:

"All was successful, and the actors were applauded from the beginning to the end of this divine work; but that which most called forth the enthusiasm of the public of Brescia, was the performance of Arsace, by the beautiful and graceful Adelaide Phillips, who has a very sweet voice, strong, rich, a genuine contralto, and who has been trained in the school of the distinguished Garcia. She sings like an angel, and I assure you that in a short time this charming creature will be the brightest star in the Italian dramatic heaven."—[Transcript.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXXIX.

ERIE, PA. Feb. 9. American voices forever! A few evenings since I was present at a common school exhibition in this place, at which the usual declamations and reading of compositions were interspersed with calisthenic exercises by a band of girls, to the music of their own songs. None, I should think, were over twelve or fourteen years of age, and some not more than eight or nine. Yet, in all the popular songs, which succeeded each other in rapid succession, varying with each change of figure and movement, the ease with which they passed from one to another, their firmness in pitch, and the general purity and sweetness of tone, were quite remarkable. I was surprised to learn that their only instruction in music was what they obtained from the teachers of the school at odd intervals, in the regular exercises of the school. Hearing these little folks sing thus, seeing what a good foundation is already laid for future improvement, it was really sad to think of the little probability there is that any of them will ever have their musical capacities properly developed. One thing however might be done for them now which would bring out the voice to a certain degree, and prepare them for better instruction—when they can get it. Besides the popular songs of the day, such children should be taught a few solid chorals, the long drawn notes of which in slow, measured time, give opportunity to the singer to take pains with the tones of the voice. I find by repeated observation that most children, when they have once acquired confidence to sing out naturally, utter long notes gracefully and correctly, as instinctively as they dance and walk with grace. It is a pity that our school songs are so generally of a rhythm, which gives little opportunity for cultivating the voice. It is a great mistake. There should be a judicious variety of style; the namby-pamby, chant-like things so much in vogue just now, do well enough in their place, but the idea of making singers by the practice of them is simply absurd. The child might as well be kept on simple addition to make him a mathematician. My ideas on this matter were strengthened on going to one of the churches here and hearing the performance of the choir. Now this choir is not mentioned as being worse than others—it is just what I have found all the way from Boston to the Mississippi. All sing the same sort of tunes; all sing them just alike; all make the same ineffectual attempts to strike a note correctly which draws near the top of the staff, flattening and sharpening and feeling round for it; all break down alike upon any long note, which may happen to break the dreary nothingness of mental, snuffing sort of chant. I am putting this rather strongly; there are leaders who know better, there are choirs which have tastes for something better; but let any one traverse the Northern States as much as I have for the last two years, go to as many different churches as I have attended in that time, and see if he would not have the same feeling, that namby-pamby is universal—that "motley's the only wear."

&c.; all alike degenerate into a feeble, sickly, half senti-

For my own part, I am exceedingly fond of psalm tunes, and am not ashamed to confess that an evening with half a dozen friends over the old Handel and Haydn Collection, or one of Zenner's books, is a source of about as much enjoyment as a concert of much higher pretensions. It is this very love for psalmody that makes me regret the gradual ignoring of flowing melodies, for this sort of thing, which I compose (?) for the occasion:

Put some common chords to this and the tune is done! We have so many hymns utterly devoid of all lyric style, that a few of these pseudo-chants are a valuable addition to our psalm tunes, and it was a stroke of genius on the part of Zenner to invent them—but the thing is most decidedly "run into the ground" now-a-days. I had as lief hear Yankee Doodle at a funeral, as to hear some grand ascription of praise, which should be sung to Old Hundred, or York, or London, or St. Ann's, lisped out with a sickly Dodge-like sentimentality to such fiddle-faddle. This by the way. Let the question of taste pass. I affirm that this sort of thing has higher disadvantages than the cultivation of a taste for French and German drinking, student, and soldier songs in church; it ruins the singing. I can remember when the book above mentioned (H. & H. Coll.) was alone used in the country villages where my childhood was spent, and the sensations which used to thrill me to hear the full clear tones of the trebles in New Sabbath, 97th Psalm Tune, Effingham, and the like. I can hear nothing of the sort in those same villages now, alas! All that requires sustained tones, has gone to the tomb. Cantabile is forgotten.

I can but think however that the evil has had its day. There are to be seen in the latest collections, indications of a return to healthy and beautiful melody, and some of the "Professors" may yet possibly sink into deserved contempt. Let us pray that the day come speedily!

A circumstance which occurred one evening makes me hope that Richardson's Piano-Forte book will get into general use. A lady where I called played finely, but her stock of music was confined to the thousand and one Waltzes, Schottisches, Polkas and other trash of the day, with which, however, she expressed herself dissatisfied, and wished for something of a higher order.

"Have you no Sonatas?"

"Sonatas! what are they?"

In fact her teachers had never made known to her that anything better than the last new waltz for the Piano-Forte was to be had! I recommended a Sonata or two by Beethoven, or Mendelssohn's songs without words. They will be a new and glorious revelation. Shame on such teachers!

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 18, 1854.

Music in Paris.

We are happy to lay before our readers the following intelligent and sprightly letter about musical matters in Paris, which we have received by the last steamer. The writer is a resident in that metropolis, and evidently good authority in the matters whereof he speaks. The letter was in French, and in the process of translation, owing to the obscurity of some parts of the manuscript, may have suffered some in sense as well as style. But the main tone and scope of its criticism are clear and unmistakable; and we doubt not its soundness. It will suggest (what we have long suspected) the wisdom of accepting with some caution what is called the stamp of a Parisian reputation for all the world in musical Art.

Correspondence of Dwight's Journal of Music.

PARIS, JAN. 26, 1854.

Paris is proud of the task it takes upon itself, not to say arrogates to itself, of making the musical glories of Europe. "The capital of civilization and of taste" cites with incredulity any European celebrities who have disdained the suffrage of the modern Athens, and there are even people here who question the immense talent of Jenny Lind: since, if she really were the great singer that all the capitals of Europe and all the great cities of the New World have proclaimed her, why has she not dared to appear before the public of France! We are so infatuated with our prerogative as distributors of the brevets of celebrity, that for us an artist, who has any reasons whatsoever for not coming to Paris, or who has no reasons for coming, is one who dares not show himself before the judges par excellence of all the known arts and the arts to come.

One would imagine, after all this, that Paris was the temple of the veritable good music; one would feel bound to believe that they waste no incense upon false gods in Paris. Unfortunately it is no such thing; and if this city, full of movement and activity, has the privilege of creating reputations for the rest of Europe, it is because they understand at Paris, better than anywhere else, the grand art of puffing. It is not for nothing that we are the inventors of the claque, an institution which is to success what the restricted suffrage is to elections; he that pays the best gets the most votes. Besides, your Parisian is of a benevolent nature, and, rather than be too much ennuyé, willingly puts a good face on a bad play (no pun intended). Finally the Parisian has not enough taste for music to pay for it; and what more natural than to remunerate those poor artists, who every year defray the expenses of our most fashionable saloons, with brevets of celebrity!

Good music accommodates itself but poorly to this state of things; and if we except a few valiant artists who for some years have made praiseworthy efforts for the propagation of good music; if we except the Société de St. Cecile, and finally if we except the concerts of the Conservatoire, our concert programmes are composed almost always of ephemeral works, which flatter the bad taste of the artistic populace. One goes away from these exhibitions commonly more astonished at what he has seen, than edified by what he has heard.

The concerts of the Conservatoire enjoy such great favor because they are a la mode, and because it is de bon ton, and above all, pretty difficult, to have one's box or stall there. As for the programmes of these concerts, they are stereotyped enough, and since after all they perform there only the chefs-d'œuvre which we have few opportunities of hearing elsewhere, it would be wrong to complain. Yet we could desire that this areopagus, which has undertaken to judge of musical creations and to direct the public taste, were really at the head of public opinion and not towed on in the wake of that. Thus Mendelssohn was not acknowledged by these gentlemen, by no means too exclusive, until his reputation in Germany and in England had become so great that it was necessary to play his music and open the gates to this indiscreet genius. Since the death of the lamented master the thing has seemed more easy, for Messieurs of the Conservatoire have a great weakness for the dead. But the fact is, (we own it to our shame,) Mendelssohn is not yet sufficiently known in France. I shall tell you nothing new, then, when I say that Schumann and Gade are names entirely strange to the musical world of Paris, and, to speak only of French authors, it is only at very long intervals that we have the pleasure of hearing one of the works of Berlioz or Reber. This latter, who now occupies the seat of the late Onslow, will perhaps appear more frequently before the French public. It goes against the grain with the Conservatoire to step out of the circle it has traced for itself, and in which it keeps itself shut up surrounded by Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. And if we were only allowed to hear all the masterpieces of these geniuses!—but they are quite as exclusive in the choice of works as they are with regard to composers. You may imagine how difficult it is to conquer a foot of ground in the opinion of Messieurs of the Conservatoire, when I tell you that a personage of considerable influence in that learned body expresses great astonishment at the enormous success of some fragments of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." M. Seghers, who directs the musical Société de St. Cecile, would fain supply the defects of the concerts of the Conservatoire. He exerts him to vary the programmes of his concerts without resorting to bad music; but he is not sufficiently encouraged by the public. This circumstance is to us an incontestable proof that Paris is not a musical city in the best sense of the word; otherwise would not the Parisians go eagerly to hear the chefs-d'œuvre of this sublime art which they cannot hear elsewhere? The orchestra of M. Seghers is good enough to lend no pretext to this lamentable apathy, and (thanks to the devotion, above all praise, of this valiant chef d'orchestre!) the musicians of the St. Cecile are evidently in the way of progress.

Our few societies for chamber music:—those of Alard, Franc-homme, &c.—of Maurice, Chevillard, Sabatier, &c., &c.,—are not more fortunate. You see there always the same faces, which proves that the public for this sort of music, which is so numerous in Germany and England, is comparatively very limited as yet in Paris.

Of virtuoso concerts I shall tell you very little this time. Thanks to the Muses, the scourge of concertanti, and especially pianists, is somewhat abated this year, at least for the present; and we know not whether it be to the Eastern question or the famine that we are indebted for this amelioration. If one must choose between two evils, we for our part would rather pay more dearly for our bread, and swallow all the Menchikoffian notes and all the pacific discourses of Aberdeen, than undertake the piano question. The only pianist who could console us for the others, M^{lle}. Wilhelmina Clauss, has left us after a solemn farewell concert, to go and charm her native Germany and all the Russias, where the ravishing artiste will doubtless share the enthusiasm, which at present is exclusively reserved to the fair deserter from the French theatre, the tragedienne par excellence of our times. Mlle. Clauss is the more deserving of the interest she has excited in so high a degree at Paris and at London, that this artist has comprehended the duty imposed upon her by her art. Arriving here without friends, losing her sole support, a mother whom she dearly loved, this young girl, scarcely out of the age of childhood, has had the energy to put away from her little fingers all the bad compositions which the musical charlatans tried so hard to slip into her programmes. She devotes herself to the master-pieces of Handel, Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn: to the exceptional creations of Chopin, and to the ravishing musical poesies of Stephen Heller. To her we owe it, if for four years past our virtuosos have modified their programmes somewhat. Since the altogether extraordinary success of this young Bohemian with good music, no one dares any longer to present himself before us with those insipid fantasias, those stupid variations, those showers and water-falls of pearls, dreams of fairies, cascades, sighs of love, &c., &c., which before her composed the entire language of our modern executants. To succeed, the young artiste has used a very clever stratagem; she has played from time to time the most difficult works of Liszt and Thalberg, to show that it was no lack of prestidigitation that dictated her choice, but really her admiration for good music. Since then she has put all these false miracles away from her, and has chosen from the numerous works of these two creators of the modern piano-playing only those which can bear serious criticism.

We feel great gratitude to this young musicienne, for awakening an interest in those little poems of our maestro, Stephen Heller, which it had been supposed were only to be appreciated in an intimate circle. Mlle. Clauss has proved to us, that these charming compositions, which under a modest title conceal treasures of harmony and sentiment and musical science, can excite a great public even to enthusiasm, only let this spiritual and deep-felt music be rendered as it has been by our artiste. Stephen Heller, that genuine favorite of the Muses, has shown us in his Pre-ludes and by his last work Les — blanches, that his talent gains in power with every creation that he undertakes.

Our lyric theatres are not very busy this year, and in the way of novelties we have only promises. Meyerbeer's L'etoile du Nord is a promise which seems soon likely to be realized. So much the better; we shall hail with interest the first comic opera which the author of Robert le Diable has brought out in Paris.

The Theatre Lyrique, since the congé of M^{me} Cabel, is like a virtuous wife who causes nothing to be said about her. The Opera Italien is in the same situation that it has been for several years. Some few brilliant evenings excepted, the Italians cannot complain of any too much vogue. Alboni and Maria, in operas like Figaro, which one always bears with a new pleasure, form a happy exception to the common run of representations at that theatre, so void of attraction or prestige.

The French Opera, which was out of favor quite as badly as the Italians, is endeavoring to raise itself up again by the engagement of Mlle Cruvelli. If you consult our journals, you will be convinced that she had success such as was never before heard of; if you ask a stranger, uninitiated in the secrets of our theatrical successes, he will repeat to you the sounding phrases of our feuilletons; and yet the success of Mlle Cruvelli in the rôle of Valentine, in Les Huguenots, is very much contested. Mlle Cruvelli however has all the elements which go to make up a great singer; she has an admirable beauty. Her physiognomy, to be sure, has not enough mobility in its features; but her eyes are very beautiful and full of passion. And with all this, Mlle Cruvelli thus far (and we have heard her every time she has appeared in Paris) has had only happy moments; she does not know how to create a rôle, which shall captivate and carry away the public from the beginning to the end.

Mlle. Cruvelli has been reproached with not following in the rôle of Valentine the tradition commenced in so brilliant a manner by Mlle. Falcon. We believe this reproach to be in itself unjust. An artist has not to consult what others have done; she has only to follow her own inspirations. But if Mlle. Cruvelli by her manner of playing Valentine has shocked the sentiments of good judges, it is not because she has not done like so many good and bad singers before her, but because the creation which she has put in the place of the old one was not complete enough to justify her way of seeing and of feeling. For this artiste's own sake, possessed as she is of such powerful means, and with an incontestible future before her, we rejoice that, by the side of a success great enough not to discourage her, she has also experienced some warnings, which reach her even through the praises of her admirers. These warnings, we hope, will lead her to think; for the fault we find in her above all is, that she does not take seriously enough her task of artist and the duties imposed on her by her extraordinary talent.

Concerts of the Week.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. The last night of the subscription series, and last night of "Moses in Egypt," crowded the Music Hall beyond parallel, if that were possible. A late comer was happy to get even a peep through the group of standers that blockaded each balcony door. But the attentive silence of the crowd made amends for that. Rossini's sparkling, fascinating music was evidently popular, and has its charm for the earnest music-lover, as well as for the frivolous. We heard only the middle portion, which was uncommonly well performed. The solos, quartets, &c., received such justice as it is hardly reasonable to expect from amateur and native singers. Mr. ARTHURSON's sweet, flexible voice, pure method and expressive style, made the florid tenor melodies peculiarly acceptable. There was unity and spirit in the choruses, too, and the Germania orchestra, under BERGMANN's sure and untiring lead, co-operated with its usual ability and good will.

The rare success of "Moses" has made a repetition imperative. We are glad to see it announced once more, for an extra concert to-morrow evening. We trust the hall will be as well filled by tickets freshly bought, as it was last time, when of course the crowd was greatly swelled by the influx of all the outstanding tickets for the series. Notwithstanding several overflowing houses, the Handel and Haydn Society have had the ill luck of a majority of stormy nights, and the season has not been a paying one. The losses fall upon the members, who are mostly young amateurs; the gains, should there be any, do not accrue to the individuals. It is a matter of honor, therefore, with the music-lovers of Boston not to let our excellent old oratorio society find anything discouraging in the result of its brave efforts.

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY. As we had not the pleasure of hearing the tenth concert (second of the "light" series) on Saturday evening, we copy a graphic description of it from the Daily Advertiser, which certainly should please all parties:

The Germanians were fully justified, under the new arrangement, in their programme of Saturday evening, in which there was nothing to task the mind of the shallowest listeners: to prove that they exercised the utmost discretion we have only to say that the hall was full, and that far from feeling insulted, the audience were highly gratified and applauded every piece more or less loudly. We thought the applause savored of a partisan spirit, which was very proper and a fit rebuke to those who pretend to control public taste; they may understand that we can support a mild and innocent concert if we choose, and have moreover the inalienable right of sinking in music as well as in any other art; and if after the turmoil of the week we like compositions which soothe by their dulness or tickle the imagination by their transparent absurdity, we are the many (empty) headed, and will have them every one, and our excellent Germanians will have the good sense to furnish them for us.

We consider this concert one of the most judicious we have ever heard on a Saturday evening; excepting in the first and last pieces the music suggested scarcely an idea which was not triteness itself; it was a wilderness of harmless sound, and we should judge that the audience enjoyed, on an average, thirty-nine yawns apiece, or three and a quarter for each of the twelve pieces. We were so much gratified indeed, that we will be at the pains to notice every one of the twelve, in the hope that mediocrity may feel properly appreciated and continue, as it hath ever done, to look down on excellence.

(1) The Gazza Ladra overture is charming music, and was played so perfectly as to defy criticism; we could pause a long while to praise so admirable a bit of execution; the outlines of each theme were exquisitely distinct and the whole performance faultless. (2) Waltz, tolerably pleasant. (3) Trumpet solo, pretty theme, played inoffensively and encores. (4) Polka of Strauss, delicious dance-music, the long-drawn, expectant chords which prefaced each change of key breathing the very spirit of the German quadrille—Strauss is irresistible. (5) Mr. Heller's Thalberg's Giovanni was tantalizing. * * *

The fantasie itself with its introduction was both clever and brilliant, and many portions of it were played effectively. (6) The Grand Potpourri Die Traumbilder of Lumbye was as ordinary as it could possibly be, and nothing could be more preposterous than the introduction of Old Hundred, the only strain during the whole evening suggestive of tomorrow, and impudently interpolated we must believe for the purpose of throwing the concert into unenviable contrast with that of the previous Saturday evening; yes, it must have been an invention of the enemy, for the universe of music would not afford an air more out of character with the piece itself, and with the tone of the whole performance, and the feeling it occasioned was one of keen mortification; coming from the organ too it was a fine satire, and seemed generally appreciated. (7) The Robespierre overture, by request (probably of the hundred and fifty anonymites) belongs with that class of productions which may be styled unjustifiable; Littolff's mistake lay in supposing that any one could enjoy a scene of discordant dreary brutality from the French revolution represented in music, with nothing about it capable of communicating a pleasant sensation, its only effect being to stun and disgust one at the moment, and probably appear in a hideous nightmare some hours later in the evening. (8) Signora Brusch's debut in a guitar performance was unexceptionably destitute of any trait which could be called exciting, although we do not assert that the air, &c., was not strummed as it should have been. (9) Echo Galop, nil. (10) Adagio &c., duet for flutes—a clever performance, by which no one was seriously injured. (11) Notturmo and Valse, composed and performed by Heller; the former a pleasing composition and well played, the latter too indistinct to be made anything of. (12) Finale of Lucia, full of precious strains reminding us of Bettini, and welcome as taking the taste of the other airs out of our mouths.

We must not omit to mention that when we reached the hall we supposed, from the gross darkness, that the concert must have been postponed; but on the door-keeper's assurance that it would come off, we kept hold of hands, and groped our way to what we were confident was a grand seat near the stage: but when the gas was turned on with reckless extravagance at exactly fifteen minutes to half past seven, we discovered to our deep disgust that we were under the gallery near the very back of the hall, which contretemps alone had the effect of preparing us to be delighted with everything.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The Seventh Concert opened with the second Quintet of Mozart, (in C.) The Allegro and Minnetto were beautiful and striking; but the Andante, and the Finale, though not lacking the infallible grace and clearness of Mozart, seemed to us comparatively level and uninteresting. The Quintet was smoothly and delicately played.

2. The "Meditation," by Gounod, (a Parisian composer of some recent note,) on Bach's Prelude in C. was again performed with violin obligato, and quartet accompaniment. The piano part, being chiefly an arpeggio accompaniment to the violin, was neatly and clearly played by Mr. CARL HAUSE. The melody (expressively sung by Mr. A. FRIES' violin) has rather a modern sound; and still more so the entrance and crescendo of the other strings, giving an effect that reminded one of some of the concerted finales in the Italian operas. It was Bach modernized undoubtedly, yet there was something rich and noble in the expression of the piece.

3. The Piano Quartet, in E flat, Op. 16, by Beethoven is an arrangement by himself from its original form of a Quintet for piano and wind instruments; you continually felt that here should come in a horn and here an oboe. Yet the vigorous Beethoven characteristics told throughout, as they always do whether the intrinsic force and beauty of his ideas be clothed with more or less instrumental coloring. Mr. HAUSE played the piano part with masterly skill and certainty. All is clear, distinct, euphonious, well accented in his execution; only it is a little mechanical and hard; a conscientious, rather than an inspired performance.

4. The fifth Quartet (for strings) of Mendelssohn (E flat, Op. 44), has become a well known friend in these concerts. The profound sentiment of the Adagio, and the humming elfin revelry of the Scherzo, are always sure to charm in contrasted ways. 5. Adagio from the first clarinet Concert of Spohr, played by Mr. Ryan. Short and sweet.

6. Mr. HAUSE proved himself one of the most brilliant bravura players in the swift and difficult first movement of Hummel's Concerto in A minor. We have rarely heard anything of that kind done so well. We can congratulate the citizens of Salem on the acquisition of such a musician and teacher among them as CARL HAUSE.

We had the pleasure of listening last Monday evening to the first concert, this season, of the ROXBURY BEETHOVEN SOCIETY, under the direction of Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD. This Society of amateurs comprises nearly thirty members. The parts were judiciously balanced; and the unity, precision and delicate gradations of light and shade, which marked their performances, gave ample proof that their discipline has been thorough and unremitting. The excellence of their chorus singing was not their only merit; solos, duets and trios were performed with taste and expression. Their voices, especially sopranos and baritones, are unusually full, pure and sympathetic. The music consisted principally of selections from opera choruses; we are informed that their future programmes will contain something to please severer tastes. The accompaniments were played by Mr. BAUMBACH, a true artist, aiming at no dazzling effects, but rendering every note with purity and simplicity.

We ought also to mention the assistance rendered to the society by Miss BOTHAMLY and her sister Mrs. EMMONS. We were especially pleased with their rendering of Quis est homo, from the Stabat Mater; we were not prepared to listen to such finished vocalization from singers so young, and for so short a time before the public. We were not so well satisfied with the cavatina from Ernani. That demands a flexibility and power of voice which none but singers of the very highest rank can claim. It was not a failure, but it was not a very decided success. The scales lacked evenness, and too often were slid over, without recognizing their exact steps. We believe Miss Bothamly, if she will have the courage and perseverance to go through the proper training, may become, at no distant day, a very eminent singer.

—Edward L. Balch,

THE

HAS now been examined by the most distinguished European and American Professors, Composers, Pianists, Teachers, Amateurs, Musical Critics, and Editors, with unanimous satisfaction.

It is also an established and confirmed fact, that this work is the most thorough, progressive, and complete Instruction-Book ever offered to the Public, and that a pupil can learn to play the piano in one half the time through this method that it will take with any other now in use. The following Professors, Pianists, and Teachers, have given us the most complimentary recommendations, which have already appeared in print:

Dreyschock, Alex'r.
Mason, William.
Jaell, Alfred.
Dresel, Otto.
Gockel, August.
Bergmann, Carl.
Kreissmann, A.
Muller, F. F.
Hill, Francis G.

The following additional and valuable testimonials have been recently received:

From LOWELL MASON.

New York, Jan. 17, 1854.

Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON:

DEAR SIR: I have received a copy of the "Modern School for the Piano-forte." Having witnessed, in part, your efforts, when in Europe, in compilation of a book, and having known something of your intercourse with some of the best Pianists of the age, I was prepared to expect a most thorough and complete work, on the training of the fingers to the key-board. That you have really produced the best work of the kind that has yet appeared, I am fully satisfied. LOWELL MASON.

From GEORGE J. WEBB.

Boston, Dec. 20, 1853.

Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON:

DEAR SIR: Having examined, with considerable care, your "Modern School for the Piano-forte," I feel prepared to add my humble testimony to its intrinsic merit. I regard it as a work of great value to the piano-forte student. Its numerous exercises, (many of which are new, and most ingeniously contrived,) for strengthening and securing an independent action of the fingers, together with its extensive provision for scale practice, are superior to any book of a similar nature that has fallen under my notice. It seems to me, also, to embrace all qualities necessary to enable any one possessing the requisite musical talents to surmount the greatest difficulties met with in the works of the most distinguished composers.

Yours truly,

GEORGE J. WEBB.

From GEORGE F. ROOT.

New York, Jan. 12, 1854.

Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON:

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your admirable and elegant book, the "Modern School for the Piano-forte." I have examined it with deep interest, and have been exceedingly gratified with its contents, and the manner of their presentation. I have no hesitation in saying that I consider it the best Piano-forte Instruction Book, in all respects, that has ever come under my notice; and I take great pleasure in recommending it to my friends and the public.

I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE F. ROOT.

From WM. B. BRADBURY.

New York, Jan. 14, 1854.

NATHAN RICHARDSON, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: Please accept my thanks for the copy of the "Modern School for the Piano-forte" which you so kindly sent me. I have examined it with much pleasure. The matter which it contains, the manner of its arrangement, and the style in which the work is issued, each and all reflect great credit upon American genius and American art.

The "Modern School for the Piano-forte" is undoubtedly the best work of the kind that has ever been issued from the press of this or any other country. I felt satisfied that this must be the case, even before I saw it, from the fact that so many distinguished gentlemen, in whose judgment I repose the most implicit confidence, had given it their unqualified approval. Added to this, I find, on examination, that you have embodied the leading points of excellence in the methods of Dreyschock, Moscheles, Schubert, and other eminent European teachers, (whose peculiarities I had an opportunity of learning while abroad;) and these having been passed through the ordering alchemy of a Yankee mind, stand forth in the "Modern School," the very ne plus ultra of piano-forte exercises and instruction.

In conclusion, I beg to say, that wherever there is a piano-forte, or a pupil, I hope there will also be a copy of the "Modern School." Most truly yours, WM. B. BRADBURY.

But he was most agreeably disappointed. Never was a piece received with such enthusiasm ; furor would be the energetic term an Italian would employ. At every instant, the pit arose en masse, to hail Rossini with acclamations. At the close of the performance, the composer was heard to declare, in the café dell' academia, that, independent of the exertions of the evening, he was overcome with fatigue at the innumerable obeisances he was called on to make to the public, who were every moment interrupting the performance with Bravo maestro! Viva Rossini!

Crowned with fresh laurels, Rossini returned to Naples in the autumn of 1817, and immediately gave his Armida. On the day of its first representation, the public visited him with the sins of Signora Colbran's voice. Besides, they were piqued at the extraordinary success of the Gazza Ladra at Milan, and could not understand why Rossini should produce anything inferior for themselves. There is nothing so dangerous to disappoint a public in, as in the expectation of their pleasures. Armida was very coldly received, in spite of its magnificent duet, Amor possente nume; perhaps the most celebrated that ever proceeded from this composer's pen.

Of the opera, Adina, ossia il Califfo di Bagdad, the only particulars we are able to collect are that it was written for the opera at Lisbon, and performed there in 1818, at the Theatre San Carlo, in that city.

Mosè in Egitto was produced at Naples the same year, in the Theatre San Carlo, and performed, in the first instance, as a kind of oratorio during the Lent season. The success of this opera was immense.

In the autumn of 1818, Rossini produced at San Carlo his serious opera of Ricciardo e Zoraida; the principal characters of which were sustained by Signora Colbran, Nozzari, Davide, Benedetti, and Signora Pisaroni.

This, like several of this composer's operas, has no overture. Rossini has often tried to convince the managers and his friends, by a number of very specious arguments, that overtures are not only unnecessary, but very absurd things; but we believe the true secret is, that Rossini does not like the labor of composing them, and that his reasonings serve only as a pretext for his natural indolence.

On the 20th of February, 1819, he brought out a cantata written in honor of his majesty the king of Naples, and sung by Signora Colbran, at the Theatre San Carlo. It was full of grace and expression, and the simple and appropriate accompaniment was much admired.

During the Lent of the same year, he produced his serious opera of Ermione. It was so coldly received as to amount almost to a failure; only a very few parts of it were applauded.

On the 9th of May following, he produced a cantata, which was composed on occasion of a visit made by his majesty Francis I., of Austria, to the Theatre San Carlo. It was sung by Colbran, Davide, and Rubini, and honored by the gracious notice of the sovereign.

Rossini was very active this year, 1819. Besides the works above-mentioned, he also composed an opera, entitled Odoardo e Cristina, which was performed in the spring, at the Theatre San Benedetto at Venice. This opera introduced to the public Carolina Cortesi, one of the prettiest actresses that had appeared upon the stage for some years.

On the 4th of October, 1819, Rossini produced the Donna del Lago, which was sung at the Theatre San Carlo by Signora Pisaroni, (one of the least handsome figures that could be imagined) Signora Colbran, Nozzari, Davide, and Benedetti. It may be said that, after the Elisabetta, Rossini succeeded only by the force of his genius. His principal merit lay in his style, which was altogether different from that of Mayer and his other contemporaries, and in the wide range of his ideas, which possessed a character entirely new to the public. He enlivened the tediousness of the opera seria, and imparted to it a life and animation to which it had before been a stranger. But then the public could not separate Rossini from the general discontent that was felt against M. Barbaja and the Signora Colbran. Impatience at last rose to its height, and made itself heard in a manner that could not be misunderstood. Rossini has been known to become quite ill with the hisses that resounded from this vast interior. This, in a man of his natural indifference, and who feels a perfect confidence in his merits, speaks volumes. It took place at the first representation of the Donna del Lago.

This first representation took place on a gala-day; the theatre was illuminated, and the court was not present to place any restraint on the uproarious spirit of the audience. Nothing could equal the extreme hilarity of a number of young officers, who filled, per privilegio, the first five rows of the pit, and who had drunk deeply to the health of their king, as all good and loyal subjects should do. One of these gentry, at the first sound of the trumpets, began to imitate, with his cane, the noise of a horse in full gallop. The public were struck with the facetiousness of the idea, and, in an instant, the pit is full of five hundred imitators, who join in this novel accompaniment. The ears of the poor maestro found neither novelty nor pleasure in such an addition to his music; it was but too ominous of the issue that awaited his opera, and he sat upon thorns in expectation of the fate that was prepared for him.

The same night he had to set off post for Milan, to fulfil an engagement which had for some time been contracted there. On the following day, the public at Naples was too candid not to acknowledge the act of injustice into which they had been betrayed; and accordingly the next evening, the opera was hailed with all the applause which it so justly merits. The trumpet accompaniment was softened down by diminishing the number of instruments, which on the first evening was really deafening.

Rossini has devoted but little attention to sacred music; however, this year we find him composing a grand mass at Naples. It took him three or four days to give the character of church music to some of his most beautiful motivos. The Neapolitans found it a delicious treat; they saw pass successively before their eyes, and under a little different form, all the sublime airs of their favorite composer. One of the priests exclaimed, in a serious tone, "Rossini, if thou dost but knock at the gate of Paradise with this mass, in spite of all thy sins, St. Peter will not have the heart to refuse thee an entrance." This phrase is delicious in the Neapolitan dialect, on account of its grotesque energy.

We saw Rossini quit Naples on the night of the 4th of October, amidst a storm of hisses; on the 26th of December following, we find him bringing out his Bianca e Faliero, in the Scala at Milan. The music was full of reminiscences, and its reception was so cold, as to amount to little short of a failure.

In the carnival of 1821, Rossini gave his Matilda di Sabran, at the Theatre d'Apollone at Rome, which was built by the French, and was the only tolerable theatre in that city. This opera introduced to the public the pretty and favorite singer, Catharina Lipparini. The opinion of the public was, that the libretto was execrable, but the music charming.

In the spring of 1822, Rossini returned to Naples, and brought out his Zelmira, which was sung at San Carlo, by signora Colbran, Nozzari, Davide, Ambroggi, Benedetti, and signora Cecconi.

Rossini also composed a pastorale for four voices, entitled La Riconoscenza, which was performed at San Carlo, on the 27th of December, for his own benefit. It was sung by the signoras Dardanelli and Cornelli, with Rubini and Benedetti. Rossini quitted Naples the following morning, and departed for Bologna. On the 15th of March following, he was married to signora Colbran. The ceremony took place at Castenaso, near Bologna, where the lady had a country seat. Meanwhile Davide, Nozzari, and Ambroggi arrived from Naples, and a few days after they all started together to Vienna, where Rossini had accepted an engagement, and where he was to make his début with Zelmira.

(Conclusion next week.)

Mendelssohn.

Ludwig Berger, then, had planted the youthful sapling: Zelter had dug about and fenced it against the adverse wind and storm, which, if they raged against it, seemed only to make the roots strike deeper. But another was wanted, one who, like a head gardener, should protect the tender buds from blight and frost and present the first fruits of such a tree to the anxious world. In the year 1824, Moscheles was prevailed upon to accept this responsible office. I cannot refrain from paying my humble tribute of praise to one who, to this day, is honored among the circle of the best and greatest musicians of the time, though such a tribute is comparatively worthless at my hands, when I remember that Felix himself constantly acknowledged his obligations to him. Moscheles has allowed me to quote from his own diary some characteristic remarks on Mendelssohn. "In the autumn of 1824, I gave my first concerts in Berlin. I then became acquainted with Mendelssohn's family, and soon my visits ripened into intimacy. As I called every day at the house, I soon learned to know and love their wonderful boy Felix. At this time, his youthful studies were a safe guarantee of a splendid future. His parents repeatedly asked me to give him lessons on the piano-forte, and, although his earlier master, Ludwig Berger, had agreed to the proposals, I hesitated at first to undertake so serious a charge, and to direct so decided a genius, thinking I might possibly cause him to go astray from a path which his own intuitive power might have pointed out to him as the one he should walk in. But father and mother grew importunate; I gave in, and commenced a course of lessons forthwith. Felix played at that time any thing I myself could execute, and mastered, with wonderful rapidity, all such improvements as I could suggest. My concerto in E major, he played from the manuscript almost at first sight; and I remember how admirably he rendered the Sonata Mélancolique." These papers of Moscheles go on to show us an interesting view of the domestic life of the Mendelssohns, whose house was the constant resort of the best musicians of the place. On the 14th of November in the same year, we read of Moscheles accepting an invitation to a party given in honor of Fanny Mendelssohn's birthday. A symphony by her brother Felix was first given, followed by Mozart's concerto in C minor, and a piano-forte duet, played by the author and his sister. Zelter, and several members of the Royal Chapel choir, were present. Another performance took place on the 28th of the same month, when Mendelssohn's symphony in D major, (?) his quartet in C minor, and a concerto of Sebastian Bach's made up the programme. On the 5th of December, the anniversary of Mozart's funeral was solemnized, the Privy Councillor (Geheimrath), Crelle, delivered an oration, and the requiem was afterwards given entirely, Mendelssohn himself accompanying on the piano-forte. On the 12th of December, Felix assisted in his own quartet in F minor, and Moscheles in the now celebrated Hommage à Handel. On the following day, Moscheles presented him with an Allegro di bravura, which he played at first sight.

Soon after this month, if I mistake not, Moscheles left for England, but we find him again at Berlin on the 14th of November, 1826. The 19th of this month must be marked as a red letter day in the period of Mendelssohn's career of which we are now treating. For the first time he produced the overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" as a duet for the piano-forte. His sister assisted him in the trial of a work which bore the unmistakeable marks of genius, and helped as much as any one composition to give him an enduring name. On the 23d of November, Moscheles published the first number of his Studies, and, about the same time, a symphony of Mendelssohn's appeared, in which the leading idea was expressed by trumpet accompaniments. This was followed by a capriccio, to which, in a jovial spirit, he gave the name of Absurdité. We shall offer no apology for details, dry and uninteresting as they may appear to the ordinary reader. The lives of great men are doubly valuable to the world they leave behind them, if their just celebrity, which is patent to all, be not marred by the recollection of moral and domestic duty forgotten and abandoned in the pursuit of fame. The great musician is, after all, scarce worthy the name of artist, if his powers be mainly directed to the achievement of popularity at the expense and sacrifice of a genuine love of his art, which should not yield to the caprice and questionable judgment of would-be critics and connoisseurs. It is that disinterested love of the beautiful and good that actuated Mendelssohn in his short and brilliant career, that elasticity of mind which raised him above prejudices so common to the ordinary run of artists, which claim for their owner so high a place in the ranks of the greatest men of the present day; and the smallest facts connected with such an artist are not to be passed over as unimportant, if they help to form a more complete picture of the man.

It will be seen from the short extracts from Moscheles' diary that the musical world found a genial atmosphere in the house of Mendelssohn's parents. This must have materially aided the progress and activity of Felix, who so often enriched the programme with his own compositions; and it is but fair to add that the influence of Moscheles at this time, his judicious training and encouragement, contributed in no small degree to the elegance and aplomb of Felix's playing, which were his peculiar gifts and rewards for early availing himself of Moscheles' tuition. But the master soon changed into the close friend; age and experience of the world were generously devoted to furthering the fame of one hitherto little known, save among a select few of his own country; and it was Moscheles who first introduced Felix to a discerning public, by persuading him to come to London. It has been said with truth that Germany did not acknowledge the greatness of her son, until England had first welcomed him and sounded his praises. I am sure that before this time, he was not recognized as anything extraordinary, either in Hamburg, where he was born, or in Berlin, the scene of his later triumphs. It is difficult to suggest reasons and excuses for Germany's being so dull of hearing. Beethoven, the intellectual giant, the Michael Angelo of music, was still alive; the author of Der Freischütz was in the full blaze of celebrity. Were not these absorbing influences? We only throw it out by way of a suggestion. But this is certain, that Moscheles warmly encouraged his pupil, whose courage never failed him under the cheering auspices of his friend, and Felix never forgot the kind words spoken to him, then an ardent and youthful but comparatively unknown artist. "You were always," he writes to Moscheles, "my hearty supporter and well wisher, at a time, too, when the Dii minorum gentium used to make faces at me." It is almost needless for us to state that Felix was welcomed in England by his friend and master, and we shall find that their introduction to each other at Berlin laid the foundation of a firm friendship honorable to both.

In the earlier years of his manhood, Felix was not so absorbed in the study of his favorite pursuit as to deny himself the pleasures and recreations common to youths of his age and standing. As a lad of seventeen, he was known for his activity; he rode well, and was an excellent swimmer. We are now speaking of him in the year 1827, as a young student in the University of Berlin. Zelter gives amusing stories of Hegel, one of the lecturers of whose instruction Felix availed himself, but whose oddity and peculiar style formed an incessant subject of Mendelssohn's mimicry. In the February of this year, he conducted some of his latest compositions at Stettin; and shortly afterwards the members of the Berlin Academy entrusted him with the direction of Bach's Passion Music. It had originally been one of his studies under Zelter; but even allowing this previous insight into a work of such difficulty, we are not the less astonished at the fact of a young man of twenty conducting successfully this complicated music. The performance seems to have more than answered popular expectation, for it was repeated by general desire shortly afterwards. Moscheles advised the elder Mendelssohn to send his son abroad on the completion of his university studies; and Felix, after his college life in the spring of 1829, became gradually more independent of parental surveillance. Before, however, we follow the traveller on his journeys, let us take a brief glance at what has already passed, and we shall find that the number and excellence of his works up to this period amply testify his activity and progress. He had written three quartets, two sonatas, two symphonies, an overture, several operettas (among them Die Hochzeit des Camacho, which has been preserved), two volumes of songs, and, to crown all, the noble overtures to A Midsummer Night's Dream and The Calm at Sea and Prosperous Voyage. These last two works, we are told, were composed within a short time of each other. If it be true that he wrote the latter work, so exquisitely descriptive and powerful of its kind, before he had ever seen the sea, we must allow him a fancy as vivid as that of Schiller, who painted so faithfully the Alpine scenery in his William Tell, scenery which had been present only to the keen eye of his imagination. How intense is the anxiety of the crew at the protracted calm, followed by the joyous welcome of the breeze and safe return of the ship to harbor! We almost feel on board ourselves. To inflict a catalogue of Mendelssohn's other pieces on our readers would be unfair. (?) They will agree with us already that he worked zealously, and that versatile and productive are not lying epithets when attached to the name of this gifted composer.

SONNETS.

BY ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

THE SOUL'S EXPRESSION.

With stammering lips and insufficient sound,
I strive and struggle to deliver right
That music of my nature, day and night
With dream and thought and feeling interwound,
And inly answering all the senses round
With octaves of a mystic depth and height
Which steps out grandly to the infinite
From the dark edges of the sensual ground!
This song of soul I struggle to outbear
Through portals of the sense, sublime and whole,
And utter all myself into the air.
But if I did it,—as the thunder-roll
Breaks its own cloud,—my flesh would perish there,
Before that dread apocalypse of soul.

WORK AND CONTEMPLATION.

The woman singeth at her spinning-wheel
A pleasant chant, ballad or barcarole.
She thinketh of her song, upon the whole,
Far more than of her flax; and yet the reel
Is full, and artfully her fingers feel
With quick adjustment, provident control,
The lines too subtly twisted to unroll,
Out to a perfect thread. I hence appeal
To the dear Christian church—that we may do
Our Father's business in these temples mirk;
Thus, swift and steadfast,—thus, intent and strong;
While, thus, apart from toil, our souls pursue
Some high, calm, spheric tune, and prove our work
The better for the sweetness of our song.

[From the New York Musical World and Times.]

Mr. Fry's Rejoinder to Mr. Willis.

NEW YORK TRIBUNE OFFICE,
February 8th, 1854.

MY DEAR WILLIS:—Being out of town when your reply appeared, I could not answer it at the moment: allow me to do so now. Your article, besides some prefatory remarks, is divided into seven heads: upon these, in their order, I shall touch as laconically as possible, considering that my first long communication was conclusive, and if I had to analyze at length all your fresh assertions, it would absorb too much of your journal and of my time.

I did not apply the words "dreary ignorance" to you, as my communication shows. I knew nothing of your opinions upon the philosophy of "imitative music," in connection with which these words occur, and only learned of your opinions through your rejoinder. Besides, I am incapable of employing such words to a gentleman in a discussion.

To your first head I reply: Fantasia means a piece written at the unchecked will of the composer: Santa Claus is written according to a musico-dramatic plan, as to time, places, persons and progress; no other word but symphony will do: I qualified its specialité by calling it a CHRISTMAS SYMPHONY. The word extravaganza will not answer for it; though strictly applicable to the classical symphony with its four disjointed movements, having as much connection in music, as in literature have Robinson Crusoe, Smith's Wealth of Nations, Marshall's Life of Washington and Hot Corn. The exception to the four disjointed movements, three disjointed movements, which, precisely as you state, do sometimes form a classical symphony, I did not touch upon, as exceptio regulam probat. Santa Claus has six movements, all connected,—with beginning, middle, end,—like a tragedy or oratorio, possessing above all musico-dramatic progress. After all, the four movement business is mere matter of fashion, and fashion sanctifies any stupidity. In music I am guided by those rules which are founded in reason.

The opening point of your second head I now convert by simply quoting these words from my communication: "The classical unities, in a word, exist in the movements separately, but the four movements are not united as a whole." You quote a phrase from Beethoven, and then say that "Santa Claus has no musical unity" growing out of the art of developing primary ideas or themes. There cannot be a cruder error than this, which could be contradicted by every page of the hundred or two of the score, if published:—the "recurrence of theme," a knowledge of the value of which you deny me, was a thing I exhibited in the first Rondo I wrote at ten years of age, and I have so composed ever since;—and I can show your statement on this head to be wrong by arithmetical figures, as follows: Santa Claus: 1st slow movement—one recurrence of the theme (not usually done in such introductions). 2d movement, six recurrences of main theme. 3d movement, three of the theme. 4th movement, two recurrences of the theme. 5th movement, two recurrences of the theme; and the rest is musical "Episode"—and developments of primary ideas, as recommended in the text books.—I did not, as you say, "attack musical unity:" I only wish to define what it ought to be.

My communication occupied some forty pages, of manuscript, written against time, and out of those forty pages you pick one solitary sentence—necessarily long, because synoptical—and find an inconsequential ending to it. A verbal change would make sense, and then the sentence would be in length, as regards my style, an exception, and as regards the sentences of the elegant Mr. Choate, a rule. "The looming of the orator" is necessary according to Cicero. I would remark, that I do not remember to have read any communication of the same length as mine published in an American newspaper, which is freer from merely literal errors. I can take the scores of Beethoven and Mozart, published half a century since, and show blunders as great in music as that inconsequential sentence of mine is in literature: these I do not attribute to the composer's ignorance (though yet played by orchestras), any more than I would attribute radical ignorance to a book-keeper because in an Account Current he makes an error. Knowing that he may make an error, however, the book-keeper adds the deprecatory letters "E. E." (errors excepted): a proceeding, it seems, if you be right, necessary likewise for literary men.

My phrase—"Music is the original mode of expressing an original idea," means, of course, an original musical idea (see Reichenow on musical "ideas or phrases"):—it did not mean an idea or phrase on chemistry or Ohio sixes. And the word "original" in Art does not forbid but includes "imitation." Non nobis, domine. I showed all this by parallelisms of Art, in an argument beginning with these words: "Now it is a rule in Art—all Art—that its value and interest depend upon its near but not precise resemblance to nature." Music is not, as you assert, an independent language. The Jury on musical instruments in the Crystal Palace—of which you were a member—instructed me to report at length their proceedings. These are now published in pamphlet form, and in that pamphlet occur these words:—"The highest quality of any instrument fabricated by man is its resemblance to God's great musical production, the eloquent singing voice." Thus you and I agree that the singing voice is the basis of musical tones, and that the skill of instrument makers lies in the approaches they can make to it. But this singing voice is not an independent voice. Its notes are formed in the same way with the same organs as are those of speech: they both include purity, pitch, sonorosity, pathos; the weight of course being vastly in favor of the singing voice in extent and duration. But melody as expressed by this singing voice is allied to language; to words; to metres; to phrases and inflections of tone defined by commas, semicolons, colons, admirations, interrogations, dashes, and full points. I gave, last winter, a course of Lectures in this city, one of which was on the connection of music and poetry, or vocal music and its interlinkings with speech,—of how poetry shaped melody, which Haydn truly pronounces the soul of music. This lecture at your request was published (as far as I could give it, omitting many musically notated examples) in your journal. I would refer you to it, and also to Rush, On the Human Voice, for matter explanatory on this head, too copious to insert here. It is because I understand the connection between music and words, and the common properties between speaking and singing, that I was able to compose for the first time in the history of music and of English literature, a grand opera—a technically grand opera—rendered most successfully on the stage and proving all the arguments of the British writers, during a century past, on the impossibility of artistically dispensing with spoken language on the English operatic stage—to be baseless. And I have equal public success on the question of symphonic forms.

I am not surprised that I am attacked as having "queer ideas about music;" because I consider it chiefly the language of passion and emotion, and endeavor to describe scenes in music so that the hearer may suppose they pass artistically before him. But Beethoven has done the same thing in his Pastorale; Weber in Der Freischütz overture; Mendelssohn in his Midsummer Night's Dream music; Spohr in his Dedication of Sound; and so does modern Germany generally. And my synopsis of Santa Claus, which I assert thousands are ready to affirm, enabled them to trace as perfectly the music as if the same things had been presented on the stage,—is objected to by you! Objected to, though you know that the Philharmonic Society of this city habitually publishes synopses of the descriptive symphonies of Spohr, Mendelssohn, Gade, and other German composers! But being an American I am of course to be deprived of the privileges accorded Europeans.

And I do assert likewise that if Mendelssohn had introduced (to paint joyous childhood on a Christmas morn) into a symphony of half an hour's duration, penny trumpets during a few seconds, it would have been applauded to the skies by the men who condemn it, or affect to condemn it in me. It would have been considered equivalent to saying, "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." In the same way a queer orchestral combination by Mendelssohn, in the Midsummer Night's Dream, paints correctly the comic death of Pyramus, by Nick Bottom, as no composer would write in ordinary.

To your fourth head I repeat, as I said casually before, the piano has not a fixed tone, but is varied from loud to soft by the touch of the player. The organ, however, has a fixed tone,—because only alterable by the mechanical agency of stops.

As to your fifth head, it is hardly necessary for me to deny what you say—that I urged notice in favor of my symphony on account of its length: that would, indeed, be "nonsense." But as a cathedral must have size, so a symphony for grand orchestra must have length; and if the ideas (of course the musical ideas) are such as to interest the audience during its entire performance, and to cause them to enquire it every time it is played in public, it deserved a longer notice at the hands of a professed critic, who gives his life and his living to that object, than the same professed critic bestows every week on a bad piano arrangement of a bad polka. In stating that the opening movement of Santa Claus was as long as Der Freischütz overture, I did so, to show that one portion of the piece, the scene of which, oratorio-like, was laid in Heaven, might at least be considered serious, even omitting a tragedy musically depicted by the most wonderful artist in the world—Bottesini.

Your heads six and seven, call for no notice except that in seven you should not attack me and attempt to ridicule me for simply calling your attention to your errors which you acknowledge were such.

Mr. Dwight, the editor of the Boston Journal of Music, I perceive has done me the honor to copy, with certain important excisions, my long communication; and adds thereto several columns of editorial remark. There are two of his sentences which seem to call for comment from me, as he may copy this present communication of mine in following up the discussion,—which, as far as I am concerned, ends here.—The phrases of Mr. Dwight are, first—

"And Mr. Fry and Mr. Bristow, and 'Herr Löstswitz' himself, whose programme rivals Fry's, are sure to be accepted just so soon as the world shall see that they have done what they themselves suppose they have:—just so soon as their audiences shall feel that there is genius, inspiration, beauty, poetry of music in their symphonies, at all proportioned to the audacity and oddness of their designs."

Now Mr. Bristow has been refused a hearing by the Philharmonic Society of this city, (some parties turning up their nose at him because he is an American) and he would not have been heard this winter at all, but that M. Jullien, in accordance with his own perceptions and listening perhaps also to my opinion, played his symphonies. Mr. Bristow has attempted "no odd design;" his forms are strictly classic. And Mr. Dwight was fully aware—from a publication already made in his paper—that my compositions were not even looked at in manuscript by the director of the Opera in Paris, and the only reason assigned was that "the people would consider him crazy to play an opera by an American." If Mr. Dwight finds any pleasure in attempting witticisms at the supposed expense of Mr. Bristow and the pioneer dramatic and symphonic composer in this country—which is myself—I make no objections. As to such attacks I have thus far beaten them all down, for on the only occasions when I could get a hearing for one of the different grand operas I have written, it had a triumphant success: so too had all the choruses and concerted pieces extracted from my different operas and performed last winter at Metropolitan Hall, and so have my symphonies played by Jullien.

Mr. Dwight's second phrase which I wish to notice is this—"The appreciative music-lovers, learned or unlearned, professional or amateur, who love Beethoven's music, and do not love Fry's, &c." I suppose by this Mr. Dwight speaks of Boston, where his comparative experience on these authors must exist.

Now for the facts: I know that my symphony in one slow movement, excited in Boston as profound a sensation as any instrumental piece ever presented by M. Jullien. And Santa Claus experienced nearly a double encore on the only time of its performance in Boston. So what is the meaning of learned or unlearned not liking my music? If the repeated applause of the élite of an intellectual city is no test, what is? Is it the opinion of a critic who gives no analysis of anything American, and whose argument sifted would make this country, in music, a Hessian colony? How are Americans to win their way in composition, unless their compositions are played?—and who plays them except a stranger, who being himself a composer, like Jullien, can read a full score and tell how it sounds before he hears a note of it? How are people to commit to memory by frequent hearing, and hence appreciate compositions unless they are repeatedly played? What Society plays orchestral American compositions in Boston, or here, or anywhere? The Philharmonic Society has given here during eleven years, forty-four concerts, and never did, and never would play an American instrumental piece; and theirs is the only grand orchestra permanently established in America.

Now, supposing there may be a score or two of these "appreciative music-lovers" in Boston, who draw distinctions before they can form an opinion, are they to judge between me or anybody else and Beethoven until they hear us several times, side by side? I have no fear of having my symphonies played side by side with Beethoven's—it is just what I ask. It has been done here repeatedly, and I am satisfied with the result. Santa Claus has already been played many times in New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Baltimore, and I know that in the three first named cities it has on every occasion received not only a partial, but a universal encore. Its success South and West is also unsurpassed. And this, too, with hardly a line of newspaper notice, for not only does the anti-American feeling seem to pervade the musical journals, but the daily papers. And it is my firm belief that if there were not some one like myself, determined that American Musical Art should not be beaten down and extinguished, it would be.

All I ask for is fair criticism from the Press. As to any amount of newspaper abuse or ridicule affecting me, it cannot do so; for as you say, I have too good an opinion of myself. That good opinion is founded on the fact, that with the public—the audiences, I have had as great success with every piece I ever had the opportunity to present, as any composer ever did or could have, and no piece I ever presented has been by the public or audience considered a failure in any degree. As to my egotism, which seems to surprise and amuse you, it is the necessity of the exceptional position in which I am placed. If an astronomer by instruments and methods of calculation of his own invention, should discover a new planet, he would publish the discovery as his own; and if the only scientific papers of the city or country of his nativity should deny his discovery, and ridicule and misrepresent him, he, of course, would defend himself, and produce his processes and his proofs; even though he should have occasion in so doing, to question the authenticity, or prove the falsity of facts, assumed before as such, from their endorsement by the names of great men, their sanctity by age, or their blind adoption by fashion. The parallel to this case is mine with regard to the position of original American Art.

I have discovered in musical composition the falsity of some old modes and the processes of correcting them. My discovery is denied and I am held up to ridicule by the only journals devoted in this country to the musical Art. Of course I defend myself, prove myself in the right, and in so doing use just as much egotism as the necessities of the case demand.

Besides, this question of egotism as opposed to modesty is all nonsense. In social intercourse egotism is intolerable; but when a man sets up for a Teacher he must prove his claims, if questioned. In doing so he may be forced to be egotistical. When an old stager gets up to address a public meeting on a subject with which he is familiar, and, as usually is done, prefaces his speech with the remark that he regrets some one older and fitter than himself were not in his place, he generally hes. He has sought to address and instruct people because he thought he knew more of the special subject in question than they did; unless he be really egotistical or selfish.

You say, my dear Willis, that I must excuse you, but I do not know what classical unity is." I do excuse you, for I claim and expect the largest liberty in discussion, and assume nothing that I am not ready to prove before any audience in the world. Now it seems a pity if I do not know what classical unity is, especially as I have studied it as closely as any one, dead or alive, ever did, besides doing what the old composers could not do as they had not the literature, going to the roots of musical ideas from their oldest forms in China, India, Egypt, through mediæval Europe, up to the last innovation. I thought I knew classical unity when at the age of eighteen I received publicly from the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia a medal made in my honor; a society, I would remark, which habitually performed my instrumental music written with classical unity; containing among its members some as profound contrapuntists as Europe can show, including Mr. Meignen, at present conductor, by acclamation, of the Musical Fund Society of Philadelphia, who was, too, I need not remind you, one of our Crystal Palace Jury. But, to settle this matter, if you will cause a symphony of mine, in four movements, to be played by the New York Philharmonic Society and by M. Jullien, I will undertake to produce one in from four to six days, though sometimes composers give from four to six months to the task; and I have no objection to have a symphony so performed, sandwiched between any two classical symphonies played on the same evening. I need not remind you that the composition of such a symphony, within such a time, would be, as regards mere writing, as fast as any experienced copyist could blacken the paper. "The appreciative few," whom Mr. Dwight mentions, might also judge of it along with the public, although the same "appreciative few" have condemned every composer during his life time. "The appreciative few" in Germany caused Handel and Haydn to seek England for a livelihood; "the appreciative few" drove Mozart to Paris, where the same "appreciative few" forced him to tune pianos for a living; "the appreciative few" in Paris called the model comic opera, The Barber of Rossini, tapage, in the leading gazette of the Continent, The Journal des Débats; "the appreciative few" habitually denounced him, and Meyerbeer, and Bellini, and Donizetti in London, the London Morning Chronicle in the anti-Bellini department leading the way; "the appreciative few" doomed Beethoven to a garret which no Irish emigrant just cleaned from the smell of bilge-water would live in, and after his death, dragged by Listz's pen and pocket, put up a statue to his memory; "the appreciative few" in this city and Boston would never, if Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti and Beethoven were now alive and born in this country, know of their existence, except through some high-souled man like Jullien, who can tell Hercules from his foot—and after reading eight measures of a symphony, would pronounce on the composer who wrote it—and bring his works before the American public, spite of a threatening Press, and put them among his pieces for European performances on his return. Yours truly, WM. HENRY FRY.

Hector Berlioz.

M. HECTOR BERLIOZ corrects an error which has been circulated in some of the papers relative to him, elf, in the following letter addressed to the director of the Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris:—

"MY DEAR BRANDUS,—Several of the Paris papers announce my approaching departure for some town in Germany, where, according to them, I have been lately appointed maitre-de-chapelle. I can easily imagine what a cruel blow my definite absence from France would be to a great many persons and how difficult a task they would find it to believe and put into circulation so important a piece of news.

"I should, therefore, be extremely delighted were it in my power flatly to contradict it, by saying, with the hero of a celebrated drama—

"Je te reste, France chérie, rassure toi!"

Respect for truth, however, obliges me to rectify a slight error in the report now current. The fact is, I am going to leave France some day or other, in a few years; but the orchestra confided to my direction is not in Germany; and, since everything becomes known, sooner or later, in this diabolical city of Paris, I may as well tell you at once the place of my future residence. I am appointed director-general of the concerts of the Queen of the Ovas in Madagascar. Her Ovaish Majesty's orchestra is composed of very distinguished Malay artists, and a few Malgachees of the highest talent. They do not, it is true, like white men, and I should, consequently, have had, at first, to suffer a great deal in my new home, had not so many friends in Europe taken such trouble to paint me as black as possible. I hope, therefore, that I shall be thoroughly bronzed against the ill-will of my future comrades when I come among them. Meanwhile, be kind enough to inform your readers that I shall continue to reside in Paris as much as I can, and to go to the theatres as little as I can, although I certainly shall go sometimes, and perform my duty as critic as much as ever—in fact more than ever. I am determined before I go to have my fling in the way of criticisms, since there are no papers in Madagascar.

"Believe me, etc."

"H. BERLIOZ,
"Librarian of the Conservatoire."

The Musical World (London) congratulates Hector Berlioz on his appointment. "He will doubtless find some new and curious instruments to add to his already unprecedented scores."

From my Diary. No. XL.

NEW YORK, Feb. 17.—Quite an excitement in the tone-realm! For one, I enjoy it hugely. This throwing of stones into the stagnant waters is not a bad idea, and as no bad gasses are thrown up in consequence in this case, the results must be unmixt good. The great trouble has been to get up discussion on musical matters, that is, discussions upon something higher than matters of personal hostility, or the choice between 1, 2, 3, and do, re, mi. As matters stand now, the Fry-Willis correspondence seems to be quite a pretty controversy, and it is really a matter of regret that the "Rejoinder" to the "Reply" to "the Letter" of Fry is announced as the closing word of the latter. These articles form as good reading for this season of the year, when we want something warm and spicy, as the cool, breezy letters from "Up the River" do for the lazy, sweltering afternoons of summer. There is a champagne sparkle and effervescence about this correspondence, that really exhilarates—unlike champagne, however, this rejoinder grows more sparkling and bright the nearer we get to the bottom of the last column; but is there not doubt enough in regard to the historic accuracy of what is said about the "appreciative few" to enable us, who rather admire that small portion of the musical world, to hold our opinions a little longer notwithstanding all this brilliancy?

"The appreciative few in Germany advised Handel and Haydn to seek England for a livelihood." Now as to Handel, before he was twenty years of age he divided the lead of the Hamburg Opera with Mattheson and soon drove him from the field: on his return from his triumphant progress through Italy he was made Kapellmeister at the Court of Hanover, nor did he leave for England permanently until his royal master became king of that country. As to Haydn, he was so well satisfied with the appreciative few at Vienna and with the rewards of his labors, that Salomon could never prevail upon him to visit London until after the death of Prince Esterhazy, whose Kapellmeister he had been for thirty years. As to Mozart, he was in Paris twice, once as a "wonder-child," and again when a young man of twenty-two—and this time just at the moment when the veteran Gluck was astonishing the musical world with his "Armida!" Mozart gave some lessons on the piano-forte, but as to tuning the instrument for a living——! He had several situations offered him as a great organist and pianist, but before he reached the goal of his ambition, a Kapellmeistership, he lost his mother and his father called him home to Salzburg. The works by which he is now known were not then composed—the "appreciative few" in Paris very naturally were thinking more of the author of Orpheus, Alceste, and Armida than of a young German pianist. Beethoven's garret! Truly "no Irish emigrant just cleaned from the smell of bilge-water would" be likely to live in such an one! Rather, however, from the want of means than the will. The composer died in the third story of a fine large four-story building, overlooking the broad, beautiful glaciis and the finest part of Vienna. As he, from 1816, "kept house" and necessarily had a servant or two, his garret was necessarily rather spacious—at the house of Baron Pasqualati, where were his headquarters for many seasons, particularly so;—not very circumscribed when he lived in house "1055, Sailer-Stradt, third story," nor when in the house with Stephen von Breunig, nor in any other case that I can find in his history—save in the year 1823, when his brother procured him a cheap lodging, on his return from the country—certainly not in his summer residences at Toeplitz and Baden (German Saratogas) at Mödling, Hetzendorf, Heiligenstadt, et cætera. If our Irish friend and prospective free and enlightened native American citizen would not live in these garrets, it would seem to argue not that he loved the garret less but his "parental halls" more. Och! Erin go brag! Though Beethoven was a sort of Harold Skimpole in money matters, throwing it away—paying for a house in advance for a whole summer in the country and leaving it in three weeks because the landlord bowed to him too much, still he left some two or three thousand dollars to his nephew.

The Italian composers mentioned can take care of themselves.—An ounce of historic accuracy is better than a pound of rhetorical flourish.

FEB. 19. Sunday afternoon, and the congregation is just coming out of Dr. Tyng's church; a military company is marching down Third Avenue, one block from the church, with a fine brass band. I guess there is a military funeral, for it is a fine lively tune they are playing. Quite a godsend to the bands is a military funeral on the Sabbath; the city is still, and the people as they come out of the churches have nothing to do but listen. So, blow away, brass. Spread yourselves, there's nothing to hinder!

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 25, 1854.

Eleventh Germania Concert.

A most refreshing, satisfying, and in the best sense classical concert was the last. Such music stimulates the nobler, finer elements in our nature, and lifts us above the barren commonplace of life. In literature, say in poetry especially, any one would think it poor fare to be bidden to a feast, where only the rhymed sentimentalities and witticisms of third and tenth-rate newspaper poetsasters were to be served up in most miscellaneous abundance. Yet this is just what the anti-"classical" (anti-serious, anti-ideal, anti-excellent) "many," are clamoring for and triumphantly enjoying in the matter of their musical entertainments. They have a right to like what they please, or what pleases them, and the good Germanians have a right to seek their immediate interest in gratifying them.

Moreover, there are many very clever things which come under the category of light music; indeed there is sometimes even genius in a waltz. What we would see more widely recognized and practiced upon is, the notion that it is quite possible to preserve all the vivacity and sparkle of the waltz, all the "Begone dull Care," the buoyancy, the variety, the lightness of "light music," within the limits of a choice selection almost wholly from the works of genius. There should be a distinction drawn between light, in the true sense, as opposed to grave, contemplative, and solemn, and "light" in the sense now applied to music, and which means merely promiscuous, miscellaneous, in the scale of excellence as well as in the scale of character variety, and which is made to include in its programme much that is dreary and stupid; much that is military and noisy; much that is heavy and overwhelming, without the least suggestion of grandeur; much that is sickishly sentimental, hacknied, "flat, stale and unprofitable." And the reason why a whole evening's medley of such things is called "light" is, as everybody knows, because they do not tax the mind's attention, do not bespeak a quiet and harmonious attitude on the part of the audience; do not interfere much with talking and laughing and all sorts of extra-musical amusements. Those who go to a concert merely to be amused, of course cannot be contented with a pure concert; they cannot comply with the conditions of a purely musical evening; they want an orchestra for accompaniment, interlude or prelude to their own social jollity; a singer to gossip about, to ogle through a lorgnette, to like or to dislike (for personal curiosity is two-thirds of the charm.) In a word they want music, as people in a great, promiscuous, full-dress ball, or "jam" want music; or as promenaders on the Battery or Common want it, as something to make the world seem gay and rhythmical, which they may heed or not, as conversation or flirtation wanes or waxes. Light music, in this sense, is something for the unmusical; and a concert so made up may lack the essential element of music, the essential character of a concert, as much as clever and ingenious rhyming may lack any spark of poetry.

Now we consider Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" light music;—light in the good sense;—its airy, fairy fancies certainly are light; Puck and Pease-blossom are light, and Nick Bottom, likewise, in the sense of funny. The graceful Allegretto to Beethoven's eighth symphony, so often played by Jullien, is light; so is the Saltarello in Mendelssohn's fourth, and the Scherzo in his third symphony; so is much of the Pastorale. These things require neither a grave and solemn mood, nor learned preparation and attention, to be enjoyed; while their charm teaches the common listener to detect and disrelish the false charm of inferior clap-trap. That overture of Mendelssohn is properly as light as the humdrum overture to "Martha," so much played. The former is good music, the other is bad; who that has heard it over and over, but is thoroughly convinced that it is bad: now a doleful slow tune, on the horns, like that the old cow died by, and now the most jingling emptiness, and now a senseless solo of the drum, and finally a swelling tutti fortissimo, that counterfeits grandeur and makes not the faintest impression thereof! (This too is German music; so don't accuse us of blind partiality, O Italians and O natives!)

Is it not rational to presume that light good music (light with the airy play of true soul and imagination), may be made as captivating to the general audience, as light bad music, (light because there is nothing in it)? May not a well-contrasted variety of good pieces be made as fascinating and as entertaining as anything else? We recall the earliest musical excitement of our boyhood, when "Der Freyschütz" used to be played at our old Federal street theatre—not as an opera, to be sure, but with much of the music, probably imperfectly enough rendered; and we remember that many of its melodies, at all events the Hunters' and the Bridesmaids' choruses, used to be hummed and whistled about the streets as commonly as negro melodies are now. Does it not prove that good music is in itself intrinsically as "catching" as the namby-pamby, vulgar tunes that every now and then infect the tuneful atmosphere?

The Germania Musical Society have made the present division of their concerts into alternate "light" and "classical," with the best will and intention. The measure is in many respects a good one, but in the carrying out it suffers necessarily from one cause. It was a measure of despair. Perplexed between the criticisms of the earnest and the importunities of the frivolous, they could see nothing to do but to spread separate tables for the parties; on one they place all the roast meats, game, &c., and all the sauces, sweet-meats and preserves upon the other. Now great as may be the crowd of sweet teeth, flies, &c., about the latter, it is very certain that many possessed by a real musical hunger and thirst will not go there to satisfy it. In plain words the matter of the light programmes is considerably overdone; there is a kind of unseemly desperation about it. These programmes, (taking that of a fortnight ago as a specimen), are really below the level of the popular appreciation. The vote of the "largest number" would sanction the interspersing of several oases in such wildernesses of trash. The success of the Germanians hitherto with mixed programmes has abundantly proved this. And we do believe their own pecuniary interest dictates, that no programme, however light in the main, should be so light as to include nothing that can attract an earnest music-lover. Secure the amusement-seekers, if you please, on evenings set apart for them; but secure also, if possible, at the same time additions to their number from the ranks of those who also go to hear good music, and who care for the composition as much as they do for the performance. The largest Germania audiences are at the afternoon Rehearsals, where the mixture of both light and classical has its influence, as well as the cheap prices.

The present division, modified somewhat in the matter of the light programmes, would, we fancy, be quite unexceptionable. What was wanted was a continuation of mixed programmes, as before, only with a somewhat reduced measure of symphonies, &c.; and then, as the beginning of a new era in the history of musical taste among us, the creation of stated opportunities, not too frequent, where those who have learned to love it, may have pure musical evenings, listen to programmes in which all shall be excellent, and all have the artistic unity in variety which makes a connected drama so much more satisfying than a medley of selections. It has been seen that there is a very goodly number of supporters for this class of concerts; while of this number there are very few who would entirely forsake more miscellaneous concerts, so long as they offered some food to the soul's appetite for real, spiritual products of true poetry and genius.

The two classical programmes, thus far given, have been admirable; especially the last, to which we now return after so much unintentional digression. Only a few notes can we offer, however, upon each of its six pieces.

1. Mozart's exquisite, grand, perfect Symphony in C major, (which the English, before Beethoven, elected to the throne of "Jupiter" and king among symphonies),—exquisite in its Andante and Minuetto, and grand, as it is profoundly learned and skilful, in the close contrapuntal interweaving of the four subjects of its fugue finale; and perfect in the complete development of its motives, the clear expression of its design, the harmonious contrast of its four intimately related movements, and the faultless bloom and beauty of the whole, as if it had sprung into being whole and perfect, by the operation of divine laws, like a flower,—seemed to be drunk in with silent ecstasy by the audience. We will risk this, or the G minor, symphony of Mozart with the largest audience the Music Hall can hold. It will enchain attention at the least as well as a long string of flute variations, or Edgardo dying for the thousandth time in an orchestrated finale from Lucia, or a piano-forte quasi impromptu fantasia, of the sky-rockety and slam-bang order, which seems always about to end, but never ending, and as it were patched together out of scale exercises and innumerable finales to all sorts of pieces. There is the buoyant, sensuous hilarity of the Don Juan music in the loud and triumphant portions of the Allegro vivace; and, as if by the same natural reaction, you trace a like analogy between the startling and mysterious passage, which crosses as with a fateful shadow the tender spiritual light of the Andante, and the supernatural statue music in that opera. By these traits we recognize Mozart in all his music; like almost every great genius he writes, himself, whatever subject he may write upon. The Minnetto is more in the sunny, clear and childlike manner of Haydn. The Finale with its fugue absorbs and conceals its contrapuntal learning in a beautiful and living whole, which the uneducated can enjoy and feel, as they can the beauty of the flower, without suspecting the chemistry concealed in its exquisite organization. And throughout the whole symphony, in the mere respect of euphony, or delicious, soul-intoxicating beauty of sound, what could excel the exquisite commingling of the various instrumental colors? Think of those flowing passages for bassoons, oboes, &c.!

The largest audience the Music Hall can hold did listen, and with delight apparently, to the "Jupiter symphony, at last Wednesday's Rehearsal.

2. We were glad of a repetition of Beethoven's piano-forte Concerto, No. 4, in G, as enabling us to get better acquainted with a work so characteristic and full of matter. Mr. HELLER played several portions of it quite effectively, and throughout was more successful than the first time. The second movement, that brief Andante con Moto, with its alternation of impatient unison outbursts from the strings in the orchestra and sweet cantabile passages from the piano, is in the truest vein of Beethoven. The bright and, as they at first seem, trivial themes of the Rondo finale, are developed with all that logical pertinacity of Beethoven, through all kinds of marvellous modulations, into really a wonderfully interesting tone-poem.

3. Part Second opened with perhaps the most strikingly imaginative of Mendelssohn's overtures, that called Die Hebriden, or "Fingal's Cave." The broad sea, with its waves sparkling in the sun, and anon its storms and shadows, seems really translated into music. It was finely played too.

4. The Andante and Variations from Beethoven's delightful Septet,—one of the pet compositions of his early manhood, and the prototype of Hummel's—was exceedingly acceptable to the audience, and had to be repeated. Such variations have character and meaning in them, and seem not made to show off the players; yet how they interested you in the peculiar expression of each instrument!

5. The Adagio Religioso, from Mendelssohn's Symphony Cantata, "Song of Praise," was new to us, and certainly it breathes the tenderest and deepest inspiration of "Seraphael."

6. The overture to Der Freyschütz is emphatically an opening overture, a summons and a preparation for something marvellous and grand; and it has nothing of the character of a splendid finale to a feast, except we take the brilliant last half, after the pause, by itself. Besides, the Adagio of Mendelssohn, in long 4-4 time, had just concluded; the Septuor, before that, was also in 4-4 time; and now when the long opening note of Freyschutz, also in 4-4 time, began to sound, there was not only a feeling of monotony, but a sense of false relation to the preceding piece, which it required some little time to overcome. The last half of the overture was most admirably played.

We are glad to see that the Germanians have engaged Mlle. CAROLINE LEHMANN for their remaining concerts. She will add character to the light programme of this evening, while the next classical concert may be quite felicitously relieved and enriched by her voice in some noble German songs, that shall be in true relation with the symphony and overtures.

WILLIAM H. FRY. The "Rejoinder" of the "pioneer dramatic and symphonic composer in this country," which we copy, will be read with eagerness by all who have read his letter and the reply of Mr. Willis. Certainly there is something quite fresh and inspiring in the talk of a man, who holds himself in readiness to write a grand symphony in four days, that is, as fast as pen can blacken paper,—which symphony he is willing to have "sandwiched" between any two symphonies of Beethoven, or Mozart, or of whomsoever, in the same concert! We like that. It is not every day that one has an opportunity to admire such valor.

The rejoinder has a word or two for us; to which we reply:

1. We disclaim any attempt of "witticism at the expense of Mr. Bristow and the pioneer composer." Of Mr. Bristow's music we have never heard a note, and therefore did not mean to be understood as accusing it of "odd designs." We coupled his name with Mr. Fry's, (perhaps too thoughtlessly), simply because we found the two names coupled in Mr. Fry's extraordinary claim, while Mr. Fry's own works were put forward as the type of the sort of thing he wished to have admired. In the same connection we alluded to 'Herr Lustiswitz,' because we could not help feeling the accidental analogy—as most of our readers doubtless felt it—between the burlesque claims of that clever fiction and the serious claims of Mr. Fry in behalf of his Santa Claus. Poetically, dramatically viewed, (to come upon Mr. Fry's own ground of symphonic unity), the symphonies of the "Merchant's Life" and of "Santa Claus," appeared to us to belong about equally well to the category of extravaganzas. But all this, if playful, was meant in the friendliest spirit and implied not a particle of disrespect.

2. As to the comparative numbers of persons, in Boston particularly, who love Beethoven's or Fry's music best, we care not to argue. But we are sorry to disturb the pleasant illusion he is under with regard to the supposed unsurpassed effect of his symphony, "The Breaking Heart," in Boston. We are still afraid that Beethoven would draw the best, and we have our serious doubts whether it was "the élite,"—as we know it was not the majority—of Boston music-lovers who doubly encored "Santa Claus."

3. As to the "appreciative few," our Diarist, happily, has saved us the trouble of setting that matter right historically. But, unfortunately for Mr. Fry's consistency, he appeals now from the un-appreciating few to the many; and now from the many to the "appreciative few," viz., to M. Jullien, himself, and we know not whom besides. Why do not the concert directors, the Philharmonic Societies, the unappreciative few, perform his symphonies? Because the many do not call for them; because they cannot trust the many to remunerate them; because, whether intrinsically meritorious or not, whether rightly appreciated or not, the fact is that they are not called for and have not yet got to be a "sure card." What then becomes of the testimony of the many, of the alleged "public success," as opposed to the negative or indifferent criticism of the "appreciative few?" Managers and orchestral societies know well enough that the amiable applause of a native effort by a miscellaneous audience, is not to be taken as establishing the merit of a composition. Who does not know that many a time and oft the most specious, empty, clap-trap overture or fantasia gets applauded to the echo, while it is a new thing, and yet the charm so fades on repetition that it can add no attraction to a programme?

After all, heavily as he belabors the backs of poor editors and critics, we do believe the real quarrel of Mr. Fry is with the public, the people, and not with the critics. Critics and editors and managers have sins enough; but we shall be happy to learn that their chief and characteristic sin is that of too much independence of the public will and liking.

4. Mr. Fry alludes to some "important excursions" in our copy of his very long letter. Those were dictated solely by the necessity of shortening the piece somewhat, in order to get it in at all; and of course we omitted (with regret) only what seemed to us the least essential to our readers' understanding of Mr. Fry's position.

Local.

The GERMANIA programme for to-night is considerably better than the last light programme. The beautiful Adagio by Mendelssohn, and the songs by Miss Lehmann, will be relished by the most classical in taste.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—Our Chamber music is coming to an end! The eighth and last concert is announced for Tuesday. The programme, it will be seen, is uncommonly rich, and we trust the audience will be such and so pleased as to dispute the "finality" of this announcement of its being the last one.

OTTO DRESEL gives the last of his delightful Soirées on Thursday evening next. We trust, however, that, although the last of the series, it will not prove the last of the season. Miss LEHMANN has returned to Boston, and may we not hope some of those choice songs of Schubert, Franz, &c., which added so much attraction to these concerts last year?

MR. APTOMMAS, it will be seen, has reduced the price for his second series of "Harp Soirées" to fifty cents, and moreover offers a largely increased list of attractions.

ERRATA.—Our Paris letter last week suffered from hurried proof-reading. Thus Mario was transformed into plain "Maria;" and in speaking of Crivelli the words enclosed in brackets in the following sentence were omitted: "She has an admirable [voice and a figure of remarkable] beauty."

MOORE'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF MUSIC:

COMPILED BY JOHN W. MOORE,

With the assistance of other distinguished men in the musical world. The intention of the author is to make a most complete and thorough work of the above, which will be a desideratum in the world of music. It will be published in one elegant Royal Octavo volume of about 900 pages, double columns, and will contain a complete

Dictionary of Musical Terms,

A HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE OF MUSIC, from the earliest time to the present, a

Treatise on Harmony and Thorough Bass,

a description of all known MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, with the names of the most distinguished makers, and a complete Musical Biography of over three thousand of the most distinguished Composers and Musicians who have ever lived. Mr. Moore has spent several years in compiling this valuable work. It is now going through the press as rapidly as will comport with accuracy.

P. S.—The above splendid work, which will prove invaluable to every professional musician, and to every amateur, will be ready this spring; we hope in the month of March. It has been delayed on account of the immense labor bestowed upon it, and the difficulty of stereotyping a work so full of examples. The delay, however, will enhance the value of the work.

The price, bound in cloth, will be, . . . $3 50.

Rossini.

(Concluded from p. 162.)

On the 30th of March, Rossini made his début at Vienna, with the opera of Cenerentola. Zelmira had been promised, but as the former opera had already been adapted to German words, and performed at Vienna under the title of Die Aschenbrödel, Rossini wished to pay a compliment to the German taste, and expressed a wish that this opera should take the precedence, and be given by the German company. At the rehearsal, he desired the music to be performed in a quicker time than had usually been done; which, however, did not very well accord with the ponderous nature of the German language.

Rossini was not allowed to remain neutral during this scene. He was assailed by the angry manager; and, to remedy an evil, which it appeared impossible not to impute, in some degree, to him, he proposed the representation of Mao-metto, which we have seen condemned at Naples, but whose fame he promised to reestablish by re-

Rossini endeavored to make his peace with the Venetians the following carnival, by calling his talents into action in the opera of Semiramide, which was performed at the Theatre Della Fenice, and sung by Madame Colbran Rossini, Rosa Mariani, (a delightful contralto) Sinclair, Galli, and Lucio Mariani. A passage in the overture tended much to conciliate the audience, and obliterate the former unfavorable impression, and this feeling was strengthened by an air of Mariani's, full of beauty and sweetness. The next piece that called forth applause was a duet between this lady and Madame Colbran Rossini; besides which an air of Galli, and a terzetto between him and the two above mentioned ladies, were received with tumultuous applause. Rossini was called for at the end of the second act, and came forward with a humble obeisance to receive this token of reconciliation.

After having received the homages of the lovers of music in Paris, we find Rossini fulfilling his engagements in London. The following is a chronological list of his works: 1. Demetrio e Polibio. This is Rossini's first opera. It is said to have been written in the spring of 1809, though not performed till 1812, at the Theatre Valle in Rome. 2. La Cambiale di Matrimonio, 1810, farza, (by farza, is understood an opera in one act) written at Venice, for the Stagione dell'Autunno. 3. L'Equivoco Stravagante, 1811, autunno, composed at Bologna, for the Theatre del Corso. 4. L'Inganno Felice, 1812, carnivale, written for the Theatre San Mosé at Venice. This is the only one of Rossini's early works that has retained its place on the stage. 5. La Scala di Seta, farza, 1812, primavera, performed in the San Mosé at Venice. 6. La Pietra del Paragone, 1812, autunno, at the Scala in Milan. 7. L'Occasione fa il Ladro, farza, 1812, autunno, in the Theatre San Mosé at Venice. 8. Il Figlio per Azzardo, farza, 1813, carnivale, at the same theatre. 9. Il Tancredi, 1813, carnivale, at the grand theatre Della Fenice at Venice. 10. L'Italiana in Algeri, 1813, estate, performed at the Theatre San Benedetto at Venice. 11. Aureliano in Palmira, 1814, carnivale, sung in the Theatre of La Scala at Milan. 12. Il Turco in Italia, 1814, autunno, at the Theatre of La Scala at Milan. 13. Sigismondo, 1814, in the Theatre Della Fenice at Venice. 14. Elisabetta, 1815, autunno, Naples, sung at San Carlo. 15. Torvaldo e Dorlisca, 1816, carnivale, at the Theatre Valle at Rome. 16. Il Barbiere di Seviglia, the same season, at the Theatre Argentina in the same city. 17. La Gazzetta, 1816, estate, performed at the Theatre Dei Fiorentini at Naples. 18. L'Otello, 1816, inverno, sung in the Theatre del Fondo, (a handsome round theatre, which is subsidiary to that of San Carlo.) 19. La Cenerentola, 1817, carnivale, performed in the Theatre Valle at Rome. 20. La Gazza Ladra, 1817, primavera, Milan, sung in the Scala. 21. Armida, 1817, autunno, Naples, sung at the Theatre San Carlo. 22. Adelaide di Borgogna, 1818, carnivale, Rome, performed in the Theatre Argentina. 23. Adina, ossia il Califfo di Bagdad. Rossini composed this piece for the opera at Lisbon, where it was performed in the Theatre San Carlo. 24. Mosé in Egitto, 1818, sung, during Lent, in the Theatre San Carlo. 25. Ricciardo e Zoraide, 1818, Naples, sung, during the autunno, at San Carlo. 26. Ermione, 1819, Naples, sung, during the Lent season, at San Carlo. The libretto is an imitation of the Andromaque of Racine. Rossini aimed at an imitation of the style of Gluck. 27. Odoardo e Cristina, 1819, primavera, Venice, sung at the Theatre San Benedetto. 28. La Donna del Lago, 4th of October, 1819, Naples, sung in the Theatre San Carlo. 29. Bianca e Faliero, 1820, carnivale, Milan, performed at the Scala. 30. Maometto Secondo, 1820, carnivale, Naples, at the Theatre San Carlo. 31. Matilda di Shabran, 1821, carnivale, Rome, at the Theatre d'Apollone. 32. Zelmira, 1822, Naples, inverno, sung at the Theatre San Carlo. 33. Semiramide, 1823, carnivale, at the grand Theatre Della Fenice. 34. Il Viaggio a Rheims, at the Theatre Italien at Paris, in the summer of 1825. 35. Le Siege de Corinthe, at the opera, Paris, October, 1826. 36. Moise, at the same theatre in 1827. 37. Le Comte Ory, at the same theatre in 1828. 38. Gillavume Tell, at the same theatre in 1829.

Rossini has devoted but little attention to sacred composition; we know of no others than the two following: 1. Ciro in Babilonia, an oratorio, 1812, composed at Ferrara for the Lent season, and performed at the Teatro Comunale. 2. A Grand Mass, composed in 1819 at Naples. Rossini has composed many cantatas, but we know of no others than the nine following: 1. Il Pianto d'Armonia, 1808, performed in the Lyceum of Bologna. This is Rossini's first attempt. The style resembles the weaker parts of L'Inganno Felice. 2. Didone Abbandonata, 1811. 3. Eglo e Irene, 1814. 4. Tei e Peleo, 1816, composed for the occasion of the nuptials of her royal highness the Duchess of Berri, sung at the Theatre Del Fonda at Naples. 5. A Cantata, for a single voice, composed in honor of his majesty the King of Naples, 1819. 6. A Cantata, performed before his majesty Francis I., Emperor of Austria, the 9th of May, 1819, when this prince appeared for the first time at the Theatre San Carlo. 7. "A Patriotic Hymn," composed at Naples in 1820. Another hymn of the same kind, but of very opposite politics, composed at Bologna in 1815. For the same offence Cimarosa had, a few years before, been thrown into prison. 8. La Riconoscenza, a pastorale, for four voices, performed at San Carlo, the 27th of December, 1821, for Rossini's benefit. 9. Il vero Omaggio, a cantata, executed at Verona, during the congress, in honor of his majesty the Emperor of Austria.

Rossini also composed a Mass, which was performed at a country town near Paris in 1832; and subsequently to this his celebrated Stabat Mater in 1838, for grand orchestra and chorus, which is now so well known. Since this he has composed nothing except a hymn to Pio Nino, at the time of the recent Roman political troubles. He is still living (1854) in luxurious retirement, principally at Bologna.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

An American Prima Donna.

PARIS, FEB. 1854.

The somewhat indiscriminate manner in which "golden opinions" have been lavished on foreign artists in the United States has exposed Americans to ridicule. But it has also revealed their almost universal susceptibility to the charms of music. It has proved that Yankees have ears for other sounds than the jingling of dollars. Jenny Lind, although the most conspicuous, is by no means a solitary example of the enthusiasm with which musical genius from the old world is welcomed in the new. But few celebrated names are missing on the list of European artists who have sought a California of "rocks" and renown beyond the Atlantic. Those few will not long be absent. Thanks to the progress of musical education, as well as the prodigious development of musical taste, in the United States, a truly great artist may now expect to be appreciated there no less intelligently than heartily. New York is now as decidedly a musical capital as either Paris or London.

Nor has New York been content with offering to foreign artists such hospitality as rarely awaits them in any European city. In its turn it has sent artists to Europe.

I do not refer to the increasing number of young Americans who are availing themselves of the facilities afforded by Italy, Germany and France for the cultivation of musical talent. Nor yet to the Alboni, the Tedesco, the Parodi, whom it has lately sent back to enchant the Parisians with redoubled attractions—for a musical tour in the United States has become an excellent school for the matured talent.

But I shall surprise some of my readers, perhaps, by informing them that the Grand Opera at Paris is indebted to New York for one of the brightest stars in its galaxy of illustrious names. DOLORÈS NAU has shone there—a planet of first magnitude—until her admirers have almost forgotten that she "had her rising" (or, as they say in Alabama, "was raised") elsewhere than at Paris. However, she is a "native American," despite her foreign name. And brilliantly has she repaid the comet-like visits of "larger and lesser lights" to our western skies.

Dolorès Nau was born at New York. In that city, where her parents had found refuge after the slave insurrection at St. Domingo, she passed her childhood and early youth. The fine instinct of her mother first divined her astonishing natural gift for music. But while her mother herself taught her infant fingers to play on the piano-forte and the harp, she wisely respected that celestial instrument, her voice, and guarded it against the perils of premature exercise. The honor of developing and training this voice of admirable flexibility and power was reserved for the best school in the world, the Conservatoire at Paris. How rapidly the young American profited by the encouragement which her rare aptitude won from teachers like Mme. Cinti-Damoreau, may be judged from the facts that nine months after she entered the Conservatoire, she received the first prize for vocalization, and a year later the first prize for singing. Mme. Damoreau did not cease to bestow on her pet pupil her fostering care, and it was not long before Rossini himself eagerly extended a kind hand to the youthful laureate, shedding the light of his glory on the roses of her crown. Under his direction, Dolorès Nau diligently and thoroughly prepared herself for the Italian stage. And it was at his suggestion that she was induced to accept en attendant, an engagement offered to her by the Royal Academy of Music.

She was busily occupied in studying with the excellent Nourrit her three roles de début,* when, one evening, at an extraordinary representation of the Huguenots, she was unexpectedly called upon to take the part of Urbain, the Page, in place of Mlle. Flecheux, who had suddenly fallen sick. She boldly assumed the part, which is by no means an easy one, and sustained it so admirably as to achieve a success all the more legitimate, that she had had but a few hours of special preparation for it, and that the applause she excited was as spontaneous as it has since been frequent and enduring.

The public of the Opera, which welcomed so warmly her first appearance, has never ceased to manifest its full satisfaction, from her roles de début to those of Isabelle in Robert, of the Page in Gustave, Eudoxie in La Juive, Teresina in the Philire, Zerlina in Don Juan, Ninka in Dieu et la Bayadere, Ramira in the Siege de Corinthe, in which she has seized with admirable intelligence the diverse shades of character that she has had to represent.

None who have been so fortunate as to have heard her in company with Duprez, can forget how, electrified by the great artist, her black eye flashed, her forehead beamed, and her bosom swelled with emotion. It was at such moments that she was rapturously hailed as beautiful, doubly beautiful, as artist and as woman. Her slender but graceful and commanding form seemed to dilate. Her voice spread its wings above the surging masses of the orchestra, and soared, but without once losing its way, amidst the dizzy and capricious heights of vocalization. Anon it folded its wings gently and subsided into a plaintive and delicious tremolo.

A French critic says that one of the "creations" of Dolorès Nau, "her Zeila in the Lac des Fées, sufficed to define the nature of her vocal resources—a high soprano, complete, of a severity full of grace, which warbles and lets fall the notes in pearls fine and delicately moulded. Its tone, usually tempered, sometimes piercing, but ever shunning the false éclat and the embroideries of the decadence, has a certain sonorous and silvery sound, and, through all its registers, is of incomparable purity and celestial sweetness. Dolorès," he continues, "even when she speaks, has in her inflexions delicious analogies with the voice of Mlle. Mars at eighteen."

English critics have rivalled with their brothers across the channel in eulogizing Mlle. Nau. The furore excited by her appearance at the Princess's

* Marguerite in the Huguenots, Mathilde in Guillaume Tell and la Comtesse in the Comte Ory.

Theatre, in Lucia di Lammermoor and in La Sirène, will long be remembered at London. She made her début in the opera of Lucia di Lammermoor, "and never," said the Sun, "have we witnessed a more successful début than that of Mlle. Nau. Her person is fine and commanding, and features well formed and expressive. Her voice is high soprano, of the Persiani character; it has great power, and is cultivated to the highest pitch of excellence. Her opening cavatina, "Ancor non giunse," was a perfect triumph of Art, and at once stamped her as the prima donna assoluta. Expression, power of voice, taste, cultivation, musical knowledge, and immense power of execution, all these were exhibited by Mlle. Nau. It was quite equal to Persiani, in her best days. The "Perche non ho" was given with sound judgment and taste, and exhibited the same marvellous powers of execution. The audience was in raptures, and the applause was most enthusiastic. . . . The concluding scena was also magnificently given, both as a musical and a histrionic effect; it was of the very highest order. The powers of execution she had exhibited were marvellous. Her floritura was brilliant in the extreme, but introduced with the most exquisite taste." The same journal says of the production of Auber's opera, La Sirène, with Mlle. Nau as the Syren, "It cannot be matter of surprise that such a syren should attract crowds, and accordingly the house was crammed to the ceiling long before the commencement of the performance." The singing of Mlle. Nau as the prima donna in the second act was beyond all praise—it was a magnificent exhibition of power and science. . . . The audience, by their repeated and enthusiastic plaudits, ratified the decision of the Duke—"Beyond all question she's a prima donna." The other London journals were not less enthusiastic in her praise than the Sun.

The Times said—"In the first act, when the Syren does not appear, but is only heard singing behind the scenes, joining in a concerted piece, the effect of Mlle. Nau's voice was charming. Such was the brilliancy and perspicuity of her upper notes, as they sounded above those of the singers in the front of the stage, that we felt at once that an invisible power was exerting an irresistible influence. . . . In the last song, where the Syren effects the escape of her brother by hiring the guards to listen to her song, Mlle. Nau seemed to revel in the accomplishment of her roulades, and nothing could be more perfect than her execution." The Age and Argus said of Mlle. Nau, "This accomplished vocalist has achieved a great triumph in her Syren—her execution being perfectly astonishing. Her runs and other feats, which have little to do with serious delivery, come admirably into use in this character, and the profusion of effects with which she delighted the house was actually bewildering. The Manager talks of a limit to her engagement; but unless he desires a "Nau row," which will utterly blot out the memory of the celebrated Tamburini demonstration, he will abstain from all such tampering with the affections of the public. Mere eulogiums of the press but echoed the voice of the public. The following couplet, entitled "One Negative equal to an Affirmative," was on everybody's lips:

"If to the Princess's it is one's wish to go,
Is there a prima donna? Maddox thunders, 'Nau!'"

Even the cautious critic of the Spectator caught the prevailing contagion of enthusiasm, and declared that "the Syren was produced in very effective style. The great attraction of the piece," continued the writer, "was unquestionably Mlle. Nau; who came out in far greater force than we had ever before heard her, exhibited the most tasteful vocalization, and many feats of such successful audacity in the bravura as we could scarcely have believed possible since the days of Malibran. One of these—trenching nearly on the incredible—was a very well made shake on C sharp and D above the staff. She is evidently a singer most arduous in practice: a good method has been given her, and now, under the fostering opinion of an audience whose plaudits are enthusiastically and judiciously bestowed, she is carrying it to perfection, and displaying more than had been anticipated. Her excellence in passages produces a certain smoothness in her intervals, which is nearly allied to expression in performance; and we believe few could hear her execute the pretty romance, 'I will not deem thee faultless,' without perceiving that she combines elegance of style with perfect mechanism and intonation."

Dress—that indispensable accessory of feminine attractions, both on and off the stage—has attained the highest dignity of art at Paris. But the ladies of New York have won the reputation of seizing intuitively and of improving upon the secret of that ineffable charm which the ladies of Paris impart to silks, velvets, laces, and other "dry goods fixings" that mysteriously compose the female wardrobe. The exquisite taste in dress displayed by Mlle. Nau, while attesting her American origin, has contributed not a little to her success as an artist. Nor has her peculiar style of beauty been ineffectual to the same end. Her French adorers have exhausted the complimentary terms of their language in celebrating her raven tresses and the double arch of her Spanish eyebrows. They swear that she must have stepped forth into life from the canvas of Murillo or of Ribeira.

We are glad to learn that before she steps back into any picture-frame of either of these Spanish masters, Dolorés Nau intends to revisit her native shores. In musical circles we have heard regrets expressed that Paris must ere long resign—at least for a season—its adopted favorite to her mother city, New York. "A prophet is not without honor save in his own country," saith the proverb. But Americans have never been chary of sympathy even with native talent, when it has been stamped with the seal of transatlantic success. It may be confidently predicted, then, that in September next they will give a generous welcome to Mlle. Nau. The New World must be proud of the cordial recognition of this child of Song in the Old World.

Reply to Mr. Fry of the Tribune.

NUMBER II.

MY DEAR FRY:—One of the pleasantest things in our musical controversy, to me, is, that, despite our appertaining, both of us, (as I suppose we do) to the artistic race of irritables, we maintain our philosophy: in other words—we keep our temper. And over that last dinner we ate together, I silently congratulated myself thereupon.

Let us now return, then, to—our definitions. In my last reply to you, I pronounced Santa Claus a fantasia—not a symphony. You rejoice as follows:—

"Fantasia means a piece written at the unchecked will of the composer: Santa Claus is written according to a musico-dramatic plan, as to time, places, persons and progress: no other word but symphony will do."

Now, was not Santa Claus written at your "unchecked will?" Is not any composition written, if written at all, at a composer's "unchecked will?" If the will be "checked," the composition is, verily, not written—is it?

If you had said unchecked fancy, or imagination, I should have understood you. Perhaps you meant this. If so, we agree in our definition.

You take the position, then, that Santa Claus being written according to the "checked will" (fancy?) and not the unchecked will of its composer, and having a "musico-dramatic plan," it is therefore, a symphony. But, I say again, a symphony is written according to a definite musical plan—not a definite "musico-dramatic" plan. A "musico-dramatic" plan has very little of a musical plan about it—certainly, if we take Santa Claus as an illustration of this definition. For instance, you imagine a Christmas story, which has a plan, and then you prepare a musical composition which has not a plan, and which can have no musical plan, because it runs parallel with the story, which story is progressive, never returning to the same point. This you call a "musico-dramatic" plan. Why not, simply, dramatic plan?—there is nothing "musico" about it.

A person might say, indeed, that his plan, in such music, was to have no plan. If so, I understand him. But, a symphony is not a plan-less composition. It has a very decided and definite musical plan. A plan which entitles it to the name of "symphony," and which renders it impossible to call Santa Claus a symphony—unless you wish one and the same word to signify two very different things.

You close your remarks on the subject of musical "unity" with the words, "I only wish to define what it ought to be." Ah—but this is not what it is—what all the world understand it. Here, again, just as you use the word symphony in an entirely new sense, you use "unity" in an entirely new sense—in an "ought-to-be" sense; but not in a sense that is—or that we know anything about.

With regard to "recurrence of musical idea" in Santa Claus, I have not the score to refer to, but of course I entirely believe what you say. The composition you state has six movements. I certainly heard but one, the evening I listened to it. But, perhaps, here again, you interpret the word "movement" in your own way. You mean cadence, I dare say. If not, I don't know what you mean. But, every time we come to a full cadence in music, it does not constitute a "movement." If this were the case, every Allegro, which embraces in its two distinct divisions two formal cadences, would be understood as comprising two musical movements. In the classic symphony, the entire allegro is the first movement. The entire andante is the second movement. The entire scherzo is the third movement, and the entire finale is the fourth. Between each of these movements there is the pause of performance, which isolates and individualizes each movement. I need not tell you all this. Such isolation and individualization does not occur, unless I very much mistake, in Santa Claus. The "progressive" subject forbids it—the music cannot well pause. It is, in fact, a one-movement piece—that is, according to the artistic acceptance of the word "movement."

With regard to that long and "inconsequent" period of yours, I did not reprint it for a grammatical or literary purpose. Grammar and literature are not the subjects of our discussion. I cited it for a musical purpose. And it was a curiously apt illustration of what I had to express with regard to your musical style.

You observe, that you intended to say, that "music is the original mode of expressing an original musical idea"—the word musical having been omitted. Now I surely could not be expected to guess at this. But we will take it, then, as it is: "music is the original mode of expressing an original musical idea." And yet you say, "all music is imitative, or it is good for nothing." Now, how in the name of all that is intelligible can you reconcile these two statements. I cannot. I can only return to the remark made in my former article, "If music be imitative, it is certainly not original. If I imitate the bleat of a sheep, that bleat has no originality about it—if it be a good bleat. The more successful I am in the imitation, the less original I am. The more I am a sheep, the less I am a musician."

With considerable emphasis you quote also the following artistic canon of your own, used on a former occasion:—"Now, it is a rule in Art—all Art—that its value and interest depend upon its near, but not precise resemblance to nature." This canon is quite opposed to my belief.

There are arts which are imitative—which copy nature. For instance, when I paint a landscape, I copy nature: when I paint a portrait, I copy nature. Again, when I make a statue, I copy nature: when I produce the Laocöon, I invent, perhaps, the grouping, but I copy nature. Once more, when I build an edifice, I copy nature: for, as an architect, in following any one of the different styles of architecture, I but construct my pillars and my capitals from models, which are doubtless based on the superb forest architecture and ornament of nature. Painting—sculpture—architecture—these are imitative Arts. But what does music imitate? Nothing—unless it forcibly be made to imitate natural sounds; thus degrading it from its eminent and commanding position above all the arts, as a perfectly independent and self-sustained language—the language of the heart. In expressing emotions, I do not imitate emotions. In expressing an idea in poetry, I do not imitate an idea: unless, as in that art of poetry sometimes resorted to, I write a line, (if I could) as,

Quadrupedante putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum, and thus, to the delight of all school-boys, imitate in my metre the gallop of horses.

I have sometimes thought, that music will be our language in that fairer and better world we read of. Music is certainly the only language and the only Art, which we have any revealed testimony we shall take out of the world with us. If our future life be one (to so great an extent) of love, and that emotion be even in this world so beautifully and subtly expressed by music, what may we not hope, at least dream, as to its ultimate perfection in the smiling Hereafter? Why may we not converse in music?—limited as that language now is, in its power of expressing aught terrestrial.

No—of all Arts, painting is perhaps the most imitative: sculpture next to painting (haply on the same level)—architecture, third on the pyramid, and less imitative than either. But music—music floats above the pyramid, like a celestial cloud, independent of all sustaining basis, resting upon no earthly foundation. A cloud, I say—for from its bosom there steals a voice, seemingly not of this world—angelic; heavenly; the echo of a distant Heaven.

I am now to speak of a subject which I have been considering much of late. You refer to a certain jury report, which, while we were members of the Musical Jury of the Crystal Palace, was drawn up by yourself at our request. In that report the principle is laid down, that a musical instrument is more perfect, the more it possesses vocality of tone: that is, the more closely that tone resemble the human voice. When you first broached this idea (and you did broach it—carrying out your favorite views of imitation) at one of our jury gatherings at the Palace, I liked it much. There was something very appealing in it to my nature. It was flattering, I suppose, to my human nature to feel assured, that I, in common with my kind, possessed in myself, the most perfect musical instrument. I still believe, that the voice is the most perfect musical instrument. But your application of this fact (in the report) to pianos, &c., I am now very much inclined to consider—a fallacy. If the report had been previously submitted to the jury before publication (which, I believe something unavoidable prevented, but which was certainly expected on the part of the jurors) I for one, should have combatted this idea of the desirable vocality of instruments—at least I should have wished to discuss it.

Now, if there be anything admirable in this world, it is the infinite and exquisite variety in the resources of nature. If there be anything admirable in an orchestra, it is the exquisite variety in the tone of the instruments. If all instruments were alike, in quality of tone, where were the charming piquancy and richness of the great tone-mass, (as well as the individuality of each instrument) a richness which results alone from the combination of many different qualities of tone: just as richness of color is the result of many colors combined. Why, let me ask, destroy, or labor to destroy, this variety—this idiosyncrasy of tone, peculiar to each instrument. Why should every instrument be made vocal, or, to resemble the human voice? Better take, I contend, the tone of the instrument just as we find it, and improve upon that tone: securing if possible, the best tone of its kind: whether it be the violin tone—the violoncello—the hautboy—the clarionet—the horn—the flute, or—the pianoforte.

There are certain qualities of tone, which we may certainly always aim at in all cases: like volume, purity, roundness, &c., &c. But, all this does not, and need not imply, vocality of tone. Let the voice be the voice—preëminent; commanding; incomparable. Let the violin be the violin—the horn, the horn—the violoncello, the violoncello. As regards the pianoforte, the tone is perhaps more varied than that of any other instrument. Let it be varied. Let manufacturers and artists exhaust their resources upon pianoforte tone. Let it always be pure of its kind (not brassy or jingling)—full of its kind—musical of its kind. We found Erard's a very beautiful tone: it is. But its vocality, or extraordinary resemblance to the human voice, is a point, I think, open for discussion. That which most characterizes the human voice is its exquisite transition from tone to tone and its innate passion:—which no instrument of fixed tone can imitate. But suppose it does imitate the human voice:—then, the less idiosyncrasy has it—the more is it an imitative instrument. In accompanying the voice, certainly, we do not so much wish an instrument that resembles the voice, as one that contrasts with it.

My dear FRY, to argue for vocality of tone in all instruments, or to insist that the tone of every instrument shall be made to resemble the human voice, is like a lover's insisting that all colors in the world, or all combination of colors, should resemble the hue on the cheek of his lady fair,—he can hardly expect it.

As I now view it, then, I do not at all agree with you on the subject of vocality of tone in instruments. You say:

"I am surprised that I am attacked as having 'queer ideas about music;' because I consider it chiefly the language of passion and emotion, and endeavor to describe scenes in music so that the hearer may suppose they pass artistically before him."

But "describing scenes in music so that they pass artistically before one," is neither passional nor emotional music: it is descriptive music. The two members of this sentence are irreconcilable again.

Once more you say:

"To your fourth head I repeat, as I said casually before, the piano has not a fixed tone, but is varied from loud to soft by the touch of the player. The organ, however, has a fixed tone,—because only alterable by the mechanical agency of stops."

Now, even admitting your definition of "fixed tone," and considering a "fixed tone" as one which cannot be made louder or softer, how can an organ be called an instrument of "fixed tone?" You remark, "because only alterable by the mechanism of stops."—But, what do you say, then, to that comprehensive department of the organ called the "swell:" where the force of the tones can be varied at pleasure, without the slightest reference to the stops. According to your own definition of "fixed tone," the organ is certainly no illustration of it.

But what is a "fixed tone?" A tone is "fixed" because it has a fixed position in the scale—fixed in respect of pitch—not of force. Interpreting it by the sense of force, is one of those "queer ideas about music" which you so resent my having ascribed to you.

At the close of your letter, my dear Fry, you reply to an article which appeared on this controversy in the journal of our accomplished friend Dwight. Dwight is so much better able to speak for himself than I (or anybody else) to speak for him, that I will not attempt to respond at length to that portion of your remarks. He, no doubt, will himself respond, and I shall take the liberty when he does so, to enliven my columns with his reply. But there is one remark you make, which I cannot but briefly refer to.

You have severely alluded, in the course of these and other articles from your pen in the Tribune, to the Philharmonic Society of this city. I believe that I once wrote an article with regard to this Society, caused by a similar attack upon it, on your part. I think you are unjust towards this prosperous and talented instrumental corps. For instance, I will quote from your last article:

"Now, Mr. Bristow has been refused a hearing by the Philharmonic Society of this city, some parties turning up their noses at him because he is an American."

Again, in the former article you say:

"The Philharmonic Society of this city, consecrated to Foreign music, is an incubus on Art, never having asked for, or performed an American instrumental composition during the eleven years of its existence: which, too, never would play Mr. Bristow's symphonies, that I caused to be brought for the first time before the public last winter."

Now, in reply, I beg you will read the following communication, which I chance to have received this week:

THE NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MUSICAL WORLD & TIMES:—DEAR SIR,—It has been stated a number of times of late in your journal and elsewhere, that the Philharmonic Society had never performed any compositions written in this country, or by Americans. In looking over their programmes a few days since, I find that such is not the fact. Mr. George Loder's overture, Marmion, has been performed twice, and Mr. G. F. Bristow's Concert Overture, Op. 3, once. On each occasion the composer directed his own piece. In addition, the writer remembers a number of public and private rehearsals which have been devoted wholly or in part to the performance of new and original pieces, and at one of the former, the well known symphony by Mr. G. F. Bristow, was brought out after several rehearsals, all under the direction of Mr. B.

Will you please state the above facts in your next issue, as I see the error again repeated in your paper of last week.

Yours very truly,

A MEMBER OF THE N. Y. P. S.

NEW YORK, Feb. 20, 1854.

The fact is, Fry, I believe in the Philharmonic Society. I have so good an opinion of them as to think, that if any instrumental piece were presented to them, which they thought worthy of performance—that is, at all on an equality with that music which their cultivated audience is accustomed, and rightly demand, to hear, they would perform it. I know the officers, and I am sure, that men like Scharfenberg and Timm and Eisfeld, and our Americans, Hill and Ensign and Bristow, are men quite above any narrow prejudices of nation; and if they had such prejudices they would be in favor of their own country, America, if the musical genius of that country produced anything instrumental of decided and unmistakable merit. You must come up to their high standard of Art, if you, or any one else, expect to be heard. The Temple of Art is an universal temple: and that you are an American is no reason that you should have free admission there, and be privileged to come and go as you list. I really think, that, unconsciously to yourself, (for you are, naturally, noble throughout) you are guilty of the very illiberality which you ascribe to others. You insist much more vehemently and exclusively for the performance of American Art, than the Philharmonic Society or anybody else can do for German or Italian Art. Nothing surely could be more determined and persevering, than your championship for American Art, and simply, as it strikes me, because it is American Art.

This is a wrong view of Art—decidedly so. It is one-sided and contracted. Let us strive for Art—universal Art. And, for myself, Fry, and as your sincere friend, I wish, with all my heart, that you would retire from the angry arena of antagonism in Art-matters and, in the sequestered seclusion of your own Art-world, calmly and earnestly work—strive—woo the divine Muse herself—do the best by yourself and your musical gifts: and be sure, that what is successfully and well done will find that recognition which you say (and I am most happy to hear you say) has already been the case with your compositions. The great aim of all art is to please, not to instruct. If you please, you will succeed: no matter whether you call your composition a Symphony, or a Fantasia, or Santa Claus, or a Day in the Country, or whether I, or any other man, wrangle with you about names and terms, which, after all, are very insignificant things—the great world cares very little about them, and knows less. It is best and most natural, and most healthful, I am sure, for an artist to overleap all discussions about Art, and, regardless of critics and grumbling editors, to address the universal heart—and see if it will not respond to his touch.

Cordially yours,

RICHARD STORRS WILLIS.

Pronunciation in Singing.

Pure intonation and correct execution are not the only requisites in singing even a simple song or ballad. After these are attained, a faulty pronunciation will much impair, if not entirely destroy the happy effects which they might otherwise produce. The flagrant abuses that prevail in this department, arise, probably, not so much from ignorance, as from thoughtlessness.

We sing with the intention of making music—hence, the words employed must be subservient to the music; that is, no effort at distinct enunciation should interfere with the correct rendering of the notes of the melody as they are written.

Nor on the other hand is there any reason why language should be mutilated, as is too often done, so as to make it so entirely different in singing from what it is in conversation. Words should be pronounced in singing, as in correct and elegant declamation, and unquestionably can be, so as not to interfere with any established rule of vocal art, and yet be perfectly intelligible to every listener.

As one example among many of the abuses of language here referred to, may be mentioned the abominable corruption of the word the, into thur and thah. Is not the word analogous in construction as well as pronunciation, to she, me, he, be, &c.? And yet who would think of calling either of these shur or shah, mur or mah, &c.? I am well aware that some popular psalm-book manufacturers, finding this general abuse of the word the, (a relic of old times and fashions) in practice, have, in teaching, sought to make a rule for its justifiable continuance, instead of correcting the error. But the universality of an evil makes it no less an evil, and common sense should be the guide in forming, as well as adopting rules. The difference even in this small item, in choirs that are directed by well-educated and tasteful leaders, is gratefully perceptible; and though it must be acknowledged that such choirs are few and far between, yet one may have occasionally the pleasure of hearing them.

A few additional examples may be mentioned, wherein our already too complicated vowel pronunciation is made odious.

The word my is often sung as if written my-ee, the tone being mostly given upon the ee; it should be sung as if spelt mah-e, (the a having the broad sound as in ah;) the tone being prolonged upon the first vowel, and the e sounded but slightly at the end; so also with thy, so commonly sung thi-ee. The words thou, now, &c., mispronounced in singing naou, thaou, should be sung as if written thah-u, nah-u, (u as in rule;) making the first vowel the longer as before. Also, night, light and smile, are too often sung as if written ni-eete, li-eete, smi-eete; but should be sung nah-ete, lah-ete, smah-ete, always preserving the broad sound of a, and prolonging the tone upon that, touching the e but slightly before the last consonant.

Again the carrying forward of the dentals d, and t, before y, converting them into j, dg, ch, &c.; for example the lines:

"Around yon fountain's brim—"
"Bid you haste to me—"
"Bright youth now faintly sees—"
"Light your dreary path—"

are all sung as if written

Aroun-jon &c.
Bidge-u &c.
Brigh-tchouth &c.
Ligh-tchour &c.

Also the unfortunate a and e, in the words dis-tant, moment, contentment, &c., are sung as if written,

"When along the distant rays"
"—how life's moments are fading."

These last two perversions of language are quite as often heard in speaking as in singing.

The above rules are applicable in all cases of words similarly formed, and though many other instances of abuse in singing might be cited, I will present but one more, viz: that of dwelling upon the nasal ng, instead of the vowel, in such words as morning, rising, &c. The correction of these, as well as all the previously mentioned faults in pronunciation, will be greatly assisted by opening the mouth properly, that the voice may have free passage, rather than force its way through the nose or against the teeth.

As remarked at first, these habits probably arise more from thoughtlessness than intention, or ignorance, as there is no reason why language in singing should not be pronounced as properly as in speaking.

An eminent master has remarked that "all that is necessary for the formation of a good pianist, is a good pair of hands and common sense." Would not the sentiment of this apply to singing? viz: that a good voice, of which few are deprived, and common sense, are all that is necessary, with industry and perseverance, to form a good singer.

Therefore, let those who think they have good voices, and are doubtless not mistaken, exercise their common sense; first in procuring a competent person to instruct and direct them, and afterwards in the performance of the duties assigned them, and we shall not only have good singing among us, but good pronunciation in singing.

BOSTON, MARCH 4, 1854.

NEW VOLUME. On the Eighth of April our Journal will enter upon its third year, and with new assurances of public favor and success. Of course new subscriptions will be now in order. The majority of our subscribers will please bear in mind that their present subscription expires with four more numbers. We trust they will all notify us, before the month is out, of their intention to renew, and that subscribers at a distance will see the reasonableness of our terms as advertised, viz: two dollars per annum in advance.

☞ We have enclosed bills to a large number of subscribers who have not yet paid for the year now closing, and beg that they will promptly remit by mail or otherwise.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS IN NEW YORK. Your attention is particularly requested to the above.

The Fry and Willis Controversy.

We could not resist the fair claim of our readers for the sequel of this racy and good-humored musical discussion. If appetites are sharp for each response in the polemical antiphony, we have done our part in stimulating them by echoing so much of it in these our columns. Many will be sorry that on Mr. Fry's part it seems to have come to a final cadence, and the themes will not be resumed. The pleasant reply of Mr. Willis, number two, we give to-day.

We know not whether to be most pleased or dismayed by his complimentary anticipation of a reply on our part to so much as concerned us in Mr. Fry's rejoinder, and his avowed intention of "enlivening the columns" of his Musical World with said imaginary reply. Had we dreamed of such an honor we might have attempted to make more of a figure; but we are taken by surprise; we did not dress for company, and if it be not too late would fain beg our friend Willis not to expose us farther than we have done ourselves. In truth there were no points for us to reply to, which seemed to call for or to justify any extended discussion. 1. As to whether we had attempted any "witticism" at the expense of Mr. F. and his friends:—that was answered in a word. 2. As to whether Mr. Fry's symphonies did or did not establish a rival claim to Boston musical enthusiasm with those of Beethoven:—how could we discuss that? and what could be proved by the decision one way or the other?—3. As to the comparative justice done to rising genius by "the appreciative few" and by "the many":—that presented quite too vague an issue upon which to try conclusions; while the best answer lay in our Diarist's solid facts, which we trust Mr. Willis will copy, if he copies anything. So we said only the little that seemed necessary, and there let the matter rest.

The real, vital Art questions, involved in the controversy, were already and most properly in our friend Willis's own hands, and receiving such able and satisfactory treatment, that it behoved us, as it was indeed entirely preferable and most pleasant to us, simply to look on and enjoy and learn.

One thing we may consider certain, and let all parties derive peace and comfort therefrom: If our friend Fry is inspired with true musical genius, if his symphonies and opera have the real, soul-magnetizing, immortal stuff in them, the world will sooner or later find it out and give due credit. It is only a question of genius on the one hand, and of time upon the other. Beethoven did not have to take up the pen of the journalist and write his symphonies into the world's admiration. Neither did Handel, Mozart, Weber, Rossini, Donizetti, nor anybody else who has ever been the great man of a day or of whole centuries. Surely no one is at fault for not admiring, where he cannot admire; for not kindling, when no spark has chanced to lodge in any combustible region of his nature. One fulfils all righteousness in such a case, if he keeps still and does not over-confidently deny existences of which time and better opportunity may yet give him proof. But a man unkindly places you in a false and awkward position, when he would compel you to argue with him the question of his own genius. One does not care to be so peremptorily summoned before the bar of all the world's opinion, to show cause why he did not wax enthusiastic about a neighbor's symphony, or other work of Art or handicraft. Every earnest person must be mainly anxious that he do a good thing, and not that he get credit for it. And if he be truly conscious and persuaded in his own mind that he has done a good thing, nay, many and excellent things, and that he has the God-given faculty in himself so thoroughly at his command, that he can produce these excellent things as often as they are called for, at a day's or four days' warning, as Mr. Fry seems to be,—why, what more could a man ask to make him inwardly the serenest and blissest of mortals? How can the world's opinion, or any outward irrecognition cloud such inward sunshine? Out of the serene rapture of such an undimmed consciousness of power, who could even see a critic, or not find the blackest newspapers printless and blank amid the general transparency? Give us the power of writing a grand symphony in four days, or in four months, and we do not think we shall be long in shaking off the editorial harness!

A New Use for Music.

A correspondent sends us the following programme printed for a recent gathering in one of the interior towns of New Hampshire, thinking that we may like to publish it "as a proof of the large musical culture of the present generation. The proof being in the fact that even an old fashioned 'Donation Party' cannot be given without a triple chorus and a full orchestra." Our friend assures us "that the performances were of a high order, and that the programme was not the ideal of a vivid imagination, but an actual live fact."

Truly music is a very serviceable sort of familiar sprite in these days, and men invoke her charm to help them out in every sort of questionable work at which the better part of us relict. Thus how could men turn themselves into devils in time of war, if it were not for music, making the bloody charge seem glorious? And here we have it brought into country parishes, to help charm the people into a little formal extra generosity towards their half-paid pastors. Henceforth, we suppose, the village pastor, who would get decently supported in his labors, must organize a good brass band to work upon the tender feelings of his congregation, not in the house of God, but in the town hall. But let the programme speak for itself:

Programme of the Donation Visit, at the Town Hall, Tuesday evening, January 31, 1854, for the benefit of the Rev. Mr. —.

1. Voluntary, from the united choirs.
2. Invocation, by Rev. Mr. —.
3. Musical Concert—Vocal and Instrumental. (Violoncello, two flutes and a post horn.)
4. Social Interview.
5. Address on the social benefits of Donation Visits, by Rev. Mr. —.
6. SINGING.
7. Eulogy, on dispensing with table luxuries at Donation Visits,—by Rev. Mr. —.
8. Music.
9. Address of thanks, by Rev. Mr. —.
10. Voluntary from the Choirs.
11. Prayer by Rev. Mr. —.
12. Benediction, by Rev. Mr. —.
13. SINGING.
14. In leaving the House the Assembly will have an opportunity to pass Rev. Mr. — and Lady, to take the usual "good night," and leave with them the "Widow's mite."

Musical Review.

A Practical Text-Book of Music, as connected with the Art of playing the Piano-Forte. By EDWARD B. OLIVER. Boston: O. Ditson.

This is a neat little duodecimo of sixty pages, in which those essentials of a musical knowledge, which every student of the piano or of any instrument must possess as the conditions of intelligent practice, are well thought out, and presented with an admirable consistency and clearness. Among the multitudes of attempts to state the rudiments of music in a popular form, it is indeed seldom that we find so much real thought and judgment brought to the task. The matter is thoroughly digested and the topics placed in their true relations. The definitions are philosophical, precise and satisfactory. It is not a book of exercises, a "School" or "Method" for the Piano-forte; but it conveys in the form of question and answer, a very convenient and intelligent solution of those theoretic questions which arise to puzzle every young beginner in the practice of the Art. It helps him to understand the materials he is to use. Then the spirit of the book is admirable; it inspires to earnest practice, keeping in sight the higher ends of Music; while at the same time it is practical and cautious about forcing upon the pupil higher things than he is prepared to appreciate.

Six Two-Part Songs, by MENDELSSOHN, arranged for the piano by OTTO DRESEL. (Nathan Richardson; Musical Exchange.)

These beautiful duets, with words, have for several years been cherished in many of our musical homes, as among the choicest gems of parlor music. In this piano-forte arrangement they are scarcely less interesting as songs without words. Mr. Dresel has happily combined every essential feature both of the voice parts and accompaniment into true little poems for the piano. They are of quite moderate difficulty, and will form capital lessons in style and musical expression. Three of the series have appeared: namely, No. 1. "I would that my Love," which our concert-goers have frequently enjoyed also in orchestral arrangements; No. 2. "The Passage Bird's Farewell," and No. 3, "Greeting." The remainder, namely: "Autumn Song," "O wert thou in the cold blast," and "The Maybells and the Flowers," will soon follow.

DANCE MUSIC. The same publisher also sends us:

1. Sphären Polka, by F. MOLLENHAUER, of Julien's orchestra. A polka of the spheres is a fancy that would seem rather to compromise the dignity of those grand bodies in their heavenly orbits. But higher spheres apart, and measured by the commonplace sphere of mortal waltzing and polking, this is a very clever polka, more graceful and ideal than the most of them, and with a gentle dash of sentiment, beginning in the minor mood of G, but ending in the relative major.

2. Boston Belles: Polka de Salon. By CARL HAUSE. A more elaborate, bravura sort of polka, that runs into variations and requires a degree of what the French critics happily term prestidigitation. Those who possess a modicum of that and who love polkas, will doubtless find it interesting.

3. Chromatic Gallop. By ADOLPH KIELBLOCK. Not the fiery thing that Liszt's Gallop Chromatique is, but child's play to the difficulties of that. Yet it is worth a turn or two and will start the blood a little.

4. La Capricieuse; Tarantelle. Op. 6. By HENRY MASON. This is the whirling tarantella reduced, we should think, to its simplest form. It is cleverly managed, but does not impress us as having much of the caprice of fancy, or of the wild delirium of the dance.

Vocal Duets. With words German and English. Music by F. KUCKEN. (G. P. Reed & Co.)

No. 1. is a graceful and pleasing Barcarole. No 2. "I think of thee" (Ich denke dein), is one of the best duets we have seen for some time. It is an Andante in flowing 4-4 measure, each quarter note in the somewhat elaborate and rich accompaniment being divided into triplets, after the type of Beethoven's Adelaide.

THE "HALLELUJAH."—MR. LOWELL MASON, the eminent composer of Psalmody, is preparing a new book of Church Music, to be called The Hallelujah. Mr. Mason has not brought out any book (except his Musical Letters,) of which he was the sole author, since the publication of Carmina Sacra in 1841. Over three hundred and fifty thousand copies of Carmina Sacra have been sold, and it has been more highly valued and more extensively used than any similar publication. The books which in their day came nearest to a similar popularity were the Handel and Haydn Society's Collection, and the Boston Academy's Collection—both by Mr. Mason. The first legitimate successor of such works must come before the public with peculiar interest; and such is to be the new book now completed by Mr. Mason. He has for several years devoted the most of his time to its preparation, during which he has spent eighteen months in Europe, under auspicious circumstances. It is understood that The Hallelujah will not follow in the beaten track of its predecessors, but that it will be new in something more than the name.—New York Tribune.

Concerts of the Week.

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY.—The twelfth subscription concert, which took place last Saturday evening, was of the light complexion, and a very pleasant entertainment of its kind. It derived new interest from the appearance of Mlle. CAROLINE LEHMANN, whose return to Boston was welcomed with hearty and repeated rounds of applause. She sang in the first part the Bel raggio, from "Semiramide," with orchestra. We cannot think it of the kind of music best adapted to her voice and nature; yet it was executed with great ease and fluency, and with good style and expression. Miss Lehmann's singing never can lack fervor, yet we thought she sang with hardly as much animation as we remember in some of her last year's efforts. In finish and delicacy of execution, in the power of sustaining, swelling and diminishing her tones, especially the high tones (which seem to us her most beautiful tones), she has gained not a little since that time.—In the second part, instead of Schubert's Trockne Blumen, set down in the programme, she gave us (in consequence, we understand, of late arrival from Philadelphia and hurried preparation) the "Birdling" of Jenny Lind. Again, we must think, an unwise selection. It was sung beautifully, finely; but its brightness dimmed before the mere memory of its prototype. The same thing must be said of her "Comin' thro' the Rye," with which she answered the encore, and in which she followed essentially the Lind version, and with more sympathetically close resemblance than perhaps any other singer could have done it; yet it was flying too near the sun.

Nevertheless it was a great satisfaction to hear this lady again. There has seldom been a singer among us who seemed to possess so much of the true artist spirit,—so much of the religion of her art. And we wish that there were a dozen, instead of three more Germania concerts, to be enriched and enlivened by her voice. Especially would we be glad to hear her in every classical concert that remains to us, from those in Chickering's saloon, to the great oratorios.

The instrumental pieces were apparently well relished by an audience, not filling the Music Hall, but yet very large. The overture to Die Felsenmühle commended itself at least by the precision and delicacy with which it was played:—we mean the lighter parts, of course; the fandara with which it opens and closes might be played about as well on drums alone as any way. Lanner's waltz, Soldatentänze, was very spirited and graceful.

Then came Bel Raggio. Then a reminiscence of the classical;—the serenely deep and beautiful religious Adagio from Mendelssohn's "Song of Praise;" and we thought nothing in the whole evening commanded such attention or was followed by such hearty and unanimous applause.

Mr. ROBERT HELLER, the pianist, played Thalberg's Andante, which is one of the New School pieces that have character and feeling as well as bravura and brilliancy; and a pretty enough Mazurka of his own. Of the finale to Flotow's Martha, which concluded the first part, we can only say that it was worthy of the overture to that same.

Part second opened with Nicolai's overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor," and ended with Auber's to Fra Diavolo; which require no comment. There was a violin duet, by Kalliwooda, performed by Messrs. SCHULTZE and MEISEL in quite a masterly manner; it had the sweet-flowing, melodious character of Kalliwooda, but was too much lengthened out by such variations as really add nothing. The Potpourri "Die Traumbilder," is certainly a feeble affair; and the introduction or rather intrusion of "Old Hundred" on the organ, was more startling than edifying. We are told that in Worcester, where the Germanians "astonished the natives" with these remarkable "dream images," when they came to this passage some native professor of psalmody stood up and called upon the audience to rise and join in singing the old psalm, which was done to the great edification of the Germanians, who certainly left Worcester with one new idea more than they carried there.

At the Rehearsal on Wednesday, the Germanians played the C minor symphony of Beethoven and the overture to Freyschutz:—two pieces more associated than any others with the first dawning of a taste for great orchestral music in this community. A plenty of light music followed, and the hall was gaily crowded.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The "Meisonaon," Tuesday night, was absolutely crowded for the eighth and last concert. Never before have we seen so many people at a Chamber Concert; there must have been six hundred at the lowest figure. Do not say that the lovers, at any rate the friends, of classical music are few and far between! The concert passed off in the main quite satisfactorily.

1. Mendelssohn's first Quintet (in A. op. 18), is not so rich or deep as many of his chamber compositions; but it has become well-known to many here, and is an ever welcome favorite, principally on account of the fine play of fairy fantasy that sparkles through it. It presents the Mendelssohnian features in their boyish simplicity and freshness. The quick and delicate staccato of the Scherzo was very neatly rendered.

Schubert's song, "Thou art the rest" (Du bist die Ruh) was sung in English. This is one of the very purest, loftiest, sweetest, serenest melodies that Schubert has bequeathed to us; it is infinitely removed from all taint of commonplace or sentimentality, full of passion but of high and holy faith; and requires a religious and poetic nature fully to appreciate and render it. Mrs. WENTWORTH sang it chastely, with good taste, and considerable expression. But it suffered in the accompaniment, which was taken now faster and now slower in the interluding passages, as if its very simplicity puzzled the pianist as to its true intention.

3. One of Beethoven's three earliest Trios, and first set of published works, the one in G, was played by CARL HAUSE, pianist, and the brothers FRIES. One might hear much of it without suspecting Beethoven, it is so clear and bright and sunny, and so much in the manner of Haydn, except here and there in passages where the deeper and stronger individuality reveals itself. It was a fine piece of reading on the part of the pianist and was altogether well performed.

4. The Andante Cantabile from the Sixth Quartet of Mozart, was to our feeling the most interesting piece in the concert; it is profoundly beautiful. It was followed by the Finale Allegro Molto of the same quartet.

5. Two "Songs without Words," composed and played by Mr. HAUSE. The first, a flowing duet in thirds and sixths, in a rather Italian cantabile style; the other sparkling and rapid, reminding one a little of Kücken's "She is mine;"—both quite clever.

6. "The Fisher's Canzonette," composed by Mr. RYAN, and sung by Mrs. WENTWORTH, with clarinet obligato, and quartet accompaniment. A pretty thing, but hardly of pretension enough for such a concert.

7. The first movement (a very long, very varied, and very difficult one, and extremely interesting withal) of Chopin's Concerto in E minor, was played with astonishing power of bravura execution by Mr. HAUSE. Almost incredible feats of digital dexterity and force were achieved with masterly ease and certainty. A mere quintet accompaniment was not very efficient in this case.

The Club had every reason to feel cheered and flattered by the audience of that night, and the announcement that the Messrs. CHICKERING had kindly offered their beautiful saloon for an extra concert on Tuesday, the 14th, was received with general satisfaction.

ROXBURY BEETHOVEN ASSOCIATION.—The Second Concert was attended by a large audience. The choruses were well given, though not so successfully, as at the first concert; and the solos by Miss BOTHAMLY, Miss BROWN, Mrs. EMMONS and Mrs. LITTLE were remarkably well done. We have spoken formerly of the chorus glee, "When thou, Oh Stone," by Mr. SOUTHARD, (the Conductor), as a composition of remarkable excellence, and were glad to hear it again. The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB took part in the concert, giving some of their light music. There is the material in every town in New England for such concerts. We have the voices; a competent conductor and careful practice will do the rest.

GREAT BOOK IN PRESS.

MOORE'S ENCYCLOPEDIA OF MUSIC:

COMPILED BY JOHN W. MOORE,

With the assistance of other distinguished men in the musical world. The intention of the author is to make a most complete and thorough work of the above, which will be a desideratum in the world of music. It will be published in one elegant Royal Octavo volume of about 900 pages, double columns, and will contain a complete

Dictionary of Musical Terms,

A HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE OF MUSIC,
from the earliest time to the present, a

Treatise on Harmony and Thorough Bass,

a description of all known MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, with the names of the most distinguished makers, and a complete Musical Biography of over three thousand of the most distinguished Composers and Musicians who have ever lived. Mr. Moore has spent several years in compiling this valuable work. It is now going through the press as rapidly as will comport with accuracy.

P. S.—The above splendid work, which will prove invaluable to every professional musician, and to every amateur, will be ready this spring; we hope in the month of March. It has been delayed on account of the immense labor bestowed upon it, and the difficulty of stereotyping a work so full of examples. The delay, however, will enhance the value of the work.

The price, bound in cloth, will be,....$3 50.

The Best Flute Instruction Book.BERBIGUIER'S METHOD FOR THE FLUTE:

TO WHICH ARE ADDED

DROUET'S TWENTY-FOUR STUDIES,

IN ALL THE KEYS.

In regard to this work, the English translator makes the following remarks:—

"M. Berbiguier appears to have bestowed on its completion the whole of his extraordinary talents, and has produced a method which is certainly unrivalled. (The commencing lessons are written in a style at once pleasing and simple, and the pupil's progress is facilitated while he is almost unconscious of performing a task.)"

This is the first American edition of this valuable work. It is the most popular Method of instruction for the Flute in Europe, where it has passed through many editions; from the latest and most correctly revised of which this is a reprint.

This copy not only contains all the matter in Berbiguier, but, in addition, the popular studies of Drouet, which may be considered as finishing exercises. These, published in connection with the instructions, exercises, and examples of Berbiguier, supply the want of the American public for a complete method of instruction for the Flute, at once concise, comprehensive, and adapted in every particular to general use.

Salvator Rosa.

This celebrated musician, painter and poet was born at Renessa, near Naples, in the year 1615. He was originally intended for the church; and was educated in accordance with that intention; but his mind, of all others, was ill calculated for a monkish life, and at an early age he abandoned his probationary habit, and returned to his father's house. We now first hear of him in connection with music, and cannot resist giving an account of his progress in this science, in the very entertaining words of Lady Morgan.

"The continuacious student of the Padri Somaschi escaped from the restraints of their cloister, and the horrid howl of their laude spirituali, to all the intoxication of sound and sight, with every sense in full accordance with the musical passion of the day. It is little wonderful if, at this epoch of his life, Salvator gave himself up unresistingly to the pursuit of a science, which he cultivated with ardor, even when time had preached his tumultuous pulse to rest; or if the floating capital of genius, which was as yet unappropriated, was in part applied to that species of composition which, in the youth of a man, as of nations, precedes deeper and more important studies, and for which, in either, there is but one age. All poetry and passion, his young muse 'dallied with the innocence of love,' and inspired strains which, though the simple breathings of an ardent temperament, the exuberance of youthful excitement and an overteeming sensibility, were assigning him a place among the first Italian lyrists of his age. Little did he then dream that posterity would apply the rigid rules of criticism to the 'idle visions' of his boyish fancy; or that his bars and basses would be analyzed by the learned umpires of future ages, declared 'not only admirable for a dilettante,' but, 'in point of melody, superior to that of most of the masters of his time.'

"His musical productions became so popular, that the 'spinners and knitters in the sun did use to chant them;' (an image which every street in Naples, during the winter season, daily exhibits); and there was in some of these short lyric poems, which he set to music, a softness and delicacy that rendered them even worthy to be sung

'By some fair queen in summer bower
With ravishing divisions of her lute.'

still, however, they are more curious as compared to that stern strain of harp invective which runs through all his maturer compositions, and to that dark, deep, and indignant feeling which pervades all his satires.

"Having acquired considerable mastery on the lute, (for which, like Petrarch, he preserved a passion till the last year of his life,) he soon became one of the most brilliant and successful serenaders of Naples. Many of those gay and galliard figures which, in after life, escaped from his graphic pencil and rapid graver, with hair and feather floating in the breeze, are said to have been but copies of himself, as he stood niched under the shadow of a balcony, or reclined on the prow of a felucca, singing to his lute the charms or cruelty of some listening Irene or Cloris of the moment.

"This mode of life, of course, could not last very long; it was necessary that he should turn his serious exertions to some profession; and a family connection drew them to that of painting. From this time, Rosa advanced rapidly in reputation and in wealth; and his house became the resort of some of the most intellectual and cultivated men in Rome.

"His pathetic cantatas, and their plaintive compositions, drew tears from the brightest eyes in Rome; the 'potent, grave, and reverend signors' of the conclave did not disdain to solicit admission to those evening conversazioni of the Via Babuina, where the comic muse alone presided, but where, under the guise of national naïveté, veiled in a rustic dialect, and set off by the most humorous gesticulations, truths were let drop with impunity, more perilous than those for translating which from the pages of Lucian a protégé of the Grand Duke de' Medici was at the same moment confined by the Inquisition.

"The manner of the daring improvisatore, as left on record by his chroniclers, or handed down by tradition, was no less singular and attractive than the matter which inspired him. The apartment in which he received his company was affectedly simple. The walls, hung with faded tapestry, exhibited none of his beautiful pictures, which might well have attracted attention from the actor to his works. A few rows of seats included all the furniture; and they were secured at an early hour by the impatience of an audience, select and exclusive, either invited by himself or introduced by his friends. When the company were assembled, and not before, Salvator appeared in the circle, but with the air of a host rather than that of a exhibitor, until the desire to hear him recite his poetry, or to improvvisare, expressed by some individual, produced a general acclamation of entreaty. It was a part of his coquetry to require much solicitation; and when at last he consented, he rose with an air of timidity and confusion, and presented himself with his lute or a roll of paper containing the heads of his subject. After some graceful hesitation, a few preluding chords, or a slight hem! to clear his full, deep voice, the scene changed; the elegant, the sublime Salvator disappeared, and was replaced by the gesticulating and grimacing Coviello, who, long before he spoke, excited such bursts of merriment, con le più ridicole smorfie al suo modo Napolitano, (with the most laughable grimaces in the true Neapolitan style,) that even the gravest of his audience were ready to hurst. When the adroit improvisatore had thus wound up his auditory to a certain pitch of exaltation, and prepared them at least to receive with good humor whatever he might hazard, he suddenly stepped forth and exclaimed with great energy, in the broad Neapolitan of the Largo di Castello, 'Siente chisso vè, anza gli uocci—a Neapolitan idiom, meaning 'Awaken, and heed me,' but literally translated, 'Listen, and open your eyes.' He then began his recitation. 'Whatever were its faults of composition,' says one of his biographers, 'it was impossible to detect them, as long as he recited; nor could their charm be understood by those who did not hear them recited by himself. When some of these productions were published after his death, it was supposed that they would lose much of their apparent merit, because his fervid and abundant genius, rich in its natural fertility, despised the trammels of art, as submitting talent to mean and slavish rules. The contrary, however, was the fact; for they excited universal admiration.'

"With a thirst of praise which scarcely any applause could satisfy, Salvator united a quickness of perception that rendered him suspicious of pleasing, even at the moment he was most successful. A gaping mouth, a closing lid, a languid look, or an impatient hem! threw him into utter confusion, and deprived him of all presence of mind, of all power of concealing his mortification. When he perceived that some witty sally had fallen lifeless, that some epigrammatic point had escaped the notice of his auditors, he was wont to exclaim to his particular friends, when the strangers were departed: 'What folly to lose my time and talent in reading before these beasts of burden, who feel nothing, and have no intellect beyond what is necessary to understand the street ballads of the blind band!'

"Observing the manners of an age in which he deemed it an indignity to have been born, with the deep and philosophic view which distinguished all he thought and produced, Salvator perceived that the church was making the same monopoly of music as she had done of painting, and would, in the end, degrade one art (as she had already deteriorated the other) to the worst purposes. The finest singers were now shut up in the Roman monasteries; and all Rome was then resorting to the Spirito Santo, to hear the sister Veronica, a beautiful nun, who awakened emotions in her auditors that did not all belong to heaven.

"It was in the palaces of the Porporati that the first musical dramas were given, which bore any resemblance to the modern opera by which they are now succeeded in the Argentina; and the choir of the Pontifical Chapel (which gave the musical tone to all the churches of Christendom, while it engrossed all the patronage of the government) was gradually abandoning those learned combinations, and that solemn and affecting simplicity, which were calculated to answer the purposes of a passionate devotion, and to satisfy, at the same moment, the taste of the amateur and the enthusiasm of the devotee.

"The first attempt at a regular drama was made at Rome in one of these palaces, as early as 1632, three years before Salvator's first arrival there. It was called 'Il Ritorno di Angelica nella India,' and was composed by the then fashionable secular composer Tignali. Public operas were at this time performing in Venice and Bologna.

"It may be curious to observe, that the instruments which were then found in the secular orchestras of Italy, were the organ, viol, viol da gamba, harp, lute, guitar, spinet, harpsichord, theorbo, and trumpet: while the court band of Louis XIII. and XIV. only consisted of the far-famed 'four-and-twenty fiddlers all in a row,' and even they were imported from Italy. The first and the most distinguished was Baptiste Lulli, brought from Florence by Maria de' Medici, at the age of fourteen. From a simple violonier, he became the founder of the French opera, and the model upon which Cambra, Destouches, and other French composers founded their braying monotonies. At the same period in England, the music of Lawes and Bird was laid aside as profane, and replaced by those pious discords,

'Such as from lab'ring lungs enthusiast blows,
High sounds attempted through the vocal nose.'

Vicenzio Galileo (the father of the celebrated astronomer) remarks, however, in his 'Dialogo della Musica,' that the best Italian lyres were made for the English market.

"While the music of the church was gradually assuming an effeminate character, the palaces of the great were filled with the most worthless of the profession, of both sexes. The genius which went to the composition of the finest music was then, as now, less prized and rewarded than the voice which executed it; and the profligacy of the public singers in Italy was no impediment to their reception into the first families of the country. Upon this shameless laxity of manners, and the visible degradation of ecclesiastical music, Salvator fell with a Puritan's severity, scarcely surpassed by the anathemas of Calvin, or the vituperations of Erasmus. He attacked the style of singing in the Pontifical Chapel. He attacked the vices of a profession which now, beyond every other, received the special patronage of the lords of the conclave; and though his efforts at reformation were as yet confined to his recitations, and to the frank utterance of opinions over which he held no control, yet these philippics increased the number of his enemies, even more than an attack on religion itself would have done.

"While, however, all the singers in Rome, with their patrons and partisans, took the field against the satirist, the great composers, distinguished alike for their genius and their morals, rallied round him; and the musical album of Salvator, brought a century after his death into England, (the land which has always been true to his merits, and in sympathy with his genius,) is a record that he offended none but those whose enmity was distinction."

"Among the musical manuscripts purchased at Rome in 1770," says Dr. Burney, in his "History of Music," "one that ranks the highest in my own favor was the music book of Salvator Rosa, the painter; in which are contained, not only the airs and cantatas set by Carissimi, Cesti, Luigi, (Rossi,) Cavalli, Legrenze, Capellino, Pasqualini, and Bandini, of which the words of several are by Salvator Rosa, but eight entire cantatas, written, set, and transcribed by the celebrated painter himself. The book was purchased of his granddaughter, who occupied the house in which her ancestor had lived and died. The handwriting was ascertained by collation with his letters and satires, of which the originals are preserved by his descendants. The historians of Italian poetry, though they often mention Salvator as a satirist, seem never to have heard of his lyrical productions. Other single airs by Luigi and Legrenze, the words by Salvator Rosa, fill up the volume, in which there is nothing so precious as the musical and poetical compositions of Rosa." It is enough to establish the musical genius of Salvator Rosa, that his compositions were pronounced by the most learned and elegant musical professors of the last century to be, "in point of melody, superior to most of the masters of his time." Rosa died at Rome in 1673.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

An Earnest Master.

When a boy, he was obliged to assist his father in giving music lessons, and in playing the organ at church. All who observed the earnestness and eagerness with which he did it, foresaw that he would one day become an excellent master. At nineteen he appeared before the public with his first work, three sonatas for the piano-forte, the skill and genius evinced in which attracted great attention on the part of critics and artists, who watched his further course with interest.

Thus encouraged he came out, with one work after another, all worthy of the author of those fine sonatas. He gained a reputation too, as an excellent performer on the piano-forte and organ; and as one equally at home in wielding the conductor's baton. In a few years he was an acknowledged master, notwithstanding all the obstacles inseparably connected with the career of a young and struggling composer without fortune. (Among other signs of acknowledgement he received the title of "Doctor of Music," a compliment that has only been paid in Germany to musicians of the very highest order, such as Mendelssohn, Spohr, Liszt, Marx, and a few others.) Especially did he distinguish himself in the composition of oratorios, so that many pronounced him the worthiest successor of Handel. Next came many overtures, songs, sonatas, etc. etc., all bearing the stamp of a manly, vigorous spirit, thoroughly trained in every branch of the tone-art, particularly in counterpoint.

It is said he has never tried the composition of an opera or any other theatrical work: The reason thereof may be found, as we think, in his character. He had too high an opinion of the Art, to sacrifice a tithe of it to the caprices and follies of stage singers, and the arrogance of stage managers, as the dramatic composer is generally obliged to do. Besides, he was too honest to pay flattering compliments, and give undeserved praise; he spoke right out just what he thought; his frankness and uprightness were proverbial among musicians. When the dignity of the Art or of artists was to be defended, he showed an imposing courage, firmness, and self-confidence, and he cared little whether it was a prince or any other man with whom he had to deal. At the princely court of Dessau, where he was chapel-master, he has given frequent evidences of this; which, by the way, never impaired the regard and affection of the music-loving duke and family towards him. On the other hand his modesty towards real merit and real greatness was touching. This was illustrated in two instances, as follows.

At the Hamburg musical festival in 1841 he was invited to conduct the sacred concert, in which Handel's "Messiah" was to be performed. The performance being over, a laurel wreath was solemnly presented to him. This manifestation of esteem and regard on the part of more than six hundred musicians and amateurs, among whom were Marschner, Liszt, David, and others, evidently touched him; however, when he held the wreath in his hands he exclaimed: "No, not I have deserved the laurels, but Handel!" and then placed the wreath on Handel's bust, which stood there.

Another time, a few days after the 4th of November, 1847, we find him, then an old man of above sixty, with some friends, in the midnight hour, at the depot of the city in which he resided, waiting for the arrival of the train from Leipsic to Berlin, which bore the mortal remains of that excellent master in the tone-art,* who in the prime of his life, in the midst of his glorious career, had been so suddenly called hence. The train having arrived, he went to see the coffin, on which, after some appropriate words, he put a laurel wreath; his old, true face impressed with the sincerest grief.

In his later years, when the Art had taken a direction that was against his convictions, he wrought only in silence; in the city of his residence, however, they had still opportunity to witness his mastery in conducting choros and orchestra, and hear his really wonderful organ playing. Moreover, he continued to advise and assist young composers, to the training of whom he had formerly, for many years, chiefly devoted himself. Some instructive works published at that time, for instance: "Instruction in the Art of Musical composition;" "Instruction in Singing for Public Schools;" "The Perfect Organist;" "Organ School," &c., show that he must have been a master in teaching, likewise. It is now about four years since he published an advertisement throughout Germany, inviting any young composers of symphonies and overtures, who wished to hear their works, to come to Dessau; as he would, provided the score showed skill and talent, have them performed by his orchestra.

There is perhaps no author so little encouraged as the composer, who is not world-renowned. Only to have the reward of hearing the work which he has written, sometimes with the sacrifice of time, money, even of health, he must frequently beg and humble himself to arrogant and jealous conductors, and hardly once in ten cases does he succeed. One might ask: "Why does he not rather tear his score to pieces and fling his pen out of the window, to write never a note more?" But it is a well-established fact that a gifted composer cannot leave off writing; as the bird upon the twig sometimes cannot leave off singing, though it be driven from one tree to another.

This our honest master knew from personal experience; he tried therefore, as it seemed, to give an impulse toward mitigating this cruel fact; which, by the way, has always been a chief obstacle to the progress of the art. That advertisement was received, as one may easily imagine, with great pleasure, by our young composing friends, who instantly, with their scores under their arms, commenced the pilgrimage to the city of promise. Whether the crowd became so large that it annoyed him, or whether it was from some other cause which he could not control, a few months afterwards appeared another advertisement, stating briefly, that he was obliged to discontinue these performances.

We believe this was the last time he was heard from by the public at large. Some weeks ago his friends this side of the ocean were surprised and pained by the announcement in the papers of the death of FRIEDRICH SCHNEIDER (the reader will undoubtedly have recognized that master as the subject of our sketch), in November 1853, at the age of sixty-seven.

NOTE. To the above we may add: that the "Philharmonic Society" in New York announce for their next rehearsal a symphony (No. 20, in B), written expressly for the society by Friedrich Schneider, of Dessau, and received only a short time before his death.—ED.

Our New Opera House.

The Atlas of Tuesday presents the following satisfactory information, which may serve, (for the present at least) as an answer to the thousand anxious inquiries which we have heard on all sides.

THE BOSTON THEATRE.—Our readers may be already aware that, in 1852, a number of gentlemen of our city applied to the Legislature, and obtained an act of incorporation, under the name of the Boston Theatre. As soon as their charter was secured, a subscription was opened, and the entire stock of two hundred and fifty shares, of the par value of one thousand dollars each, was all taken up by persons interested in giving to our city a reputation for the excellence of its public amusements. Much of the stock was taken by our most eminent merchants, with the hope that, by so doing, they would not only be contributing towards raising the standard of public amusements of their city, but would, at the same time, be creating an inducement for strangers to visit Boston, and by giving it an additional attraction, make their visits both pleasant and frequent. Our city was at that time, and still is, in want of a much higher class of public amusements than it has for many years possessed. There is not at present a first class theatre in our city. But such a want will not remain long unsupplied. Managers would not furnish what was wanted, and our own people at last, in self defence, commenced an undertaking which is now almost completed. The Boston Theatre, which is, with the single exception of the new opera house in New York, the largest and most convenient theatre in the world, will be finished in a few months, and will be opened at the commencement of the next season, when an impetus will be given to the drama in our city, from which, we believe, it will not soon recover. Under the management of Mr. Barry, a gentleman of the greatest experience in theatrical matters, and who will be, at the same time, lessee and stage manager, the Boston Theatre will acquire a popularity heretofore unknown in our city. Mr. Barry will soon leave for England, and has, as we may say, a carte blanche to obtain the best talent that can be found. No doubt an excellent stock company can be obtained in our own country, but Mr. Barry wishes to avail himself of the time and opportunity to secure none but the best. The generous conditions of his agreement with the directors of the company, warrant him in securing the services of none but the most talented performers. We have understood that Mr. Barry will not adhere to the old fashioned star system, but will place his principal dependence upon his stock company.

Knowing that there exists a considerable desire in the community to learn some facts connected with the new theatre, we have taken pains to make inquiries concerning the present state of the structure and the probability of its early completion; and having learned something of the plans upon which it is constructed, now present the result for the information of our readers. The lot upon which the theatre has been built, fronts on the rear of the stores on Washington street, next north of the Melodeon; the rear of the estate is on Mason street. The directors of the company, in order to secure a proper lot for the erection of the theatre, were compelled to purchase a much larger piece of ground than could possibly be needed for their purposes. The remainder, embracing the entire lot upon which the Melodeon hall is situated will doubtless be disposed of at some future time, or may be leased on advantageous terms. The main entrance is at the southern corner on Washington street, at the narrow passage next north of the Melodeon. This passageway will soon be widened by the removal of a portion of the Melodeon building, not including, however, the favorite hall, when a passageway of about thirty feet in width will be presented, making one of the most excellent entrances that could be formed. This passageway will be built over, and will then resemble in general appearance the entrance to Niblo's Theatre in New York. This main entrance will conduct the spectator to the parquette and all the galleries, with the exception of the upper, to which there is a separate entrance at the northern corner on Washington street, where there is now a narrow passageway, which will also be covered. There are also two entrances to the parquette and lower galleries at each end of the Mason street side of the building. These two entrances are both firmly arched and will always afford a safe and sure mode of exit to an audience. Carriages can reach the building, either on Mason or Washington street, but the entrance on the former street will be found the most convenient in bad weather, for the doorways will there be protected by awnings, under which carriages may be driven, so that visitors can alight therefrom without soiling a garment or experiencing the slightest inconvenience from the weather.

The main entrance from Washington street will be by a gentle ascent, without steps of any kind, to the main door, where a most imposing sight will greet the spectator. The spacious entrance hall is on a level with the parquette, and will be handsomely decorated and finished. From this point a splendid carved oaken staircase, which will rival in magnificence the famous ones of olden tales, will conduct to the upper rows. Space seemed to be no object with the designers of the building, for there is ample room for every object. The corridors are wide and extensive, and will be fitted with all conveniences. Beyond the entrance hall there is a corridor of about nine feet in width, extending entirely around the parquette, which is intended to serve, not as a place for promenading, to the annoyance of the audience, but for the convenience of those who may wish to pass in or out.

The general appearance of the theatre bears a great resemblance, in respect to corridors, to the Music Hall. Those who may wish to witness a performance must enter the hall, to which twenty-four doors open from the corridors. This plan is opposed to that of the Howard and National, where great annoyance is sometimes felt from the continued noise in the lobbies. In this respect the new theatre bears considerable resemblance to the old Tremont, above the pit. The adoption of this plan we consider as one of the best features of the house. It certainly will contribute much to the comfort, convenience, and pleasure of the audience.

The theatre hall or auditorium, is in a circular form; its exact shape may be understood by our mentioning that the interior walls of the parquette enclose an entire circle, with a diameter of 90 feet, with a portion, six feet deep, cut off at the curtain. The audience will have a good view of the stage, and as regards this respect we do not think the shape of the hall could be improved. The parquette embraces the entire lower floor, including that portion which in the Howard is devoted to the dress circle, and is ninety feet wide, from side to side. The distance from the front of the stage to the back of the parquette, is sixty-six feet. The stage projects in front eighteen feet, making the entire distance from the curtain to the back of the parquette, eighty-four feet. The outer seats of the parquette, to the extent of twelve feet from the wall, will be arranged in a circular form, and will be raised about one foot above the remainder of the seats. Those seats in this circle directly opposite the stage, corresponding in position to the private boxes at the Howard, will be divided into boxes for the convenience of parties and families. Owing to the peculiar construction of the house these seats will be no more desirable than others in the parquette, and will therefore be considered a portion of the parquette, with the same charge for admittance. The remaining parquette seats will be arranged in the usual form, with an aisle on each side of the above mentioned boxes, and one at each side near the stage. There are six small proscenium or stage boxes, three on each side.

The first gallery above the parquette will form the dress circle, and is in the same relative position as the family circle at the Howard. This dress circle will extend about twelve feet from the wall, and will contain four rows of seats. In front of the dress circle, two feet below it, and around the entire theatre, there will be a balcony, two seats deep on a level, in no way interfering with the sight of those in the dress circle behind. This balcony is a new feature in our country, and has, we believe, never before been introduced here, although common in the French theatres, under the name of stalle-de-balcon. The second tier will be of the same width as the dress circle, and will have, probably, a balcony, one seat deep. The third or upper gallery will extend back and include the corridors, and will also extend opposite the stage some distance. This latter portion may be closed up if not needed, or may be used as occasion may require. The height of the auditorium, from the parquette to the ceiling, will be about fifty-three feet.

If the seats should be placed as close together as in some of our places of amusement, many hundreds more could easily be accommodated; but the directors prefer accommodating a smaller number rather than cramming their house to general inconvenience, for the purpose of making a little more money.

Some five or six months since, the directors offered a premium of one hundred dollars for the best seat suited to their wants. The seat selected is the one that will, with some improvements, be used in the theatre, and is the most convenient and comfortable chair that we have ever seen. The frame will be of iron, and the seat will be covered with enamelled cloth, well stuffed. Each arm will answer for two chairs, will be sufficiently wide to be used, and will also be well cushioned. The backs will be so arranged with springs that they can be used in any position desired, and the seat portion, being placed upon pivots and loaded at the back, will rise up itself as soon as a person may quit it, thus giving ample room to pass in front between the seats. A space of thirty-one inches long and nineteen wide, will be allowed each spectator, and the sitting portion of the seats will be eighteen inches wide, from arm to arm, and twenty inches deep, from back to front.

At the northern end, on Washington street, back of the parquette, and on a level with the corridor, is a large saloon, forty-four by sixteen feet, and also a ladies' dressing room, eighteen by sixteen feet; also, on the same floor, a gentlemen's room, thirteen by eight feet. These rooms will be fitted up in a most magnificent style. On the dress circle floor there is a grand promenade saloon, twenty-six by forty-six feet, and twenty-six feet high. This saloon will be one of the most magnificent drawing rooms in the country, and will be beautifully fitted and decorated. There are also on this floor ladies' and gentlemen's dressing rooms, of the same size as those below. The second tier floor contains the dressing rooms but not the saloon; the gallery has a large retiring room. All the floors are amply furnished with cloak rooms, water and water closets.

The building will be lighted with gas upon a new plan. The ceiling of the auditorium will be but a false ceiling, in the centre of which will be a capacious metal inverted basin, in which the burners will be placed. This plan has been found not only pleasing to the eyes, but is at the same time a portion of the ventilating system of Prof. Wyman, whose aid has been sought in the erection of this beautiful building. There will also be burners beneath the galleries; but to prevent the great heat usually arising therefrom, flues have been constructed from the burners, through which the heat will pass off, and thus obviate the great objection against lights of the kind. The foot-lights will be arranged in the same manner. The entire theatre will be heated by steam, the apparatus for generating which will be placed in a cellar separate from the main building.

The stage is forty-seven feet wide at the proscenium opening, and the curtain will be thirty-five feet high. The distance from the curtain to the last flat is about forty-nine feet. At the back of the flat there is an open space for perspective, of about seventeen feet in depth, making the whole distance from the curtain to the back of the stage sixty-six feet, and from the front of the stage to the back of the stage about eighty-four feet. Behind the curtain the stage is from one hundred and ten to one hundred and twenty feet wide. This stage is supposed to be the best in the world as regards its machinery, size and other excellencies. Particular attention has been paid to the mechanical department, and all the recent improvements of the French and English theatres have been here introduced. Mr. Jacob Johnson, late of the Museum, is the machinist, and under his direction these improvements have been made. Mr. Johnson has had thirty years experience in the mechanical department of the stage, and will render the stage of the new theatre a wonder to all intimate with theatrical matters. There are upon the stage seven rows of side scenes, or wings, as they are technically termed. There are also traps, blocks, wheels, and other machinery innumerable about the stage, of which none but one accustomed to such things can tell even the use. There is one large trap about fifteen by twenty feet. Water has been introduced upon the stage, in such a way that real water-falls, fountains and cascades can be represented at any time; and below the stage are two cellars, through which scenery can be passed, should occasion require. At the back of the stage is a door on Mason street, for the introduction of machinery, through which, if needed, a coach and horses could be easily driven. Should "Cinderella" ever be produced here, we may expect to see Pedro's pumpkin change to a real carriage and live horses. Mr. Charles Lehr, probably the best scene painter in the country, and the painter of the drop at the Museum, has been engaged, and is hard at work upon the scenery. Trees, houses, castles, rocks, and shrubbery are all appearing at his magic command. Behind the stage are ample dressing rooms, for almost any number of performers, which will be furnished with all the necessary conveniences.

The auditorium will be decorated in a most gorgeous manner, with oriental magnificence; but as the arrangements for this department have not been completed, we shall take a further opportunity to refer to them.

The directors have taken every precaution to guard against fire. We have already referred to the fireproof arched passage ways in Mason street. The staircase leading to the gallery from Washington street will be built of brick and iron, and can never be destroyed by fire. The entire building will be furnished with iron shutters, and the main walls are fire proof, being built of the best brick, laid in mortar made of equal proportions of cement and lime, in two thicknesses, of one foot each, with a space of four inches between, for the circulation of air. The peculiar method of constructing this wall will render the theatre warm in winter and cool in summer. Co-tituate water has been introduced into the theatre, by means of pipes four inches in diameter, to which hose of the ordinary size used with fire engines will always be attached, ready for immediate use at eight different points behind the curtain, both on the stage and above the scenery. Hand hose will be placed at convenient points throughout the building. A thick iron wire curtain, upon the principle of the safety lamp, will always be ready to close the connection between the audience and the stage. Smoke may pass through the interstices of this curtain, but from its nature it will be impervious to flame. This curtain or screen will be in sight of the audience every evening, and will be raised a few moments before the commencement of the performances. In addition to these arrangements to guard against fire, watchmen will be on duty throughout the building, both day and night, and the most important parts of it will be furnished with factory watch clocks, which must be visited at stated intervals, or in case of a neglect of duty, the fact will be recorded by the peculiar working of the clock. The building has been constructed in such a manner, that it seems as if danger from fire would be almost impossible. Great attention has also been paid to strength and durability. The roof is strongly arched, with trusses of the most durable appearance, and the whole building has been erected in the most substantial and workmanlike manner, and is highly creditable to all concerned.

We understand that the price of admission has been fixed at fifty cents to the parquette and first tier or dress circle, and twenty-five cents to the remainder of the house.

It will yet be some time before the interior of the Boston Theatre can assume a cheerful aspect. Masons, carpenters, plasterers, plumbers, gas-fitters, and machinists are all hard at work, endeavoring to leave everything in readiness for opening early next fall. We shall endeavor to keep our readers constantly informed in regard to the progress of the work upon the structure; and meanwhile shall await patiently for the evening that will commence a new era in Boston theatricals.

From my Diary. No. XLI.

NEW YORK, Feb. 21.—Now who is wrong? Here is an article by Rochlitz, published in his Musikalische Zeitung in 1815, upon popular songs, with a Beilage containing five examples. "The first," he says, "is Venetian. This in the highest degree simple song, executed very slowly and legato, was sung by the gondoliers in Venice on the morning of Assumption day; that is in those days when they had not been taught that this sort of thing was good for nothing, and made ashamed of it. The effect of this song, especially when given by a numerous chorus in the open air, to a gentle beating of the time by the oars, was to touch the very bottom of the heart. Indeed it must have been irresistible to every one, save such as opposed its influence upon them by mockery or brutality."

The piece referred to is none other than the well known "Sicilian Mariners' Hymn," as it is called in our old books of forty years since. In the early editions of the Handel and Haydn Collection, it is called "Sicilian Hymn," and now-a-days we find it in books, as "Sicily." Now I do not recollect that the name of its supposed author stands over the tune in any of the old books, certainly not in those of Mr. Mason, which I have by me. But Zenner, in the Ancient Lyre, says, "A Latin hymn by Mozart," and since then most of our singing books place Mozart's name over it.

Is Zenner right or Rochlitz? Who knows?

Feb. 26.—I have been looking over my various catalogues of Beethoven's works, with reference to the question of a friend as to the authenticity of the multitude of Waltzes attributed to him. But, the idea of doubting their authenticity! True, very few of them are to be found even in that magnificent 'Thematic Catalogue' published in 1851, by Breitkopf and Härtel of Leipzig; but it only shows that the compiler of that catalogue—was not posted up! Now everybody—in this country—knows that Beethoven composed that exquisite little thing, the "Spirit Waltz," but it is not in this catalogue; nor those popular works, the Tabitha, the Judy, and the Cabbage Waltzes, so expressive of the yearnings of sentimental spirits. Who could have manufactured them, except Beethoven? If anybody else, would he have dared put that composer's name to them? Of course not. Therefore the authors of the catalogues are mistaken, and must have some American catalogues of music sent them before their next edition. Among the best known and most popular Waltzes which we have under the name of Beethoven, are the following:

No. 1. Le Desir.

No. 2. La Douleur.

No. 3. L'Espoir.

No. 4.

No. 5.

No. 6.

Of these Waltzes, No. 2 and No. 3 were published in the London 'Harmonicon' as Beethoven's, before the death of the composer, and all have been published again and again as being from his hand. No. 1 has also been published as being by Franz Schubert—yet Jullien gave it on his Beethoven nights as being the work of that composer. Now, in the 'Thematic Catalogue' they are given as being in a publication of Schott of Mayence, entitled "Sonvenir à L. v. Beethoven: Sechs Walzer und ein Trauermarsch."—the funeral march being that in the Sonata, op. 26, transposed to A minor. This Souvenir is contained in Part III of the catalogue, which is an "Achaag," [appendix] to the work, and the first division of which contains "Tonstücke angeblich von Beethoven," that is, "Pieces attributed to Beethoven." Now turning to the catalogue in the new edition of Beethoven's Studien, which is evidently made up from the Thematic, I find that these six waltzes are omitted altogether—proving that Pierson, the editor, gave them no credit as being the work of Beethoven.

Another appendix to the Thematic Catalogue, is a systematic list of the master's compositions, and in this these are not given. No wonder that they have passed as being Beethoven's, for they are exquisite. But we must give up that idea, as we have had to give the pleasing associations connected with that lovely thing called "Von Weber's last Waltz," which is now attributed to Reissiger. As to the dance music really composed by Beethoven, it consists of the following works, which however the author did not think worthy of being numbered among his opera.

1. 6 landlerische Tänze. Arranged for piano-forte by Czerny and published in the great collection of Waltzes which he edited. 2. 7 do. Arranged and published do. 3. 12 Deutsche Tänze, which were written for two violins and bass and originally performed in the Hall known as the Klein Redoutensaal at Vienna. Also in Czerny's collection. 4. 6 Contretänze. 5. Minuet in E \flat . 6. 6 Menuetten. 7. 12 Menuetten.

NEW VOLUME. On the Eighth of April our Journal will enter upon its third year, and with new assurances of public favor and success. Of course new subscriptions will be now in order. The majority of our subscribers will please bear in mind that their present subscription expires with three more numbers. We trust they will all notify us, before the month is out, of their intention to renew, and that subscribers at a distance will see the reasonableness of our terms as advertised, viz: two dollars per annum in advance.

We have enclosed bills to a large number of subscribers who have not yet paid for the year now closing, and beg that they will promptly remit by mail or otherwise.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS IN NEW YORK. Your attention is particularly requested to the above.

New York Philharmonic Society.

NEW YORK, March 6, 1854.

DEAR DWIGHT:—On Saturday evening the Philharmonic Society gave its third concert, of this its 12th season, according to the programme hereto appended. Gade's Symphony is unmistakably his. The same feeling which seems to run through all old modern Literature, whether Pict, Scot, or Scandinavian—in the Sagas of the Skalds and in the poems of Gaelic bards, tints and pervades that work as it does all the others of Gade which I have happened to hear. This was only a second hearing and I can hardly venture to speak very decidedly upon it. On the whole, I was rather disappointed in it. The Scherzo is a very original and beautiful movement, and the close, dying away so delicately, is most finely conceived. The Andante, with all its rich coloring, wanted melody to my ear and proved rather heavy. We are destined, I think, to find Gade less of a composer than his first works led us to hope. He seems to have but one vein; each work, like each succeeding poem of Macpherson's "Ossian," is the same thing in sentiment. How differently the great symphonists wrought. Compare any two of Mozart's, or any two of Beethoven's, or even of Mendelssohn, and you have a new train of feeling, a new sentiment expressed. I fear Gade will prove a sort of Ik Marvel in music.

Mr. Schumann's two songs, especially the very injudicious selection from "St. Paul," fell dead on the audience. An Aria from "Paul" must come in its regular connection in the oratorio to be effective, and must moreover be sung with much dramatic force and in tune.

Spohr's Concertino is a very interesting piece of music, and with Burke's excellent playing gave high satisfaction. You will find in the programme a word or two about its design. The overture, by the same composer, to "Faust"—not Goethe's drama, but a poor opera of the same title—has never pleased me. It is much played abroad and considered classic, but to me it has always seemed to be little else than noise and confusion.

The Romance and Rondo from Chopin's Concerto are lovely in the highest degree. Nothing can surpass the Chopin-ism of the Romance, with its æolian delicacy, and the dreamy, delicious feeling which flows all through it. You should have heard Hoffman play it! Why it is that we hear so little of that artist I cannot imagine. Is he not one of the great performers? In answer to the continued applause which followed the Concerto, he treated the audience to some great finger-work—pity we could not have had part of the romance again.

Beethoven's first Symphony, with its Mozartish and Haydnish effects, was very well played, and being easy of comprehension was listened to with marked attention to the end of the third movement, when a large portion of the audience left. Most of the remainder stayed through. As to the audience, upon the whole it was quite attentive—for New York. I say "for New York," because usually the number is very limited, who can go home from one of these concerts and say with truth: "This evening I have listened to the music; this evening has not been spent in indifferent (yes, very indifferent) conversation with my neighbors; this evening I have not been guilty of utterly destroying the pleasure of some poor fellow to whom a Philharmonic concert is a costly and ill afforded gratification; this evening I for once have not made the judicious weep by exposing my ignorance of music, my want of musical taste, and my utter destitution of good manners." From brainless fops and dandies we expect nothing and hope nothing. But there is a set of young women, who attend all the rehearsals and concerts, whose conduct is utterly beyond excuse. In selecting a seat avoid them as you would a pestilence. They, and a set of free ticket ninny-hammers, are always there—to meet each other probably—for what pretensions they have to be considered lovers of music, when never by any accident do they listen to any, is past finding out. I missed some of these too well known faces Saturday evening, and have some hopes that my prayers are answered, and they were kept at home by sickness or were lost in the profound depths of the streets. If the audience is gradually becoming musical, Heaven be praised!

The Philharmonic appears to be unusually flourishing. Well, it has certainly been a patient waiter for success! Whether it might not have achieved it sooner by adopting a scale of prices of admission which would have called out many who do not now feel able to attend, especially as the music performed is of a character which requires considerable cultivation of taste for its enjoyment, is a matter for those concerned to decide. People who know nothing of orchestral music can hardly be expected to pay a high price to hear it. However, the number of auditors is very fair this winter. Those who really have a taste for great music, attend these concerts, or go without.

You will have noticed the premonitory symptoms of a musical revolution—a declaration of independence is expected soon—America is on the point of throwing off allegiance to Germany. In vocal music the victory is already achieved. Three negro minstrel bands draw nightly crowds of devotees to their temples, while a German four-part Lied, or an old English Glee, is unknown. And now the strong fortress of Symphony is to be attacked. Exactly how the war is to be carried on, since of the sixty-three names on the Philharmonic list, all but some seven or eight read with a German sound, I do not see. If the Society originated in the desire of the German resident musicians to keep up their knowledge of and taste for the music of their native land, and in the wish of Americans to know the music of which they had heard and read so much—and this I take to have been its origin, and this principle to have been followed thus far in its management—a discontented one or two will probably find up-hill work in arraying their forces and attacking the citadel. The fifty odd Germans will be very likely to stick to Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn and so on, and that with right. So far from the Society's not giving novelties enough, it ought to make it a standing rule, as many such societies abroad do, that of the two symphonies at each concert, one shall be either Mozart, Haydn or Beethoven. Again, as the present audience of the Philharmonic—in so far as it cares for music at all—has been indebted for its musical culture to that society, and its taste formed upon its models, it is difficult to see how their strength is to be turned into the ranks of the attacking party. As the matter now stands, the whole force of the brass and wood instruments, together with those of percussion, and a great majority of the strings are arrayed on one side, while as yet the other party has but a fiddle or two—a slender chance for the latter, truly! Imagine the conflict; the Teutonic army drawn up in martial array, furnished with ammunition by Captain Mozart, and on the other side one or two violins, perhaps reinforced by some of our American instruments. Nun geht's los! With an awful shock the quadruple fugue in Mozart's C major Symphony meets in mid air a strain from—from—but we will not specify.

No, no, this will never do. We must wait until an orchestra is formed of American, native, free and enlightened citizens, who shall play nothing that comes across the water. And lest our French and Italian friends should be aggrieved, they shall also have their societies for the performance of French and Italian symphonies; and that all may have fair play, the lovers of music will combine to assist those eminent performers—now, alas, selling tobacco and cigars, or distributing advertisements in the streets—who came hither not long since from China, in starting again in the national music business. I shall go strong for the latter—blessed be their long queues!—and besides, they if anybody are the victims of the Philharmonic; not a piece of theirs has that exclusive society seen fit to rehearse—much less produce in public! Chan Yong, who has the cigar stand at the Park gate, vows he will compose a piece in two evenings, which he will challenge the Philharmonic to produce, “sandwiched” as they please. So they say,—rather doubtful though.—Chan Yong is a good fellow, and those who deal with him like him, and hardly will believe that he will do it.

Seriously, the society in question I understand to be formed upon the basis of the great orchestral societies abroad, and like them its performances are to be of music by composers of high and acknowledged standing. We need, and it is devoutly to be hoped that some time we may have, a society where popular music and the compositions of new men, may receive a calm and unbiassed hearing. In a city like this it argues a low state of musical taste, if an orchestra of some thirty or forty members could not exist by a series of weekly afternoon concerts. PEGAN.

PROGRAMME, (referred to above.)

PART I.

Symphony No. 4, in B flat, op. 20, (first time), Niels W. Gade.
1. Andantino, Allegro vivace e grazioso.—2. Andante con moto.
—3. Scherzo, Allegro ma non troppo.—4. Finale, Allegro molto vivace.

Song of the Czar, from the Opera, ‘Peter the Great,’ Lortzing.
Mr. JULIUS SCHUMANN.

Concertino No. 3, in A, op. 110, (first time), ‘Past and Present,’ for Violin, L. Spohr.
Mr. JOSEPH BURKE.

The author would seem to have endeavored in this composition to show, to a limited extent, the peculiar characteristics of a certain style of music which was much in vogue in Germany some fifty years ago, as distinguished from that kind of music which superseded this style at a later period. He has sought to render the former by adopting as his theme the movement of an old-fashioned slow “Minuetto,” while he represents the latter by a fresh and lively melody in 2-4 time. Both the themes are introduced several times alternately, and interwoven in that ingenious manner for which the composer, as a master spirit of the art of modulation, is so justly celebrated.

PART II.

Overture to ‘Faust,’ in C, (first time), Louis Spohr.
Romance and Rondo Vivace, from the Concerto in E, op. 11, for Piano, (first time), F. Chopin.
Mr. RICHARD HOFFMAN.

Aria from Oratorio of ‘St. Paul,’ F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.
Mr. JULIUS SCHUMANN.

Symphony No. 1, in C, op. 21, (first time), L. van Beethoven.
1. Adagio molto, Allegro con brio.—2. Andante con moto.—
3. Scherzo, Allegro molto vivace.—4. Finale, Allegro molto e vivace.

1. Mr. F. F. MUELLER writes us an epistle (which might amuse the curious reader, were we authorized to print it), touching certain strictures in our last upon the piano accompaniment to Schubert's song: “Thou art the rest,” as sung at the Mendelssohn Quintette Concert by Mrs. Wentworth, and regretting that we did not name himself as the accompanist. Naturally he does this out of pure concern for the good name of Mr. Hause, the only pianist mentioned in the programme, but who did not play the accompaniment in question. We owe Mr. Hause an apology for even seeming to refer to him, and we hereby cheerfully make it. And as to Mr. Müller, we shall most cheerfully stand corrected if we have done him wrong. But in what we said of that performance we had no thought of him or any person; we but compared (too hurriedly and briefly perhaps) the rendering of a favorite song with our own notion of it; thinking it more profitable to judge facts and things, than persons. His rendering of the accompaniment was at variance with what we believed the true conception of it; we did not blame him for it, nor intimate that it was at all impossible for one generally a good musician to mistake the character of a given work in a given instance. We felt it would be unfair to name him, because he was not named in the programme, and very probably (as it occurred to us) was kindly volunteering his aid to others at perhaps a moment's notice; and because we never wish to bring any person into questionable prominence, if we can righteously avoid it. Can we not dissent from a professor's reading of a piece of music, without wrong to him!

2. Mr. GEORGE F. BRISTOW, an American composer of symphonies, overtures, &c., and a director of the New York Philharmonic Society, addresses a letter to Willis's Musical World anent the Fry controversy, bitterly endorsing his (Fry's) statement of grievances experienced by American musical Art,—particularly at the hands of said Philharmonic Society, which Mr. Bristow proposes hereafter to convict of a “systematized effort for the extinction of American music.” At the end of his letter, Mr. Bristow “respectfully requests Mr. Dwight to copy this and let America have one word to say in his paper where Germany has had ten thousand.”

We must set some limit to the entertainment of this, as of all other controversies and of all other topics, in these columns, and therefore respectfully decline to copy the letter entire, feeling justified in the fact that, spirited as it is, it adds little besides rhetoric and feeling to the statements of Mr. Fry. Yet, to show the gist and style of it, we extract some of the pithiest sentences, including one for our own benefit.

As it is possible to miss a needle in a hay-stack, I am not surprised that Mr. Fry has missed the fact, that during the eleven years the Philharmonic Society has been in operation in this city, it played once, either by mistake or accident, one single American composition, an overture of mine. As one exception makes a rule stronger, so this single stray fact shows that the Philharmonic Society has been as anti-American as if it had been located in London during the revolutionary war, and composed of native born English Tories. Your anonymous correspondent who is not worthy of notice except that you endorse him, says that a symphony of mine, also, was rehearsed, and not played in public. So Uncle Toby says—“Our army swore terribly at Flanders”—but that army did not fight. It appears the Society's eleven years of promoting American Art, have embraced one whole performance of one whole American overture, one whole rehearsal of one whole American symphony, and the performance of an overture by an Englishman stopping here—Mr. Loder—(whom your beautiful correspondent would infer is an American) who, happening to be conductor of the Philharmonic here, had the influence to have it played. Now, in the name of the nine Muses, what is the Philharmonic Society—or Harmony-lovers' Society—in this country? Is it to play exclusively the works of German masters, especially if they be dead, in order that our critics may translate their ready-made praises from German? Or, is it to stimulate original Art on the spot? Is there a Philharmonic Society in Germany for the encouragement solely of American music?

It is very bad taste, to say the least, for men to bite the hands that feed them. If all their artistic affections are unalterably German, let them pack back to Germany and enjoy the police and bayonets and aristocratic kicks and cuffs of that land, where an artist is a serf to a nobleman, as the history of all their great composers shows. America has made the political revolution which illumines the world, while Germany is still beshadowed with a pall of feudal darkness. While America has been thus far able to do the chief things for the dignity of man, forsooth she must be denied the brains for original Art, and must stand like a beggar, deferentially cap in hand, when she comes to compete with the ability of any dirty German village. Mr. Fry has taken the right ground. Against fearful odds, he has, as a classical composer, through you and your journal challenged all Germany to meet him before the audiences of the Philharmonic and Mr. Jullien; and the challenge has not been accepted.

Mr. Dwight, too, the editor of Dwight's Journal of Music, published in Boston, has found my “forms” in symphonic writing “odd.”—I beg to tell him they are not quite so odd as his critical forms when he gave an opinion on my music, as he now acknowledges “hastily,” and without having heard a note of it.

Excuse us, Mr. Bristow; we gave no opinion of your music. After reading our disclaimer of any intention of charging you with “odd designs,” why will you still find fault with us, instead of Mr. Fry, for coupling you together. Complaint was made that American composers (specifying the names of Fry and Bristow) had not received fair recognition. We simply said that Mr. Fry, and Mr. Bristow, and Mr. any body else, even the oddest claimant of originality, “are sure to be accepted just so soon as the world shall see that they have done what they themselves suppose they have.” A safe enough general assertion, one would think!

3. We have received a long and interesting communication from Mr. FRY, chiefly in answer to the historical statements of our “Diarist,” and also touching the true grounds and method of comparison between his symphonies and those of Beethoven, for which we hope to find room next week.

Otto Dresel's Fourth and Last Soiree.

We must not omit to chronicle the richest of these truly and thoroughly artistic occasions, which took place on Thursday evening, 2nd instant, too late for notice in our last. The audience was as large as usual, in spite of diversions especially affecting many of Mr. Dresel's subscribers; and the beautiful saloon received new interest from the presence of a noble and speaking bust (by our townsman, Thomas Ball) of one still felt as the presiding genius of the place, though bodily removed from us; in its placid and benignant smile we read, as of old, his sympathetic, genuine enjoyment of such music. Mr. Dresel gave us a heaped and overflowing measure of good things.

1. His own Trio, for piano, violin and violoncello, so much liked last year, was even more successful, because more appreciated, this time. It is a work that wears well; full of imagination, full of delicate touches, full of fire. Both in the ideas, which are individual and interesting, and in the working up, which is skilful, complex and yet clear, preserving the most satisfying unity amid great wealth of contrast to the end, it rewards attention and excites the desire for a more intimate acquaintance, scarcely less than the immortal compositions in this form (not very numerous, it is true) by the grander masters.—Strange to say, however, it suffered somewhat in the energetic and impassioned first movement from the nervousness of the composer pianist himself, who struck the chords out,—or rather in,—with that excess of force that chokes the tone it would set freely and boldly vibrating. But soon the instrument grew more genially responsive to a more confiding touch, and not again throughout the evening was the enjoyment marred by that or any cause. It is peculiarly the finest nature who are thus sometimes weaker than themselves, weakest in that which they possess most perfectly. Messrs. SCHULTZE and BERGMANN did unexceptionably their parts, true artists as they are; and the composition has passages that rather fondly favor the genius of the violoncello, as one finds also in the works of Mendelssohn.

2. Piano Solos by Mr. Dresel First, a brilliant and unique Etude, by Ferdinand Hiller, one of the most genial and in many forms productive composers of the day, too little known among us. Then an Etude, called Kindermärchen (children's story), by Moscheles, which we confess we have forgotten. And finally a march,—enthusiastic, earnest, sad, Hungarian enough,—from the Divertissement Hongrois of Schubert, a piece originally for four hands. All three together formed a pleasant, dainty divertissement, fit to lead from such a Trio to

3. The master Trio of all Trios, the magnificent one by Beethoven, in B flat. This was admirably played by the three artists, and we know of no work that is more sure to inspire its interpreters, if at all equal to the task in soul and fingers. It took the deepest, firmest hold upon the audience, from the first measures of the bold and buoyant Allegro, which, beginning as it were with a careless, glorious sense of power, grows ever more and more elated and in earnest in its play. The Scherzo, led off by the violoncello, whirls your thoughts away with the momentary of one of those wayward, unique, exquisite, freakish fancies, such as inspire only a Beethoven;—in the episodic part, or trio, opening darker depths which make you shudder, as you irresistibly bend forward over the very verge to look in. The Adagio, with its large, swelling, harmonies, comes as near to the sublime as any music can do on no larger scale; the soul is filled, expanded, strengthened, solemnized, when it becomes the receiver of such music. Such a trio, and so rendered, would ensure the success of any Chamber Concert, were it to occur every week, we might say almost every evening, in the concert season.

4. Another bouquet of most delicately aromatic flowers of piano-forte music. A song without words, by Mendelssohn, played as only Mr. Dresel plays them, who makes the composer's thought so sing itself to us that we forget all mechanism. Then a Notturmo (in B), and an Etude (in E flat) by Chopin; and then, best of all, the heavenly Adagio from Chopin's second Concerto, which, as then rendered, seemed to us a miracle of tender, delicate and soul-fraught expression.

5. A string Quartet, by Messrs. SCHULTZE, SENTZ, MEISEL and BERGMANN, who gave us a neat rendering of a characteristic Andante with variations from a posthumous Quartet by Schubert.

6. Finally the great Quintet (piano, violin, &c.) of Robert Schumann, which has continually improved upon acquaintance, ever since it was first produced with the Mendelssohn Club by our friend SCHARFENBERG.

No concerts in our city have given such unalloyed satisfaction to those who have been fortunate enough to hear them, as these of Mr. Dresel. His success has exceeded that of last year; and there can be no doubt of a permanent and growing audience for his music every winter, if he should remain with us. For the present we may say, it is the unanimous and earnest wish, amounting to an expectation, that he will give an extra concert as soon as arrangements can be made.

CROWDED OUT. We have unwittingly left ourselves no room for a multitude of matters which entered into the plan of this day's paper; and must even postpone till next week any notice of the last Germania Concert,—decidedly the best orchestral concert of the season. Their to-night's "light" programme includes not a few good things. The "Männerchor," as well as Miss LEHMANN, will add great attraction.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The lovers of classical chamber music surely do not need to be reminded of the extra concert, to be given at the Messrs. Chickering's rooms next Tuesday evening. See advertisement for a splendid programme.

The best Primary Book on Thorough Bass ever issued.

FIRST STEPS IN THOROUGH BASS,

IN TWELVE FAMILIAR LESSONS, ARRANGED IN THE DIALOGUE FORM. BY A TEACHER OF MUSIC.

The mode of instruction carried out in this work has by positive experience proved efficacious in imparting to a pupil of ten years of age, as also to any one who may be ignorant of the subject, correct ideas of the abstruse science of Thorough Bass. "The progress made by those who have learned Thorough Bass in this manner," says the author, "has been so rapid (I had almost said astonishing,) that I have been urged to communicate my method of teaching it to the public, by many good judges who have witnessed its effects with surprise; and though I acknowledge this to be an assertion introduced into prefaces as the names of the publishers are inserted in title pages, it happens, in this instance, to be literally true."

The Best Flute Instruction Book.

BERBIGUIER'S METHOD FOR THE FLUTE:

TO WHICH ARE ADDED

DROUET'S TWENTY-FOUR STUDIES,
IN ALL THE KEYS.

In regard to this work, the English translator makes the following remarks:—

"M. Berbiguier appears to have bestowed on its completion the whole of his extraordinary talents, and has produced a method which is certainly unrivalled. The commencing lessons are written in a style at once pleasing and simple, and the pupil's progress is facilitated while he is almost unconscious of performing a task."

This is the first American edition of this valuable work. It is the most popular Method of instruction for the Flute in Europe, where it has passed through many editions; from the latest and most correctly revised of which this is a reprint.

This copy not only contains all the matter in Berbiguier, but, in addition, the popular studies of DROUET, which may be considered as finishing exercises. These, published in connection with the instructions, exercises, and examples of Berbiguier, supply the want of the American public for a complete method of instruction for the Flute, at once concise, comprehensive, and adapted in every particular to general use.

Handel's "Acis and Galatea."

The following account of this work, and of a concert of the Harmonic Union, (Feb. 13), at which it was performed, is from a London paper:

Of all the secular works of Handel the most beautiful is Acis and Galatea. The story was twice used by him as a vehicle for music—at Naples, where, in 1710, by desire of a certain Spanish Princess, he composed a pastoral under the title of Acis, Galatea e Polifemo (or, according to the copy existing in the Queen's Library, Galatea, Acigi e Polifemo), and in London, where, nine years later, he wrote the masque of Acis and Galatea, to words attributed to Gay and others, for his friend and patron, the Duke of Chandos, at whose place of Cannons it was first performed in 1724. There is no resemblance between the Italian version and the English; and, while the former is forgotten, the latter is almost as familiar to musicians, and in its particular way as highly esteemed, as the Messiah itself. Acis and Galatea is the most exquisite of musical pastorals. The subject was eminently favorable; and, though the off-hand manner in which the shepherdess, Galatea, allows herself to be consoled for the death of her devoted Acis—whom the giant, Polyphemus, in a fit of jealousy, kills with a rock—somewhat weakens our sympathy for the fate of the ill-starred lovers, the music of Handel would cause even greater discrepancies to be overlooked. The love songs of Acis, "Where shall I seek my charming Fair?" and "Love in her Eyes sits playing," are unsurpassed by Mozart himself, and unequalled by any one else. The uncontrollable passion of Polyphemus is described with a not less masterly hand, and "O ruddier than the Cherry" has yet to find a rival as a "monster" love song. Galatea is painted more delicately. Her love, like that of the heroines of the Spanish and Italian pastorals, is half real and half coquetry; and this mixed feeling is most charmingly developed in the air, "As when the Dove laments her Love." The choruses "Oh! the Pleasures of the Plains," and "Happy, happy, happy we," are redolent of pastoral life; while "Wretched Lovers" (where the shepherds bewail the approaching fate of Acis and Galatea), in which occurs the celebrated passage, descriptive of the giant Polyphemus, who is about to wreak his vengeance on one of them—

"See what ample strides he takes,
The mountain nods, the forest shakes"— is among the most strikingly dramatic and powerful of all the choruses of Handel.

Acis and Galatea has been frequently performed in London and in other parts of England. At Drury-lane Theatre, under the management of Mr. Macready, it was produced, with great success, as a dramatic piece, the effect of which was materially aided by the beautiful scenery of Mr. Stanfield. On that occasion, additional orchestral accompaniments (and, in some cases, additional music) were provided by the late Mr. T. Cooke. Handel wrote the music for a very small orchestra—how small may be guessed from the facts that the overture is scored for first and second violins, two oboes and basses—and that, except in the chorus, "Wretched Lovers," there is no viola part in the orchestra, and no alto part in the voices. Although it was known that Mozart had written additional accompaniments to Acis and Galatea, as well as to Alexander's Feast and the Messiah, no advantage had ever previously been taken of them in this country. Had Mr. Macready been aware of it, he would doubtless have spared Mr. T. Cooke his pains. Mozart's additional accompaniments were used on Monday night for the first time, at the suggestion of Mr. Benedict, who managed to obtain one of the very few copies in existence; and it was this which gave a more than ordinary interest to the performance. What Mozart has done may be stated in a very few words. He has added a viola part, and, by judicious employment of the wood and brass instruments, has supplied what Handel (as he did with his oratorios) used to supply himself, on the organ or harpsichord. That no effect produced by an organ or harpsichord, in however skilful hands, could equal what Mozart has obtained by filling up the score, may well be imagined; and it is reasonable to hope that Handel's Acis and Galatea, like his Messiah and Alexander's Feast, will be henceforth inseparable from Mozart's additional accompaniments. As in the Messiah, it must be admitted that in some instances Mozart—doubtless carried away by a love for the task in which he was engaged—has gone beyond bounds, and (especially in his use of clarinets and bassoons) made Handel appear more like Mozart than like himself—an oversight which nothing but the exceeding beauty of what has been added could have excused.

The performance on Monday night was on the whole highly creditable to the Harmonic Union, and to Mr. Benedict, its able and accomplished conductor. The choruses, as far as "Wretched Lovers," were extremely well executed: and it was only in the somewhat difficult one, in F minor, "Mourn, all ye Muses," that the intonation of the singers began to be uncertain, and their precision equivocal. The two last—"Cease, Galatea," and "Galatea, dry thy Tears"—were open to the same objections. As far as the tempi were concerned, we thought the first two last choruses of the first part—"Oh! the Pleasures of the Plains," and "Happy, happy, happy we"—were too slow. The vocal solo parts were filled with great efficiency. Miss Stabbach and Miss Thirlwall shared the part of Galatea between them, and both young ladies accomplished their duties in a praiseworthy manner. Miss Stabbach was especially successful in the lovely air, "As when the Dove." It was, nevertheless, a mistake to divide the music of the principal soprano character, which should always be allotted to one singer. The part of Damon, though written for a tenor, was, in Handel's time, sung as treble, by a boy. It was entrusted on Monday night to Mr. Suchet Champion, who had evidently made himself well acquainted with the music. The two principal male parts, Acis and Polyphemus, were supported by Signor Belletti and Mr. Sims Reeves. Signor Belletti's success was unequivocal. He sang the recitatives exceedingly well, and the second song of the giant—"Cease to Beauty to be suing," one of the most magnificent of Handel's airs—allowing for his foreign accent, to perfection. But it was not to these that he owed his triumph. The famous song of Polyphemus, "O ruddier than the Cherry," was the signal for one of those uproarious demonstrations which are a sure sign that the feelings of a whole crowd have been aroused. We never heard a more unanimous encore. And yet—while, as far as mere vocalisation was concerned, Signor Bel-letti was beyond reproach, and while, at the same time, he infused a remarkable degree of spirit into the air—in regard to musical declamation and the absolute intentions of Handel, this was the least meritorious of Signor Belletti's efforts. Constrained, no doubt, by the difficulty of the language, he sang the whole staccato, which in a great degree robbed the music of its character and the words of their signification. This clever and deservedly popular singer must not be induced, by the applause of the multitude, to relax in his endeavors at acquiring a thorough command of the new style of music in which he has already made such marked progress. Much as he has done, he has a great deal more to achieve. The most unexceptionable, and the most thoroughly "Handelian" singing of the evening was that of Mr. Sims Reeves, who gave the varied and beautiful music of Acis as, probably, it has never been given till now, in England or elsewhere. The two languishing apostrophes of the love-sick shepherd, "Where shall I seek?" and "Love in her Eyes," were delivered with a truthful and passionate expression, which realized all that could have been imagined by the composer. These, however, not belonging to the "ad captandum" style, were less warmly appreciated than the more stirring and boisterous "Love sounds the Alarm," where Acis, in despair, sets his rival, Polyphemus, at defiance. This well known air, declaimed by Mr. Sims Reeves with a power and energy that could hardly be surpassed, brought down an encore of the same tumultuous character as that accorded to Signor Belletti, in "O ruddier than the Cherry." The performance of Acis and Galatea was altogether most gratifying; and Mr. Benedict, the conductor, was not less entitled to praise for his exertions than any who were concerned in its success. With Mozart's additional accompaniments, it will now inevitably become a stock piece.

After Handel's "Masque," Mr. W. Rea, organist to the Harmonic Union, played Mr. Sterndale Bennett's beautiful Caprice in E major, for piano-forte and orchestra, with great and well-merited applause. Mr. Rea is a pianist of more than ordinary talent, and his performance of this very elaborate and difficult composition was equally remarkable for good taste and fluent execution. The second part begun with a new MS. symphony in G minor, by Mr. C. E. Stephens, which, though not distinguished by a profusion of original ideas, is the work of a thoughtful and well-intending musician, who aims at emulating the best models. The symphony was given with unfailing spirit and precision by the orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Benedict. The best movement is the finale, a kind of tarantella. In the minuet there are two trios—just one too many. The concert terminated, at an unusually late hour, with the overture and music to the Ruins of Athens, by Beethoven, in which Miss Stabbach and Signor Belletti sang the principal vocal parts. The Hall was very full, and, in consequence of its great success, Acis and Galatea is to be repeated forthwith, in conjunction with Mendelssohn's Walpur-gis Night.

Letter from W. H. Fry.

NEW YORK TRIBUNE OFFICE, March 6, 1854.

DEAR SIR: Towards the conclusion of my second communication to R. S. Willis Esq., republished in your journal of the 25th ultimo, there are a few words of a merely allusive character as to the career of certain composers, which do not form properly of themselves sufficient matter for comment. But as you give in two editorials, one of which is copied into the Musical World, your sanction to a correspondent's strictures on these trifles, and make it the occasion to reflect on my general accuracy, I feel impelled, against my will, to notice the matter, and show that I was right.

Without going in detail into the lives of those composers which have been so often given, the following positions and facts may be set forth:—When a composer is duly appreciated in his own country he does not expatriate himself or reside permanently abroad: by this I mean, when he receives "pudding as well as praise." Handel chanced to be patronized by the King of Hanover, owing to the accident of his Majesty's musical tastes: notwithstanding this, whenever he could get off on leave, he went to England, making protracted visits. The king going there as sovereign, enabled him to expatriate himself to advantage, as he considered "the king's name a tower of strength." Whether many millions of Germans could afford to lose such a composer, is a question I need not treat, nor will I mention the furious cabal against him in England, or the empty benches at his oratorios.

Haydn was a good easy sort of man, satisfied to be a domestic of Prince Esterhazy. "He was," says his biographer, M. Fétis, "treated as a servant, and behaved himself with due humility." Whether as a servant he ate with the scullions we are not informed, though the fact that the excellent archbishop who hired Mozart for his amusement, insisted on that artistico-culinary arrangement from the author of Don Giovanni, would lead us to an affirmative opinion. We know what a filthy commodity genius is in the Fatherland, alongside of thirty-two quarterings duly recorded in the cathedral chapter and blessed by the Holy Trinity. Before going to London, says his biographer,—"Haydn, after thirty years of labor," or "fifty-four thousand hours of work" (for he was "singularly methodical in appropriating five hours every day to composition, beginning at six o'clock in the morning") he had laid by the sum of "five thousand francs," $1000. He was then fifty-nine, and a beggar—as this would produce, at German rates of interest, 62½ cents a week. The man who hired him having died, we find him obliged to seek a livelihood in a foreign land, where he was appreciated and rewarded. His biographer says, speaking of his return to Vienna at the age of 62, when doubtless the well filled purse which he had obtained in England had its mellowing influences: "The éclat of Haydn's success in England, much more perhaps than the beauty of the twelve great symphonies, augmented vastly his renown in Germany. Many times he himself declared that it was only since then that his person and his works excited interest in Vienna, and the envy of the musicians of that capital seemed to cease." Of course these musicians belonged to "the appreciative few" who require foreign endorsement for "native talent."

Mozart, in the plenitude of his genius, expatriated himself to Paris; but Gluck there had the field; and it is a rule with a certain class of minds that young men cannot do things as well as old ones, and that genius in a composer does not lie in the mute eloquence of the manuscript score, but in being bruited through opera companies or orchestral societies. Mozart, accordingly, finding "brutes," as he expresses himself of the company he found himself in, turned his hand to any thing that offered, and, like men of genius, being versatile, tuned pianos. Of this fact there can be no doubt. I had it from a venerable ex-professor of the Conservatoire, who knows all about it. If it does not appear in print, it is simply another proof that the worst straits of men of genius are not known, until they are sometimes discovered by the body of an Otway, dead from starvation; or that of the best song-writer in Europe, Schubert,—as some say, though I do not vouch for the fact, that he died of starvation. Mozart, however, returned to Germany, and his arrest for a debt of some five dollars shows the great appreciation in which he was held. "The appreciative few"—a cabal against his genius—induced the Austrian government to take away from his widow and children the beggarly (beggarly even for Germany) pension it first accorded to them, on the death of that great man,—but this is of "no consequence."

In regard to Beethoven I was likewise beyond correction. That composer worked hard for thirty years; and at his death, after the cup of his glory had overflowed, his name resounding through Christendom, he left in all a beggarly sum of "two or three thousand dollars," having lived, as any one acquainted with his career knows, a penurious life, fitted to his poverty and his servile position as composer in Vienna. "Two or three thousand dollars"—which a first tenor in France or England sometimes spends in two or three months. The Philharmonic Society of London, upon the first trial, threw aside at rehearsal one of his best symphonies as the work of a man who had "lost his wits;" and this composition lay despised as waste paper on their shelves for years. As it was the C minor, which not even the deluge of critical speculation—owing to its transparency—has been able to obscure, we may infer that the judgments of Philharmonic Societies are capable of occasional revision. Had they played this symphony,—which is so plain any promising boy should understand it—instead of rejecting it, perhaps Beethoven, likewise, could have expatriated himself to England. Saul, however, became one of the prophets, and before Beethoven died, the London Philharmonic began to understand that a true composer is necessarily individualized, although the "appreciative few" of their body at first denied the fact. Beethoven—his status having been judicially decided in the Vienna courts of justice to be that of plebeian—Anglicé, snob and flunkey rolled into one—and living in one of those apartments that you vouch for overlooking sights in the same way an immigrant hole overlooks the Battery and the finest Bay in the world,—sent to the London Philharmonic Society a symphony, beseeching them to give him a little return of some few hundred dollars. Pitying "the sorrows of a poor old man" they did so. When this fact came out at his death, the Viennese were ashamed of it, and the trumpety sum he left behind him was paraded as an evidence of his not being in want. Beethoven knew better: he saw age approaching, and wished for a little independence when he could no longer have inspirations to gain him daily bread; and that was the means he sought to secure something. If after he had toiled thirty years and was at the head of his craft, he had sought retirement, the interest of his capital in three per cent consols would have been about $1.50 a week. I give these particulars merely to show you how accurate I am in what I say of all even the most trivial matters. We think even in America that a man who has worked for thirty years ably and successfully, is entitled to some such little comforts as a house of his own, a carriage and so forth. But, perhaps, the particular splendor of Beethoven's apartments and the manner in which his genius was substantially cherished by his countrymen may be better described in the words of Madame Sontag, who paid him a visit when his fame was at its acme. I give the words of that lady as she gave them to me, in a general conversation I had with her: "Beethoven lived miserably. In a sort of cupboard was a sort of pie, which was the style of his dinner. He rang a bell: I observed that the bell-rope was a clothes line, which quite matched the other details of the room. * * * Such is the fate of genius." Now pardon me for saying it, as you never visited Beethoven and Madame Sontag did, I must take her testimony. If New England were to treat her most eminent son as did Vienna Beethoven, we should say the depths of rhetoric could not sound her baseness.

My statements about the "Italians" were equally correct. So far as the "appreciative few" controlling the press in France, but especially in England, could crush every composer—without exception—they did it. I refer you to the "Musical Dictionary" of Mr. Hogarth, the noted critic also of the London Morning Chronicle, for the spirit of the press in the concrete, of the slashing order. If any Italian composer, Meyerbeer included, who has come before the public for fifteen years or more, has not been extinguished, it was not for the want of the efforts of the London Times, Chronicle, Post, Herald, Examiner, Atlas, Athenæum, &c. &c. &c., to kill him at the outset. I was, being an editor, a subscriber to and reader of all these journals, and I speak by the card. I wonder there is any music at all when I reflect that a composer's works are in MSS. as dead as Psammettichus unless performed; and that is not done unless he is able to propitiate variously from one to five hundred persons; conductors, managers, singers, players, &c., generally giving an opinion, though not one of them can read his score any more than if it were the sarcophagus of the above named monarch. I do not hesitate to say that High Art in musical composition, above all in this country, stands alone for the difficulties which beset it. And when I reflect that composition in this country is pursued in a desert of trade and politics, without any 'Change or Capitol Hill for profit or display, or the first critical line written on the works Americans have produced, I might be surprised at some recent things which have occurred, if I were not callous to that emotion.

It would transcend the object of this letter were I to answer your fresh remarks. I may state generally that as no critic in this country knows any particulars of what has really been done in American Musical Art, or has bestowed a moment's attention on the positive or relative difficulties of bringing it before the public, through opera-houses or societies, and keeping it before the public for a sufficient time necessary to make himself understood, it is useless for me to combat what to me are mere words. But I cannot refrain from stating (apropos of what you have said) as follows:—that I have, as a composer, never asked any approval from any one, not even critics; that the public never demand any new pieces,—they wait always until such pieces are presented; that likewise they do not demand Spohr's, Spontini's, Meyerbeer's, Winter's, Weber's, or any works of Europeans more than mine; and it is no argument against some of these composers that their operas are not yet played at all in this country, or against others that they have been tried two or three times and then set aside: that comparisons drawn between me and another have no meaning until performances are as freely and frequently given to one as the other: that I have not sought the public press in this discussion, and only corrected errors, and given the explanations due to American Art; that it is not likely I shall trouble the press again, having for the last eight years thrown up composition, not writing any operas, and only three symphonies; but nevertheless I thought the time had come to say something for American Art, seeing how much attention is given to foreign Art, while our own is ignored: that the applause of Philadelphia is quite as good as that of Vienna—each for its "native Art," and of the two I prefer that of Philadelphia: that my innovations, if not "alarming" in comparison with Wagner's, can only be judged when they are studied, and not before, and then they will be found to have worked a revolution in the lyrical and musico-dramatic capabilities of the English Grand Operatic Stage, having achieved what for one hundred years English critics pronounced impossible. I would add, too, that European composers in their capacity as "plebeians"—with the spirit of "humility" which society required of them, may lie quiet under any nonsense and falsehood that may be written about them. It may have suited them socially, and also their want of literary education may have prevented their holding a pen in competition with their assailants. This however is no rule for me. But I would add, that I would have remained quiet as I have done for fifteen years under attacks of foreigners whom I will not characterize, led on by a nameless journal; but that not wishing to see assertions in American Art journals that I had done this, that, and the other, when nothing of the kind took place, and the whole tendency of such writing was to keep us a Hessian colony, I for once, for the sake of American Art, broke through my rule of silence. I now relapse into it again.

Mr. Bristow, one of the directors of the New York Philharmonic Society, (see letter in the last number of the Musical Times), simply confirms what I stated on that point, and ought to show every American what are the chances of High Art in this country, and that no one can pursue it—even as an amateur. The composer, I would remark, with the strongest emphasis, stands alone among the followers of Literature or Art for the difficulties which attend him—first in reaching the public ear at all, and next in keeping possession of it for the time absolutely necessary for it to learn his works "by heart," and determine their value. In these days of cheap printing, every literary man can find a publisher, because a publisher can read literary MSS. But neither managers, nor singers, nor any of "the appreciative few," can read a Full Score. So, too, any man can buy colors, brushes, and canvas, or modelling clay and produce a painting or statue, and when the work so finished is exhibited it speaks for itself. Not so with the Opera or Symphony. When composed, until repeatedly played, it has for mankind about as much absolute existence as a statue or painting would have, if the moment it came from the artist's hand and unseen by other eyes than his, it were buried in the ground and left there to rot. As there are not twelve persons in the twenty-four millions in the United States who can read a full score, publication is out of the question.

In your journal was published on the 11th of February the following in an article on Beethoven: "He re-wrote two or three times his opera of Fidelio; for which, as we well know, he composed four overtures. A recital of what he had to endure to bring forth this opera, from the ill will and opposition of all the performers, from the first tenor to the contra basso, would be of sad interest." These oppositions are multiplied a thousand fold in this country, where alien influence controls opera-houses and concert rooms; the sole exceptions to which I have already indicated. An army of fools and imbeciles was found to oppose Beethoven's grand work; and the same fools and imbeciles will ever be found—fortified to the last degree when they find colonial deference on the part of American writers, as in this country. In an hereditary opera-house, in a country with musical traditions, in a capital boasting its Art, not one singer or player could be found who was not besotted, when it came to decide on Fidelio. This I think should be a lesson.

I venture on one more quotation, from your journal of the 4th of February: "Frequent performances constitute an essential condition for correcting errors of opinion concerning works conceived like those of Beethoven without the pale of the musical habits of those who listen to them." As I have not had those "essential conditions" awarded to me, your parallels touching my works and Beethoven's are of no weight, and should not have been made according to a common understanding of what is due to logic and all Art, to say nothing of the claims of living national Art.

I remain yours, faithfully,

WM. HENRY FRY.

To J. S. DWIGHT, Esq.

Mlle. CLAUSS.—This young and talented pianist is at present at Berlin. She lately gave concerts at Elberfeld and Bonn, both of which were very successful; and, on her way from one place to the other, she again performed at Düsseldorf and Cologne. At Leipzig she appeared at two of the Gewandhaus Subscription Concerts, and at a soirée musicale. The first concert occurring on the evening before Mendelssohn's birthday (Feb. 3d), she played a concerto by that lamented composer. At the second, she gave one of Beethoven's. Mlle. Clauss intends to remain a fortnight or three weeks at Berlin, at the expiration of which time her further progress is still undecided. If the Emperor of Russia says "Peace!" he will be recompensed by hearing "little Wilhelmina" play some of the Lieder ohne Worte of Mendelssohn; if he says "War!" she will not go to Petersburg, and the Czar will be robbed of that pleasure. He had better make haste and decide.—London Musical World.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XLII.

NEW YORK, March 11.—Perhaps I should not have gone to Eisfeld's Soirée last night. Nerves all in a jangle, a sonata or two in a quiet family circle, or even a few old favorite church melodies, would have soothed and calmed; but why trust myself at a concert? Because Haydn's and Beethoven's names were too powerful an attraction. Besides, I thought in that out of the way corner no one would disturb me; that there I might sit and give myself up to the influence of the music. But, no—the thing was on this wise:

Eisfeld is giving his series this winter in Dodworth's handsome room, in the building, the windows of which looked down into Grace Church yard—until they built the high wall to prevent the dancing master's pupils from gazing at the heaven-pointing spire. This hall is well up town and the concerts are becoming fashionable, and the hall is well filled and Eisfeld is successful, and so, besides the musical people, there is a smart sprinkling of those who neither know nor care anything about music, and who for want of any enjoyment in the performances amuse themselves in destroying the pleasure of others.

Before the concert began I was driven from my corner by my old acquaintance, Wyzaker, and his party. In my new seat I was just fair earshot from that big, redfaced man, who always will get near me, and always will talk out loud with that passable looking woman. Through his kind offices I lost the entire first movement of Father Haydn's Quartet (No. 73) in F. What it is all about I know no more than the man in the moon. I took a new seat, quite out of the way—there were but few left, and those not very desirable—but, no use! The Andante was murdered and "kilt intirely" and drowned, by the entrance of that party, which always comes late, stands at the door, during the pause between the performances, and then marches down the hall just as the listening part of the audience becomes fairly interested. During the Menuetto, the third movement, young Whiskerando and his lady love marched in and popped down exactly before me and entered into quite an amusing discussion of matters and things in general. In the Finale I ventured to hint by a gentle hiss in their ears, that their conversation was less amusing to their neighbors than to themselves; which had the effect to draw an unpleasant amount of attention upon myself and stop their noise for about sixteen bars. They were luckily beckoned to by Miss Sophronia Chatterbox and carried their agreeable society after the quartet to that lady, and unluckily to that other too, who long since won my notice by the way she listens to and appreciates music. I don't know who she is, but I pitied her during the rest of the concert, from the bottom of my heart.

"But, how did you like Haydn's Quartet?"

My dear Madam, I did not hear it.

Another piece on the programme was a Piano-forte Trio by Alexander Fesca.

"You liked that, I hope? Fesca is a pretty writer."

Well, Madam, the fact is, I was behind the piano—one of Chickering's Grands, which was played with about 20 donkey power, so that all I heard was a rolling thunder for some twenty-five minutes, with an occasional cry from a poor drowning violin and 'cello—what those instruments had to say, you see, I could not make out.

Madame Wallace Bouchelle sang an Aria from Mozart's "Figaro," which put me in mind of old times, and which I enjoyed much; also a song composed by Eisfeld, which had a good deal of delightful German Schubert-like dreaminess, and which went to the right spot. It was called for again. By the way, why wont some one give us What's his name's "Day and Night," one of the most delicious little bits of sentiment!

Finally came the work of the evening. How delightful it was to have by this time a little company in our corner of listeners to Beethoven's Quartet in B flat, op. 74! This work was written about the time of the 7th and 8th Symphonies, say in 1808 or 9, following of course the three celebrated Rasoumowsky Quartets. It was one of those works which astonished the musical people of that day, and met with severe criticism. One can say nothing about such a work upon a single hearing. The strangest interruptions, and breaks, the most unique mingling of the earnest and jocose, seem to characterize all the movements; and yet any one conversant with Beethoven's music feels that a few hearings would flood the whole with light, and that the composer would take his auditor captive and carry him a willing prisoner into his own fanciful realm.

I fear it is too great a happiness to hope for in this world—that of being able to attend a series of these soirées with the assurance of a truly sympathetic and appreciative audience—a series each subscriber to which has nought else in view than giving himself or herself up to the spirit of the hour, and sitting in willing subjection to the magic spells of the composer. Must every flock have its black sheep? Must there always be sheep and goats? If so, why not have them on separate sides of the room?

Oh, thou gentle spirit of Johannes Kreisler—kapellmeister Kreisler! art thou now in a musical sphere, where the annoyances and tribulations to which thou wast subjected here, are forever at an end? Canst thou now play the thirty variations of Sebastian Bach and give the free rein to thy fantasy when the theme of the last starts out before you and spreads away into the infinite, and find an audience to follow you with sympathy and love? Kreisler, I know not what power thou possessest now—if any, rap. (Not a sound!) But hadst thou power to send the deep and subtle spirit of music into the souls of Wyzaker, and Whiskerando, and the big man of the red face, and those others, whose very presence strikes a chill to the musical heart, and sends a shock through the nerves, thou wouldst have remembered thine own "Musikalische Leiden" and sent us aid. If thou hast no such power, thou wilt at least sympathize with us and pray the gods—to make them deaf!

Music Abroad.

PARIS, (Feb. 16).—The long and anxiously expected Etoile du Nord, the new comic opera of Meyerbeer and Scribe, is positively to come out to-night. No further delay, on any plea whatever, will be sanctioned by M. Perrin, who has been losing money for the last three months, and cannot afford to lose any more. A brilliant success is anticipated. Some go so far as to say that L'Etoile du Nord is superior to anything that Meyerbeer has previously composed. I believe that he has made use of two or three pieces from the Camp de Silesie, an opera of which he seems determined to let Paris know nothing. Among other things, the march, and the air of Vielka, with accompaniments for two flutes (which Jenny Lind used to sing so often), are spoken of as forming part of the music of L'Etoile du Nord. Mdle. Caroline Duprez has the principal rôle. Every place in the theatre has been secured long since; and it is expected that such an audience will assemble within the walls of the Opéra-Comique as was never witnessed there before. The Emperor and the Empress have signified their intention of being present.—In the Rue Lepelletier nothing is talked of but Spontini's tragic opera, La Vestale, which is being revived with the utmost pomp and circumstance for Sophie Cravelli, who continues to draw great receipts to the treasury of the Grand Opera, much to the satisfaction of M. Nestor Roqueplan, whose good star, thanks to the young and gifted Teuton, is once more in the ascendant. M. Roger refused the part of Lucinius, but, urged on all sides to accept it, he agreed to refer the matter to arbitration. A decision, without appeal, was to be pronounced by Messrs. Ponchard, Duprez, and Ambroise Thomas, when a letter from Madame Spontini, widow of the composer, induced M. Roger to change his resolution, without awaiting the decision of the referees. So that the matter is definitely arranged, much to the chagrin (so says scandal), of M. Gueymard, who is very jealous of M. Roger, and of whom M. Roger is very jealous.

At the Italian Opera there has been nothing new, but the debut of Mdle. Petrowich in Lucrezia Borgia. There appears to have been a cabal against the new German prima donna, from whom such great things had been anticipated. As much indeed is insinuated in the feuilleton of P. A. Fiorentino (Constitutionnel), from which the following is an extract:

"The debut of Mdle. Petrowich had excited a degree of public curiosity at once very lively and very dangerous. Never had an artiste been more talked about previous to making her first appearance in the natural and ordinary course of things. She was known to be the granddaughter of a celebrated Hospodar. This afforded great scope for the imagination. The question of the Danubian Principalities, before, during, and after their occupation by the Russians, was newly discussed, and so many reports were circulated, and so many stories related, that the most simple and everyday occurrences assumed the importance of political events. It almost appeared, indeed, as though the Eastern question had assumed a novel and unforeseen aspect. In the midst of a host of romantic details, however, connected with the past, present, and future of Mdle. Petrowich, there was one positive and indisputable fact, viz., that this was not Mdle. Petrowich's first appearance on the stage. She had already sung in Italy and at Vienna, and played Lucrezia Borgia ten nights consecutively at Dresden with Moriani, who is assuredly an admirable Gennaro. She came to Paris, furnished with the best recommendations. Romani and Bonola, two competent judges, guaranteed her success, and predicted that a brilliant career was in store for her. Lastly, those who have heard her at the piano, when she is not overcome by anxiety, declare that she possesses a magnificent voice, and the greatest capabilities for the stage. The Parisian public, especially when its curiosity has been too much excited beforehand, must inevitably produce on certain temperaments a profound and terrible impression—an impression which bewilders some, while others it strikes dumb, and petrifies. For my part, I confess, in all humility, that, if suddenly pushed on before the foot lights, I should be incapable of saying so much as "good evening, ladies and gentlemen." Alarmed and paralysed by the imposing and icy-cold audiences, of whom she had been told almost as many incredible stories as the public on its side had been told of her, Mdle. Petrowich was not sufficiently calm and collected in some parts of the opera to enable me to derive any opinion of her talent from this her first appearance."—Correspondence Lond. Mus. World.

There are concerts in plenty. Mr. John Thomas, the harpist (brother of the talented Thomas called "Ap" here in Boston), has been giving concerts with great success in the Salle Herz, assisted by M. Lefort and Sig. Ferranti.—Great things were expected of the debut of a boy-pianist, Theodore Ritter; but prodigies and wonder-children are growing common.—Vieuxtemps and Schullhoff, the pianist, are soon to be in Paris.—Blumenthal, the pianist, was to give a concert, en route for London.—Ferdinand Hiller had arrived in Paris for the winter.—Herz has finished a new Concerto (his fifth) which was to be played at his own concert.—Mlle. Clauss, it is said, goes not to St. Petersburg, but remains some time in Berlin, and will then return to England, via Paris, for the London season.

VIENNA, (Feb. 9th).—The third Concert spirituel took place in the room of the Musikverein. A new overture by Ferdinand Hiller, entitled Phædra, was performed; Herr Dachs played Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat; and the overture to Richard Wagner's Tannhäuser, with a chorus from the same opera, was introduced for the first time in Vienna. A Künstlerball (artists' ball) is to take place on the 15th, under the direction of Strauss, at the Sofienbadssnale. There has been nothing new at the Opera. The Huguenots and the Zigeunerin (Balfie's Bohemian Girl), have attracted the best audiences of the week. There have been a great many concerts, the most interesting of which was that of Léopold de Meyer on the 5th. Having entirely recovered from his long illness, this extraordinary player has regained all his mechanical dexterity, and has even added to the elegance which was always a characteristic of his style. He played several new compositions, among others a new gallop, and a fantasia quite as showy and difficult as the Patinours of Liszt.

On the 31st of January, a concert was given in the Schubert-Salon, by Heinrich Schmitt, solo-violoncellist at the Imperial Theatre of Moscow. Fräulein Liebhart and Herr Stauidig varied the concert with some of Schubert's lieder.—On the 2nd inst., a Madame Burovich-Bossi gave a concert in the Rooms of the Musikverein. According to the Neue Wiener-Musik-Zeitung, the whole affair was a miserable failure.—On the 2nd, J. A. Pacher, a pianist and composer, gave a musical soirée in the Schubert-Salon, and introduced several of his pupils to the public. The concert opened with a symphony of Beethoven. Fräulein Betty Bury sang some songs of Mendelssohn, Fuchs, and Schubert.—On the 2nd, a concert was also given in the Theater an der Wien, for the benefit of the "Krippen." The principal instrumental and vocal selections were: Suppé's Dalmatian Overture, Mozart's overture to the Gärtnerin aus Liebe (La Finta Giardiniera), the romance from the Favorita, sung by Herr Steger, the romance from Euryanthe, and the rondo-finale from Cenerentola, sung by Fräulein La Grua, Proch's song An die Sterne, and G. Hölzl's Auf der Reise (encored), sung by the composer himself, and Weber's Concert-stück for the piano, played by Fräulein Standach.—Spontini's opera of the Vestale will be produced at the Hofopern-Theatre, in the beginning of next month, with Madame Marlow as the Vestal, Madame Herrmann as the High Priestess, Herr Draxier as the High Priest, and Herr Steger as Lucinius.—London Musical World.

CARLSRUHE, (9th February).—The directors of the theatre have lately devoted an evening to the works of Mendelssohn, on which occasion the one act opera, Die Heimkehr (Son and Stranger), the overture to Fingal's Cave, the finale from the unfinished opera of Lorely, and solos by Madame Howitz, were performed. The entertainment excited the utmost possible interest.—Ibid.

BERLIN.—A Musical Musical was given on the 20th ult., in the Concert Room of the Opera, in aid of certain charitable institutions. The person who attracted most general notice was Madame von Boek (late Schröder-Devrient), who, although she has virtually retired from the profession of which, for many years, she was so distinguished an ornament, came forward to give her assistance on this especial occasion. She sang some of Schubert's songs, much to the satisfaction of the audience, who warmly applauded her. Mesdames Tuzcek, Köster, and Johanna Wagner were the other vocalists.—Ibid.

LEIPZIG.—(From the same Correspondent).—Two French musicians—Louis Lacombe and Théodore Gouvy—have been here, giving symphonies and other works of their own composition. The 15th, 16th, and 17th Subscription Concerts have taken place at the Gewandhaus. Mdle. Clauss, the pianist, played at the two last, and made quite a sensation. They call her "a second Clara Wieck." We hear news at Leipzig of an opera having been just completed by Franz Liszt, which will be produced at Weimar.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 18, 1854.

NEW VOLUME. On the Eighth of April our Journal will enter upon its third year, and with new assurances of public favor and success. Of course new subscriptions will be now in order. The majority of our subscribers will please bear in mind that their present subscription expires with two more numbers. We trust they will all notify us, before the month is out, of their intention to renew, and that subscribers at a distance will see the reasonableness of our terms as advertised, viz: two dollars per annum in advance.

☞ All who do not expressly notify us of their wish to stop the Journal at the expiration of their term, will still continue to receive it, and be counted as subscribers for another year.

☞ No SUBSCRIPTION RECEIVED FOR A SHORTER PERIOD THAN SIX MONTHS; AND NONE FOR LESS THAN A YEAR, UNLESS PAID IN ADVANCE.

☞ We have enclosed bills to a large number of subscribers who have not yet paid for the year now closing, and beg that they will promptly remit by mail or otherwise.

APOLOGY FOR LOOKS. We have to ask the indulgence of our Patrons for the dingy looking paper on which this and the last two numbers of our Journal have been printed. Our stock became exhausted, and we were disappointed in the paper-manufacturer's promise of a new supply. The paper-market has been ransacked in vain for paper of our size and quality, and we must e'en put up with such as we can find. We trust the cloud will pass off in a week or two, and that our little sheet will again greet you with its shining morning face, as heretofore.

MENDELSSOHN.—We have had to suspend the conclusion of that interesting Biography for a few weeks, until we shall find it resumed in the paper from which we have copied it thus far, namely the London Musical World. From what source that derives it we are not informed.

A very enterprising paper, by the way, is that same London Musical World. Week after week it comes to us fraught with from six to ten columns taken bodily from this Journal; and in the majority of cases without one word of credit. This is returning stolen goods with a vengeance! For American musical news, it carefully ignores a source so independent, and draws from the New York Herald, and the wholesale puffing organs, that have pleasant things to say about its favorites starring in our verdant cities. But for articles of general interest it scruples not to borrow our selections, editorials and translations. In its New Year's number it made great parade of some articles from Berlioz about Mendelssohn, "translated expressly for the Musical World!" Said translation, with the alteration of here and there a word, is almost identical with that that appeared in this Journal in September last. The "Maxims" of Robert Schumann are among the pieces thus appropriated.

For nearly two years has this gone on, and we have not felt in the mood to make allusion to it. After many copyings without credit, the World did finally, for the first time, credit us with a long article about Alboni, one of its special pets. What was our surprise to find said article ingeniously compounded of several notices which we had written at different times, eked out with passages we never wrote at all, and whatever qualifying sentences we used entirely twisted round into wholesale eulogium.

Surely, better things were to be looked for from the leading musical organ of the great English musical metropolis!

Concerts.

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY.—Two of the Saturday night concerts remain unchronicled:—one of the classical, and one of the light description.

The first, of the 4th inst., yielded almost unalloyed satisfaction. (Almost being a safe and prudent qualification in almost every case.) Every thing in the programme was excellent; there was not too much of it; and the various compositions (five in all) succeeded each other in such felicitous order, were so adapted to succeed each other, and to meet together in the same harmoniously varied programme, that there could be no sense of incongruity or of fatigue. The musical appetite had no chance to get blunted or demoralized by such promiscuous overfeeding as one is bidden to in nine concerts out of ten that hold out "great attractions."

The concert opened with one of the best of overtures, or opening pieces; with that unsurpassed old favorite of all true amateurs, Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute," or rather to a whole world of enchantment. For such seems to be the invitation proclaimed in the bold, prolonged chords (in E flat,) with which it commences. We are bidden as by the potent spell of a great enchanter to enter an ideal world; at the wave of his wand the scales of common-place fall from our eyes, and bathed in the quickening dew of Art, we are as if face to face with an untried, marvelous, divine creation. What radiant, subtle forms of grace and beauty fill the air, and flit and sparkle, in and out, in mazes of an ever-shifting dance, as soon as the little fugue theme of the Allegro enters and begins to pass about from instrument to instrument, each helping to weave the shining thread into an exquisite and complex whole! But we have given an elaborate and graphic analysis of this overture already, in Vol. II. Nos. 4, 5, and 6 of this Journal, translated from Mozart's genial biographer, Oulibicheff. Suffice it to say, here, that this time it fitly precluded an evening made up purely of inspired marvels and masterpieces of Art. The promise was fulfilled in all that followed.

The fifth piano-forte Concerto of Beethoven (Op. 73), also started with the bold chord of E flat major, as if to prolong the same enchantment and prove its virtue to be ever fresh. But how soon it opened up new wonders, deep after deep, of quite another individuality; and after those childlike Arabian Nights dreams of the young Mozart, you felt yourself in the strong and nervous grasp of Beethoven, magnetically thrilled with his great restless aspirations and prophetic moods, and reeling with his fine Bacchus frenzy. We were so interested and pre-occupied with the beauty of the work itself, hearing it for the first time, that probably it would have taken great imperfection in the execution to disturb us. As it was, it seemed finely rendered; certainly on the part of the orchestra; and Mr. HELLER marched through the difficulties of the piano part with ease and steadiness, rendering the letter faithfully, if not the spirit, of a music for which he never seems to have sympathetic fire or delicacy, or sense of light and shade enough, with all his prestidigitation—an apt term, that French one, for one who learned at the magician's trade the sleight of hand that now avails him as pianist! No Concerto, we are sure, was ever listened to with such delight in Boston as this fifth by Beethoven. For the beauty of its Adagio especially we have no words; and in the first movement (Allegro), and in the Rondo Finale, also, one felt new hopes continually excited and not disappointed, new surprises, new convictions of the great and good power working in and through all even the darkest seeming passages of life. Certain strains seemed like anticipations of that glorious pitch of enthusiasm at which the Choral Symphony sustains itself until it bursts from its material bondage and becomes vocal. But we must hear it again; long as it is in each of its three movements, like all the regular concertos before Weber and Mendelssohn, it kept the audience in rapt attention to the end.

The Scherzo by Schumann, (from the "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," op. 62) did not this time, as in several miscellaneous concerts before, flash past the audience unheeded. It came in fitly and took them in the listening and appreciative mood; and we do not think there were many doubts about the singular beauty of this very original morcean. Charming is the contrast between the light, quick, panting staccato of its main movement in six-eight, and the dallying repose of the episodic passage (Trio) in two-four, for oboes, flutes, &c. Some time we hope, under equally favorable conditions, to hear the whole work of which this Scherzo is a part.

Miss CAROLINE LEHMANN sang one piece only; but that was the noble Scena from the "Freyschütz," Wie nahte mir der Schlummer. She sang the musing recitative and prayer with much expression and true feeling, and in the rapturous Er ist's! &c., was fairly carried away, her audience with her, by her impassioned abandon. Perhaps, as a matter of strict taste, we should say, the display of feeling was a little too great, too little en rapport with so quiet, intellectual a concert, and too suggestive of that painfully stereotyped excess of feeling with which Italian opera singers are so wont to storm one's sensibilities into a habit of resistance that becomes callousness. But in this case it was genuine feeling; there could be no doubt of that; and that saved it. In style and finish this performance was a great gain and triumph on the part of this true artist; yet one felt that such energetic eloquence was hardly seconded by a sufficiency of voice; sometimes in rapid passages one only understood but did not fairly hear the sound of a few notes. The applause was tremendous; the lady curtsied profound thanks; and again recalled, she curtsied even more profoundly; but no more singing was vouchsafed to us that night. There was a dignity about that which happily contrasted with the usual over-readiness in yielding to encores. Verily the encore business has got to be a nuisance, distorting the proportions of all programmes, spoiling the appetite for things to follow, and converting pleasures into wearisome excesses. We thank Miss Lehmann and the management of that concert for a more rational example; and none the less so, that we really longed to hear a Lied or two from her.

The second part consisted simply and purely of Mendelssohn's last and best symphony, the No. 3, in A minor, commonly called the "Scottish recollections." Never have we heard it given from beginning to end so satisfactorily. It is one of the most perfect specimens of the genus symphony; as perfect in the symmetry of its form and in the exquisite finish of its every detail, as it is poetic and original in its conception. In its every movement it is full of deep, pure sentiment, of fine imaginations, and of an all-subordinating, blending and correcting reason and unity of purpose. It is a thoroughly genial work. We commend it to our friend Fry, as evidence that the four movements of a good symphony are not so many separate and independent compositions. Great as the contrast is between the Allegro, and the Scherzo and the Adagio, and the Finale, here they are all intimately related,—and eloquently own one common bond, of musical as well as of poetic unity. There is no room here to enter into such analysis of this symphony as it should have, if it have any. That we leave to fitter time and leisure. It was repeated at the next Wednesday rehearsal with increased appreciation; and the Scherzo and Adagio movements again at the rehearsal on Saturday.

The fourteenth concert, (Saturday last) was "light," but not altogether trivial and worthless in the selection of the programme. What with the attraction of new singers, and of pieces of many kinds for many tastes, the audience was unusually large. Auber's overture to Le Bal masqué is a sparkling, pretty thing, suggesting Anna Thillon, and was neatly played. The Hoffnungsstrahlen waltz, by Wittmann, too, was fresh and buoyant, as its title indicated. Then came the delicious Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, —a touch of the classical light—which was applauded more than any item of the programme and repeated. Miss LEHMANN greatly distinguished herself in Casta Diva, a piece which has been allowed to slumber undisturbed through all this winter, so that it had actually recovered something of its freshness. We never heard the lady acquit herself so bravely in a thing of this kind; yet we must think it not in her own proper vein of song. It is an unfortunate fatality of prima donna life, that it nourishes the ambition to please so much at the expense of one's inward, best artistic aspirations. In an unpretending, genuine, really inspired German or Swedish song, we have hardly heard since Jenny Lind the equal of Caroline Lehmann.

The Trio from Lucrezia Borgia (orchestral arrangement) followed, and then came the German "MÄNNERCHOR," some twenty voices strong, marshalled and led by our friend "KREISSMANN." They sang first Weber's "Prayer before Battle," an earnest, sombre piece of harmony, involving some rather subtle modulations, which were not executed with the certainty and nicety which we have sometimes heard from this choir. In the second part they gave the Reiter's Morgenlied, by Gade, of a livelier character. But neither rendering was very happy, or realized the last year's promise. The voices were not balanced, the first tenors shouting much too loudly, while the basses murmured feebly, and there was no palpable and solid middle to the harmony. Yet there was a good German flavor to it; and it was by no means an uninteresting performance, or such as should discourage from new trials.

Meyerbeer's overture to Struensee,—grotesque, fantastical and noisy, yet full of power and effective instrumentation, and Mendelssohn's Andante Capriccioso, played on the piano by Mr. HELLER, were the two notable features of the second part. We did not hear Miss LEHMANN sing Eckert's "Swiss Song," nor the overture to Lestoeque, by Auber and one or two other light things.

In the last Public Rehearsals the Germanians have repeated the third symphony of Mendelssohn, and revived the lovely No. 4 of Beethoven.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The extra concert, on Tuesday evening, drew a select and pretty numerous audience of music-lovers, amateurs and professors, to the beautiful Chickering saloon. The programme hardly realized the expectations caught from a hasty glance at it beforehand; yet we could only say this, measuring by the high mark which the Club has set. The Septuor, arranged as Quintet, op. 20, by Beethoven, is a work of most developed symmetry and beauty, and was in the main very finely and smoothly played. It is by no means one of the most strikingly original, and Beethoven-ish of that master's works; compared with the Trio in B flat, or in D, with almost any of his Quartets or Quintets, or with half of his thirty and odd piano Sonatas, it is elegantly tame (comparatively, of course). Then again, this public has grown so familiar with its movements, that if it covet any hearing of it, it is to hear it in the original form, with seven instruments.

Cherubini's "Ave Maria," a piece whose pure and lofty style of melody does not easily wear out, was sung quite effectively by Mrs WENTWORTH, with clarinet obligato by Ryan, and quartet accompaniment. It was encored, and both times gave great satisfaction, only marred in one place each time by a common-place Italian opera cadenza, that seemed not akin to Cherubini's spirit. Mrs. Wentworth's highest tones are singularly pure and sweet and silvery; but in the middle register it seems another voice, less genial in quality.

Mr. CARL HAUSE had full field again for his distinct, unfaltering, even execution in a Piano Quintet by Ferdinand Ries, Beethoven's pupil, but not partaker of the master's divine fire, if we may judge by this his opus 74, which is of the brilliant, effective, execution-tasking order, while strictly in the classic forms, like much of Hummel's music, only feebler far than that. We were sorry to lose the opportunity for a comparison, presented by the last piece in the programme, which was the Andante and Finale from Hummel's Concerto in E major. That, as well as WULF FRIES's singing of the Adelaide on his violoncello, we had to forego. But we heard the dignified and deep Adagio, and the quaint, imaginative Scherzo from Mendelssohn's fourth Quartet, in E minor, which was to us the most individual and satisfying thing of all. The song of Kücken: "Fly, my skiff," was prettily enough sung by Mrs. WENTWORTH, for so commonplace a specimen of German song. (N. B. Mr. F. F. MUELLER accompanied.)

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. Rossini's oper-oratorio of "Moses in Egypt" still draws crowded houses every Sunday evening, and is announced again for the eighth time for tomorrow. We cannot blame the society for harping upon any string that vibrates to the chink of dollars. But it would be good to hear some solid choruses of Handel once more!

These could be heard, however, in a quiet way, in the Tremont Lesser Temple, and for a small price, at the Monday evening "Rehearsals" of the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY. Choruses and songs from the "Messiah," "Jephthah," "St. Paul," &c., &c., have been rehearsed before such as love them by a large and good choir, and such singers as Miss DOANE and Mr. ARTHURSON, under the conductorship of Mr. KREISSMANN.

M'LE. GABRIELLE DE LA MOTTE has given three of her "Private Musical Soirées" at Chickering's Rooms, to the satisfaction apparently of a respectable audience. She has great energy of execution and shows an enterprising acquaintance with a wide variety of styles, her programmes embracing from time to time Trios of Mendelssohn, Sonatas of Beethoven, Songs without Words, and brilliant, difficult fantasias of Thalberg, Liszt, De Meyer, Prudent, and others. Her fourth and last Soirée will be next Monday evening.

Mr. APTOMMAS, with his long list of attractions, filled the Chickering room to overflowing at his last "Harp Soirée." His own unrivalled harpings charmed the most. But there was a good rich violin solo, by Mr. CARL GÄRTNER, on themes from Freyschutz, including the tenor song: Durch die Wälder, the Hunter's Chorus, &c., &c.,—really refreshing, compared with most such show pieces. And there was singing by Miss BRAINERD, of New York, who has pure and telling high notes, and who gave Robert, toi que j'aime (accompanied by the harp) with considerable effect. Sig. CAMOENZ, too, displayed his bluff voice to better advantage than usual in some songs suited to him. Mr. ROBERT HELLER, the pianist, played a duet with Mr. GÄRTNER, and a piece by Thalberg.

A Gewandhaus Concert.

[We translate the following letter of a correspondent of the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung, as being probably of interest to the readers of the Journal of Music.]

LEIPSIK, Feb. 5, 1854.

Until he has attended a Gewandhaus Concert, a stranger here hardly dares show himself in society, and will scarcely be able to learn anything of the state of business, of the influence of the German-Austrian tariff upon the Bohemian railroad, or the opinion of Saxony upon the Oriental question. I therefore hastened on occasion of the first concert after my arrival to the entrance of the musical purgatory; placed myself early, as I had been advised, at the little window of the office in the Gewandhaus; found already, considering the increased price of the tickets, a very fine, well perfumed, well behaved, and silent public waiting upon the steps; continued to steer my way finally into the current to the office, and found that every place had been taken. The attempt to get in, however, had to be made again yesterday; for Jenny Lind—Goldschmidt by marriage—had promised to appear. Again was waiting, as has been the case through the whole season, in spite of the small number of strangers in town, a very fine public on the steps. In the pressure a hundred "excuse me's" were to be heard, for involuntary crowding; as one gentleman expressed his sorrow for the injury done to the ladies' dresses, an amiable young lady of fifty replied, the gentlemen must be a little more careful and we put up with it. However we reached the hall door happily without broken limbs, and proceeded to seek our places. It was a full hour before the concert and yet, save a few reserved seats, the entire hall was filled, and many of the ladies were forced to form in a line in an anti-room, and satisfy themselves with stools which kind hands had procured for them. The Gewandhaus without is an old, storm-beaten, unimposing building. In the lower story are wool and paper stores, in the next the city library and the students' fencing hall, and in the third finally the large and imposing concert hall. This is oval in form, and has a light gallery, fronted by a low iron railing running round, and will contain a thousand to twelve hundred auditors. The paintings which adorn it belong to the first part of the present century and are of no great account; but it is lighted in a very agreeable manner, namely, by four chandeliers with forty-eight gas burners, rendered milder by glass globes, and twelve wall burners for the orchestra. The newest fashion noticeable among the numerous well dressed ladies, seemed to be light colored silk dresses, with an orange colored or scarlet shawl over the shoulders. This dress suited their lively, pleasing faces extremely well—though I disclaim any insinuation that they knew this beforehand. In the conversation, Berlin jokes upon sitting and standing, waiting and tiring, seemed mainly to fill up the time, until at last David appeared as director at his stand.

A signal invited to silence, one more rustling of silk dresses, and a symphony by N. W. Gade (No. 4, B \flat major) began. The performance was characterized by a precision, which rendered right clear what a genial architecture of tones means; and afterwards the orchestra exhibited its full richness in Meyerbeer's overture to Struensee. After the symphony I heard among those standing near me and Mrs. Jenny appeared. The blonde Swedish Nightingale, who, after having fascinated the people and collected the dollars upon the banks of the Neva, the Spree, the Thames, the Delaware and Lake Erie, has established a quiet home beneath the Bruhl Terrace, had come over to combine charity and the spread of artistic enjoyment. She sang for the benefit of the Pension fund of the Leipzig Orchestra. She was received with great applause, and sang the Aria from Haydn's Creation, "On mighty pens," with a power and delicacy, and joyous solemnity, which filled the bosoms of her auditors as with morning light, and seemed a new act of creation of light and life. Afterwards Madame Goldschmidt vied with two flutes in the joyous Trio in Meyerbeer's "Camp of Silsia." She surpassed the flutes often in tone, and continually in feeling and emotion, but in passages where the wordless tones gave way to words, the delight was still greater. At the close she surprised the audience in several "Songs at the Piano" by the power of her voice as well as by a pianissimo, which like the hum of bees flew through the hall, and still was distinct and melodious in the most distant part. It seemed, after each piece, as if the applause would never end; hardly a single cry of "brava," as is the custom here, was heard, but a tremendous labor of hands—some small, but still more large, if one may judge from the sound.

"Sie naht, sie naht, des Nordens stolze Flotte,"

Jenny's magic operated, further, upon Herr Goldschmidt's performance upon the piano, and we had a musical evening during which politics for some hours completely forgot the discords of the Concert Européen.

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. A note from Mr. William Scharfenberg, in Willis's Musical World of last week, states that the Directors of this body will probably, after their next meeting, publish a reply to the accusation of Mr. G. F. Bristow. We doubt not that they will present a triumphant vindication of the course which this high-toned and admirable society of artists has always pursued in the selection of pieces for its programmes. The Philharmonic Society, for all that we can see, has certainly a right to devote itself to the study and interpretation of such music as it chooses. It was formed by Germans and lovers of the great German music, and to the end of providing in New York opportunities for renewing and deepening the acquaintance with those noble works of Art, and of inspiring others with the same elevating taste. Mr. Bristow on the other hand has a perfect right to organize an orchestra purely or mainly for the production of native American symphonies and overtures. But why quarrel with a Society, nine tenths of whose members are Germans, or of German taste, for cultivating that they desire and love! If it were put to the general mass of music-lovers, whether one of the (only) four Philharmonic concerts in a year should be taken from Beethoven, Mozart and Mendelssohn, and given up to the trial of new American works, we doubt if many voices would be heard to call it good economy, considering how little we know after all of the best, and that "life is short and Art is long."

We feel a certain national pride in the existence of the New York "Philharmonic," which is altogether the noblest permanent orchestra that has existed in our country, and in some sense the mainstay of true, classical taste, among us, amid the novelties and fashions of the day. We subjoin a list of its members, and pray for the day, when Boston, with its five or six times as many symphony concerts, shall possess so large and effective a body of musicians.

ORCHESTRA.

Conductor.—Mr. THEO. EISEL.

THE LAST CONCERT! To-night, (can we realize it?) will be the last of the series of Germania Concerts. We are to hear the CHORAL SYMPHONY of Beethoven again:—that is, the first three movements for the orchestra alone. We will be grateful enough for that; but what a pity that they cannot pursue the composer's grand and kindling thought to where it "breaks forth into singing;" up to that sublime climax of the thought of Universal Brotherhood and Schiller's "Hymn to Joy!" It is leaving out the fulfilment, aye, and the key to the whole design. The difficulty we presume to be in finding singers. Singers generally shrink from music in which they cannot personally appear to much advantage; and that is hardly possible in the high-climbing choruses and difficult solos of Beethoven's symphony. Yet it would seem that there should be among singers enough disinterested zeal to bring out once a year a work of so sublime a character, to lead them cheerfully to sacrifice themselves in contributing their possible to make the thing complete. Beethoven in writing the voice parts so high, relied upon an enthusiasm in the singers, kindling with the inspiration of the symphony, that should lift them above themselves for the time being. We cannot but hope that the revival of an interest in the Choral Symphony to-night, will make another performance called for, which shall be with chorus.

The remainder of the programme to-night is quite rich. There is the Tannhäuser overture, too, which has been silent long enough to let us come to it with new ears and new powers of comparison. It will be eagerly welcomed. Then there is the Mendelssohn Scherzo, and the better portions of that glorious E flat Concerto of Beethoven; and there will be Miss LEHMANN; and a larger orchestra than usual.

There must be a full Music Hall to-night, to show the Germanians that the Boston musical public yet appreciate good things.

MOORE'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF MUSIC:

COMPILED BY JOHN W. MOORE,

With the assistance of other distinguished men in the musical world. The intention of the author is to make a most complete and thorough work of the above, which will be a desideratum in the world of music. It will be published in one elegant Royal Octavo volume of about 900 pages, double columns, and will contain a complete

Dictionary of Musical Terms,

A HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE OF MUSIC, from the earliest time to the present, a

Treatise on Harmony and Thorough Bass,

a description of all known MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, with the names of the most distinguished makers, and a complete Musical Biography of over three thousand of the most distinguished Composers and Musicians who have ever lived. Mr. Moore has spent several years in compiling this valuable work. It is now going through the press as rapidly as will comport with accuracy.

P. S.—The above splendid work, which will prove invaluable to every professional musician, and to every amateur, will be ready this spring; we hope in the month of March. It has been delayed on account of the immense labor bestowed upon it, and the difficulty of stereotyping a work so full of examples. The delay, however, will enhance the value of the work.

The best Primary Book on Thorough Bass ever issued.

FIRST STEPS IN THOROUGH BASS,

IN TWELVE FAMILIAR LESSONS, ARRANGED IN THE DIALOGUE FORM. BY A TEACHER OF MUSIC.

The mode of instruction carried out in this work has by positive experience proved efficacious in imparting to a pupil of ten years of age, as also to any one who may be ignorant of the subject, correct ideas of the abstruse science of Thorough Bass. "The progress made by those who have learned Thorough Bass in this manner," say the author, "has been so rapid (I had almost said astonishing,) that I have been urged to communicate my method of teaching it to the public, by many good judges who have witnessed its effects with surprise; and though I acknowledge this to be an assertion introduced into prefaces as the names of the publishers are inserted in title pages, it happens, in this instance, to be literally true."

about to be executed, when suddenly the vapors of wine disappear; Peter remembers the voice he has heard, the eyes which looked upon him; it is Catherine whom he saw and heard. He summons the corporal; by a providential chance the undisciplined soldier has not been shot; she escaped at the moment when the balls were about to strike her. A stream was before her; she leaps therein, having first dropped a paper addressed to Peter. This paper encloses the ring the carpenter had formerly given her, and the secret of the conspiracy woven against Peter the Great.

The trumpets sound, the army is on foot. Peter advances, and fears not to declare himself to his soldiers. At the name of the Czar, the conspirators fall on their knees; Peter the Great places himself at their head, and leads them on to victory. O'er hill and dale their national hymn resounds; general enthusiasm. At this moment the spectacle is one of magic beauty; the stage presents one of the most magnificent tableaux the imagination can conjure up. The music is quite equal to the spectacle.

(Conclusion next week.)

Mendelssohn.

On the 26th of March, 1829, Felix wrote to Moscheles, from Berlin, an account of the performance of Bach's Passion Music. The proceeds of this concert had been generously handed over by the directors to the managers of two charitable institutions. In the letter alluded to, Felix told his friend of his intended visit to England, and we find him in London on the 20th of April following. His name was known already in the musical circles, since Moscheles, as conductor of the Philharmonic Society, had invited public attention to his rising genius, and the members of that body were eager to give him an honorable reception and a fair trial. We shall see that he did not visit England empty-handed. Besides a chorale in A minor, and a motet for sixteen voices, he brought his first stringed quartet in A minor. The overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream was performed for the first time in London, and repeated with great applause on the 13th of July, at a concert given by Henrietta Sontag. On this occasion, Felix and Moscheles played, from an unpublished score, a concerto in E major, for two pianofortes. A tour through Scotland, shortly after his arrival in England, suggested the thoughts of an overture to Fingal's Cave, or The Hebrides, which, I believe, was written in the same year, after his return to Berlin.* A curious story is told of this composition. His sisters asked Felix for some description of the cave. "Come, tell us something about the Hebrides." "I can't," said Felix; "it's impossible, except on the piano." He then seated himself at the instrument, and extemporized on those ideas which were afterwards condensed in the shape of an overture.

In the month of May, 1830, Mendelssohn went to Weimar, and, after staying some weeks with Goethe, visited Munich, where Fräulein Delphine Schaurrott happened to be giving concerts, and adding greatly to her reputation as a pianiste. Felix, who admired her playing, appears always to have felt a deep interest in this lady; and it is said he presented her with the song in Op. 19, "Bringet des treusten Herzen's Grüsse," which was composed at Rome. Hildebrand, Hübner, and Bëndemann joined Felix in his journey to Italy, and he remained at Rome from the 1st of November to the April of 1831. During that period he set the First Walpurgis Night of Goethe to music,† and wrote the music to the 115th Psalm, several sacred pieces, three motets for the nuns of Santa Trinita, and the first volume of the Songs without Words. In the February of 1832, he went to Paris, to conduct his overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream. This was the third and, as far as I know, the last time in his life that he visited the French capital. He had been there with his father as a boy of ten years old, but neither the climate nor the people seem to have suited him. On the 22nd of April he returned to London, bringing with him three most valuable manuscripts—the Walpurgis Night, the overture to the Hebrides, and the concerto in G minor for pianoforte and orchestra. The overture was played for the first time on the 14th of May. In the latter end of the month following, Felix was once more found in Berlin. During his absence from Germany, the office of director to the Vocal Academy at Berlin had become vacant, and Felix became an unsuccessful candidate for the post, which was given to Rungenhagen. This was probably a job of the "Dii minorum gentium," whose appreciation and judgment have been alluded to in a former number. But disappointment failed to crush the ardent and active Felix, who gave a series of concerts in aid of charitable institutions, and seemed bent on winning the good will of the Berliners, if not by his genius, at least by his benevolence. A reward came soon, in the shape of an invitation to conduct the Düsseldorf Festival; and, Felix, after what had lately happened, acknowledged and accepted the compliment with gratitude.

* This overture, according to M. Berlioz, was composed at Rome.

† Which he afterwards almost entirely rewrote.

A new period in Mendelssohn's life dates from his first stay in Düsseldorf. We have already sketched what we shall call the first two periods in his career: that of his early years, and the second, which he devoted to travelling. The third, at which we have now arrived, convinced the world of his great original powers. He had hitherto contended with much opposition. It is sad to think of the uphill work and misgivings of heart which are inseparable from all great and persevering spirits. In Mendelssohn's case, I believe that the firm friendship of a faithful few did much to alleviate his toil and cheer him on. Possessed of this, he was comparatively callous to the fact that "the world knows nothing of her greatest men;" and his friends played their part nobly, in assuring all around them that Germany knew not the value of her son. At Düsseldorf, Felix joined the society of those artists who had travelled with him through Italy. They all welcomed him as an old companion; and Wilhelm Schadow, who was the foremost among the number, became one of Felix's best and most intimate friends. Before, however, we follow Mendelssohn in this new sphere of action, we should not omit to mention another visit to London, remembering that the Düsseldorf Festival took place between his first and second journey to England in 1833.

He arrived in London on the 25th of April, and in two days from that time composed, jointly with Moscheles, variations on the "Zigeuner Marsch," from Preciosa; this was played in public by the two composers on the 11th of May, and so often (it is said) had these two artists played and studied together, so familiar were they with each other's thoughts and expressions, that in private circles they not unfrequently extemporized together on the same instrument. On the 13th of May, Mendelssohn's symphony, in A major, was given at the Philharmonic Society.* On the 15th, the variations from Preciosa were repeated.

After the Düsseldorf Festival, he returned to England with his father. On the 10th of June an overture, in C major, was introduced to the public, and, at this period, he showed Moscheles the manuscript of his beautiful overture to Melusine. A picture in Düsseldorf had suggested the subject of this music, which was given for the first time on the 7th April, 1834, and met with very qualified applause. It was performed again on the 8th of May following, at Moscheles' own concert, and was better appreciated than on the occasion of its first trial. Mendelssohn's reply to Moscheles, who wrote him an account of the earlier concert, is not without interest. He thanks him heartily for the zeal and care taken in introducing the overture to a critical audience, and owns modestly to self-satisfaction after Moscheles' favorable opinion of its merits as a composition. "Your encouragement," (he says) "is essential to keep up my spirits; distrust of my own powers would ensue if you failed to encourage me; your applause is dearer than ribbons and orders." He then gives some hints as to further improvement. "The wind instruments must be kept under, and the leading idea in the overture be played ppp. Without boisterous playing the whole overture will be a different thing: it will sound frischer, and I shall be better pleased." Felix left London on the 25th of August, 1833, and took up his abode in Düsseldorf. At the great festival which introduced him as a conductor to the musical world at Düsseldorf, his Overture in C major, Handel's Israel in Egypt, the Overture to Leonora and Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, an Easter cantata by Wolf, and Die Nacht der Töne, by Winter, formed the chief features of the programme. Felix played Weber's Concert-Stück with great applause, and the directors were so satisfied with the success of the whole undertaking, that they induced him to consent to remain for three years, during which time he would be required to lead the weekly meetings of the "Singverein," the Winter Concerts, and also the music in the Catholic Church. An unlucky circumstance at this period deprived the world of a treasure which, we believe, would have been "for all time." Immermann, a friend of Mendelssohn's, had, at the latter's request, prepared a libretto for Shakspeare's Tempest, which Felix longed to set to music; but the manuscript was declined by the musician, and, as no alteration was volunteered by Immermann, the whole project fell to the ground. What Felix would have made of this beautiful poem need scarcely be demanded by those who have heard his music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. Can we doubt that he, who understood Puck and his gambols as well as any Englishman living, would have written just as fairy-like strains for the dainty Ariel? The solemn Prospero, and sweet Miranda, too—what subjects for one who loved to write of the fairy world, and to heighten the interest of a romance with his own passionate music! The wild, the ethereal, and unseen, "such stuff as dreams are made of," have been nobly treated in modern days, by two stars shining in the same sphere—Carl Maria von Weber, and Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

Choir Singing.

DEAR MR. DWIGHT.—I am led to think, from a somewhat dreary experience, that nothing is more rare than good choir-singing; and as scarce anything is more agreeable in its peculiar sphere, I cannot forbear giving you an account of some which I had the good fortune to hear recently during a visit to a neighboring town, in the hope that some one of those engaged in conducting choirs may derive a hint or two of value from the narration.

After mature reflection I am disposed to say that the essential requisites to good church music are good voices, good tunes and taste; perhaps this opinion is in a manner forced upon me by the fact that they were the attributes of the choir in question, and which produced the most pleasing music by far which I remember to have heard. Each of the voices was good in itself, one or two of them very valuable, and the four blended harmoniously, both from their own sympathetic qualities and from long practice together; they were so well balanced that the listener could trace each through the entire piece or get the full effect of the chords, as he pleased; and the evenness of tone, the taste and finish of the entire service, and the high character of the compositions combined to render it to me a memorable occasion.

I procured a list of the selections, thinking them very happy, which were as follows. (I should tell you by the way, that this society was not of the Episcopal denomination, and that the words: "Now unto the King Eternal," &c., were substituted in the chants for the customary Gloria Patri.) Morning: opened with Old English Chant, by Rev. T. Pears, from the collection used in the Queen's Chapel, Windsor; voluntary, after first prayer, from Quintet by Biery, "Hear me, O Lord," adapted from Novello's Collection of Convent Music; both hymns were from the "Beethoven Collection," published in New York. Afternoon: chant, Deus Misereatur, by R. Turle; manuscript hymn in 7s metre by one of the choir, a charming bit of graceful, flowing harmony; voluntary, In Te confido, Himmel ("In Thee, O Lord, will I ever trust.")

There has been much good sacred music written within the last two centuries, and some little continues to be composed even in our time, though one might justly be incredulous of the fact; and so entirely to avoid the ocean of trash, which has been poured into our country towns, as in the above selection, would seem to assure us that taste in choir-singing is not actually contrary to the fundamental laws of nature; it is however so remarkable that I have felt it my duty to call your attention to this most extraordinary instance; and I can only hope it may have the effect of suggesting to some of your readers the idea of using a choir for the production of such music as is really sacred. s.

The Philharmonic Society.

NEW YORK, March 9, 1854.

DEAR SIR:—In your journal of the 4th inst. appears a letter from Mr. George F. Bristow, in which he undertakes to censure the spirit and action of the N. Y. Philharmonic Society in such a remarkable and unjustifiable manner that the Board of Directors feel it a duty to the Public and their constituents to make a reply, which, they are sure, will set the matter right, and which they hope you will have the goodness to insert in your journal of next week. In fact, an answer on our part would hardly seem to be required, as in the short Reply you made to the above letter, you have already, in behalf of the Society, met satisfactorily the charges which Mr. B. proffers; yet there are several statements in that letter so utterly inaccurate and so unjust, that we cannot let them pass unnoticed, the more so, as by a mere reference to the records of the Society they can be thoroughly refuted.

First, then, Mr. B. finds fault (as we understand it) that during the 'eleven years' existence of the Society there have been played but two American compositions at the concerts and rehearsals, and these an Overture and Symphony of his. Now, the Society had existed four years, before any American composition was suggested to the members for performance, which at once reduces Mr. B.'s eleven years to a period of seven years, thus materially weakening his position, were it otherwise tenable. During the interval of the remaining seven years, several American productions by either native or adopted citizens of this country were brought to the notice of the Society and performed as follows:

Overture to Marmion, by Geo. Loder, (English,) performed twice at concerts.
Overture by H. Saroui, (German,) performed at public rehearsal.
Overture by F. G. Hansen, (German,) performed at public rehearsal.
Overture by Theo. Eisfeld, (German,) performed at public rehearsal.
Overture by Geo. F. Bristow, (American,) performed at concert.
Indian March by F. E. Miguel, (French,) performed at public rehearsal.
Descriptive Battle-Symphony, by Knäbel, (German,) at public rehearsal.
Symphony No. 1 by George F. Bristow, (American,) performed twice at public rehearsal.

Duetto for two Cornets, by Dodworth, (American,) performed at concert.

Serenade, by William Mason, (American,) performed at concert.

Several songs by W. V. Wallace, (Irish,) performed at concert.

Application was also made by Mr. A. P. Heinrich, (German,) for the performance of several of his compositions, and when he was informed that the society was ready, he withdrew.

All these compositions were written on American soil, it is true, but as does appear, not solely by native Americans: and we hold that only such a work is the production of American Art as emanates from an American mind, that is from a native of the country: but be this as it may, and waiving the point altogether for the sake of argument, we certainly think that the above statement sufficiently shows, that justice has been done as well to Mr. B. as to other American composers, either native or adopted citizens: and may we not add here, since speaking particularly of Mr. B., that his merits and talents as a musician and composer, have never for a moment, to our best knowledge, been called in question by any of the members of our Society. That, however, the directors of the Society do not hesitate to acknowledge the great superiority of the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Weber, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Gade, Bennett, Schumann, Cherubini, Rossini, Spontini, Mehul, Berlioz, &c., &c., to those of Mr. B. or any other American composer, now publicly known, and that for the promotion of Art in this country they feel it their duty to cause the works of the former to be played most frequently, no one who knows anything about the matter, and is able to judge impartially, will for a moment find strange or unjustifiable. Were the tendency a different one, the Directors would betray the trust vested in them by the second clause of article I. of the constitution, which says that "the object of the Society shall be the cultivation and performance of Instrumental music;" and acting otherwise than they have done, the Society would most signally have failed in the honest endeavor to contribute in elevating Art, and raising the standard of Music in this country.

Secondly, Mr. B. says, that since the commencement of the Society there has been, on the part of the members and direction, little short of a conspiracy against Art in this country, and that there exists in the Society a systematized effort for the extinction of American Music. These charges, although made very positively, are really so absurd, that in answer to them we simply challenge Mr. B. to prove his assertions; for in his letter there is not one word to substantiate them.

The third fault Mr. B. finds is, that the execution of the Philharmonic performers was three years ago better than it is now, although at that time he says, the members individually were not as competent as they are at present. As to this point, we are willing to abide by the decision of those who have been in the habit of simply listening to our performances for the last five years, without allowing their minds to be disturbed by those rancorous feelings, which envy and jealousy, as well as disappointed ambition, sometimes call forth. We willingly admit, however, that much remains to be desired in the results of our performances, and only regret that circumstances beyond our control often prevent the execution of the pieces from being as perfect as we feel they ought to be. It is, after all, much easier to pass judgment and find fault than to do better.

Having thus met Mr. B.'s charges, which for his sake we wish he had framed in a somewhat nobler spirit, and on the weight of which he might have reflected more deliberately, we entirely refrain from taking any notice whatever of those parts of his letter which have no bearing on the subject in consideration, and which, we believe, have been pronounced as in exceeding bad taste and entirely uncalled for. Nor can we imagine, from the acquaintance and brotherhood we have had with Mr. Bristow for some time past, that all he said was the result of his own heart's convictions, but rather that he has been advised into pursuing this strange course by would-be-friends, whose advice and undue adulation he would much better have done without. To abuse is a very easy thing: but although Mr. B. has seen fit to take this mode of arguing, we certainly cannot, and will not stoop to it, and, with a simple statement of the facts, take leave of him, fearing and regretting that by so hasty proceeding on his part he may have alienated from himself sympathies, which hitherto have always been cordially rendered him.

We must finally be permitted to indulge in the remark, that in our opinion it would have been more manly in Mr. B., honestly and frankly to have laid his grievances, if he had any, before the Society, for which he had ample opportunity, instead of writing and publishing a letter full of vehemence and passion, condemnatory of a body of musicians, of which he had been himself a member for many years, [and of late one of the leading men,] and in whose spirit and action he has always acquiesced from the commencement of his membership up to his late extraordinary attack in your journal.

Taking this opportunity of thanking you for the interest you have always shown for the welfare and progress of our Institution, we remain

Very respectfully yours,

H. C. TIMM, President.

Board of Directors.

At the regular meeting of the Society on Saturday, March 11th, the above letter was read and fully concurred in, and voted to be published in Willis's Musical World, there being only three dissentient votes. Of these, one was declared to be so because the voter preferred that no notice whatever should be taken of Mr. Bristow's letter.

Subsequently, Mr. B.'s resignation, as one of the Board of Directors and as performing member of the Society, was accepted, and Mr. Beames elected in his stead as Assistant Director.

On motion of Mr. U. C. Hill, Mr. Richard Hoffman was then duly elected an Honorary member of the N. Y. Philharmonic Society.

Music in Paris.

[Extract from a private Letter.]

PARIS, FEB. 21, 1854.

MY DEAR DWIGHT:

By the kindness of a friend, I had a ticket to the second concert of the Conservatoire Imperial. You may suppose that I eagerly embraced the opportunity of hearing one of these far-famed concerts. Let others run after operas and great singers;—for the truest and deepest pleasure, give me a concert of pure instrumental music. These concerts are not always accessible to non-subscribers, as the seats are taken and held year after year by the regular subscribers. So I considered myself lucky to get in. We had 1st, a symphony of Beethoven; 2d, a chorus from Mozart's Idomeneo, the solo part sung very fairly by Mlle. Boulard, one of the pupils of the Conservatoire, who has received a prize; 3d, a truly naïve and charming dance of Gluck, from Iphigénie en Aulide; 4th, a Trio from Haydn's Armide, sung by pupils of the Conservatoire; and lastly, the whole of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The instrumental part of the performance seemed to me as perfect as one could desire. The last especially lingers in my memory as complete and soul-sufficing as Shakspeare himself. Never have I heard all those subtle, fantastic harmonies of Mendelssohn, those dreamy, glancing lights and shadows which captivate one so from the beginning to the end of this work, so perfectly rendered. And the grand, exulting, barbaric movement of the Wedding March—where Theseus and Hippolyta pass by, with elephants and camels and barbed steeds, and all the splendor of Indian costume covering the grand Grecian simplicity of form—was never so truly represented by any orchestra.

At the Italian Opera I heard Mario again in the Sonnambula, when he poured himself forth in such bursts of magnificent, such impassioned, such tender tones as I have never heard approached by any other male voice. The Elvir d'Amore was very well sustained by Gardoni; a very tender and sweet tenor; Rossi, a capital Dulcamaro; Tamburini, who did the best he could amid the ruins of his former voice; and Frezzolini, who did well enough as prima donna, but whom one hears as if he were hearing her on trial, and who, when she does anything in a manner approaching to abandon, is most kindly and patronizingly applauded.

Here you have the extent of my experience in the world of music in Paris. I hear all about me talk of brilliant successes. Cruvelli I hear of as the rival of Rachel in acting, but of her voice as not particularly sympathetic. Meyerbeer's new opera at the Comique, L'Étoile du Nord, is praised highly in Galgiani, and all seats taken for the representation for some time to come. Such things float about me as I oscillate daily between my lodgings and my atelier. When any of these drops of etherial essence ooze into my ears, I will endeavor to make a distillation thereof, and bottle up something of their aroma for your use. c.

Letter from the Diarist.

Editor of Dwight's Journal of Music.

THREE PAIR BACK, March 19, 1854.

DEAR SIR,—Towards the conclusion of my XLth communication of jottings, published in your Journal of the 25th ultimo, there are a few sentences not "merely of an allusive character" as to the career of certain composers, which seem to have been considered "sufficient matter for comment." As you have admitted a letter into your paper of yesterday, two columns and a half of which are strictures upon those few sentences, and these strictures most decidedly "reflect upon my general accuracy," I feel impelled, against my will, to notice the matter and show that I was right.

Before "going in detail into the lives of those composers, which have been so often given," the following positions and facts may be set forth:—

1. A young composer must make a reputation before his musical abilities will procure him a subsistence—must have "praise before he gets his pudding;" if he strikes out a new path, he must expect to meet not only the opposition of those who already have the public ear, and are in possession of the stage, but that of the singers and musicians generally, to whom the greater the novelty the greater the labor; and when so much reputation is gained as to warrant his aspirations for an engagement either as composer or director, or both, he carries his commodity—his genius and talents—to whatever market offers a demand.

2. Of the four great German composers, Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, two not only pleased the "appreciative few," but became popular, and enjoyed the benefits of popularity. The other two, in spite of their own utter want of all knowledge of economy and the value of money, were sustained, supported, and not allowed to "starve or live in garrets" by the "appreciative few."

3. He that follows Fétis in minor matters of historic detail, especially in relation to German composers, follows an ignis fatuus; and the Quixote who undertakes a tilt against facts and statements drawn from original German sources without knowing that language, is in precisely the position, in which the author of "A Letter to Mr. Willis" finds those critics of "Santa Claus" who cannot read the score.

4. "If this is a free fight, count me in."

The preliminaries being thus adjusted, I shall proceed to a somewhat particular discussion of the pecuniary condition of the four composers named above; 1. because this has never been done, 2. because their alleged poverty is harped upon so continually by fanciful and imaginative writers, and 3. "to show you how accurate I am in what I say of all, even the most trivial matters."

HANDEL. In 1693 he went to Berlin, where Attilio Ariosti used to take him upon his knees and hear him play the harpsichord. The Kurfürst—he had not then assumed the title of King—offered to send him to Italy, (rather appreciative that), but his friends thought a boy of thirteen had better go back to Halle to his father. His father died and the boy in 1703 went to Hamburg and entered Keiser's orchestra at the opera as a violinist. Keiser got into debt and ran away. There were two harpsichords in the theatre, and the player of the second naturally took Keiser's place, but the boy put in a claim for it and actually took it from him as the best player of the two. This was the cause of the attempt upon his life; and all these circumstances together led the managers to put an opera into his hand for composition—he finished it in a few weeks and it ran thirty nights. He soon with Mattheson divided the directorship and wrote three other successful operas. The Prince of Tuscany heard two of them and invited the composer to Italy. In three years he saved money enough to enable him to travel respectably, accepted the Prince's offer and went to Florence. In Italy he made such a tour from opera house to opera house, visiting Venice, Rome, Naples, &c., as Rossini did a century later, and came home with plenty of fame and money. Hanover at that time was a leading German capital, and Handel paid it a visit. At this time the Elector was heir to the throne of England, and many of the English nobility were there worshipping the dull, old rising sun. Having money enough, Handel concluded to accept the invitation of these nobles and visit London. Just at this time, 1710, Baron Kilmansegg had obtained the appointment from George, of Handel as kapellmeister, with a salary of 1500 crowns a year. The young man refusing this, because of his intended London journey, he was told this should not interfere, he should have the appointment with permission to go where he would for a year. (Rather appreciative, for a young man of 23?) The history of the opera "Rinaldo" need not be repeated. After his return to Hanover, he stayed two years and then obtained permission to visit London again, on condition of returning at a specified time.

He broke his engagement, and when his employer came over, in 1714, this fact and another, which need not be mentioned, had banished the composer from court. Then came the "Water Music" story, which is fact, and Handel was reinstated in his place and salary. Appreciated? Why, he lived for a long time at Burlington House, and at another period in the family of the Duke of Chandos. Appreciated? In poverty? Why, £50,000 were subscribed expressly for the performance of operas at the Haymarket, composed by him, Bononcini and Attilio Ariosti. The "Royal Academy of Music" in a few years sunk its capital, $250,000, (at a time when money was more valuable than now, and when the public was aghast that a great singer refused to come to London, though the offer of 1,000 guineas had been made!) but Handel had grown rich enough to join Heidegger in the attempt to carry on opera, and posted off to Italy and Germany to get singers. It would be a little singular if after all previous attempts to establish Italian Opera in London had failed, he should have succeeded. As it was, for a time things went on well; but a quarrel between him and his singers led to a breach with his noble patrons—the people had nothing to do with these things then—and soon a rival Opera was established. Both were bankrupt in 1787, and Handel had lost $50,000 which he had previously saved. So that a want of appreciation of Handel's talents had nothing whatsoever to do with the comparative poverty of the few following years. During this year he had an attack of palsy and went to Aix la Chapelle, where he was cured in six weeks and returned to his favorite London.

Now comes the time of "the furious cabal against him in England" and "the empty benches at his oratorios." His last two operas had been composed in 1736-7, and the Earl of Middlesex had paid him for them $5000—appreciative that? He began his new career with "Alexander's Feast," followed with "Israel in Egypt," "L'Allegro ed il Penseroso," &c., &c.; wrote music for Vauxhall Gardens, where a marble statue by Roubillac had been erected at an expense of $1000; published Concertos for various instruments, and against all the opposition of his personal enemies, met with that sort of success with the appreciative few, that on the 14th of April, 1759, he died in the 76th year of his age, worth one hundred thousand dollars. "When a composer is duly appreciated in his own country, he does not expatriate himself or reside permanently abroad," says the writer in the last number of your Journal. I leave it to the common sense of every reader, if Handel expatriated himself because of any stupidity on the part of the "appreciative few" in Berlin, Hamburg or Hanover.

HAYDN.—"After thirty years of labor, or fifty-four thousand hours of work (for he was singularly methodical in appropriating five hours every day to composition, beginning at six o'clock in the morning,) he had laid by the sum of five thousand francs, $1000." I quote this to show that M. Fétis is not only a wonderfully accurate historian but a great, Laplace-like sort of a mathematician.

Joseph Haydn, the oldest of the twenty children of a peasant mechanic in an Austrian Dorf, from his 8th to his 16th year supported himself on the regular salary of a singing boy in St. Stephen's Cathedral at Vienna. When his voice broke, the boy could not well go back to his father, there being no chance there to get his bread by music; he could do nothing else for a living, nor could the peasant support his son in idleness. However, he had had good instructors in the St. Stephen's School, and determined to try his luck as a teacher. He hired an attic room in the house where Metastasio lived, and the poet employed him to give lessons to a Miss Martinez in singing and on the piano-forte. Through him Haydn was then employed to play the accompaniments, when old Porpora gave singing lessons to the lady-love of the Venetian ambassador. In the summer the ambassador and his lady went to a watering place, and Porpora of course with them. Haydn, anxious to retain the advantages of Porpora's instructions—not given to him, got them by being present during the lady's lessons—hired himself to the old master as a sort of footman, for six ducats a month, to board with the officials, not servants, of the Venetian. This lasted three months, during which time he gained the praise of Gluck and Wagenseil, and other great men, for his skilful accompaniments. He studied composition alone.

At 18 years, we find him in Vienna again giving lessons at two gulden ($1) a month, which increases to five before long, and enables him to take better lodgings. He gets sixty gulden a year for musical performances in one of the convents, attends three services at different churches Sundays and festival days as organist or singer, getting seventeen kreutzers—about twenty cents—for each, and evenings goes serenading with some friends, generally playing music of his own. One of these serenades procured him an opera to set, as is well known, which gained him twenty-four ducats, a sum, as he said years afterward, which made him consider himself a rich man. At this time his room was broken open and all he had was stolen, but there was even then an "appreciative few"—and one gave him a black suit, another supplied him with shirts, and Baron Fürnberg took him into his house two months. This life he led until he was twenty-seven, 1759. Not knowing the value of his compositions, which he used to give his pupils, he threw away one source of income. This year he was appointed Music-director by Count Morzin, with a salary of two hundred gulden, free lodgings, and board with the Count's private secretaries and men of business—not his servants. It was at this time that he married the barber's daughter; not the one he loved, she went into a nunnery; but her sister; something like Mozart, though in Haydn's case the marriage was not happy. In 1760, twelve days before he completed his 28th year, he was appointed Kapellmeister by Prince Esterhazy, with a salary of four hundred gulden and other emoluments. This was a small salary and he worked very hard; but it was a life he loved, and though Gluck and other such men advised him to leave, and he had pressing offers from Salomon to visit England, yet he loved the Prince, was happy, and the mere offer of wealth did not affect him. Twice his house was burnt down and the Prince rebuilt it; and he had but to hint at leaving to get a present from Esterhazy any time. His conversations about this period of his life are on record, and they prove that it was no fault of the appreciative few that after thirty years of service, he was poor. At the death of Esterhazy, Sept. 28, 1790, according to Greisinger, a man who knew Haydn intimately many years and knew all about it, his property was 2000 gulden. A gulden is a florin, and an Austrian florin, says Murray, is two and a half francs, so that Fétis' thousand francs becomes 5000. Salomon was in Bonn or Cologne on his way to London when he heard that Esterhazy was dead. He turned at once towards Vienna, and reached that city in a few days. One afternoon, just as evening was coming on, there was a knock on Haydn's door. "Come in!" and there stood his old acquaintance, Salomon, who had so urged him to come to London, and whom he had hitherto refused. The first thing the visitor said, as Haydn used to tell the story, was, "Come, get ready, in fourteen days you go to London!" Haydn—but there are some things which the musical reader is expected to know.

There is no one circumstance in Haydn's history that sustains the assertion that the appreciative few drove Haydn to England. All the sneers, and quotations from the Frenchman, and the logic (!), and the insinuations, and the rhetoric of your last week's correspondent to the contrary, notwithstanding. "The man who hired him having died, we (do not) find him obliged to seek a livelihood in a foreign land." The fact is, that Salomon was so afraid that he should not get him, that he gave him no time to try the Vienna public, and in eleven weeks after Esterhazy's death, he had him on the road—and this Salomon was one of the appreciative few Germans, and had only been in England nine years at the time. The King and Queen of England did all in their power to persuade Haydn to make England his residence, and the Queen promised him rooms in Windsor Castle for his summer abode. They offered to send for his wife, and urged him personally. [See Haydn's own Diary—those who can read German.] But he chose to return, as he expressed it, "to the household of his Prince," which, as we learn from your correspondent of last week, and from "his biographer—the accurate Fétis, I suppose—had always treated him so shabbily.

[Conclusion next week.]

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XLIII.

NEW YORK, March 13.—The last two concerts, "Philharmonic" and "Eisfeld's Soirée," have called out some fine specimens of criticism from our press. An instance or two are worth recording. Beethoven's first symphony in C has for forty-six years been considered as a curious example of the influence of works of acknowledged excellence upon the forms and style of a young artist—as being curiously imbued throughout with the characteristics of Mozart and Haydn, being especially Haydnish in the Andante—not of course slavishly so in its musical ideas, but in the mode of their expression. Now comes the critic of the Albion and says:

"A symphony of Beethoven's, whether it be his first or his last, is a work that always must command the attention of the critic, amateur, and musician. In the present instance we have his earliest symphonic work under consideration, a work marked by all the vigor, power and originality so characteristic of this author. Without being as intricate and difficult as most of his subsequent symphonic works, it is at least equally as agreeable, flowing, and fresh, and if it has not the classical grandeur of many of the subsequent symphonies, it is at least as rich in natural, brilliant, and glowing forms. The Andante particularly is most stamped with the peculiarities of his genius; and by way of parenthesis we may add, that the last movement seems so especially marked by the peculiarities of Mozart's genius, that it might be called plagiarism in a lesser mortal than Beethoven."

Another paper, speaking of Eisfeld's Soirée, at which a quartet from Haydn and one from Beethoven were played, finds a piano-forte Trio by Fesca "the gem of the evening!" A third referring to the same concert, gives his opinion of Eisfeld's song, and adds:

"The other vocal piece was a beautiful Ave Maria, by Kucken, a charming composition, which was exquisitely sung by Madame Bouchelle."

The programme announced it as an Aria from Mozart's Figaro.

March 18. I notice that a correspondent of Dwight's Journal repeats to-day a statement derogatory to the good sense of the London Philharmonic Society in regard to their treatment of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor. That Journal, Vol. II. No. 21, contains enough in relation to its first rehearsal to render it unnecessary to say more than that the statement is an entire mistake, and that upon its public production it was received with extraordinary applause. Does that correspondent know when the work was written, first performed in public, and first rehearsed in London?

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 25, 1854.

NEW VOLUME. On the Eighth of April our Journal will enter upon its third year, and with new assurances of public favor and success. Of course new subscriptions will be now in order. The majority of our subscribers will please bear in mind that their present subscription expires with another number. We trust they will all notify us, before the month is out, of their intention to renew, and that subscribers at a distance will see the reasonableness of our terms as advertised, viz: two dollars per annum in advance.

☞ All who do not expressly notify us of their wish to stop the Journal at the expiration of their term, will still continue to receive it, and be counted as subscribers for another year.

☞ No SUBSCRIPTION RECEIVED FOR A SHORTER PERIOD THAN SIX MONTHS; AND NONE FOR LESS THAN A YEAR, UNLESS PAID IN ADVANCE.

☞ We have enclosed bills to a large number of subscribers who have not yet paid for the year now closing, and beg that they will promptly remit by mail or otherwise.

MEYERBEER'S NEW OPERA. A friend, to whom we have several times been indebted for like favors, translates for us a description of this new opera, whose success has been so complete in Paris, as to have become the topic. Spite of its Russian subject, it seems to ride safely on the heavy sea of anti-Russian public feeling. The plot, it will be seen, is but a variation upon the old plot of Peter the Great in the shipyards of Zandaam, which has served Lortzing for his Czar und Zimmermann, Jullien for his Pietro il Grande, and even Donizetti, if we remember rightly, for one of his forgotten earlier works.

We are happy to be able to present our readers this week with a continuation of the life of Mendelssohn. The writer, be he English or German, evidently chimes in with that peculiar English enthusiasm about Mendelssohn, which is continually frothing over in the London Musical World. We apprehend, however, that for the real, clear, quiet liquid that underlies the foam, one could well go to Germany, even to the "Schumannite Jesuits" of Leipzig. By the way, what does this biographer mean by placing Weber and Mendelssohn in the "same sphere?"

Admiring readers of "Charles Auchester" will follow this narrative with eager interest; but with but small results in the detection of correspondencies between the Seraphical fictions and the literal events of the historical Felix.

An enviable correspondent crows quite tantalizingly over a little oasis which he has discovered in the great circumambient Sahara of our New England "CHOIR SINGING." The list of pieces, which he kindly copies for us, is certainly encouraging. And this reminds us of a suggestion we have long wished to make. Why cannot the more cultivated choirs in our churches, of whatsoever faith, relieve sometimes the humdrum of the common market psalmody by a movement or two from some of the beautiful and truly religious Masses of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini, Hummel, and others? When we witness the real enthusiasm with which this music inspires the little circles of friends, who for several winters have met to practice it, in private houses (and there have been not a few such in this neighborhood), we are inspired with a longing to hear something of the sort in public worship. Such music would be worship! There is the real, vital language of the religious sentiment in it, untrammelled and undeadened by set creeds and forms. But we should insist upon the Latin words. It is a prejudice that would exclude them. For centuries those same few pregnant and expressive words have been wedded with the same devotional and musical themes. In the Kyrie, the Gloria, the Crucifixus, the Benedictus, &c., we have all the phases of the religious, Christian feeling fitly expressed, in words admirable for music. These are immortal, familiar texts, to which the musical composers give continually new and fresh exposition. What if they are not in our own vernacular? It is better, since the meaning lies more in the music, that the words be fit and few, and always the same, and not in any vernacular, but in some sort of consecrated universal language, which Roman, Frenchman, German, American or Russian equally may understand. Now who does not know the meaning of the Gloria? of the Benedictus?—Generations that grow up hearing certain sentiments continually sung to these words, have a vital apprehension of their meaning, without learning Latin. And what if the Mass has been always associated with the Roman Church? Is not inspired music, are not those large and generous texts, more truly Catholic than any church, and therefore fit to be adopted by all worshipping Humanity in God's Church Universal?

Could we have our way, (without of course dictating any one way for all persons and all cases), we would seek greater edification in the would-be-musical department of public worship, by making every musical service to consist of these three kinds, alternating in due proportions:

1. Organ voluntaries, fugues, &c., of the highest and noblest kind, impersonal, pervading the place as with a holier atmosphere, and charming the thoughts upward, as by a sort of spiral Jacob's Ladder of the Fugue, to heavenlier and purer states.

2. At least one plain Chorale, simple, grand, time-hallowed, familiar, sung in unison or harmony by all the congregation who can sing. A dozen or two of these were better than the thousands upon thousands of newly manufactured psalm-tunes. In the simplicity and grandeur of the thing would consist its ever renewed novelty.

3. Singing by a small trained choir, of artists,—at least in spirit and in feeling, and in general culture and refinement,—of pieces of a more artistic character, whose beauty and deep sentiment should penetrate the soul of the listeners. For this what better than extracts from the masses, as above suggested? We might also mention many admirable motets, hymns by Marcello, quartets, trios, &c., from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," or "St. Paul," much of the old Church of England service, &c. &c. There is no lack of good compositions for the purpose, if choirs will but cultivate acquaintance with them, instead of ringing everlasting changes on the short form of a psalm-tune. Psalm-tunes and waltzes are subject to the same fatality in regard to indefinite multiplication; beyond a certain number they will sound all alike.

We merely hint this thought. Observe it is only one plan among many, which we have no doubt might be adopted for the better.

THE NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY have made, as we expected, a very satisfactory reply to the charges of Mr. Bristow, which will be found on another page. The document is manly, dignified, and reasonable.

Our "Diarist," too, is making pretty thorough mincemeat of Mr. Fry's facts. We only regret that we could not give to-day the whole of his interesting and able communication.

Concerts.

GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY. The fifteenth and last of the Subscription Concerts, with a programme almost entirely classical, filled the Music Hall with one of the largest and best pleased audiences of the season. It formed a noble and a fitting close to a series of Concerts, which have been so frequent and in the main so excellent, that one is startled by the thought that what had come to seem a settled habit of our lives, and part of "human nature's daily food," can come to an end, even for a season, and that we must dream of its return not without reckoning the uncertainties of all futures. But one thing, we opine, is certain: the appetite and love for great orchestral music is pretty thoroughly awakened in this community; it is one of the permanent social facts; and it will crave and will have its periodical and frequent gratification, so long as there is talent in the world that can supply it. The Germanians, we cannot doubt, will still find their interest year after year in bringing their perennial products of the Muses to this market, which can never relapse into settled dullness, in spite of any slight and temporary fluctuations. Meanwhile they have not yet left our city on their usual summer tour, to sow the good seeds of true musical taste, (and also reap, we trust, in more substantial kind) throughout the Southern, Western, Northern States, and Canada. They have yet a few weeks left here, which we doubt not they will improve by at least one farewell concert, which should be a bumper. At all events, the music-lovers have still the public rehearsals to fall back upon, every Wednesday and Saturday afternoon, until the 8th of April; at these one always hears at least one good symphony and one good overture, with enough besides to tickle the heels of the waltzers, and revive the spirit of other days to the long fasting habitués and bouquet-flingers of the Italian Opera. (These latter, by the way, may ere long have their fling—not of bouquets indeed—at us tame symphony lovers; for do they not behold a stately edifice and Theatre of all their hopes looming before them in immediate prospect of completion,—substantial, made with hands!)

To return to the concert.

1. What an opening! The ninth, the Choral Symphony of Beethoven! We know not how many persons may have shared our own experience; but,—so we found it last year, and so it was again without the least shade of deduction, Saturday evening—this music was to us the most exciting, the most sense and soul-engrossing, the most satisfying, to which it has ever been our happiness to listen. Surely the most restless, far-yearning, unsatisfied, blasé being, that has tried all experiences, cannot fail, (if there be any spark of soul left in him,) to find something that recognizes and speaks to and speaks for all there is in him, in that grand Faust-like Allegro, which on the back-ground of a strange sense of emptiness (those naked fifths in the tremolo of the first bars) summons before us such giant shadows of Fate, and wrestles with them with heroic and sublime resolve; the stern strife sweetened at intervals by themes of gushing tenderness out of the heart's truest depths. There is a grand note of preparation and of promise in that whole first movement, that shows us purple streaks of dawn as of a glorious day, even across all those colossal, Michael Angelo shadows of despair. Promise that cannot fail! Beethoven indeed always inspires you with that assurance from the moment that he takes you under his conduct, and no matter through what dark, mysterious depths he leads you. But never more strongly so than here. More than the ordinary developments of a symphony were foreshadowed in such a pregnant overture as that Allegro. (Most of our readers will recall Richard Wagner's really illustrative, if fanciful, parallel between the three first movements of this symphony and passages in Goethe's "Faust." Those hearers of the symphony who have not read it, will do well to refer to No. 18, Vol. II. of this Journal, where they will find it translated.) As for the performance, we could only wonder that so small an orchestra could bring out all the bold as well as the delicate outlines of such a piece with so much emphasis and clearness.

Equally successful was the quick-throbbing staccato of the joy-intoxicated Scherzo, full of the abandon of the natural, sensuous hey-day of youth and pleasure; and the pastoral humor (bassoon and oboe) of the episode where the time changes from triple to common. And after such vigorous trial of this kind of joy, this simple but not final solution of the great life problem, come the visitations of serene, sweeter, holier thoughts in one of the most heavenly of Adagios. This was rendered with most delicate expression. The first notes of the different parts in the first measure fall in one after the other, like sweet bells on the evening air. These prelude to the principal melody which, after the manner of a chorale, is given out in sentences or lines, the pause after each line being filled with an interludic echo of its last notes. And then with a change of key from B flat to D major, comes the second main theme, an unbroken stream of a more human and pathetic kind of melody, as of the private heart answering, in sweet tears of penitence and trust, to the consoling sentences of that more impersonal and holy theme. These two themes alternate throughout the Adagio; the melting melody runs into the most fine and exquisite divisions in the violins, which at other times by little pizzicato throbs and snappings of the strings break in upon the smooth flow of the general harmony only to testify their sympathy. How absurd and crazy this talk sounds indeed! And yet one who has the actual music still vibrating upon his spirit's nerves, will have felt what we mean and find some pleasure in the awkwardest tokens of another's recognition of it.

The Adagio was over; and one "recovered himself" (to speak common prose, which sometimes is just the opposite of soul's truth) with a sort of shudder to find that one of the most perfectly harmonious and brimming hours vouchsafed to this mortal life had passed. For with the heavenly comfort of the Adagio, this hearing of the Choral Symphony was cut short. No Choral climax followed; the completion of this grand poetic and musical design in the idea of Unity and Brotherhood, of the embrace of all the millions, and the merging of the human in the divine in one universal hymn to Joy, was relentlessly withheld from us. It would have been far better to have had it, even with imperfect singing, if only to fulfil the expectation raised and heightened by each successive instrumental movement thus far. We longed at least to hear again the great, impatient recitative of the double-basses, trying over by turns and dismissing all the preceding themes, and finally their discovery of the Joy theme and its bursting forth into singing. The voices would, at least have answered for the frame work to hold the exceedingly interesting orchestral parts together, and help the imagination to sketch out the entire design.

Of one thing we could not but be conscious, even when most entirely absorbed in the music; and that was of the unusual degree of attention and interest with which the great mass of the audience listened. During no instrumental performance, at which we were ever present in a large assembly, have the signs of a pervading interest been more unmistakable. The presence or absence of such sympathy in an audience is something one can feel and measure without much scrutiny of outward demonstrations. That audience was ripe for the last great movement with the chorus, and would have followed it with eagerness we have no doubt. But instead of Schiller and Beethoven, we had to quench our eagerness in Meyerbeer; instead of the "Hymn to Joy" the expectant spirit had to adjust itself to

2. An Aria from "Robert le Diable;" a beautiful, pathetic, serious aria indeed, and sung with true style and expression by Miss LEHMANN. It was music enough to fill many a void, but not the void left by the non-completion of the Choral Symphony.

3. The fifth Concerto for violin, with orchestra, by De Beriot, was finely played by WILLIAM SCHULTZE. A spirited composition in the best style of its author, far less hacknied than most violin concertos, and not too long.

4. The Scherzo again from Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, which has become a great favorite, and welcome in all concerts.

5. Part Second opened with a revival of the romantic overture to Tannhäuser, of which enough has probably been said in this column in the earlier part of the season. Suffice it to say that this time the charm did not fail, and that Richard Wagner, so far as this work shows him, has made a deep impression on our truest music-lovers.

6. Mr. HELLER repeated the two last movements, Adagio and Allegro, from the wonderful piano Concerto, in E flat, of Beethoven, which was first introduced to us entire at the preceding classical concert. The Adagio, of course, lost much of its effect thus unprepared by the first and principal movement; yet it has the peculiar virtue of a Beethoven Adagio. The brilliant Rondo produces a singular effect by an ambiguity of rhythm, the theme being in six-eight measure, with the phrasing of three-four; so that the former livelier rhythm, which is the true rhythm of the piece, seems struggling from the detention of the latter.

7. Some of the printed bills deluded their holders with the expectation next of Schubert's "Erl King." But no such hope was gratified. ECKERT's "Swiss Song," the pretty echo piece which he wrote for Sontag, to offset the Lind echoes, was the piece now chosen by the LEMMANN, as if to show that not alone by Sontag could it be effectively presented. We certainly were surprised and charmed by the power and beauty of her rendering. But in such a concert one had reason to expect something higher in one of the songs, at least.

8. The concluding overture was of the modern, third-rate German, noisy, over-strained, struggling for much and coming to nothing order; now making desperate efforts at the pathetic, and then as desperately abandoning them for the lightest jingle. We mean the overture by KREATZER to Das Nachtlager in Granada (The night Camp in Grenada.)

MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY. We had the pleasure of listening on Monday evening to one of the Public Rehearsals which this Society has been giving for some weeks past; and a very pleasant, richly varied, sociable sort of entertainment it was. We found the Meisonaon so crowded with listeners, both the floor and organ loft, that only standing places, and those scarcely inside the doors, remained for the late comers. At a little desk in front of the platform at the lower end of the hall stood Herr Conductor KREISSMANN, and on either side of him in lines across the corners, like two wings, were ranged the male and female choirs, a hundred, or hundred and fifty strong. Our ears were saluted, as we drew near, by the jubilant strains of the first chorus in the "Messiah." And the glory of the Lord, which was sung with much spirit and fine unity and balance of voices.

Then followed a charming duet by Miss DOANE and Mr. KREISSMANN, from Mozart, sung with rich, clear, penetrating voice on the part of the lady, and in excellent style on both parts. A chorus from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" followed quite impressively. An elaborate Italian Aria, by Carafa, was sung by Miss DOANE; a bass song, by a gentleman whose name we did not hear, with a powerful bass voice; and a very beautiful sacred Quartet, of a cheerful character, by Novello, by four finely balanced voices, among which we were struck by the fresh and musical quality of a soprano, new to our ears. Mr. WILCOX added a fine element to the variety, which we wish were more common in musical soirées, in some good organ-playing; among other things he played that pathetic fugue, from the "Messiah," one of the very best things in the oratorio: And with his stripes, &c., for a conclusion to which he aptly appended the solemn close to the chorus: All we like sheep, viz., And the Lord hath laid on him, &c. Handel's jubilant chorus: See the conquering hero comes! and other choruses were sung.

The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY gave another highly successful performance of "Moses in Egypt" last Sunday evening; and have now resolved themselves, again, for the time being, into Committee of the Whole for new rehearsals.

Mlle. DE LA MOTTE'S Soirées closed on Monday evening, with a rich selection. The lady herself performed one of the Trios of Mendelssohn, with the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB; and for solos, Thalberg's fantasia on the prayer in Moïse, and Prudent's on Lucia di Lamermoor. The Quintette Club performed also a Quartet of Mozart's (No. 8, in F), a Quintet with clarinet; by Weber, and one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," arranged by Ryan.

Mr. APTOMMAS'S Harp Soirées also came to an end on Tuesday,—as we hear, with much éclat, although the harpist rose from a sick bed to perform his duty, which we are sorry to see he made doubly arduous for himself by the unnecessary old Simon Stylites sort of penance of playing on two harps at once!

GERMANIA REHEARSALS.—Last Saturday afternoon we had the Pastoral Symphony, finely played as far as the conclusion of the Storm, and there suddenly left hanging in mid air—as it was once by Jullien—by that sunny flute passage which forms the transition to the last movement. We wondered how it was possible to stop there.

On Wednesday last the Rehearsal opened with three of the four movements to Spohr's descriptive Symphony, "Consecration of Tones." The overture to Die schöne Melusine was also played to the great delight of all who appreciate Mendelssohn in his most romantic and unique vein. (See a paragraph about its origin in the biographical sketch on a preceding page.)

Musical Intelligence.

NEW YORK.—The ladies of Grace Church have recently given a complimentary concert to their chief singer, Mrs. BODSTEIN, better known in these parts as Miss JULIA NORTHALL. Niblo's saloon was "filled with the fashionable fair, whose favorite Mrs. B. has always been." Mr. BURKE, the violinist, and other excellent artists, assisted, and the whole thing is said to have been both choice and successful.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTH WEST. The shooting stars of our half of the musical firmament seem to have been all tending to a focus about New Orleans for some time. SONTAG has been giving concerts there, with Jaell and Camille Urso; and more recently has appeared in Italian Opera, as Rosina, &c. Mobile, Natchez, &c. have also had a share of her sweet singing. JULLIEN has given concerts and bals masqués there, too, with great success, and was announced for three concerts in Mobile. OLE BULL and STRAKOSCH have been hovering about in the same region, and had got back as far as St. Louis. We read also of a contemplated operatic excursion of Mme. SONTAG into Mexico. BISCACCANTI and Miss CATHERINE HAYES were still rivalling each other in delighting the excitable inhabitants of Lima.

But New Orleans seems to have been the brilliant musical metropolis of late, having its permanent supply of good French opera, and boasting triumphant performances of Les Huguenots, &c., in addition to the visitations of the stars aforesaid.

PHILADELPHIA.—In the absence of any imposing public performance of music here this winter, more attention than usual has been paid to private musical entertainments; and among others a series of soirées given by Mr. H. Thorbecke at Scherr's Saloon have given great delight to the limited but appreciative company that had the privilege of attending them. The closing one took place last evening. The programme included a septuor of Beethoven, a sextuor of Onslow, a trio of Mayseder, piano solos of Liszt, Mendelssohn, Henselt and Hummel, played by Mr. Thorbecke himself, and a couple of vocal pieces. The execution of all these was admirable, and the favor with which the instrumental concerted pieces were received shows a growing love for the pure and elegant works of the classic composers.—Bulletin.

MOORE'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF MUSIC:

COMPILED BY JOHN W. MOORE,

With the assistance of other distinguished men in the musical world. The intention of the author is to make a most complete and thorough work of the above, which will be a desideratum in the world of music. It will be published in one elegant Royal Octavo volume of about 900 pages, double columns, and will contain a complete

Dictionary of Musical Terms,
A HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE OF MUSIC,
from the earliest time to the present, a

Treatise on Harmony and Thorough Bass,

a description of all known MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, with the names of the most distinguished makers, and a complete Biographical of over three thousand of the most distinguished Composers and Musicians who have ever lived. Mr. Moore has spent several years in compiling this valuable work. It is now going through the press as rapidly as will comport with accuracy.

P. S.—The above splendid work, which will prove invaluable to every professional musician, and to every amateur, will be ready this spring; we hope in the month of March. It has been delayed on account of the immense labor bestowed upon it, and the difficulty of stereotyping a work so full of examples. The delay, however, will enhance the value of the work.

The best Primary Book on Thorough Bass ever issued.

FIRST STEPS IN THOROUGH BASS,

IN TWELVE FAMILIAR LESSONS, ARRANGED IN THE DIALOGUE FORM. BY A TEACHER OF MUSIC.

The mode of instruction carried out in this work has by positive experience proved efficacious in imparting to a pupil of ten years of age, as also to any one who may be ignorant of the subject, correct ideas of the abstruse science of Thorough Bass. "The progress made by those who have learned Thorough Bass in this manner," say the author, "has been so rapid (I had almost said astonishing,) that I have been urged to communicate my method of teaching it to the public, by many good judges who have witnessed its effects with surprise; and though I acknowledge this to be an assertion introduced into prefaces as the names of the publishers are inserted in title pages, it happens in this instance, to be literally true."

Meyerbeer's New Opera "L'Etoile du Nord."

From "La France Musicale."

[Concluded.]

The third act takes us to St. Petersburg, in the palace of the czar. Danilowitz has followed him, and has become his confidential friend. One thought haunts the emperor amidst his political preoccupations: he cannot believe in the death of Catherine. He speaks of her continually; sees her in all around him; and, that she may be ever present to his recollection, he has built in his palace a cottage like that which he inhabited with her in Finland.

No, she is not dead. The poor girl has found an asylum; Danilowitz has concealed her in the imperial palace. But her reason has fled. Catherine no longer recognizes her friends. Nevertheless a ray of hope illumines the mind of Peter the Great; by means of a change of scene he brings us back to the first act, and discovers to our view the carpenter's workshop, the inn, the little shop of the pastry cook, and what is still more extraordinary, all the same characters, living and singing the same songs which we have already heard. There we see Danilowitz passing around his buns; George and Prackowia, the affianced lovers, and Peter the carpenter. Gradually Catherine recognizes her friends, and is saved; it is her brother's flute which she hears, and she replies to him; by her side she recognizes Peter and Prackowia. Now that she has recovered her reason there is but one means of proving that the love of the carpenter was sincere: at a signal from the czar, the doors are thrown open; the maids of honor and the chamberlains place upon the head of Catherine the imperial crown, amid cries of: Long live the Empress! and the drama is ended.

It would require an exceptional organization to render an account after a single hearing, of the contents of a score so considerable and so complicated as that of "L'Etoile du Nord." How is it possible to retain nineteen pieces of music which have each a different character, and which form, in their whole, the most extensive dramatic work that has ever appeared upon the boards of the Opera Comique? We follow the master with interest through his modulations and tonalities, varying at each moment; we seize now and then passages most striking by the originality of their form, by their unforeseen rhythm, by the melange of designs and stamps which undulate a thousand different ways in the orchestra. We exclaim: Here is a grand effect, a chorus, new and of iron stamp; a trio, a quintet, a finale with new attractions, which Meyerbeer alone is capable of writing. But to arrest the attention upon each page, to analyze each detail, and render an account of all the combinations drawn from the resources of science, is impossible, even with the memory of a Mezzofante.

It is easy to say: How fine, how admirable, how sublime; the critic can easily shirk his work with these words. Unless he have the score under his very eyes, we defy the most skilful among them to define his enthusiasm.

Ah! let him say: Such a piece has produced an immense effect, such another has been applauded, such another has been encored; very well. But, once again, to say exactly how these nineteen pieces of music, cast into the mould of composition slowly and with extreme care, have been conceived, is beyond human power. We see a statue, a painting; the eye can rest as long as it likes upon the forms, the groupings, the colors. After having examined them, we may dispute upon their faults or merits, explain why there is here too much light, and elsewhere a shadow too strong and abrupt, why this arm is too stiff, this drapery too dark, or too light.

A few of those sounds which glide into the ear, and vanish upon the lightest breeze, we can retain in their flight; but to pretend to fix in the brain at the very first, all the effects which the musician has drawn therefrom, is by far too daring. It is only after a while, that taking, one by one, each idea enveloped in its forms, and its arabesques, we can feel and entirely comprehend what the artist has wished to paint or express.

The overture is that of the Camp of Silesia; it commences with several measures of the Sacred march; and various motives of the work are very skilfully enshrined therein. There is especially a very elegant phrase, which at the second reprise, played pianissimo, by the harps, the oboes and the flutes is of an extreme suavity. The end of this symphonic piece is vigorous and exciting.

In the first act the introductory chorus, and the verses of Danilowitz (Mocker) are fresh and smiling. The prayer and chorus which follows, accompanied by the continuous tolling of a bell, are of a charming stamp. The gipsy song of Catherine (Mlle. Duprez) with accompaniment on the tambourine, is a spruce, lively song, and the orchestra by its ingenious designs adds much to its attraction. The duo between Mlle. Duprez and Battaille, (Peter) which gives to the singer the opportunity to show the fineness and facility of her voice, without being entirely original, is nevertheless, interesting and agreeable. What must be praised above all in this act is a chorus of young girls; the wedding chorus, which is of a ravishingly melodious calmness; the verses in B \flat of Mlle. Lefebvre (Prackowia), and the whole finale in which the voice of Mlle. Duprez trips poetically through the caressing harmony of the orchestra.

The second act is by far the finest of the opera. It is varied and full of life. At first we have a dancing air, in which the composer, with that audacity which inspires us with an idea of power, has allied two instruments placed at the two extremities of the instrumental scale, the contrabass and the octave flute. It is rather shrill, it is true, but it is novel and happily imagined. Then follow some military couplets sung by M. Delaunay-Riguier, free in rhythm, and of a popular cast. They link themselves to other couplets sung by M. Hermann Léon, and reproduced by the chorus. The turn of their melody is charming; they were encored; the whole tent scene is treated in a most masterly manner; the song of the cantinieres is piquante; it is original, delicate, imitative music, quite in the master's style; it is reproduced in trio, then in quatuor, and blends into a quintet which is certainly one of the most complete, and most happily conceived pieces in the score. Lastly the Sacred March, which is a German national hymn, crowns this act. The instruments of Sax, the drums and the orchestra uniting with the chorus in different tones, attain to a massive effect which is most prodigious. Never has a more formidable tutti echoed beneath the arches of the Opera Comique.

The third act has less musical importance. The duo of the three men, and the duo between Mlle. Lefebvre, and M. Jourdan: Fusillé, fusillé! might without loss be cut down a little. There would still remain, a romance for M. Bataille, some delicate and pretty couplets for Mlle. Lefebvre, which were encored, and the air of Mlle. Duprez, a little fatiguing, it is true, for the singer, but very brilliant, and requiring, to produce its full effect, the voice of a Jenny Lind.

We must praise the execution of the opera; the choral masses and the orchestra are on a par with the work, which, by its proportion exacted a display of forces, far beyond the habits of this theatre. Mlle. Duprez played the part of Catherine with wonderful intelligence, and her talent of vocalist has revealed itself in a new light. Mlle. Lefebvre, in a less important part, sang and played with that charm and dramatic sentiment which are always admired in her; Mmes. Lemerrier and Decroix, had only a few lines, but they sang them delightfully. Bataille, as Peter the Great, produced a great sensation; he is a warm actor, and a sympathetic singer; the creation of this part does him honor. Hermann Léon (the corporal Gritzenko) makes a good old man; he is as comical as the spirit of his part demands; his verses in the second act were perfectly sung. Messrs. Riguier and Mocker complete the execution, and come in for their share of the success. The costumes and scenery were of a dazzling richness and variety.

Mendelssohn.

In compliance with a general wish of the people at Düsseldorf, Felix, Immermann, and Uechtritz undertook a joint management of the theatre, which for some time past had dragged on a miserable existence, and seemed likely to fall into decay, from the incompetency of the directors, and consequent failure of support from the public. As model performances Felix revived Mozart's Don Juan, and Cherubini's Wasserträger, besides Beethoven's music to Goethe's Egmont. He himself wrote two choruses, a march, and music of a military kind for a play of Calderon's. (I am not aware of these pieces having been heard anywhere but at Düsseldorf.) Matters now began to wear a more favorable aspect, and, to ensure further success, a committee was formed consisting of eleven members, who consented to Immermann's assistance in the production of plays, and to the superintendence of Felix in that of opera, and whatever incidental music might be required. Julius Rietz, a pupil and disciple of Mendelssohn, promised his able co-operation, and everything seemed to augur well for the "Stadttheater" of Düsseldorf, which was reopened with all pomp and circumstance on the 28th October, 1834. But there is a fatality attending theatrical managers and caterers for public amusement, which in this case blighted all the fair hopes and expectations which had been raised by the energy of Felix, and the help and good will of his associates. We grieve to record, that Immermann and Mendelssohn quarrelled, and involved in their unhappy dispute the complete downfall of the entire scheme. They were confessedly unable to manage the theatre. Felix was accused of prejudice and exclusiveness, in selecting his singers from Berlin, and the operatic party retorted to the effect that Immermann attached an undue importance to the histrionic performances, thereby depreciating the value of the opera. Objections and arguments of all kinds were the preludes to a final separation. Weber's Oberon was twice given by Mendelssohn, and this is the last we hear of him as conductor of the opera at Düsseldorf. The theatre supported itself with much difficulty till the year 1837.

Most of our readers are aware of the existence of a school of painting at Düsseldorf. The names of Overbeck and other distinguished fresco painters might be here mentioned with honor, as having in their early years studied at this place; and let us add, with pride, that Felix could use his pencil with more than average excellence, and availed himself of the advice and friendship of Schirmer, a professor of landscape drawing at Düsseldorf. Felix dedicated to Schirmer his music to the 114th Psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," and his friend Klingemann has in his possession an album with several drawings by the musician, who was fond of illustrating poetry with pen and pencil also. Moscheles, I am told, has several humorous sketches by Felix in his possession, and though I would not contend that the sister arts found an equally worthy representative in the subject of this memoir,* the facts are worth recording, as illustrating that versatility of taste with which Mendelssohn was undeniably gifted.

The vocal institutions at Düsseldorf (the opera excepted) seem to have flourished chiefly in 1834, during the winter season, for we read of the performance of the Messiah and the Seasons, and other works of magnitude and importance; but the great event of this period was the composition of the greatest part of St. Paul; to this may be added the three Capriccios for pianoforte, Op. 33 (dedicated to Mr. Klingemann), several Songs without Words, the first volume of vocal pieces for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, and three national choruses (Volklieder). The spring of 1835 found Mendelssohn on his way to Cologne, to conduct the festival, which was inaugurated with a performance of Handel's Solomon, with new organ accompaniments by Felix. So heartily appreciated were Mendelssohn's good services, that the musicians presented him with the London edition of Handel's scores, as a slight but significant mark of their gratitude, and upwards of six hundred signed their names to a written acknowledgment of the honor paid them.

Cities and towns seemed to rival each other in paying honor to the artist, whose name in Germany became the theme of every tongue, and Leipsic deputed some of the most influential members of her university to press on him the acceptance of a professorial chair. Felix modestly declined the honor, on the plea of his incapacity for lecturing, and the experience of after years proved that this was a proper distrust of his powers, and no affectation. Nothing daunted at his refusal, they prevailed on him to take the management of the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts, which was to date at the expiration of his engagement at Düsseldorf. He presided at a farewell concert in the latter place on the 2nd July, 1835, and then took up his abode in Leipsic, which became the scene of his noblest achievements. He lived there almost uninterruptedly from September, 1835 to 1844, and from 1845 to the day of his death. That this was a glorious epoch in the history of modern music, and that Leipsic might justly boast of her adopted son, are matters patent to all who have wished to know anything connected with the author of Eljah. His friends, moreover, and the whole atmosphere he breathed here, were admirably suited to favor and encourage him to persevere in his art. He found on his arrival great resources at his disposal, both orchestra and chorus comprising eminent musicians, amateurs and professional. Felix lost no opportunity of exalting the public taste and introducing a love of the highest classical music, and his influence, not confined immediately and exclusively to the society of which he was the leader, met with an abundant harvest, as the memoir will show. He was very conscientious in his selections of music to be performed before audiences of such acknowledged discernment; the oldest masters were not shelved, but the greatest works of each period were given in a series of historical concerts, so that the orchestra and listeners might become familiar with the noblest and best composers of all times.

Here was a liberal-minded conductor, and the cheers which greeted him on the 4th of October, 1835, the first occasion of his leading the Gewandhaus Society, were something more than the mere vulgar applause which is bestowed on public favorites in ordinary. Artist and connoisseur, one and all, knew the value of their lately acquired treasure. The concert began with the overture, entitled Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt, followed by a scena from Weber's Lodoiska, and Spohr's violin concerto No. 11, with the introduction to Cherubini's Ali Baba. Beethoven's Symphony in B flat was given in the second part, and the precision and accuracy with which this great work was rendered commanded the immediate respect of the musicians who had hitherto been conducted by Mathäi, the first violin player in the orchestra. He had won applause as a conscientious reader of Beethoven, but his successor's was the master mind, and it would be unfair to draw comparisons of the earlier performances of this work with the one we are now dwelling on, which was always esteemed at Leipsic one of the happiest revivals under Mendelssohn's management. On the 9th of October, Moscheles appeared, and the two friends performed his duet Hommage à Handel on the 11th of that month, at a subscription concert. The delight of the audience knew no bounds. "Es wurde" (said one of the papers) "von den beiden Freunden so feurig vorgetragen." We shall not give any further details of this series of performances, which continued to please all parties, and satisfy them of their wisdom in conferring the post of conductor on so active and zealous an artist.

Felix now sustained a severe loss in the death of his father, Abraham Mendelssohn, who died at Leipsic about this time. We could wish to know something more of the son of so illustrious a father, and father of so illustrious a son; though it is not to be wondered that the wisdom of the philosopher and genius of the musician should have eclipsed the inobtrusive piety and worth of a private individual in the eyes of the world. But let it be recorded to the honor of the elder Mendelssohn, that his practical benevolence was the means of alleviating his own son's sorrow, when that son was left fatherless, not friendless. It will be remembered by our readers that we stated in an earlier number that Ferdinand David was born at Hamburg, in the very same house where Felix first saw the light in 1809. Ferdinand lost his parents at an early age, and was adopted by the elder Mendelssohn, in whose house he received the chief part of his education. This circumstance naturally brought the two boys together, and both evinced proofs of remarkable powers at a very early age. David practised on his violin, and was first introduced to the public, at Hamburg, his native place; but the real harvest of his triumphs was reaped in Berlin, where he had accepted an appointment in the orchestra of the Royal Opera House. This celebrated pupil of Spohr followed his vocation afterwards in the chapel of a wealthy private gentleman in Dorpat, and, after a separation of many years, we find him restored at a painful time to the friendship of his earliest and most devoted friend. On the death of Mathäi at Leipsic, in the February of 1836, David succeeded to his place, and has continued to hold this distinguished position in the Leipsic orchestra ever since. Thus the two friends met again, and I think it fortunate for the world that they did so. Grievances of a private nature weigh heavily on those who find a solid comfort in domestic sympathy, and the activity of a great man's mind, which has been proof against the scorns and caprice of the world, has often succumbed and yielded to the pressure of private sorrow. Mendelssohn had not yet fulfilled his mission, and he strove with a manly energy to forget his loss in the prosecution of his duties; while his friend was close at hand to cheer and assist him. The season of 1834 witnessed the production of several standard classical works, and Mozart's compositions seem to have been brought out with especial care. Of Mendelssohn's playing that master's concerto in D minor, the Leipsic Journal spoke in enthusiastic terms.

On the 11th of February, the memorable symphony on Schiller's song, "An die Freude,"* was revived. The preparation of this stupendous work is a severe task to any musician wishing to do Beethoven full justice in the interpretation of his magnificent music; but Felix had excellent materials to work with; and, confident of success, the symphony was performed to his own satisfaction, which is a sure guarantee for that of others. Nothing now could exceed Mendelssohn's activity and zeal in and apart from the actual duties of his office at Leipsic. He joined David Graban and others in a quartet association, and on one occasion played the tenor part in an octet which he had composed in early days.† Nor did he neglect his composition, since we find that his oratorio of St. Paul, which he had begun in Düsseldorf, was this winter completed at Leipsic, and the vocal parts were immediately forwarded to Julius Rietz, who put the work into active rehearsal for the approaching festival at Düsseldorf. On the 8th of May, 1836, Felix arrived at the early scene of his crosses and triumphs, and on Whit-Sunday, the 22nd of May, St. Paul was performed. The solo singers were Fischer-Achten, Graban, Schmetzer, and Werfing; and the oratorio was received with decided approbation, to the delight of the author, and the anxious witnesses of his trial, Mendelssohn's younger brother, and the accomplished Fanny Hensel, who knew and felt her brother's power. Of these three members of a happy circle, two have been taken away, the eloquent and gentle brother, "And she who at his side sat listening by, And thought to strains like these 'twere sweet to die"—she, too, is gone!

Thalberg.

We condense the following from Fétis's Biographie Universelle des Musiciens:

Sigismund Thalberg, the celebrated pianist, was born at Geneva, January 7, 1812. At an early age he was taken to Vienna, where his musical education commenced. He is said to have received lessons from Sechter and from Hummel; but M. Fétis states that Thalberg himself denied this, as well as the assertion that he acquired his talent by indefatigable labor. At the age of fifteen he began to excite attention in saloons and concerts. At sixteen he published his first works, now regarded by himself as trifles, but in which there are indications of the peculiar style which he has since developed. One who knows Thalberg as he has since become, both as pianist and as composer, says M. Fétis, will find it interesting to examine his "Mélange sur les thèmes d'Euryanthe," (op. 1.) his fantasia on a Scotch air, (op. 2.) and his impromptu on motives from the "Siège de Corinthe," (op. 3.) which appeared at Vienna in 1828. Two years after this he made his first visit to England to give concerts. The journals of that day are full of him. He had written for this tour a concerto, (op. 5;) but it was not for this speciality that his talent fitted him; the constraint of the classical form and of the orchestra was too much for him. His thoughts then turned to the development of the sonorous power of the piano; to the combinations of various effects; and, above all, to a novelty of which the invention properly belongs to him. The old school of pianists was divided into two principal categories; namely, the brilliant pianists, such as Clementi and his pupils; and the harmonists, such as Mozart and Beethoven. Each of these schools was subdivided into several shades. Thus Dussek, by his national instinct, tended to the harmonic school, although he wrote incorrectly and must be considered one of the brilliant pianists. Kalkbrenner afterwards followed the same direction. On the other hand, Hummel, and then Moscheles, pianists of the harmonic school, gave more of brilliancy to their compositions than did Mozart and Beethoven. But in both schools we remark that song and harmony on the one hand, and the brilliant traits on the other, are always separated, and that these two elements of pianoforte music only appear one by one in turn, and in an order nearly symmetrical. In the brilliant passages of these two schools it is the scales that predominate; the arpeggi appear only at long intervals, and almost always in the same forms. In the singing and harmonious passages, if the two hands are brought together they occupy but one side of the key board; if they are widely separated they leave a void between them; the harmony is not filled up. Such was the state of piano playing when Thalberg conceived the idea of uniting song and harmony and brilliant passages in one, instead of letting them alternate with one another by a sort of formula. He sought to make the whole key board speak at once throughout its entire compass, leaving no void in the middle. This thought, gradually matured and developed, led him to the discovery of a multitude of ingenious combinations of the fingers, whereby the song or melody could always be heard strongly accented in the midst of rapid arpeggio passages and very complicated forms of accompaniment. In this new system the scales ceased to be a principal part in the brilliant piano music; different forms of arpeggi took their place; the fingering was greatly modified; and the frequent passage of the thumb became its essential characteristic. It was by means of the thumb, taken alternately in the two hands, that the melody established itself in the centre of the instrument.

In 1830 Thalberg made an artistic tour through Germany. In 1834 he accompanied the Austrian Emperor Ferdinand, as pianist to the imperial chamber, to Toplitz, to the meeting of his sovereign with the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia. There his playing awakened a warm interest. But his true European fame dates from his success in Paris during his first visit there in the latter part of the year 1835. Since then he has made frequent tours in France, Belgium, England, Russia, and Germany; and everywhere the precision, delicacy, and finish of his playing, the beautiful sound which he draws from his instrument, the brilliant effects which he combines, and the individual charm which he has put into his musical forms, have excited a general enthusiasm. These forms, imitated by most of the new school pianists in their compositions, or rather their arrangements of themes from operas, have become the fashion of nearly all the piano music of our time. Thalberg and Liszt stand preëminently at the head of this new school of pianists. Among the productions by which Thalberg and his peculiar method have acquired the most celebrity, are his fantasias on themes from "Robert le Diable," from "Les Huguenots," from "Moïse," from "Don Juan," and from "La Donna del Lago." He has also published some charming études; and more recently in England (1853) a course of instructive exercises entitled "The Art of singing applied to the Piano-Forte." This very useful work is now in course of re-publication by Oliver Ditson, in this city.

Letter from the Diarist.

MOZART at the age of sixteen had made the tour of Europe, and returned to Salzburg just at the time that great brute, that villainous old monster, Archbishop Jerome, was installed. We know what the boy suffered until he arrived at the age of manhood; and this not because none appreciated him, but because he could not leave his timid father, who dared not leave Salzburg. As soon as he was of age we find him with his mother travelling toward Paris. At Augsburg he writes a long letter describing a piano-forte to his father, it being a new instrument, just then coming into use. This brings up the piano tuning story. He reached Paris March 23d, 1778, at the age of twenty-two, and was the Liszt or Thalberg of his time. I will not stop to discuss the question, whether there were any pianos in Paris at this time, as we have the tuning story upon the authority of "a venerable ex-professor of the Conservatoire, who knows all about it." Yes, rather venerable, as it is now seventy-five and a half years since Mozart left Paris, and the ex-professor must have been then some sixteen or eighteen years old to have his testimony of any value now.

In fact Mozart was set to work composing a Miserere, an operetta for the French Theatre, half the music to a ballet, a sinfonie concertante, &c. But let the reader look into Holmes's Life, made up mainly from Nissen's collection of Mozart's letters, and see the history of these—years?—of these six months and three days! Yet during this half year he obtained a duke's daughter for a pupil, was invited into the highest society, where he made many influential friends, and had the place of organist at Versailles, with a small salary of only three hundred dollars, it is true, but with six months leave of absence annually, and of course with plenty of time to write operas, instrumental music and what he pleased. It strikes me that the "appreciative few" wished to keep him in Paris. He would not take anything under a Kapellmeister-ship, and none became vacant in those six months. He formed a great friendship for Le Gros, the director of the Concert Spirituel; and the same letter in which he says he will not write anything without fixing the terms beforehand, concludes with the announcement that Le Gros had engaged him to write an oratorio for the next Lent. "I am in wonderful favor with M. Le Gros." Le Gros performed his symphony and was delighted with it. This letter is dated in July after the death of Mrs. Mozart, and contains also this passage, in which he refers to that event: "I write this in the house of Madame d'Épinay and M. Baron de Grimm, with whom I am now staying, and where I have a pretty little room with a pleasant prospect, and am, as far as circumstances will permit, happy." Perhaps the old gentleman who knows all about it may be right, and that Baron Grimm's protégé did use to go about tuning pianos.

But the poor bereaved father wanted to see his only son. That son was of a slender constitution and ill fitted to make his way alone in the world, and so he gave up all to filial duty and went back at the end of the six months and three days to His Most

* The ninth (choral) symphony.—

Gracious Reverence, the villainous, contemptible Archbishop of Salzburg. He was nearly four months in getting there, having arrived January 11, 1779. In 1780 he got leave of absence and went to Munich to compose Idomeneo. See how he writes from there, and judge whether the "appreciative few" must hear the blame of his being ill treated in a little, out of the way country town, at that time of eight or ten thousand inhabitants perhaps, by a miserly, thick-headed archbishop:

"You know, my dear father, that it is only my love to you that keeps me at Salzburg; for, by Heaven! if it rested with me, I would have torn up my appointment and relinquished my situation before I came away." * * * "The distinguished patronage I have here would well supply my wants, to say nothing of what might accrue by deaths, for which nobody can wait—and yet these are no disadvantage to an unemployed man."

How Idomeneo was received need not be stated; Fétis—he is a good critic—considers it the basis of all the music of our day. Mozart did make up his mind to stay in Munich, but it is supposed that Count von Seau concealed this from the Elector. In March 1781, he was ordered from Munich to Vienna, and was there on the 17th of that month. The indignities heaped upon him by the Archbishop he bore for two months only in spite of his father, and in May resigned. For two years he was happy and not pressed for money. And for several years his receipts from lesson giving, from playing at concerts, and from subscription concerts of his own were very large. (See his letter to his father, March, 1784, Holmes, page 246.) The Emperor Joseph was an old ass in music as in every thing else, and nothing pleased him but the namby pamby, thin scores of a set of Italians then in Vienna, which was unfortunate enough for Mozart. The composer was arrested once for thirty florins, about fifteen dollars—not five—not from want of a good income, but because he and his young wife knew not how to take care of money. In 1785 he gave a series of six subscription concerts, and at that of March 12, cleared 559 florins. The "appreciative few" did all they could for Mozart, but the Emperor alone had the power of appointing to a kapellmeistership worth having; Esterhazy's being filled by Haydn. In 1786 he produced the "Marriage of Figaro," and this was not well received by the Viennese. This troubled him pecuniarily. His own sickness and that of his wife—she was sick a year and a half—brought him to poverty. The success of Don Juan did not much help him. Two years after he might have been permanently situated—better than any other composer in Germany, as four years before he might have gone to England under the best auspices. It was in 1789 that the king of Prussia offered him personally three thousand dollars a year, to go to Berlin, and gave him a year to decide in. And the reason he did not go was similar to Haydn's for not leaving Esterhazy. He personally liked the Emperor, and therefore remained, living by giving lessons and upon the miserable salary of chamber composer, hoping for better times. One year and a half of deep poverty, but of immense productiveness, and then an opening was made for him in the Kapellmeistership of St. Stephens, and commissions for works in various parts of Europe came pouring in. But his good fortune was too late. The "appreciative few" had sustained him ten years against the Emperor and the Italians, until success was sure; but his feeble constitution had given way, and he did not live to enjoy that success. This was the bitterest pang of his dying bed. Mozart was a new man—his style was new and opposed to all the preconceived notions of the Emperor and his musical toadies. In his great work for the Imperial Theatre, Figaro's Hochzeit, he failed of course, for he undertook to write a comic opera, when according to the author of "A Letter to Mr. Willis" he was utterly without comic power. The success of three works produced for other theatres than that of the Emperor, did open the eyes of old Stupid, and in less than five years from the time when Joseph preferred Martini's light, superficial Una Cosa Rara to Figaro, the author of Figaro received the finest musical appointment in Austria. The amount of it was this: Mozart was determined to conquer the prejudices of the powerful unappreciative few, and to stay in Vienna; and by almost superhuman exertions, in spite of the opposition of a whole army of Italian composers, singers and musicians, he did this after the failure of his Figaro, in the short space of four years. But such intense and uninterrupted labor was too much for a constitution to which severe illness and anxiety for his wife had already given so dangerous a shock.

[Conclusion next week.]

The New Metropolitan Hall.

Mr. La Farge has determined to rebuild the musical hall on its old site. He designs to erect marble stores on the Broadway front, precisely after the same beautiful design of those which were burned. The upper portion of the building will probably be finished as before, and appropriated to the same purposes, (hotel, &c.) though this is not yet definitely determined. The whole ground will be covered by the new building. This lot has one hundred feet front on Broadway and Mercer street, and is one hundred and fifty feet in depth. But while the public may felicitate itself upon this added ornament to the "palatial" structures that already grace Broadway, it is a far greater subject of gratulation that New York will soon be able to boast of a Musical Hall, which she can point to with pride and pleasure as the most elegant and best adapted to this purpose of any in the country.

The new Hall will have one great advantage over the old one, and over most others, in being upon the ground floor. It will be provided with ample means of egress, in case of fire. There will be nine doors on Mercer street, all opening outwards, and one main entrance from Broadway, twenty-five feet in width. There will also be another entrance from Broadway, seventeen feet in width, in the centre of the building, to be used in case of fire or other emergency. The main stairway will be eleven feet wide, and will be closed with a heavy balustrade.

The capacity will be greater than that of the old hall, and it is designed to accommodate five thousand persons. The parquette will be elegantly finished and furnished. There are to be three tiers of boxes, richly ornamented with decorations of white and gold. The drawings of the proscenium boxes, are among the most beautiful and elaborate we have ever seen. These are doubled, having two on each wing of the first and second tiers of boxes, making four on each side, and eight in all. They are to be of the Renaissance order of architecture, the most beautiful and appropriate known for this purpose.

The stage is to be fifty-five feet deep and ninety-six feet in width—about the same size as the Broadway Theatre stage. The ceiling is to be surmounted with a magnificent dome, forty-five in diameter. This is to rest upon a richly ornamented balustrade which is to run all around it, and which is admirably adapted for ventilation. In fact the whole ventilating arrangements of the hall are after the latest and most improved plans. The height of the interior, from floor to dome, will be sixty-eight feet. The side walls, ceiling and dome are to be superbly painted in fresco by Gattesini, the same artist who designed and executed the frescoes in the old Hall.

The extreme dimensions of the new Hall are to be ninety-five feet by ninety-six. There are to be many features unlike anything that has hitherto been attempted in this country. These are the creation of J. M. TRIMBLE, Esq., the architect and builder. He was the architect of the old hall, the Broadway Theatre, and the Metropolitan Theatre at Buffalo. There are various other monuments to his skill and taste, and he has determined that this shall eclipse them all.

His professional pride is piqued, and he is incited to greater ambition than he has hitherto felt, since the projectors of the new Opera House in Fourteenth street would not look at him, simply because he had never been to Europe. He proposes to furnish something now that will prove that American architects understand their business quite as well as foreigners. An examination of his plans makes us confident of his success.

We may also notice in this connection, that the idea of building a new Theatre on Broadway, near Fourth street has been abandoned, in consequence of the rebuilding of Metropolitan Hall. Perhaps it may not be out of place to say that the subscription for stock to build the new Music Hall, which was to have been erected, under the same name, on the site of the Academy of Design, progresses but slowly, and that the project may fall through altogether. But one we must have, and we care not which.—N. Y. Mirror.

From the Bizarre.

The Sultan as a Critic.

As soon as any artist who has given a series of concerts in Paris thinks it expedient to make a tour, he immediately begins to torment every unsuspecting individual, who has not had the sense to conceal the fact of his having foreign acquaintances, for letters of recommendation. Letters must be written to some innocent banker or amiable ambassador, or generous friend of the fine arts, stating that Monsieur A—, or Madame B—, is about to give concerts in Amsterdam or Copenhagen, and hoping that the recipient of the letter will be so kind as to give them some encouragement and assistance. This system of tactics has in general the most lamentable result, particularly for the person recommended.

I heard a story last winter when I was in Russia, of a singer and her husband, who having done St. Petersburg and Russia without much success, nevertheless thought themselves sufficiently meritorious to ask for letters which would give the entrée to the court of the Sultan. The fact of Russia having shown them the cold shoulder, they thought an additional reason why they should try their fortune under a more propitious sky. Our couple set off, well recommended, following, like the three wise men, the perfidious star which guided them to the East. They arrive at Pera, their letters produce the desired effect, and Madame is informed that she will be allowed to sing her ballads before the Commander of the Faithful. A concert is to be given at the Court—four black slaves bring in a piano, a white slave (the husband) follows with the music and shawl of the fair songstress. The candid Sultan, who had no idea of what he was doomed to hear, seats himself on a pile of cushions, surrounded by his principal attendants. His narghilé is lighted, and as it sends forth a volume of odorous smoke, the cantatrice begins this plaintive ballad of M. Panseron:—

"Je le sais, vous m'avez trahie,
Une autre a mieux su vous charmer;
Pourtant, quand votre cœur m'oublie,
Moi, je veux toujours vous aimer.

"Oui, je conserverai sans cesse
L'amour que je vous ai voué;
Et si jamais on vous délaisse,
Appelez moi, je reviendrai."

Here the Sultan makes a sign to a dragoman interpreter, and says to him—with the well-known laconicism of the Turkish language: "Naoum"—whereupon the interpreter, turning to the husband, says: "His Highness orders me to tell you that your wife will have the goodness to stop."

"But she is just beginning—it would be such a mortification."

During this dialogue the lady, rolling her eyes, still continues the plaintive ballad of M. Panseron:—

"Si jamais son amour vous quitte,
Faible, si vous la regrettez,
Dites un mot, un seul, et vite
Vous me verrez à vos côtés"

Hereupon a new sign from the Sultan, who, stroking his beard, throws over his shoulder a remark to the dragoman: "Zeick." Whereupon the dragoman to the husband (the lady still singing the plaintive song by M. Panseron): "The Sultan orders me to tell you that if the lady does not stop immediately, he will have her thrown into the Bosphorus." This time the trembling husband hesitates no longer, and clapping his hand on his wife's month, rudely interrupts the touching refrain,

"Appellez moi, je reviendrai, Appellez moi, je——"

An awful silence ensues, only broken by the sound of the drops of perspiration which fall upon the piano from the brow of the husband.

The Sultan remains immovable, and our two travellers dare not retire; when suddenly a new word, "Boulack," breaks from his lips in the midst of a cloud of smoke. The interpreter addresses the husband:

"His Highness orders me to tell you that he wishes to see you dance."

"See me dance?"

"No other."

"But I am no dancer—am not an artist. I merely accompany my wife to carry her music and shawl, and really—"

"Zeick Boulack," interposed the Sultan, exhibiting signs of impatience.

"Sir his Highness orders me to tell you that if you do not immediately begin to dance, he will have you thrown into the Bosphorus."

There is no alternative, and so our poor wretch commences a series of the most absurd capers, which he continues until the Sultan, stroking his beard for the last time, cries with a terrible voice: "Daioum be boulack Zeick."

And the interpreter: "Stop—his Highness orders me to tell you, that you and your wife may retire, and must leave Turkey to-morrow, and that if you ever return to Constantinople, he will have you both thrown into the Bosphorus."

Sublime Sultan, admirable critic! what an example for us! Why, oh why is not the Bosphorus in Paris?

I did not hear whether the unfortunate couple pushed on to China, or if the tender cantatrice obtained letters of recommendation to the Celestial Emperor. It is more than probable, as nothing has been heard of them. In that event, the husband has either perished miserably in the Yang-tse-kiang, or has become danseur to the son of the Sun.

Verdi.

Since Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti, this composer has been the reigning star of the Italian opera. Yet though his operas have been for several years the fashion and the rage in every theatre throughout the world, where operas are heard, it is in vain that we have searched for any satisfactory notice of his life. The following from the Illustrated London News, for May 30, 1846, is all that we can find:

GIUSEPPE VERDI was born in an insignificant village of Lombardy, called Busseto. His family was poor, and unable to defray the expenses of a musical education for the young Giuseppe, who derived his first ideas on the subject from the organist of the village church. He soon found, however, friends and appreciators of the extraordinary talent he manifested; and by the intervention of these he was at length sent to Milan. At an unfortunate season, at the Scala (1839), he brought out his first opera, Oberto di San Bonifacio, a work which, though unequal in its parts, and displaying many of the faults of a young composer, nevertheless contained portions of extraordinary merit. But the young, unknown and almost unbefriended composer was not likely to meet a better fate than all the other writers, whose works that year had met with defeat at La Scala. The work was for a time buried in oblivion, but at length exhumed by the kindness of a zealous friend of Verdi, named Pasetti la Marini. Mrs. Shaw, Salvi, the tenor, and Marini, the basso, all appeared in this opera, which created, on this, its second appearance, such a fanatismo as can only be witnessed in Italy.

An opera buffa was the next work undertaken by our composer; but during its composition he lost his beloved wife, and certainly, after that, his thoughts tended rather to the serio than the buffo. This work however has been reproduced at Venice with a success that would not have been expected, considering the circumstances under which it was written. But Verdi's day of triumph was approaching. "Nabucco," known and admired in England as "Nino," created a degree of enthusiasm extraordinary even in Italy. It was performed sixty times running, and, on each occasion the actors had to retrace their steps from twenty to thirty times before the curtain, after the fashion of Italian theatres. "I Lombardi," the next work brought out, enjoyed perhaps still greater triumph on account of the brilliant talent of Frezzolini, whose style of singing is admirably adapted to do justice to the works of Verdi's school. "Ernani" is another of his most popular compositions. Then followed "Giovanna d'Arco," also performed in by Frezzolini, a magnificent work and brilliantly successful, "Alzira" and "I due Foscari," the latter hardly equal to those we have named. The last work (1846) of the great maestro is "Attila," a highly dramatic and most original composition, with a degree of local coloring and effectiveness quite new to the lyrical stage. This opera, brought out at Venice with Loewe, Guasco, Marini and Constantini, enjoys that favor which the works of this master always command among his countrymen. The enthusiastic appreciation in Italy of a composer of Verdi's stamp would appear strange to those who have imagined Italian musical taste to be represented by the sickly, sentimental compositions until lately classed as "Italian music" par excellence; but Verdi's works show that the "fatherland of song" has newer and more vigorous resources.

The writer adds that Verdi was then (1846) thirty years of age, though looking much older. The traces of care and illness, as well as of deep thought, were visible on his countenance. He lived quiet and retired; his active mind, however, was always employed, and he devoted a large portion of time to his musical and literary studies.

Verdi's operas have been among the most prominent and popular of those presented by Italian troupes in this country, also, since "Ernani," the greatest favorite of them all, was first presented in Boston and New York about the year 1847, by such singers as Tedesco, Perelli, Vita and Novelli. "I Lombardi," "Nabucco," "Attila," "Macbeto" (a later work than either of the above named, in which Bosio and Badiali rendered the principal parts), have also had their turn of favor. The last opera of Verdi, which appears to be enjoying great favor in the European theatres at this present time (1853), is "Rigoletto."

A MODERN COMPOSER APPRECIATED. We commend the following, which we clip from a Philadelphia paper, to the attention of our friend Fry:

William Vincent Wallace, the talented and popular composer, has four original operas nearly completed, two of which are for Mr. Beale, of London, and two for a Paris house. Mr. Wallace is to get from six to eight thousand dollars for each of these works, the titles of which are the "Maid of the Wreck," the "Spirit of the Rhine," "Il Corsare," and the "Amber Witch." The opera of "Maritana" has yielded its author, up to the present time, very little short of $20,000. Mr. Wallace, who has been residing in this country during the period necessary to obtain his naturalization and secure the copyright of his works, is shortly about to visit Europe.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 1, 1854.

NEW VOLUME. With next Saturday's number the JOURNAL OF MUSIC will enter upon its third year. Of course now is the time to RENEW OR TO COMMENCE SUBSCRIPTIONS. Subscribers will see the reasonableness of our terms as advertised, viz: $2.00 per annum, by mail, and $2.50 by carrier, both IN ADVANCE.

☞ All who do not expressly notify us of their wish to stop the Journal at the expiration of their term, will still continue to receive it, and be counted as subscribers for another year.

☞ No SUBSCRIPTION RECEIVED FOR A SHORTER PERIOD THAN SIX MONTHS; AND NONE FOR LESS THAN A YEAR, UNLESS PAID IN ADVANCE.

☞ We have enclosed bills to a large number of subscribers who have not yet paid for the year now closing, and beg that they will promptly remit by mail or otherwise.

☞ The Title-page and Index for the volume now completed, are already in type, and will be supplied together with the next number.

☞ Bound volumes of the past year's issue, as also of the first year, will be ready in a week or two. We can supply single back numbers of any volume to those who wish to make their files complete.

Our "DIARIST," we are grieved to learn, is ill with fever in New York, and has thus been frustrated in his design of sending us this week the conclusion of his letter about the world's treatment of the great composers. It yet remains for him to speak of Beethoven.

Our Journal of Music has now lived two years, and with good spirits and assurance of much sympathy prepares to start next Saturday upon another twelve months' voyage. Two years, in such a journal, implies some measure of success. Ours has been moderate, and yet we count it as success. Outwardly, the Journal has done something more than pay its way; and were its bad debts (!) guaranteed, the editor would have a decent remuneration left for his own labors, after all the rest are paid. Our Journal can at least take comfort in the thought that it has lived two years and owes nobody.

Our success in making such a Journal of Music as we from the first aspired to make, and felt to be most needed, has, if we may trust the many favorable assurances from good quarters, been somewhat better than our success in selling it. And yet the most we dare presume upon is credit for having given as good as we have received. With more means, more subscribers, we could have done much more. Double our list and you supply us with the means of enriching our columns both in amount and quality of matter; of engaging other minds and talents to lend fresh variety of interest; of securing a more regular correspondence from the chief centres of the musical world; to say nothing of organizing an outward business machinery (by many deemed the prime condition of all success in journal enterprises) for advertising and pushing our paper into circulation, and relieving the editor, who has work enough in editing, from the annoying and distracting daily drudgery of book-keeping and dunning—Heaven save the mark!

One thing we feel we have accomplished. We have demonstrated the value and practicability of a high-toned, independent, candid musical journal; one that need not cater to low tastes and prejudices, and speculate upon the interests of persons, instead of holding up the real interests of Art, as something quite impersonal and holy. In doing this, we could not fail to make some enemies; but we have also made more, or at all events more valuable friends. Of marketable commodities, and of convenient notices of such, others will take care to supply enough. But what the earnest and truth-seeking musical public did want, was an organ that should treat Music always as an Art and not as a trade. Our readers will surely give us credit for so much. If we have failed at any time to utter the true word, to render justice to all schools and tastes, to see beyond our own idiosyncrasy (of which every mortal has his own), to truly recognize and successfully describe the strong or weak points of a performer or composer,—it has always been too clearly at the cost of our own outward interest, where we lost favor with the great world that pays, and where all we had to gain was credit with the rightly-seeing, sober few, for upright purpose.

This in the long run we have thought to be the only solid basis of success in such a journal. It may lack a thousand most desirable qualities of tact or knowledge in its editing; but if it be animated by the real earnest spirit and love of Art, and show determined candor, these other requisites are pretty sure, so we have fancied, to become its own in time. The editor in this case knows his own limitations and short-comings; but if he succeed, as in some measure he has already done, in establishing a journal of the right tone and character, that shall seem obviously fit to live and grow and become richer and better,—why, every talent that it needs will surely flow towards it,—for such is the economy of nature. And this hope, so far, has been by no means feebly justified in the valuable communications, often from various sides and points of view, that have been volunteered to the enriching of our columns, and the thought of which causes us to feel that in one sense at least we do owe somebody.

We trust that we shall still continue to merit and receive these favors. And we again renew the invitation to all those, who have earnest thoughts to utter about Music or about other arts, or Art in general, to make these columns their medium of communication with a large number of the right sort of readers: the reception of such articles being subject, of course, to those fitnesses of things which the editor alone can fully appreciate. Especially do we renew this invitation to sincere and courteous representatives of different sides of mooted questions from our own, or of schools of Art to which we are not partial, and of which we cannot speak so often or so enthusiastically as to satisfy their warm adherents.

We are fully aware that we have been (though sometimes we have only seemed to be) at issue with some formidable parties. The Italians in musical taste think us too German; chiefly because there has been little besides German for the year past to talk about; the opera, in which alone one does not miss the essence of Italian music, having kept aloof from us, in waiting, we suppose, for our new Theatre. The "Native American" party, of which there are recently two branches, not much in sympathy with one another—the psalm-book makers, and those who put forth novel claims in the high walks of symphony and opera—accuse us of entirely too much talk about the foreigners;—as if Mozart and Beethoven could be foreign in any sphere where music's power is truly felt. Some of the psalmodists charge us with magnifying Art above Worship (witness the N. Y. Musical Review of this week):—as if a low idea of Art were essential to a high idea of Worship, and as if a true artist could be and not be religious;—whether according to another person's type and pattern of religion, is another question. And generally we have found ourselves, by a fatality to which we are quite reconciled, continually at issue in our criticisms with the merely money-seeking views of those engaged in music. Public performers love praise; they think it their chief capital and fortune; and so exacting of it are the adventurous concert-givers who come here, and above all some of our young and native singers, that no report appears to them to do them justice which does not lavish praise more absolute than the world's greatest artists can command in Europe. The kindest mention of a slight defect, or the failure to express positive enthusiasm, is taken as a wilful wound inflicted by a spirit of harsh and arrogant criticism. It has been our happiness to notice, however, as a general rule, that the best, the truest artists, are the least sensitive to candid criticism.

But we have not room here to review our entire position. Before long we intend to consider fully this whole subject of criticism. Meanwhile, if we have dwelt perhaps too exclusively upon what are recognized as the world's highest models in musical Art, and have shown less interest in a thousand new things that engage individuals so eagerly, our justification may be found in this: that there were organs and orators enough to cry up all that was done for music in the mere marketable way, and that we thought it legitimate to enter a sphere that seemed comparatively unoccupied, that of the calm discussion and interpretation of the higher forms of Art without regard to individual or party interests.

Concerts.

For one week we have enjoyed an almost unbroken lull of the concert fever. So much the more refreshing was the Germania Rehearsal, on Wednesday; and doubly so, that we were treated, without warning, to a programme worthy of the best kind of regular concert. So far as the selection was concerned there was not one piece which anybody could find fault with. First came Beethoven's Seventh Symphony entire. Next ROBERT HELLER played two piano pieces of Mendelssohn, namely, a "Song without Words" and the Rondo Capriccioso. Then to the agreeable surprise of everybody, came the overture to Tannhäuser. Miss LEHMANN sang, and with great power and beauty, too, the arch song from "The Barber," Una voce paco fa, and when recalled, the pretty Swiss echo song of Eckert. A spirited set of waltzes by Lanner, and the "Wedding March," completed the entertainment.

By the way, we cannot resist the temptation to lay before our readers, some of the anonymous requests addressed to "Dear Mr. Bergmann," which have fallen into our hands, and which in this case certainly were quite sensible, and deserved to be complied with as they were. It certainly speaks well for the progress of musical taste when "we girls" call for seventh symphonies.

YOU DEAR MR. BERGMANN,

If you do not play the Seventh Symphony next Saturday we never will forgive you in the world, and by the way we hope you will play the Wedding March at the same time.

"ONE OF YOUR MANY LADY FRIENDS."

Monday.

DEAR MR. BERGMANN:

Will you be so kind as to have your delightful Germanians play the Wedding March next Saturday. We girls have been dying to hear it, and you have hardly played it all winter. Do pray, now, wont you? that is a good man. Yours, &c.,

S—B—.

Monday, March 27, 1854.

CARL BERGMANN, ESQ.:

SIR,—By having your esteemed company play Beethoven's Seventh Symphony at the next Rehearsal you will greatly oblige a large number of your lady friends.

Yours respectfully,

Boston, March 25, 1854.

JOHN SMITH.

CONCERTS AT HAND. This afternoon another GERMANIA REHEARSAL, and again next Wednesday.

On Monday evening the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY give another of their pleasant rehearsals in the Meionaeon. The music will consist of noble oratorio choruses, and songs, duets &c., from pleasant singers, for whose names see advertisement.

For Thursday (Fast day) evening the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, announce an extra performance of the ever popular "Moses in Egypt."

On Saturday evening of next week our concert season will come to something like a formal close in a FAREWELL CONCERT of the GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY. Besides the aid of Miss LEHMANN and Mr. HELLER, they are to be assisted by the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY, who will sing some choruses from 'Elijah' and the 'Messiah.' We hear also that a repetition of the Choral Symphony is contemplated, besides other fine things enough to make it the richest concert of the season.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB give a Sacred Concert in Salem to-morrow evening, assisted by Mrs. Wentworth, Mr. Arthurson, and the there resident brilliant pianist, Mr. CARL HAUSE.

Communications from "K.," and from "A constant and sympathizing Reader," shall receive attention.

Musical Intelligence.

LONDON.—STERNDAL BENNETT'S SOIREES. The second of these came off on Tuesday evening, before a brilliant and fashionable audience, that filled the Hanover Square Rooms to the Walls. The programme merits quoting:

Programme.—Part first: Quintet, E flat—Mozart; Sonata, E flat, piano-forte—Haydn; "The Spirit Song"—Haydn; Sonata, op. 23, A minor, piano-forte and violin—Beethoven. Part second: Sonata Duo, op. 32, piano-forte and violoncello—Bennett; Aria, "O! cara Immagine"—Mozart; "Lieder ohne Worte," No. 4, 7th book, Andante Sostenuto—Mendelssohn, No. 4, op. 2, Allegro molto vivace—Fanny Hensel; Songs, "Day and Night"—J. L. Hatton; "Summer"—Joseph Robinson; Selections, Capriccio, A minor, Tema e variazioni—piano-forte—Bennett.

The fresh and unartificial quintet of Mozart (which was composed in 1784), delighted everybody. The parts for oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, were efficiently sustained by Messrs. Gratton, Cooke, Williams, Hardy, and Waetzig, Mr. Bennett himself being at the piano-forte. Equally welcome in its way (though not half so good a composition in the same key) was Haydn's Sonata, dedicated to Madame Bartolozzi (mother of Madame Vestris), which Mr. Bennett played to perfection. The divine (though little) sonata of Beethoven, could not fail to delight, when executed by two such players as Mr. Bennett and M. Sainton. The sonata of Mr. Bennett, for piano and violoncello, improves on every hearing. A more faultless performance of this charming work than that of the composer and Signor Piatti (to whom the sonata is dedicated) was never heard. The beautiful Lied in D, from book 7 of the "Songs without Words," was charmingly played by Mr. Bennett, and the sparkling composition of the same class, composed by Madame Fanny Hensel (Mendelssohn's lamented sister, whose sudden death was followed so speedily by that of the great composer himself), was encored. It was new to the audience, and Mr. Bennett, to whose style of playing it is peculiarly suited, did well to introduce it. The selections included the quaint capriccio in A minor, and the Tema con variazioni in E, two of the latest compositions of the author—both bagatelles, but both of the most refined.

The vocal music was well chosen and well sung. Mr. Herbert (who lately replaced, at a few hours' notice, the renowned Sims Reeves, in Elijah, at Exeter Hall) sang Mozart's lovely aria very gracefully; and Miss Dolby was more charming than ever in Haydn's "Spirit Song," and the two pretty ballads of Mr. Hatton and Mr. Robinson. Mr. Harold Thomas (pupil of Mr. Bennett) accompanied the songs exceedingly well. The concert was altogether delightful.

MUSICAL WINTER EVENINGS. Mr. Ella commenced his winter series of Chamber Concerts, the avant-courier of the Musical Union, on the evening of the 23d ult., before an audience less numerous than select, and more attentive than enthusiastic. The following was the selection:—

Quartet, E flat, No. 80—Haydn; Duet, piano and violoncello, B flat, op. 45—Mendelssohn; Quartet, E minor, op. 45, No. 2—Spohr; Trio, piano, violin, and violoncello, E flat, op. 70—Beethoven; Selection, piano-forte solo—Chopin and Mendelssohn.

The players in the quartets were MM. Molique, Goffrie, Hill, and Piatti. The quartets of Haydn and Spohr were well contrasted, besides being favorable specimens of the masters. The execution was little short of faultless. The finish, precision, and chaste refinement of Herr Molique's playing, make him quite invaluable in quartets. Mr. Goffrie is one of the best "second violins" we know; and Mr. Hill is still unmatched at the viola. Signor Piatti is the greatest violoncellist in Europe—which has often been said before, but must re-suggest itself on every fresh occasion of hearing him. In Mendelssohn's fine sonata (the first of the two violoncello duets), he "shone like a star;" his execution was, indeed, incomparable. The trio of Beethoven, a mighty work, was marvellously well given by all three performers. The pianist was Mr. Charles Hallé, one of the grandest players in the world; and the piano-forte was one of those gorgeously-toned instruments that have lately issued in such profusion from our great English manufactory, which set competition at defiance, and, in the future history of music, will entitle the makers to a place beside the Stradavari, Guarnieri, and Amati, of Italy, whose violins and violoncellos have never been equalled. Mr. Hallé (who may be styled pianist to His Highness, the Director of the Musical Union—so often does he play at Mr. Ella's concerts—and he cannot play too often for the pleasure of the subscribers and our own), was equally successful in the duet of Mendelssohn and the trio of Beethoven. His playing was intellectual, and his mechanism unerring. The short solo pieces, introduced by Mr. Hallé at the end, comprised one of the nocturnes of Chopin, and one of the Lieder ohne Worte of Mendelssohn—No. 1, Book 6, in E flat.

The Record of Mr. Ella continues—as chatty, critical, noisy, and pleasant as ever. Neither the Winter nor the Summer "Sittings" at Willis's Rooms would be themselves without it.—London Mus. World, March 4.

PARIS. The correspondent of the London Musical World furnishes the following chronicle of musical events during the latter half of February:

Mdlle. Wertheimer appeared for the first time on the 13th instant, at the Opéra, as fides in the Prophète. She was tolerably successful, but could not have appeared at a less favorable moment, as Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli engrosses all the attention of the public. A new opera called Maitre Wolfgang has been accepted at the théâtre Lyrique. The music is by M. Ernest Rey, and the libretto by Messieurs Méry and Théophile Gautier. The management of the Théâtre Italien courts alternately the comic and the serious muse. The Sonnambula has been succeeded by the Elisir, but, although the style of the operas vary, the principal actress remains the same. Under the delicate and coquettish features of Adina, we recognize the tender Aminta, although greatly altered. Her lips, which opened but to pour forth her sorrows, are wreathed with smiles; her eyes, formerly drowned in tears, flash forth sparkling light, and her voice, smothered by sobs, has recovered its freshness and brilliancy. Such a transformation belongs to great artists alone; it is a gift which Mdlle. Frezzolini possesses. If this charming cantatrice would but determine not to substitute her own music for that of the composer! Rossi was Dulcamara; Tamburini, Belcore; and Gardoni, Nemorino.

The third concert of the Société Sante Cécile, under the direction of Messrs. Seghers and J. B. Wekerlin, took place on Sunday week. Weber's Preciosa formed one of the attractions. Mdlle. Nissen sang an air from Spohr's Faust. The Minuetto of a quartet by Mendelssohn was then executed by all the stringed instruments (!), and the concert concluded with Mozart's eighth, and least-known, symphony (in D).—The new symphony of M. Lefebure-Wély was executed on the same day by the orchestra of the Jeunes Artistes, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup, in the Salle Herz. It was successful.—Mdlle. Ugalé has returned to Paris, after an absence of five months. She is said to have derived great benefit from her trip to the South. Félix Godefroid and Emile Prudent have also come back. M. Erard's Saloons are to be shortly opened in honor of Mdlle. Rosalie Spohr, the harpist, a relative of the celebrated composer, Dr. Spohr.

Madame Tedesco passed through Paris last week en route from Brussels to Lyons. M. Roqueplan has refused to prolong her congé. Madame Bosio has achieved a great success in Rossini's Moïse. Mademoiselle Dameron sings the music of Amenophis charmingly, and looks very interesting. This splendid opera, with Madame Bosio, Mdlle. Dameron, and Messrs. Obin, Chapusi and Brignoli, helps to back up the still increasing success of Sophie Cruvelli in the Huguenots. The admirers of Spontini are awaiting impatiently the production of La Vestale, which, it is expected, will be brought out next Monday. The receipts of the Huguenots continue at their maximum. M. Gounod's opera is in full rehearsal. The two principal parts are confided to Mdlle. Poinot and M. Gueymard. La Nonne Sanglante, it is expected, will be ready about the middle of May. Sophie Cruvelli's congé begins on the first of June.

At the Opéra-Comique, besides the two-net opera of M. Bazin, a new work in three acts, by M. Victor Massé, author of Galatée and the Noces de Jeannette, has been rehearsed.—La Fille Invisible, a new opera, in three acts, music by Adrien Boieldieu, libretto by M. de Saint-Georges, has been given at the Théâtre-Lyrique with success. The music of M. Adrien Boieldieu (son of the great Boieldieu) is much in the same style as his former works—neither better nor worse.—A comic opera in three acts, from the combined pens of MM. de Leuven, Brunswick, and Louis Clapissin, for Madame Cabel and M. Laurent, will succeed La Fille Invisible. Donizetti's Elizabeth still continues its career. In less than two months it has been performed thirty times. An opera, in one act, by M. Rey, composer of Sélim, has been accepted.

At the Italiens, Don Juan has been revived with immense success. The cast was powerful—Madame Frezzolini, Donna Anna; Madame Cambardi, Elvira; Mad. Alboni, Zerlina; Signor Sussini, the Commandant; Signor Della Aste, Leporello; Sig. Mario, Ottavio; and Sig. Tamburini, Don Juan. Mario created a furor in "Il mio tesoro;" Alboni sang all her music exquisitely, and was encored in "Batti Batti," which, as well as "Vedrai carino," she gave in the right key. Tamburini is still the beau idéal of Don Juan.

Madame Rossi-Caccia has arrived in Paris. She will sing shortly at the Salle Saint-Cécile, in a concert given under the immediate patronage of some ladies of high distinction. Mad. Rossi-Caccia, during her absence from Paris, has been singing at several of the principal towns of Europe. In 1853, she was at the Theatre San Carlo, at Lisbon, when she appeared in Lucrezia Borgia, Linda di Chamouni, Anna Bolena, I Martiri, and an opera composed expressly for her by Mignone. Madame Rossi-Caccia, we are told, has declined a very lucrative engagement at the Theatre Royal, Turin—where, by the way, the opera is shut up. The concert of the Juvenile pianist, Theodore Ritter, attracted a large assembly. This little fellow is, in reality, an extraordinary performer. He is a true musical phenomenon, and, if not spoiled by over praise and over work, promises to rise to the highest eminence in his art. He played a Fugue, Garotte, et Musette, of Bach, and obtained a rapturous encore. He was also forced to repeat a morceau, founded on the cavatina in Verdi's Ernani. He displays a real feeling for music, and his playing exhibits both taste and expression. In short, he is a prodigy, and must be heard.

HAMBURG.—Auber's Marco Spada has been produced with success. The prima donna, Fraulein Babinig, leaves shortly for Rio Janeiro, where she is engaged at an annual salary of 30,000 francs. The next musical novelty is to be Mr. Pierson's music to the second part of Faust. Mr. Pierson is the author of the oratorio of "Jerusalem," which was brought out two years ago at the Norwich Festival.—Theresa Milanollo has given four concerts to crowded houses.

VIENNA.—The representation of Don Juan, on the 17th, was the 344th in Vienna. The house was densely crowded. On the 17th of February, the third concert this year was given by the Akademie der Tonkunst. It was to have taken place on the 3d of February, in celebration of Mendelssohn's birthday, but was unavoidably postponed. The programme consisted entirely of works by that great master. The various pieces, vocal and instrumental, were entrusted to pupils of the Academy, and, as the latter has not been long established, the execution (of the instrumental pieces especially) was a task beyond the strength of the performers. The first part, consequently, went off in anything but a satisfactory manner. The second was far superior. The choruses: Herbstlied, Lerehengesang, and "Es wird ein Stern aus Jacob aufgehen," were admirably rendered. Fräulein Purkinje sang two songs, Sonntagsslied and Frühlingslied (the latter in the Suabian dialect), very well, and was unanimously encored. Fräulein Hauke was equally successful in the charming Erlentied, and the incomparable "Da liegt' ich unter den Bäumen," found among Mendelssohn's papers after his death. The choruses were under the direction of Herr Storch. On the 19th of February, the second concert of the violoncellist, Heinrich Schmit, from Moscow, took place in the Musikvereinsaal.—M. Vieuxtemps lately gave his third concert in the Theater an der Wien to a very crowded audience. He played his concertos in E major and A major, his Norma fantasia on one string, the Caprice-Fantaisie, the variations on Yankee Doodle, Les Arpèges, the Andante Spianato, and the Carnival of Venice. M. Vieuxtemps was rapturously applauded in all of them. The programme was varied by some overtures, under the direction of Herr Suppé with songs by Herr Rudolf, Messdames Rudini and Schiller.—Herr Stockhausen's first concert took place on the 26th of February. The principal attractions were Mlle Cruvelli, sister of Sophie Cruvelli, (whose singing produced quite a sensation,) and M. Vieuxtemps.

MOORE'S ENCYCLOPEDIA OF MUSIC:

COMPILED BY JOHN W. MOORE,

With the assistance of other distinguished men in the musical world. The intention of the author is to make a most complete and thorough work of the above, which will be a desideratum in the world of music. It will be published in one elegant Royal Octavo volume of about 900 pages, double columns, and will contain a complete

Dictionary of Musical Terms,A HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE OF MUSIC,

from the earliest time to the present, a

Treatise on Harmony and Thorough Bass,

a description of all known MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, with the names of the most distinguished makers, and a complete Musical Biography of over three thousand of the most distinguished Composers and Musicians who have ever lived. Mr. Moore has spent several years in compiling this valuable work. It is now going through the press as rapidly as will comport with accuracy.

P. S.—The above splendid work, which will prove invaluable to every professional musician, and to every amateur, will be ready this spring; we hope in the month of March. It has been delayed on account of the immense labor bestowed upon it, and the difficulty of stereotyping a work so full of examples. The delay, however, will enhance the value of the work.

The price, bound in cloth, will be... $4 00.

The price, bound in half calf, will be... $4 50.

The best Primary Book on Thorough Bass ever issued.

FIRST STEPS IN THOROUGH BASS,

IN TWELVE FAMILIAR LESSONS, ARRANGED IN THE DIALOGUE FORM. BY A TEACHER OF MUSIC.

The mode of instruction carried out in this work has by positive experience proved efficacious in imparting to a pupil of ten years of age, as also to any one who may be ignorant of the subject, correct ideas of the abstruse science of Thorough Bass. "The progress made by those who have learned Thorough Bass in this manner," say the author, "has been so rapid (I had almost said astonishing,) that I have been urged to communicate my method of teaching it to the public, by many good judges who have witnessed its effects with surprise; and though I acknowledge this to be an assertion introduced into prefaces as the names of the publishers are inserted in title pages, it happens in this instance, to be literally true."
